exorbitantly prolix, as well as the foregoing remonſtrance, I believed it neceſſary to inſert the whole, that the reader, by comparing them together, may be able to form a clearer idea of the cauſes and origin of the diviſions between King and parliament thro' the whole courſe of this reign.

The King's declaration, notifying the cauſes of aſſembling and diſſolving the two laſt parliaments.

June 13. Ruſhworth, p. 406. Annals, p. 203.

" THE King's moſt excellent Majeſty, ſince " his happy acceſs to the imperial crown of " this realm, having by his royal authority ſum- " moned and aſſembled two ſeveral parliaments; the " firſt whereof was in Auguſt laſt, by adjournment " held at Oxford, and there diſſolved; and the " other began in February laſt, and continued until " the fifteenth day of this preſent month of June, " and then, to the unſpeakable grief of himſelf, " and (as he believeth) of all his good and well- " affected ſubjects, diſſolved alſo: altho' he well " knoweth that the calling, adjourning, proroguing " and diſſolving parliaments, being his great " council of the kingdom, do peculiarly belong " unto himſelf by an undoubted prerogative inſe- " parably united to his imperial crown; of which, " as of his other royal actions, he is not bound to " give account to any but to God only, whoſe " immediate lieutenant and vicegerent he is in " theſe realms and dominions, by the divine pro- " vidence commited to his charge and government. " Yet foraſmuch as, by the aſſiſtance of the Al- " mighty, his purpoſe is ſo to order himſelf and all " his actions, eſpecially in the great and public " actions of ſtate, concerning the weal of his king- " doms, as may juſtify themſelves, not only to his " own conſcience, and to his own people, but to " the whole world; his Majeſty hath thought it fit " and neceſſary, as the affairs now ſtand both at " home and abroad, to make a true, plain and " clear declaration of the cauſes which moved his " Majeſty to aſſemble, and after inforced him to " diſſolve theſe parliaments, that ſo the mouth of " malice itſelf may be ſtoped, and the doubts and " fears of his own good ſubjects at home, and of " his friends and allies abroad may be ſatisfied, and " the deſerved blame of ſo unhappy accidents may " juſtly light upon the authors thereof.

" When his Majeſty, by the death of his dear " and royal father, of ever bleſſed memory, firſt " came to the crown, he found himſelf ingaged in " a war with a potent enemy; not undertaken " raſhly, nor without juſt and honorable grounds, " but inforced for the neceſſary defenſe of himſelf " and his dominions; for the ſupport of his friends " and allies; for redeeming the ancient honor of " this nation; for recovering the patrimony of his " dear ſiſter, her conſort, and their children, in- " juriouſly, and under color of treaties and friend- " ſhip, taken from them, and for maintenance of " the true religion, and invited thereunto, and in- " couraged therein by the humble advice of both " the houſes of parliament, and by the large pro- " miſes and proteſtations to his late Majeſty, to " give him full and real aſſiſtance in thoſe enter- " priſes, which were of ſo great importance to this " realm, and to the general peace and ſafety of all " his friends and allies; but when his Majeſty " entered into a view of his treaſure, he found how " ill provided he was to proceed effectually with " ſo great an action, unleſs he might be aſſured to " receive ſuch ſupplies from his loving ſubjects, " as might inable him to manage the ſame.

" Hereupon his Majeſty, being willing to tread " in the ſteps of his royal progenitors, for the " making good and wholſome laws; for the better " government of his people; for the right under- " ſtanding their true grievances, and for the " ſupply of monies to be imployed for thoſe public " ſervices, did reſolve to ſummon a parliament " with all the convenient ſpeed he might, and " finding a former parliament already called in the " life of his father, he was deſirous, for the ſpeedier " diſpatch of his weighty affairs, and gaining time, " to have continued the ſame without any alteration " of the members thereof, had he not been adviſed " to the contrary by his judges and council at law, " which he deſired to avoid. But as ſoon as poſſible " he could, he ſummoned a new parliament, which " he did with much confidence and aſſurance of the " love of his people, that thoſe (who had not long " before, with ſome importunity won his father to " break off his former treaties with Spain, and to " effect it had uſed the mediation of his now Ma- " jeſty, being then Prince, and a member of the " parliament, and had promiſed in parliament " their utmoſt aſſiſtance for the inabling his late " Majeſty to undergo the war, which they then " foreſaw might follow) would aſſuredly have " performed it to his now Majeſty, and would " not have ſuffered him, in his firſt enterpriſe of " great expectation, to have run the leaſt hazard " thro' their defaults.

" This parliament (after ſome adjournment, by " reaſon of his Majeſty's unavoidable occaſions in- " terpoſing) being aſſembled on the eighteenth day " of June, it is true, that his commons in parlia- " ment, taking into their due and ſerious conſidera- " tion the manifold occaſions which, at his firſt " entry, did preſs his Majeſty, and his moſt im- " portant affairs which, both at home and abroad, " were then in action, did, with great readineſs " and alacrity, as a pledge of their moſt bounden " duty and thankfulneſs, and as the firſt-fruits of " the moſt dutiful affections of his loving and loyal " ſubjects, devoted to his ſervice, preſent his Ma- " jeſty with the free and chearful gift of two intire " ſubſidies: which their gift, and much more the " freeneſs and heartineſs expreſſed in the giving " thereof, his Majeſty did thankfully and lovingly " accept. But when he had more narrowly entered " into the conſideration of his great affairs, wherein " he was imbarked, and from which he could not, " without much diſhonor and diſadvantage, with- " draw his hand, he found that this ſum of money " was much ſhort of that which of neceſſity muſt " be preſently expended for the ſeting forward thoſe " great actions, which, by advice of his council, " he had undertaken, and were that ſummer to be " purſued. This his Majeſty imparted to his " commons houſe of parliament; but before the " ſame could receive that debate and due conſidera- " tion which was fit, the fearful viſitation of the " plague in and about the cities of London and " Weſtminſter, where the lords and the principal " gentlemen of quality of his whole kingdom were; " for the time of this their ſervice, lodged and " abiding, did ſo much increaſe, that his Majeſty, " without extreme peril to the lives of his good " ſubjects, which were dear unto him, could not " continue the parliament any longer in that " place.

" His Majeſty therefore, on the eleventh day " of July then following, adjourned the parliament " from Weſtminſter, until the firſt day of Auguſt " then following, at the city of Oxford. And his " Highneſs was ſo careful to accommodate his lords " and commons there, that as he made choice of " that place, being then the freeſt of all others " from the danger of that grievous ſickneſs, ſo he " there fited the parliament-men with all things " convenient for their entertainment: and his Ma- " jeſty himſelf, being in his own heart ſincere and " free from all ends upon his people, which the " ſearcher

Charles I An' 1626.

" ſearcher of hearts beſt knoweth, little expected
" that any miſ-conſtruction of his actions would " have been made, as he there found. But when " the parliament had been a while aſſembled, and " his Majeſty's affairs opened unto them, and a
" farther ſupply deſired as neceſſity required, he " found them ſo ſlow, and ſo full of delays and
" diverſions in their reſolutions, that, before any " thing could be determined, the fearful contagion
" daily increaſed, and was diſperſed into all parts
" of this kingdom, and came home even to their " doors where they aſſembled. His Majeſty there" fore rather prefered the ſafety of his people from
" that preſent and viſible danger, than the providing
" for that which was more remote but no leſs dan" gerous to the ſtate of this kingdom, and of the " affars of that part of Chriſtendom which then
" were and yet are in friendſhip and alliance with " his Majeſty. And thereupon his Majeſty, not " being then able to diſcern when it might pleaſe
" God to ſtay his hand of viſitation, nor what
" place might be more ſecure than other, at a time
" convenient for their re-aſſembling, his Majeſty
" diſſolved that parliament.

" That parliament being now ended, his Ma-
" jeſty did not therewith caſt off his royal care of " his great and important affairs; but, by the " advice of his privy council, and of his council of " war, he continued his preparations and former
" reſolutions; and therein not only expended thoſe
" monies, which by the two ſubſidies aforeſaid
" were given unto him for his own private uſe,
" whereof he had too much occaſion, as he found
" the ſtate of his exchequer at his firſt entrance,
" but added much more of his own, as by his
" credit, and the credit of ſome of his ſervants,
" he was able to compaſs the ſame. At laſt, with " much diſadvantage, by the retarding of pro-
" viſions, and uncertainty of the means, his navy
" was prepared and ſet to ſea, and the deſigns unto
" which they were ſent, and eſpecially directed,
" were ſo probable, and ſo well adviſed, that, had
" they not miſcarried in the execution, his Majeſty
" is well aſſured they would have given good ſatiſ-
" faction, not only to his own people but to all
" the world, that they were not lightly or unad-
" viſedly undertaken and purſued. But it pleaſed
" God, who is the Lord of Hoſts, and unto whoſe
" providence and good pleaſure his Majeſty doth,
" and ſhall ſubmit himſelf, and all his indeavors,
" not to give that ſucceſs which was deſired: and
" yet were thoſe attempts not altogether ſo fruitleſs
" as the envy of the times hath apprehended, the " enemy receiving thereby no ſmall loſs, nor our " party no little advantage. And it would much
" avail to farther his Majeſty's great affairs, and
" the peace of Chriſtendom, which ought to be
" the true end of all hoſtility, were theſe firſt be-
" ginings, which are moſt ſubject to miſcarry,
" well ſeconded and purſued, as his Majeſty in" tended, and, as in the judgment of all men con-
" verſant in his actions of this nature, were fit not " to have been neglected.

" Theſe things being thus acted, and God of " his infinite goodneſs, beyond expectation, aſſuag-
" ing the rage of the peſtilence, and, in a manner,
" on a ſudden reſtoring health and ſafety to the " cities of London and Weſtminſter, which are
" the fiteſt places for the reſort of his Majeſty, his " lords and commons, to meet in parliament; his
" Majeſty, in the depth of winter, no ſooner
" deſcried the probability of a ſafe aſſembling of " his people, and in his princely wiſdom and pro-
" vidence foreſaw that, if the opportunity of ſeaſon
" ſhould be omited, preparations both defenſive
" and offenſive could not be made in ſuch ſort as
" was requiſite for their common ſafety, but he
" adviſed and reſolved on ſummoning a new par" liament, where he might freely communicate the " neceſſities of the ſtate, and the counſel and advice
" of the lords and commons in parliament, who " were the repreſentative body of the whole king" dom, and the great couſel of the realm, might
" proceed in theſe enterpriſes, and be inabled there-
" unto, which concern the common good, ſafety
" and honor both of Prince and people; and ac" cordingly, the ſixth of February laſt, a new " parliament was begun. At the firſt meeting,
" his Majeſty did forbear to preſs them with any " thing which might have the leaſt appearance of " his own intereſt, but recommended unto them
" the care of making good laws, which are the " ordinary ſubject for a parliament.

" His Majeſty, believing that they could not " have ſuffered many days, much leſs many weeks,
" to have paſſed by before the apprehenſion and
" care of the common ſafety of this kingdom, and
" the true religion profeſſed and maintained therein,
" and of our friends and allies, who muſt proſper
" or ſuffer with us, would have led them to a due
" and timely conſideration of all the means which " might beſt conduce to thoſe ends; which the " lords of the higher houſe, by a commitee of that
" houſe, did timely and ſeaſonably conſider of,
" and invited the commons to a conference con" cerning that great buſineſs: at which conference,
" there were opened unto them the great occaſions
" which preſſed his Majeſty; which making no
" impreſſion with them, his Majeſty did, firſt by
" meſſage and after by letters, put the houſe of " commons in mind of that which was moſt neceſ-
" ſary, the defenſe of the kingdom, and due and
" timely preparations for the ſame.

" The commons houſe after this, on the twenty-
" ſeventh of March laſt, with one unanimous con-
" ſent at firſt, agreed to give unto his Majeſty
" three intire ſubſidies, and three fifteenths, for a
" preſent ſupply unto him; and on the twenty-ſixth
" of April after, upon ſecond cogitations, they " added a fourth ſubſidy, and ordered the days of " payment for them all, whereof the firſt ſhould
" have been on the laſt day of this preſent June.
" Upon this, the King of Denmark, and other
" Princes and ſtates, being ingaged with his Ma-
" jeſty in this common cauſe, his Majeſty fited
" his occaſions according to the times which were " appointed for the payment of thoſe ſubſidies and
" fifteenths, and haſted on the lords commitees,
" and his council of war, to perfect their reſolu-
" tions for the ordering and ſettling his deſigns;
" which they accordingly did, and brought them
" to that maturity, that they found no impediment
" to a final concluſion of their counſels, but want
" of money to put things into action. His Ma-
" jeſty hereupon, who had with much patience ex" pected the real performance of that which the " commons had promiſed, finding the time of the " year poſting away, and having intelligence, not " only from his own miniſters and ſubjects in foreign
" parts, but from all parts of Chriſtendom, of " the great and powerful preparations of the King
" of Spain, and that his deſign was upon this " kingdom, or the kingdom of Ireland, or both,
" (and it is hard to determine which of them would " be of worſe conſequence) he acquainted the houſe
" of commons therewith, and laid open unto them,
" truly and clearly, how the ſtate of things then
" ſtood, and yet ſtand, and at ſeveral times, and " upon ſeveral occaſions reiterated the ſame. But " that houſe, being abuſed by the violent and ill-
" adviſed paſſions of a few members of the houſe,
" for private and perſonal ends ill beſeeming
" public perſons truſted by their country, as then
" they were, not only neglected but wilfully refuſed

" Notwithſtanding which letter read in the " houſe, being a clear and gracious manifeſt of his " Majeſty's reſolutions, they never ſo much as ad- " mited one reading to the bill of ſubſidies, but " inſtead thereof they prepared and voted a re- " monſtrance or declaration, which they intended " to prefer to his Majeſty, containing (tho' palliated " with gloſſing terms) as well diſhonorable aſper- " ſions upon his Majeſty, and upon the ſacred " memory of his deceaſed father, as alſo dilatory " excuſes for their not proceeding with the ſub- " ſidies, adding thereto alſo colored conditions, " croſſing thereby his Majeſty's direction; which " his Majeſty underſtanding, and eſteeming (as he " had cauſe) to be a denial of the promiſed ſupply, " and finding that no admonitions could move, no " reaſons or perſuaſions could prevail, when the " time was ſo far paſſed that they had put an im- " poſſibility upon themſelves to perform their pro- " miſes, which they eſteemed all gracious meſſages " unto them to be but interruptions: his Majeſty, " upon mature adviſement, diſcerning that all " farther patience would prove fruitleſs, on the " fifteenth day of this preſent month, he hath diſ- " ſolved this unhappy parliament; the acting " whereof, as it was to his Majeſty unexpreſſible " grief, ſo the memory thereof doth renew the " hearty ſorrow which all his good and well-affected " ſubjects will compaſſionate with him.

" Theſe paſſages his Majeſty hath, at the more " length, and with the true circumſtances thereof, " expreſſed and publiſhed to the world, leſt that " which hath been unfortunate in itſelf, thro' the " malice of the author of ſo great a miſchief, and " the malevolent report of ſuch as are ill-affected " to this ſtate, or the true religion here profeſſed, " or the fears and jealouſies of friends and faithful " ſubjects, might be made more unfortunate in the " conſequences of it, which may be of worſe effect " than at firſt can be well apprehended; and his " Majeſty being beſt privy to the integrity of his " own heart, for the conſtant maintaining of the " ſincerity and unity of the true religion profeſſed " in the church of England, and to free it from " the open contagion of Popery, and ſecret in- " fection of ſchiſm, of both which, by his public " acts and actions, he hath given good teſtimony, " and with a ſingle heart, as in the preſenſe of " God, who can beſt judge thereof, purpoſeth re- " ſolutely and conſtantly to proceed in the due " execution of either; and, obſerving the ſubtilty " of the adverſe party, he cannot but believe, that " the hand of Joab hath been in this diſaſter, that " the common incendiaries of Chriſtendom have " ſubtilly and ſecretly inſinuated thoſe things, which " unhappily (and, as his Majeſty hopeth, beyond " the intentions of the actors) have cauſed theſe " diverſions and diſtractions. And yet notwith- " ſtanding, his moſt excellent Majeſty, for the " comfort of his good and well-affected ſubjects, " in whoſe loves he doth repoſe himſelf with con- " fidence, and eſteemeth it as his greateſt riches: " for the aſſuring of his friends and allies, with " whom, by God's aſſiſtance, he will not break in " the ſubſtance of what he hath undertaken; for " the diſcouraging of his adverſaries, and the ad- " verſaries of his cauſe, and of his dominions and " religion, hath put on this reſolution, which he " doth hereby publiſh to all the world, that as " God hath made him King of this great people, " and large dominions, famous in former ages " both by land and ſea, and truſted him to be a " father and protector both of their perſons and " fortunes, and a defender of the faith and true re- " ligion; ſo he will go on chearfully and conſtantly " in the defenſe thereof, and (notwithſtanding ſo " many difficulties and diſcouragements) will take " his ſcepter and ſword into his hand, and not ex- " poſe the perſons of the people commited to his " charge to the unſatiable deſires of the King of " Spain, who hath long thirſted after the univerſal " monarchy, nor their conſciencies to the yoke of " the Pope of Rome: and that at home he will " take that care to redreſs the juſt grievances of " his good ſubjects, as ſhall every way be fit for a " good King.

CHARLES I AN' 1626.

" And in the mean time, his Majeſty doth publiſh " this to all his loving ſubjects, that they may " know what to think with truth, and ſpeak with " duty of his Majeſty's actions and proceedings in " theſe two laſt diſſolved parliaments."

Given at his Majeſty's palace at Whitehall, this thirteenth day of June, in the ſecond year of his Majeſty's reign of Great Britain, France and Ireland.

Remarks on the declaration.

This declaration, which ſeems to be in the ſame ſtile with the lord-keeper Coventry's harangues, full of long periods and parentheſes, does, under a vaſt heap of words, contain only two eſſentials, viz. King Charles's two motives for diſſolving the two laſt parliaments. Therein it is alledged, that the plague, which approached Oxford, occaſioned the diſſolution of the firſt: but this reaſon, which ſeems plauſible, proves at moſt but a neceſſity to diſ- continue the parliament, which might as eaſily have been done by prorogation, as by intire diſſolution: and farther, when this declaration was publiſhed, all knew what the commons had ſaid in their re- monſtrance, that the end of diſſolving the firſt was to exclude from the inſuing parliament ſuch mem- bers as had been againſt the duke of Buckingham, by cauſing them to be appointed ſheriffs of their reſpective counties. With regard to diſſolving the ſecond, it is, in the declaration, wholly grounded on his Majeſty's being pleaſed to conſider as a poſitive refuſal the commons delay to ſupply him with money, tho' they affirmed the contrary: but none were ſo blind as not to perceive their demand, that he would vouchſafe to remove Buckingham from his preſenſe, and apprehenſion of what ill ſucceſs might attend the impeachment againſt his ſaid grace, were the true cauſes of this diſſolution. Thus the declaration had no great effect among the people, who beſide were not under any dread of that pretended invaſion of England or Ireland by the Spaniards, notwithſtanding Charles did his utmoſt to inſpire them with this apprehenſion. It was ſomewhat extraordinary that, within little more than a year, the war, which was undertaken for re- covering the Palatinate, ſhould be metamorphoſed into a defenſive war for the preſervation of his Majeſty's dominions, and ſupport of the church of England, tho' the Engliſh had not yet received any check.

A few days after the declaration's appearance, came out two proclamations which afforded ample matter matter of diſcourſe to ſuch as were not in the court's ſecrets. By the firſt, his Majeſty commanded all perſons who had any copies of the commons remonſtrance to burn it, on pain of his higheſt diſpleaſure. But generally ſuch precautions ſerve only to cauſe the prohibited writings to be more carefully preſerved. The King's injunction could not prevent this remonſtrance's being tranſmited to poſterity.

Proclamation to ſuppreſs the remonſtrance. Ruſhworth, p. 411. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVIII. p. 721.

The ſecond proclamation contained very expreſs commands, not to preach or diſpute upon the controverted points of Arminianiſm, either for or againſt them, under color that ſuch ſort of diſputes ſerved only to breed contention. But many were of opinion, that Laud biſhop of London, and Neile biſhop of Winchester, had procured this injunction to cruſh ſuch orthodox miniſters as ſhould preſume to infringe it, while diſobedience in thoſe of the adverſe party ſhould be connived at. Certain it is that the next parliament complained to his Majeſty that the orthodox miniſters were ſilenced for diſobeying this proclamation, and the Arminians tolerated and countenanced. Theſe matters appertained to the high-commiſſion, in a manner wholly compoſed of the creatures of Laud and Neile, heads and protectors of the Arminians, or at leaſt they were ſo reputed.

Another proclamation not to diſpute for or againſt Arminianiſm. Ruſhworth, p. 412. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVIII. p. 719. Annals.

The King prevents Buckingham's being accuſed in the ſtar-chamber.

Mean while, an information was, by his Majeſty's ſpecial command, prefered in the ſtar-chamber againſt Buckingham, for having adminiſtered to the late King thoſe before-mentioned potions, &c. but withal, it was ſo ordered that the cauſe came not to a hearing.

The means uſed by King Charles to raiſe money. Ruſhworth, p. 413, &c. Annals.

Charles, not receiving from the parliament any aid, becauſe he would not purchaſe it at the rate ſet by the commons, was greatly ſtraitened (1). He was to maintain a war againſt the houſe of Auſtria, to ſupply his allies with the promiſed ſuccors, and to put his kingdom in a defenſible poſture. As all this could not be effected by his ordinary revenues, recourſe muſt be had to expedients for repleniſhing his coffers. Some of them I ſhall here mention ſucceſſively, tho' they were not all at once put in practiſe.

Ruſhworth, ibid. * For two years. Ibid. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVIII. p. 729, 851, 922. Annals, p. 206.

The firſt was a proclamation inhibiting * all perſons to preſent or ſollicit any ſuit tending to the diminution of his Majeſty's revenues.

The ſecond was a commiſſion directed to the archbiſhop of York and others, to compound with Popiſh recuſants, not only for all forfeitures (2), due ſince the tenth year of King James, but alſo for ſuch as ſhall become due hereafter. This commiſſion was directly contrary to his promiſe to the parliament at Oxford: but as he could not obtain money of the late parliament, only on ſuch conditions as he thought not fit to comply with, he judged himſelf authoriſed to ſupply his occaſions by ſome other methods.

Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVIII. p. 739, 741, 786.

The third was a proclamation, declaring the King's reſolution to make his revenue certain, by granting his lands, as well holden in copy as otherwiſe, to be holden in fee-farm.

Ruſhworth, p. 415.

The fourth was a loan, from every peer, of a certain ſum for defenſe of the kingdom. But his attempt to borrow a hundred thouſand pounds from the city of London did not ſucceed, the citizens deſiring to be excuſed.

ibid. Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 53.

The fifth was an impoſition upon the ſeveral ports and maritime counties, to furniſh and ſet out a certain number of ſhips to protect the trade. The city of London having refuſed lending money to his Majeſty, was appointed to equip twenty ſhips, or at leaſt to find a ſum ſufficient for that purpoſe. As this tax was peculiar to maritime towns, many inhabitants of ſuch places retired elſewhere: but they were commanded by proclamation to return to their reſpective abodes.

Charles I An' 1626.

Laſtly, the council iſſued very ſtrict orders, that the payment of tonage and poundage ſhould be continued; tho' the King had yet no grant from the parliament; tho' he had never demanded any ſuch thing, and tho' the commons had complained of the levying theſe impoſts as a grievance, in the remonſtrance they had prepared.

Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVIII. p. 729, 737. Ruſhworth.

A faſt injoined. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVIII. p. 725. Ruſhworth, p. 416.

But to let the people ſee it was purely thro' neceſſity that their Sovereign made uſe of theſe extraordinary methods to raiſe money, his Majeſty ordered a general faſt † to divert Heaven's judgments ready to fall on the kingdom, by the pretended invaſion wherewith it was menaced. This furniſhed him likewiſe with a pretext to require the lords-lieutenants of the ſeveral counties to muſter and arm the militia, and put them in condition to withſtand the invaſions of enemies from abroad, and quell the rebellions of ſubjects at home, if any ſhould happen (3): for the court was not free from apprehenſion of ſome commotions.

The King of Denmark's defeat. Ruſhworth, p. 417. Annals.

The means hitherto uſed by King Charles to raiſe money, ſufficed not to extricate him from a freſh imbaraſs ariſing from a very unexpected event. The King of Denmark, his uncle, whom he had ingaged in a war with the Emperor, was defeated, the 27th of Auguſt, by count Tilly, with the loſs of all his baggage and train of artillery. This accident put Charles under a neceſſity of procuring wherewithal to ſupport his uncle, whoſe affairs were in a moſt indifferent ſituation, and who, if not ſpeedily relieved, could not avoid making peace with his Imperial Majeſty. The method judged propereſt to raiſe money on this urgent occaſion, was by a general loan from the ſubject, anſwerably to each perſon's aſſeſment in the ſubſidies uſually granted by parliaments. It is true, Charles gave his royal word, that all the money ſhould be repaid without fee or charge: but the performance of his promiſe was not relied on, as afterwards appeared. The King himſelf, as well as his council, expected to meet with many obſtacles in executing this project; ſuch forced loans not being agreeable to the nation: it was moreover feared, that this way of raiſing money upon the ſubject would finally render parliaments uſeleſs. For this reaſon, the council judged it proper to make uſe of three methods to ſucceed in their deſign: 1. Of ſome artifice to oblige the people, as much as poſſible, to lend freely: 2. Of fear, to terrify the irreſolute: 3. Of rigor to compel the moſt obſtinate. Hereon were grounded thoſe inſtructions the council gave their commiſſioners appointed in the ſeveral counties to levy this loan. The inſtructions themſelves here follow: viz.

" rate

CHARLES I AN' 1626.

" rate and value amounts to at which they are " rated and ſet; as (namely) he who is ſet a hundred pounds in goods, to lend a hundred marks; " and he who is ſet a hundred pounds in land, to " lend a hundred pounds in money; and ſo per " rata for a greater or leſſer ſum.

" III. To uſe all poſſible indeavors to cauſe " every man willingly and chearfully to lend, opening unto them the neceſſity and unavoidableneſs " of this courſe; the honor and reputation of the " nation; the true religion and common ſafety of " Prince and people, of our friends and allies ingaged in the common cauſe; that there is no time " now of diſputing, but of acting.

" IV. That they appoint the days of payment " to be within fourteen days, and perſuade ſuch as " ſhall be able to pay it at one intire payment, the " better to accommodate his Majeſty's occaſion; " otherwiſe to accept of the one half at fourteen " days, and the other to be paid before the twentieth of December now next inſuing.

" V. That they treat apart with every one of " thoſe who are to lend, and not in the preſenſe or " hearing of any other, unleſs they ſee cauſe to the " contrary. And if any ſhall refuſe to lend, and " ſhall make delays or excuſes, and perſiſt in their " obſtinacy, that they examine ſuch perſons upon " oath, whether they have been dealed withal to " deny or refuſe to lend, or make excuſes for not " lending? Who hath dealed ſo with him, and " what ſpeeches or perſuaſions he or they have uſed " to him, tending to that purpoſe? And that they " ſhall alſo charge every ſuch perſon, in his Ma" jeſty's name, upon his allegiance, not to diſcloſe " to any other what his anſwer was.

" VI. That they ſhew their diſcretion and affections, by making choice of ſuch to begin with as " are likely to ſet the beſt examples; and when " they have a competent number of hands to the " roll or liſt of the leaders, that they ſhew the ſame " to others to lead them in like manner.

" VII. That they indeavor to diſcover whether " any, publicly or underhand, be workers or perſuaders of others to diſſent from, or diſlike of " this courſe, or hinder the good diſpoſition of " others: and that, as much as they may, they " hinder all diſcourſe about it, and certify to the " privy-council, in writing, the names, qualities " and dwelling-places of all ſuch refractory perſons, " with all ſpeed, and eſpecially if they ſhall diſcover any combination or confederacy againſt theſe " proceedings.

" VIII. That they notify to all whom it may " concern, that his Majeſty is well pleaſed, on " lending theſe ſums required, to remit all that " which by letters, in his name, was deſired upon " the late benevolence for free-grant; and whatever hath been already paid upon that account, " ſhall be accepted for part of this loan; and if " it exceed the ſum deſired, that the overplus ſhall " be repaid without fee or charge: ſo likewiſe for " privy-ſeals, if any have been already paid; but, " if not, that agreeing to the loan of the ſum required, excuſes payment of the privy-ſeal.

" IX. That they admit of no ſuits to be made, " or reaſons to be given for abating any ſum, the " time and inſtant occaſion not admiting any ſuch " diſpute, which would but diſturb and protract the " ſheriff.

" Laſtly, the commiſſioners were required and " commanded, upon their faith and allegiance to " his Majeſty, to keep ſecret to themſelves, and " not impart or diſcloſe theſe inſtructions to " others."

To facilitate theſe loans, care was taken to publiſh a liſt of thoſe who had freely ſubſcribed, for a good example to others, and all the peers and gentlemen were ordered to repair to their country-ſeats, that their abſenſe might cauſe no delay or obſtacle to the ſubſcriptions. Sir Randolph Crew, lord chief-juſtice, ſhewing no zeal for advancing the loan, was removed from his place, which was given to ſir Nicholas Hyde. The King believed it neceſſary to ſhew, by this example, that he would admit of no excuſe (1).

Beſide this example, the court to promote the loan had recourſe to certain other methods, which ſeemingly would not be leſs effectual. The firſt was, billeting ſoldiers upon private houſes, contrary to the conſtant cuſtom of England, where all except thoſe who keep public houſes, are exempt from any obligation to quarter ſoldiers againſt their wills. We may readily ſuppoſe that ſuch as expreſſed reluctance to lend the King money were not ſpared on this occaſion, and that the ſoldiers quartered upon them took care they ſhould know to what they expoſed themſelves by diſobeying his Majeſty. Moreover, ſuch as were ſufferers by theſe incommodious gueſts, could not ſummon them before the uſual judges; but, by the King's expreſs orders, they were obliged to apply to a council of war; ſo that the officers were ſole judges of their ſoldiers. This is never practiſed in England, where councils of war have no juriſdiction but what the parliament allows them by acts on purpoſe, limiting both times and occaſions. In ſhort, it evidently appeared that King Charles would not be contradicted, and was reſolved to raiſe money upon the ſubject as he pleaſed. It is true, he grounded his proceedings on former precedents: but that ſome of his predeceſſors had, many ages ſince, uſed ſuch means, whether thro' neceſſity or otherwiſe, was ſufficient for him to conſider ſuch a precedent as the foundation of his right, and a prerogative of the crown. Notwithſtanding all this, the people in general were ſo averſe to the loan, that the money flowed but ſlowly into his Majeſty's exchequer. The court therefore was obliged to uſe a more violent remedy to force the moſt obſtinate, and that was, to order ſuch of the common ſort as refuſed to ſubſcribe to the loan, to be inrolled, as ſoldiers, to ſerve in his Majeſty's troops. As for perſons of birth and rank, they were ſummoned to appear before the council, and, on a ſecond refuſal to lend money, were confined to places at a great diſtance from their habitations, and ſuch as refuſed to be thus confined, were commited to the ſeveral priſons in London. Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards earl of Strafford and King Charles's zealous adherent, was among the impriſoned.

Beſide theſe methods, the court practiſed another, whence they expected great advantages, but which proved to his Majeſty rather detrimental than beneficial. This was, to cauſe miniſters, gained for that purpoſe, to preach as a ſcripture-doctrine, that ſubjects were obliged to obey the King's commands, without examination. Two of theſe miniſters diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their ſermons on this ſubject. Dr. Sibthorp, who was one, ſays, among other matters, in a ſermon.

(1) The Papiſts contributed very freely in the loan, but the Puritans were very backward. Whitlock, p. 8. This did beget in the King at firſt a tenderneſs towards the Papiſts, and afterwards a truſt and confidence in them; which was unhappily miſtaken by his other ſubjects, as if he inclined to their religion. " ture, or impoſſible, yet ſubjects are bound to " undergo the puniſhment, without either reſiſting " or reviling, and ſo to yield a paſſive obedience " where they cannot exhibit an active one——I " know no other caſe, but one of theſe three, " wherein a ſubject may excuſe himſelf with paſſive " obedience; but in all others he is bound to active " obedience."

But Dr. Manwaring ſpake ſtill more plainly in one of his ſermons. He ſaid, " That the King " is not bound to obſerve the laws of the realm " concerning the ſubjects rights and liberties, but " that his royal will and command in impoſing " loans and taxes, without common conſent in par- " liament, doth oblige the ſubjects conſcience, " upon pain of eternal damnation. That thoſe " who refuſed to pay this loan, offended againſt " the law of God, and the King's ſupreme autho- " rity, and became guilty of impiety, diſloyalty, " and rebellion. And that the authority of par- " liament is not neceſſary for the raiſing aids and " ſubſidies; and that the ſlow proceedings of ſuch " great aſſemblies were not fited for the ſupply of " the ſtates urgent neceſſities, but would rather " produce fundry impediments to the juſt deſigns " of Princes."

The archbiſhop ſuſpended for refuſing to approve Sibthorp's ſermon. Annals. Archb. Abbot's Apol. Ruſhworth, p. 434, &c.

It can ſcarcely be imagined that ſuch a doctrine was publicly preached in England, or at leaſt one would be apt to ſuppoſe theſe preachers to be men of no name, who ſought to pleaſe the court, and were not openly approved. But this belief muſt vaniſh when it is conſidered, that archbiſhop Abbot was ſuſpended from all his archiepiſcopal functions, and confined to one of his country-houſes, for refuſing to licenſe Sibthorp's ſermon: that Manwaring, after having been by the lords in next parliament ſentenced to pay a thouſand pounds fine, to make a public ſubmiſſion at the bars of both houſes, and to be impriſoned *, after having been ſuſpended for three years, and declared incapable of holding any eccleſiaſtical dignity, or ſecular office, obtained nevertheleſs the King's pardon, with a good benefice, and afterwards a biſhoprick. One cannot therefore help thinking, that the doctrine preached by theſe miniſters was approved, favored and countenanced by the court. Indeed, Charles's and his miniſters conduct manifeſtly evidenced it to be their intention to eſtabliſh arbitrary power, and ſet the King above the laws. Of this we ſhall ſee farther proofs in the ſequel.

* During the peers pleaſure.

State of Charles's affairs at home and abroad.

Notwithſtanding King Charles's hopes of finally ſucceeding in his project, he was not eaſy: the war he had undertaken for recovering the Palatinate was ſo ſlowly and unſucceſsfully carried on, that it was evident he would never compaſs his ends, by continuing it on ſuch footing. Hitherto, all had miſcarried. The twelve thouſand men intended for the Palatinate, under count Mansfeldt's command, were loſt for want of proper meaſures for their paſſage, as was ſhewn in the reign of King James. The projected expedition againſt Cadiz, and the Spaniſh Weſt-India fleet, had met with no better ſucceſs The King of Denmark, commencing a war with the Emperor, at his nephew the King of England's inſtances, had been miſerably defeated. The United Netherland provinces, in alliance with England, were rather in want of aſſiſtance, than able to give any. Lewis XIII had flattered the King of England with hopes of a league againſt the houſe of Auſtria, only to obtain better terms from the Spaniards in Italy, and, ſince he had concluded a peace in that country, did not ſhew the leaſt inclination to join with England for recovering the Palatinate. Thus Charles found himſelf more remote than ever from the execution of his grand projects. To this may be added, that the diſſolution of his two firſt parliaments, without obtaining the expected ſupplies, rendered him contemptible to his neighbors. No one ſtate ſeemed very forward to contract a ſtrict alliance with a Prince who had imprudently quarreled with his ſubjects at a juncture when he moſt needed their aſſiſtance. Finally, notwithſtanding he had intended to free himſelf from the yoke of parliaments, and put himſelf in a condition to raiſe what money he pleaſed upon his ſubjects, by the methods he had deviſed, he daily perceived he had taken wrong meaſures. The loan-money came in but very ſlowly. To raiſe it, he was obliged to be perpetually uſing rigor and violence, the Engliſh in a manner generally refuſing to ſubmit willingly to a power they believed contrary to their laws and liberties. The court therefore was conſtrained to be cautious in the examples of rigor againſt the diſobedient, that it might not occaſion a bare-faced rebellion, for fear if a flame brake out in any part, it would ſpread over the whole kingdom.

Charles, in his then ſituation, ſeems to have had but one of theſe two courſes to take; either to agree with his people, or ſtrike up a peace with Spain. By the firſt courſe, he would have been inabled to puſh the war he had undertaken more vigorouſly. By the ſecond, he would have been freed from the trouble of demanding extraordinary ſupplies of his parliament, or of raiſing money by unuſual methods, which gained him his ſubjects hatred. But both theſe courſes were repugnant to his diſpoſition, his character, his projects, the intereſts of his favorite and miniſters. With regard to the firſt, I believe I may affirm, he had formed the project of eſtabliſhing in England a deſpotic power; but ſhall not loſe time in proving it. I had rather the reader would judge for himſelf, by Charles's own ſpeeches, by his meſſages to the houſe of commons, by his conduct, and by that of his miniſters and council. What has been hitherto advanced may ſerve to give thereof ſome idea; but what is to appear in the ſequel will, according to my judgment, afford undeniable proofs. This being ſuppoſed, Charles could not diveſt himſelf of the principles imbibed from his infancy, and deeply rooted in him by his father's inſtructions and examples, without relinquiſhing his projects, and forming a new plan of government directly oppoſite to his humor and inclination. By reconciling himſelf to his people, he muſt have acquieſced to the maxims of parliaments, who were inceſſantly urging the nation's laws, and ſubjects liberties, and ſubmit to be, if I may uſe the expreſſion, leſs a King than he had hitherto been, and than he thought he had a right to be. It was too contrary to his diſpoſition to ſuffer the extent of his royal prerogative to be queſtioned on all occaſions: this was a point wherein he was no leſs, if not more tender than his father. Beſide Buckingham, who had over him a great influence, evidently foreſaw, that a reconcilation between King and people would infallibly be followed with his own ruin. The other miniſters, who were all that duke's creatures, were likewiſe ſenſible that their preſervation depended on the favorite's welfare, and that the favorite's credit could not ſubſiſt with a good harmony between the King and his parliament. It was therefore neceſſary that Charles, to extricate himſelf from this labyrinth, ſhould become, as I may ſay, quite another man; ſhould alter his principles; ſhould have ſufficient ſtrength of mind clearly to diſtinguiſh his true intereſts from thoſe of his favorites and miniſters, and reſolution to proceed without their aſſiſtance, and follow counſels more agreeable to his ſubjects. But this was a mere impoſſibility, conſidering the character of this Prince, who then ſeemed of a temper abſolutely inflexible. He in the end grew ſenſible that he had taken a wrong courſe, but not 'till it was too late to recede.

Reaſons of Charles's conduct.

As

CHARLES I An' 1627.

As to the other courſe, which was to make peace with Spain; beſide Charles's deeming himſelf bound in honor to ſupport a war whereof he was the ſole author, tho' he conſtantly affected imputing it to the parliament, ſuch a peace was utterly repugnant to his own particular intereſt. How little ſucceſs ſoever he had reaſon to expect by continuing the war, in his then circumſtances, it ſerved him for a pretext to levy money upon his people, and afforded him means to put in practiſe his projects to eſtabliſh abſolute power. On the other hand, it being the intereſt of his favorite and miniſters to keep him at variance with his people, to whom they were all extremely odious, they could not better effect it than by laying him under indiſpenſible neceſſity of raiſing money upon the ſubject without conſent of parliament.

Charles reſolves on a war with France. Ruſhworth, p. 423, &c.

The effect of this policy manifeſtly appeared at the very juncture whereof I am ſpeaking. Inſtead of perſuading King Charles to make peace with Spain, they inſenſibly ingaged him to proclaim war with France, at a time when he knew not how to proſecute the war he had commenced with the houſe of Auſtria. In order to induce France to furniſh ſome pretext from the rupture meditating in England, Charles, on ſome diſguſt concerning the Queen's French chaplains and domeſtics (1), diſmiſſed them all, having firſt paid off their wages or ſalaries. The King of France highly reſented this manifeſt breach of the marriage-treaty; but however did nothing tending towards a deſign of being revenged by way of arms. So the diſguſt received from the Queen's domeſtics, who were ſufficiently puniſhed, could not ſerve for pretenſe of a rupture on the ſide of England, ſince, on the contrary, France had reaſon to complain of breach of treaty. Nevertheleſs, it was intended to make war upon France, under color of ſupporting the Hugonots, who were oppreſſed, and threatened with utter deſtruction (2). But when the King's, favorite's and miniſtry's characters are conſidered, it can ſcarcely be imagined that the deſire of maintaining the Proteſtant religion, ſuch as it was in France, was the real motive of this war. King Charles and his whole court mortally hated the Preſbyterians. The duke of Buckingham had properly no religion at all. Weſton and Conway were Papiſts. Laud and Neile believed it impoſſible to be ſaved out of the church of England. How then can it be imagined that all theſe men, who were the King's moſt intimate counſellors, ſhould combine to ſupport in France a religion for which they had the utmoſt contempt? It is abundantly more probable, that Charles's miniſters, ſeeing little likelihood of recovering the Palatinate by arms, and fearing his Majeſty would at length be tired of a fruitleſs war with Spain, induced him to carry his arms into France, in order ſtill to keep him under a neceſſity of raiſing money by extraordinary methods, and thereby perpetuating his miſunderſtanding with his ſubjects, whereon the continuance of their credit intirely depended. But I own this is bare conjecture. Another cauſe is alledged of this war with France, viz. the pride of Buckingham, who, being ſent to Paris to conduct the Queen into England, became amorous of Ann of Auſtria, Lewis XIII's conſort, and had the aſſurance to diſcloſe his paſſion. It is ſaid, the court of France menaced him with a chaſtiſement ſuitable to his inſolence, and refuſed to let him ſee the Queen any more, but that he ſwore, he would ſee her in ſpite of them all. To this oath is aſcribed the reſolution inſtilled into his royal maſter to make war upon France, in hopes it would give him opportunity to perform his oath. I own, I ſee very little probability in this pretended project, which however lord Clarendon has thought fit to introduce (3).

He tries to make the French court give him ſome pretext. Annals, p. 209.

Pretenſe of the war with France.

The miniſters reaſons.

Clarendon.

The war with France being reſolved, King Charles declared the grounds of it to his council; viz.

Charles declares to the council his motives.

" I. That the houſe of Auſtria had ſuch in" fluence on the council of France, as to prevail
" with them to obſtruct the landing of count Manſ-
" feldt's army, contrary to promiſe, with whom
" the French ſhould have joined forces, for relief
" of the Palatinate, and the German Princes;
" which failure of performance in them proved the " ruin of that army.

1. Cauſe. Ruſhworth, p. 424.

I have mentioned this buſineſs in the reign of King James I, and ſhewed it to be no ſmall error in the council of England to depend on a general promiſe as on a treaty: beſide, it was too late for the King to think of revenging this pretended affront, which had not prevented his eſpouſing the French King's ſiſter.

Obſervation.

" II. That having by his mediation prevailed
" for a peace between the French King and his " Proteſtant ſubjects, and ingaged his word, that
" the Proteſtants ſhould obſerve the articles of " agreement: nevertheleſs the King of France,
" contrary to the ſaid articles, blocked up their
" towns, gariſons and forts, and had commited
" many ſpoils upon them, when they had done
" nothing in violation of the edict of peace.

2. Cauſe.

It certainly was the intereſt of England to ſupport the Hugonots, who were unjuſtly oppreſſed. But by what law is a Prince, who procures a peace between two enemies, but is not guarantee for performance of articles, impowered to make war upon one of the parties who breaks it? Had King Charles been ſatisfied with ſaying, the intereſt of England would not ſuffer the Hugonots to be cruſhed, this political reaſon might have been allowed. But in ſuch caſes there is a wide difference between intereſt and right.

Obſervation.

" III. That the King of France had commited
" an example of great injuſtice in full peace, to
" ſeize upon one hundred and twenty Engliſh ſhips,
" with all their merchandiſe and artillery.

3. Cauſe.

His Majeſty paſſes over in ſilence, that the French acted only by way of repriſal, and that the Engliſh were the agreſſors, as the parliament had complained to Charles himſelf. It is therefore evident, that the grounds of this war could not be more frivolous.

Obſervation.

King Charles's intention was to ſend a fleet to Rochel, under color of relieving that place, which was menaced with a ſiege. This affair had been managed at the Engliſh court by the duke of Soubize, and M. S. Blancard, a gentleman of Languedoc, unknown to the Rochelers. This gives occaſion to ſuſpect, that their intention was to deliver the town to the Engliſh, on pretenſe of relieving it. However this be, the affair was kept very private, and, ever ſince April, a fleet had been

(2) This affair was managed and promoted by a certain abbot related to the duke of Orleans, who had been diſobliged by cardinal Richelieu. Idem. p. 244.

(3) The duke of Buckingham is reaſonably ſuppoſed to have been the author of this war; either thro' revenge, for having been excepted againſt by Lewis XIII, when he was appointed embaſſador to France; or on account of ſome affronts put upon him by that court, when he was ſent to bring the Queen over: for, from that time, " he took all the ways he could to under-
" value and exaſperate that court and nation; and omited no opportunity to inſenſe King Charles againſt France, and even
" againſt his Queen; and behaved himſelf very rudely to her." See Clarendon, p. 31.

equiping with all expedition, without any poſſibility of gueſſing for what it was deſigned. When it was ready, the King gave Buckingham a commiſſion which plainly ſhewed the affair was to be a ſecret. By this commiſſion, the duke was appointed admiral of the fleet, and commander in chief of the land forces, which ſhould be imbarked for recovery of the Palatinate, according to ſuch private inſtructions as he ſhould receive from his Majeſty.

Id. p. 425. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVIII. p. 892.

This navy, conſiſting of more than a hundred ſhips, having on board ſeven thouſand ſoldiers, ſailed from Portſmouth the ſeventh of June, and on the twentieth of July appeared before Rochel. At the duke's approach, the Rochelers ſhut their gates for fear of a ſurpriſe, not having the leaſt intelligence of any Engliſh fleet's being to come ſo near them. Very ſoon after, appeared the duke of Soubize, with ſir William Beecher, who told them, from his grace of Buckingham, that the King of England, in compaſſion to their ſufferings, had ſent a fleet and army to their aſſiſtance, and if they refuſed his aid, he declared he was fully quit of his ingagement of honor and conſcience for their relief. The mayor, in the inhabitants names, replied; that they moſt humbly thanked his Majeſty for his care of them; but that, being in ſtrict union with all the other Proteſtants of France, they could not receive into their city the offered ſuccors, without conſulting their friends, and without a previous concurrence of the whole body of Hugonots. Buckingham, finding by this anſwer it would not be eaſy to gain admitance for his troops into Rochel, directed his courſe to the iſle of Rhee, where Toiras commanded. This governor at firſt attempted to obſtruct the Engliſh at their landing; but, as his troops were not numerous, he was obliged to retreat to his fort S. Martin, which was in a very defenſible condition. Had Buckingham been verſed in the art of war, he would, without loſing a moment, have marched to that fortreſs, and thereby hindered Toiras from laying in proviſions: but he laviſhed away ſo much time in landing, and in preparing for his march, that Toiras had leiſure to ſtore the place with all requiſites. He at length advanced to S. Martin, and beſieged it in form, but with ſmall ſucceſs. He had to deal with one more expert than himſelf, and who found means to hold him imployed in the ſiege 'till November, tho' he had aſſured King Charles, he ſhould be maſter of the place in eight days. Mean while, the King of France, who little expected this invaſion, ordered his troops to march with all ſpeed towards the ſea, and came in perſon to haſten the iſle of Rhee's relief. When all was ready, count Schomberg paſſed into the iſle with ſix or ſeven thouſand men, without any oppoſition from the Engliſh fleet. Then he marched to S. Martin, the ſiege whereof Buckingham raiſed with precipitation, being vigorouſly puſhed by the French to the very ſea-ſide, ſo that it was with great difficulty that he re-imbarked the remnant of his troops. It is affirmed, that of the ſeven thouſand men he brought from England, near five thouſand periſhed in this unfortunate expedition: nevertheleſs, it was rumored in England, that ſcarcely fifteen hundred were loſt, and ſome even aſſert that the King was made ſo to believe.

The Engliſh fleet returns home.

While the duke of Buckingham was imployed in this expedition, ſir John Elliot, impriſoned for refuſing to lend the King money, preſented to his Majeſty a petition for his liberty, which he aſked not as a favor, but as juſtice. He grounded his requeſt on diverſe ſtatutes which he cited, and by which he pretended to demonſtrate, that the King could not exact money from the ſubject by way of loan, nor were the ſubjects therein bound to obey him. As Charles then ſtood diſpoſed, this petition could not be of any ſervice to the perſon by whom it was preſented. In November following, ſome other gentlemen, alſo impriſoned on that account, brought their Habeas Corpus, that is, deſired to be diſcharged upon bail, a privilege injoyed by all Engliſh ſubjects (1). This cauſe was pleaded very ſolemnly before all the judges of England. Two points were decided. The firſt; whether the priſoners were commited by the ſpecial command of the King, ſince the warden ſaid only, "that the "priſoners were detained by command of the King, "ſignified to him by warrant of ſeveral of the "privy counſel." Now the priſoners pleaded, that, according to law, the King's order ſhould be produced, not barely for detaining them, but for commiting them, and that beſide, ſignifying the order by the lords of the council ſhewed, it was not by ſpecial command of his Majeſty. The ſecond point was; whether the King could impriſon any ſubject without declaring the cauſe of commitment, and whether, in ſuch caſe, the priſoners ought not to have the benefit of a Habeas Corpus, that is, to be diſcharged upon bail. The counſel for the priſoners repreſented the terrible conſequences of ſuch a power in the Sovereign, ſince thereby the liberty of every ſubject would be at the mercy of their King, who could detain them in priſon as long as he pleaſed, and there would be no remedy by law. But the judges unanimouſly decided againſt the priſoners, who were all remanded to their ſeveral priſons.

Some other priſoners bring their Habeas Corpus; but are remanded to priſon. Ruſhworth, P. 558.

The ill ſucceſs of the iſle of Rhee expedition raiſed numberleſs complaints and murmurs againſt the duke of Buckingham, who had many enemies. Multitudes were loſt in that unfortunate undertaking, and among the reſt, major-general Burroughs, one of the beſt officers in England; and theſe misfortunes were imputed to the incapacity of Buckingham, who had never been in the wars, and knew nothing of the ſea-ſervice, tho' the King had made him both admiral and captain-general. To theſe complaints were added others upon other accounts. The mariners complained, they had not in three whole years received any wages, and deſerted in great numbers, to avoid being forced to ſerve any longer without pay. The merchants made bitter complaints, that the ſeas were neglected, that within three years they had loſt a great number of ſhips, and that the fiſhing boats were carried off almoſt from the very harbors. Laſtly, no one ventured to build any new ſhips, becauſe as ſoon as ready the King ſeized them for his ſervice, contrary to the owners will or conſent.

Complaints againſt the government and Buckingham. Ruſhworth, p. 465. Annals, p. 227. Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 32, 33.

Tho' Charles little regarded all theſe complaints, which poſſibly indeed reached not his ears, he was however very attentive to the petition which the Rochelers, on the point of being beſieged, ſent him for relief by their deputies. He had ingaged in a war with France, on the ſtrong opinion he had conceived of his navy and favorite's ability, and, tho' experience ſhewed him this opinion was ill-grounded, he would not be undeceived or contradicted. Mean while, he found himſelf without money, and the oppoſition he met with in the loan affair, made him ſenſible how difficult it would be to raiſe any ſum by ſuch methods. For this reaſon he conſulted ſir Robert Cotton, upon the preſent ſituation of his affairs. Cotton adviſed him to call a parliament, as the beſt means to free himſelf from all difficulties: but as ſir Robert foreſaw the commons would attack Buckingham, he adviſed withal, that the duke might be the firſt who, in full council, ſhould move the calling a parliament. This advice was followed, and the duke having acted his part, the parliament was ſummoned by the council's unanimous reſolution, to meet the ſeventeenth of March 1628. Immediately after, warrants were ſent to all parts to releaſe all thoſe impriſoned and confined for the loan buſineſs, and Charles had the mortification to ſee almoſt all of them, to the number of twenty-ſeven, elected to ſerve for repreſentatives in the inſuing parliament (1). He likewiſe ſent writs of ſummons to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was confined to one of his houſes, to the biſhop of Lincoln, priſoner in the Tower, and to the earl of Briſtol. Then alſo, the council ordered the lord-mayor of London to uſe moderation in demanding the loan-money. This evidences there were ſtill ſome who ſtood out, and that violence had thitherto been uſed to compel them.

The parliament being aſſembled the ſeventeenth of March, his Majeſty made to both houſes the following ſpeech: viz.

My lords and gentlemen,

Charles's ſpeech in parliament. Ruſhworth, p. 476.

" THESE times are for action. Wherefore, " for example ſake, I mean not to ſpend " much time in words; expecting accordingly, " that your (as I hope) good reſolutions will be " ſpeedy, not ſpending time unneceſſarily, or (that " I may better ſay) dangerouſly: for tedious conſultations at this conjuncture of time are as hurtful as ill reſolutions.

" I am ſure you now expect from me, both to " know the cauſe of your meeting, and what to " reſolve on. Yet I think there is none here but " knows, that common danger is the cauſe of this " parliament, and that ſupply at this time is the " chief end of it: ſo that I need but point to you " what to do. I will uſe but few perſuaſions: for " if to maintain your own advices, and as now the " caſe ſtands for the following thereof, the true " religion, laws and liberties of this ſtate, and the " juſt defenſe of our true friends and allies, be not " ſufficient, then no eloquence of men or angels " will prevail.

" Only let me remember you, that my duty " moſt of all, and every one of yours according to " his degree, is to ſeek the maintenance of this " church and common-wealth: and certainly, there " never was a time in which this duty was more ne- " ceſſarily required than now.

" I therefore, judging the parliament to be the " moſt ancient, ſpeedieſt and beſt way, in this time " of common danger, to give ſuch ſupply as to " ſecure our ſelves, and to ſecure our friends " from imminent ruin, have called you together. " Every man now muſt do according to his con- " ſcience: wherefore if you (as God forbid) ſhould " not do your duties, in contributing what the ſtate " at this time needs, I muſt, in diſcharge of my " conſcience, uſe thoſe other means which God " hath put into my hands, to ſave that which the " follies of particular men may, otherwiſe, hazard " to loſe.

" Take not this as a threatening, for I ſcorn to " threaten any but my equals, but an admonition " from him who both out of nature and duty, " hath moſt care of your preſervations and proſpe- " rities: and (tho' I thus ſpeak) I hope that your " demeanor at this time will be ſuch, as ſhall not " only make me approve your former counſels, but " lay on me ſuch obligations as ſhall tie me, by " way of thankfulneſs, to meet often with you: for " be aſſured, that nothing can be more pleaſing " unto me, than to keep a good correſpondence " with you.

" I will only add one thing more, and then " leave my lord keeper to make a ſhort paraphraſe " upon the text I have delivered you, which is " 'To remember a thing, to the end we may for- " get it.' You may imagine that I came here " with a doubt of ſucceſs of what I deſire, remembering the diſtractions of the laſt meeting. But " I aſſure you, that I ſhall very eaſily and gladly " forget and forgive what is paſſed, ſo that you " will at this preſent time leave the former ways " of diſtractions, and follow the counſel late given " you, 'To maintain the unity of the ſpirit in the " bond of peace.".

CHARLES I AN' 1627.

The lord keeper thus ſeconded his Majeſty.

My lords and gentlemen,

The lord keeper's ſpeech.

" YE are here in parliament by his Majeſty's " writ and royal command, to conſult and " conclude of the weighty and urgent buſineſs of " this kingdom. Weighty it is and great, as great " as the honor, ſafety and protection of religion, " King and country: and what can be greater? " Urgent it is; it is little pleaſure to tell or think " how urgent: and to tell it with circumſtances, " were a long work. I will but touch the ſum of " it in few words.

" The Pope and houſe of Auſtria have long af- " fected, the one a ſpiritual the other a temporal " monarchy: to effect their ends, to ſerve each " other's turn, the houſe of Auſtria, beſide " the rich and vaſt territories of both the Indies " and in Africa joined together, are become maſters " of Spain and Italy, and the great country of " Germany. And altho' France be not under " their ſubjection, yet they have invironed all about " it; the very bowels of the kingdom ſwayed by " the Popiſh faction. They have got ſuch a part, " and ſuch interceſſion in the government, that, " under pretenſe of religion, to root out the Pro- " teſtants and our religion, they have drawn the " King to their adherence, ſo far that albeit, upon " his Majeſty's interpoſition by his embaſſadors, " and his ingagement of his royal word, there " was between the King and his ſubjects articles of " agreement, and the ſubjects were quiet; whereof " his Majeſty, intereſted in that great treaty, was " bound to ſee a true accompliſhment; yet, againſt " that ſtrict alliance, that treaty hath been broken, " and thoſe of the religion have been put to all " extremity, and undoubtedly will be ruined with- " out preſent help. So as that King is not only " diverted from aſſiſting the common cauſe, but " hath been miſled to ingage himſelf in hoſtile acts " againſt our King and other Princes, making way " thereby for the houſe of Auſtria, to the ruin of " his own and other kingdoms.

" Other Potentates, who in former times did " balance and interrupt the growing greatneſs of " the houſe of Auſtria, are now removed and di- " verted. The Turk hath made peace with the " Emperor, and turned himſelf wholly into wars " with Aſia: the King of Sweden is imbroiled in " a war with Poland, which is invented by Spaniſh " practiſes, to keep that King from ſuccoring our " part: the King of Denmark is chaced out of his " kingdom, on this and on that ſide the Sound; " ſo that the houſe of Auſtria is on the point to " command all the ſea-coaſts, from Dantzic to " Embden, and all the rivers falling into the ſea " in that great extent: ſo, as beſide the power by " land, they begin to threaten our part by ſea, to " the ſubverſion of all our ſtate.

" In the Baltic ſea, they are providing and

CHARLES I An' 1627.

" arming all the ſhips they can build or hire; and " have at this time their embaſſadors treating at " Lubec, to draw into their ſervice the Hanſe " towns, whereby taking from us and our neigh- " bors the Eaſt-land trade, by which our ſhiping is " ſupplied, they expect, without any blow given, " to make themſelves maſters of that ſea. In " theſe weſtern parts, by the Dunkirkers, and by " the now French and Spaniſh admiral, to the ruin " of fiſhing (of infinite conſequence both to us and " the Low-Countries) they infeſt all our coaſt, ſo " as we paſs not ſafely from port to port. And " that fleet which lately aſſiſted the French at the " iſle of Rhee, is now preparing at San Andero, " with other ſhips builded in the coaſt of Biſcay " to re-inforce it, and a great fleet is making " ready at Liſbon; where, beſide their own, they " do ſerve themſelves upon all ſtrangers bottoms " coming to that coaſt for trade; and theſe great " preparations are, no doubt, to aſſault us in Eng- " land or Ireland, as they ſhall find advantage, and " a place fit for their turn.

" Our friends of the Netherlands, beſide the fear " which juſtly troubles them leſt the whole force of " the Emperor may fall upon them, are diſtracted " by their voyages into the Eaſt, which have car- " ried both men and money into another world, " and much weakened them at home.

" Thus are we even ready on all ſides to be " ſwallowed up; the Emperor, France and Spain " being in open war againſt us; Germany over- " run; the King of Denmark diſtreſſed; the King " of Sweden diverted; and the Low-Country men " diſabled to give us aſſiſtance.

" I ſpeak not this to increaſe fear, unworthy of " Engliſh courages, but to preſs a proviſion wor- " thy the wiſdom of a parliament: and for that " cauſe his Majeſty hath called you hither, that by " a timely proviſion againſt thoſe great imminent " dangers, our ſelves may be ſtrengthened at " home, our friends and allies incouraged abroad, " and theſe great cauſes of fear ſcattered and diſ- " peled.

" And becauſe, in all warlike preparations, trea- " ſure bears the name, and holds the ſemblance of " the nerves and ſinews; and if a ſinew be too " ſhort or too weak, if it be either ſhrunk or " ſtrained, the part becomes unuſeful: It is need- " ful, that you make a good and timely ſupply of " treaſure, without which all counſels will prove " fruitleſs. I might preſs many reaſons to this " end, but I will name but few.

" Firſt, for his Majeſty's ſake, who requires it. " Great is the duty which we owe him by the law " of God; great by the law of nature, and our " own allegiance; great for his own merit, and the " memory of his ever bleſſed father. I do but " point at them: but methinks our thoughts can- " not but recoil on one conſideration touched by his " Majeſty, which to me ſeems ſo ſound, like a " parliamentary pact or covenant.

" A war was deviſed here, aſſiſtance profeſſed, " yea and proteſted here: I do but touch it, I " know you will deeply think on it; and the " more, for the example the King hath ſet you; " his lands, his plate, his jewels he hath not " ſpared, to ſupply the war: what the people have " proteſted, the King for his part hath willingly " performed.

" Secondly, for the cauſe ſake. It concerns us, " in Chriſtian charity, to tender the diſtreſſes of " our friends abroad; it concerns us, in honor, not " to abandon them who have ſtood for us. And " if this come not cloſe enough, you ſhall find our " intereſt ſo woven and involved with theirs, that " the cauſe is more ours than theirs. If religion " be in peril, we have the moſt flouriſhing and " orthodox church. If honor be in queſtion, the " ſtories and monuments in former ages will " ſhew, that our anceſtors have left us as much " as any nation. If trade and commerce be in " danger, we are iſlanders, it is our life. All " theſe at once lie at ſtake, and ſo doth our ſafety " and being.

CHARLES I An' 1627.

" Laſtly, in reſpect of the manner of his Ma- " jeſty's demand, which is in parliament, the way " which hath ever beſt pleaſed the ſubjects of Eng- " land; and good cauſe for it: for, aids granted " in parliament work good effects for the people; " they be commonly accompanied with wholſome " laws, gracious pardons, and the like. Beſide, " juſt and good Kings, finding the love of their " people, and the readineſs of their ſupplies, may " the better forbear the uſe of their prerogatives, " and moderate the rigor of the laws towards their " ſubjects.

" This way, as his Majeſty hath told you, he " hath choſen; not as the only way, but as the " fiteſt; not as deſtitute of others, but moſt agree- " able to the goodneſs of his own moſt gracious " diſpoſition, and to the deſire and weal of his " people. If this be defered, neceſſity and the " ſword of the enemy make way to the others. " Remember his Majeſty's admonition, I ſay, re- " member it.

" Let me but add, and obſerve God's mercy " towards this land, above all others. The tor- " rent of war hath overwhelmed other churches " and countries; but God hath hitherto reſtrained " it from us, and ſtill gives us warning of every " approaching danger, to ſave us from ſurpriſe. " And our gracious Sovereign, in a true ſenſe of " it, calls together his high court of parliament, " the lively repreſentation of the wiſdom, wealth " and power of the whole kingdom, to join toge- " ther to repel thoſe hoſtile attempts which di- " ſtreſſed our friends and allies, and threatened our " ſelves.

" And therefore it behoves all to apply their " thoughts unto counſel and conſultations, " worthy the greatneſs and wiſdom of this " aſſembly; to avoid diſcontents and diviſions, " which may either diſtemper or delay; and to " attend that 'unum neceſſarium,' the common " cauſe; propounding, for the ſcope and work of " all debates, the general good of the King and " kingdom, whom God hath joined together with " an indiſſoluble knot, which none muſt attempt " to cut or unty. And let all, by unity and good " accord, indeavor to pattern this parliament by " the beſt which have been, that it may be a pat- " tern to future parliaments, and may infuſe into " parliaments a kind of multiplying power and " faculty, whereby they may be more frequent, " and the King our Sovereign delight to ſit on his " throne, and from thence to diſtribute his graces " and favors among his people.

" His Majeſty hath given you cauſe to be confi- " dent of what you have heard from his royal " mouth; which nevertheleſs he hath given me " expreſs command to redouble. If this parlia- " ment, by their dutiful and wiſe proceedings, " ſhall but give this occaſion, his Majeſty will be " ready, not only to manifeſt his gracious accepta- " tion, but to put out all memory of thoſe diſtaſtes " which have troubled former parliaments.

" I have but one thing more to add, and that " is, as your conſultations be ſerious, ſo let them " be ſpeedy. The enemy is beforehand with us, " and flies on the wings of ſucceſs. We may dally " and play with the hour-glaſs which is in our " power, but the hour will not ſtay for us; and " an opportunity once loſt, cannot be regained.

" And therefore reſolve of your ſupplies, that they

CHARLES I AN' 1627.

"they may be timely and sufficient, serving the "occasion: your counsel, your aid, all is but lost, "if your aid be either too little, or too late: and "his Majesty is resolved, that his affairs cannot "permit him to expect it over long."

Charles's view in these two speeches, and remarks thereon.

These two speeches need no comment, since they plainly speak both the King's principles concerning the use of parliaments, and his intention, in case he received not from the parliament such satisfaction as he expected. Charles seems not to have made use of a proper means to gain the good-will of the commons: but it must be observed, that nothing was more opposite to his temper, than stooping to court his parliament. He deemed it a great condescension to declare that, tho' he had other ways of raising money, he was very willing to follow the old method of demanding a supply from the parliament: but lest the commons should think he was forced to it by a kind of necessity, he took care to intimate that, in case the money he demanded was not granted, he could raise it by other means. This was the sole aim of both these speeches (1).

As to those arguments, alledged by the lord-keeper, to excite the commons to give his Majesty a plentiful supply, they were too highly exagerated to produce much effect. The Spaniard's pretended preparations to invade England were a groundless chimera: for in reality, during this whole war, that nation never once offered to attack either Great Britain or Ireland; nay, it was absolutely in King Charles's power to have been at peace with the Spaniard, who had no demands upon him; nevertheless he would make believe that England was most evidently in danger. As to the argument so very frequently urged; viz. that the parliament advised this war, it was grown so thread-bare that it could no longer make any impression. There was not then in England any one person not perfectly sensible that the King and duke of Buckingham were the real authors of the rupture with Spain, and had thro' a gross artifice surprised the parliament into that advice whereon Charles perpetually insisted.

A letter published in the begining of this parliament. Rushworth, p. 489. Annals, p. 238.

Before the commons had entered into any debates, there was a long letter communicated to them, and dispersed under title of "A Speech without "doors (2)." The anonymous author pretended to have been formerly a member of the lower house, tho' he was not chosen to serve in the present parliament. His aim was to advise the commons how they were to proceed, and to lay before them the sundry grievances complained of by the people. This writing made great noise at that time, but I do not think it necessary to insert the contents, since they were only the sentiments of a private person.

After the two houses had petitioned his Majesty for a fast, the commons began to examine the national grievances, and seemed determined to grant no supply 'till these grievances were redressed. The first they took into consideration were, billeting soldiers; loans by benevolence and privy-seals; imprisoning gentlemen refusing to lend; denial of release upon a Habeas Corpus; and several speeches were made upon these occasions. Sir Francis Seymour, among other particulars, said — "How "can we think of giving subsidies, 'till we know "whether we have any thing to give or no? For "if his Majesty be persuaded by any to take from "his subjects what he will, and where it pleaseth "him; I would gladly know, what we have to "give? — Hath it not been preached in our "pulpits, that all we have is the King's, JURE "DIVINO?" — Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards so well known as earl of Strafford, distinguished himself by a speech against the government. He said indeed, these things were not to be imputed to the King but to the projectors, that is, to the ministers or others who had formed the design of stretching the prerogative beyond its due bounds, of whom he thus expressed himself: "They have "brought the crown into greater want than ever, "by anticipating the revenues. And can the "shepherd be thus smitten, and the sheep not "scattered? They have introduced a privy council, "ravishing at once the spheres of all ancient go-"vernment, imprisoning us without either bail or "bond; they have taken from us, what? What "shall I say indeed, what have they left us? All "means of supplying the King and ingratiating "ourselves with him, taking up the root of all "propriety." — Sir Edward Coke, a great lawyer, spake chiefly to the grievances of loans, and among other matters said: "Who will give sub-"sidies, if the King may impose what he will? "and if after parliament, the King may inhance "what he pleaseth?------The King cannot tax any "by way of loans."------Thereupon he quoted the statute of 25 Edward III, wherein it is said, that "loans against the will of the subject, are against "reason, and the franchises of the land;----- and concluded with this paragraph out of Magna Charta ------ "Nullus liber homo capiatur vel imprisonetur "aut disseisietur de libero tenemento suo, &c. nisi "per legale judicium parium suorum, vel per legem "terræ." Another, speaking of the imprisonment of those who had refused to lend the King money, said, ------ "O improvident ancestors! O "unwise fore-fathers! to be so curious in providing "for the quiet possession of our lands, and liberties "of parliament, and to neglect our persons and "bodies, and to let them die in prison, and that "durante beneplacito, remediless: if this be law, "what do we talk of our liberties? Why do we "trouble ourselves with the dispute of law, fran-"chises, propriety of goods? What may a man "call his, if not liberty?

It is not my design to inlarge farther on what was said in the house of commons upon these points. This suffices to shew how the majority were disposed. All their arguments tended to demonstrate, that if the King had power to take away his subjects goods by a bare act of his will, whether by way of loan or otherwise, and to imprison such as refused to obey his orders without their being admited to bail, they were either to be intirely subject to their Sovereign's pleasure, or to begin with firmly establishing the peoples rights to the prevention of tyranny. The court-party durst not directly oppose this general sentiment, but by various arguments strove to make their opponents comprehend that, to gain his Majesty's good will, supplies were previously to be granted. Then, they gave hopes, that the King, moved with such a mark of affection for his person, would not be against redressing the grievances. But this made little impression upon the rest, who were by far the majority, and who verily believed, that to begin with the subsidies was the ready way to have the grievances un-redressed. Mean while, to make a diversion, secretary Coke presented to the house certain propositions from the King, concerning supply: but it was resolved, that the reading thereof should be defered 'till the house had taken some resolution touching the grievances, especially imprisonment of the subjects, and denial of bail. There were very great debates upon theſe points, and even the judges were heard. Finally, the houſe came to theſe ſubſequent reſolutions, directly oppoſite to Charles's pretenſions, and the judges determinations: that is, they eſtabliſhed maxims quite different from thoſe of his Majeſty: viz.

The commons reſolutions. Id. p. 513.

" I. That no freeman ought to be detained or " held in priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrained by the " command of King or privy council, or other, " unleſs ſome cauſe of the commitment, detainer, " or reſtraint be expreſſed, for which by the law he " ought to be commited, detained, or reſtrained.

" That the writ of Habeas Corpus may not be " denied, but ought to be granted to every man " who is commited or detained in priſon, or other- " wiſe reſtrained, tho' it be by command of the " King, the privy-council, or any other, he pray- " ing the ſame.

" III. That if a freeman be commited or de- " tained in priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrained by com- " mand of the King, the privy-council, or any " other, no cauſe of ſuch commitment, detainer, or " reſtraint being expreſſed for which, by law, he " ought to be commited, detained, or reſtrained, " and the ſame be returned upon a Habeas Corpus, " granted for the ſaid party, then he ought to be " delivered or bailed.

" IV. That it is the ancient and undubitable " right of every freeman, that he hath a full and " abſolute property in his goods and eſtate; that " no tax, tallage, loan, benevolence, or other like " charge ought to be commanded or levied by the " King, or any of his miniſters, without common " conſent by act of parliament."

An' 1628. The King's demands. March 26. Ruſhworth, p. 513. Annals, p. 251.

The propoſitions, tendered the day before by ſecretary Coke, from his Majeſty, were now received and read, but the debate thereof was refered to another day. The propoſitions were theſe:

" 1. To furniſh with men and victuals thirty " ſhips to guard the narrow ſeas, and along the " coaſts.

" 2. To ſet out ten other ſhips for relief of the " town of Rochel.

" 3. To ſet out ten other ſhips for the preſer- " vation of the Elbe, the Sound, and the Baltic " ſea.

" 4. To levy arms, cloth, victual, pay, and " tranſport an army of ten thouſand horſe, and ten " thouſand foot, for foreign ſervice.

" 5. To pay and ſupply ſix thouſand more for " the ſervice of Denmark.

" 6. To ſupply the forts of the office of ord- " nance.

" 7. To ſupply the ſtores of the navy.

" 8. To build twenty ſhips yearly for the in- " creaſe of the navy.

" 9. To repair the forts within the land.

" 10. To pay the arrears of the office of ord- " nance.

" 11. To pay the arrears of the victuallers " office.

" 12. To pay the arrears of the treaſure of the " navy.

" 13. To pay the arrears due for the freight of " diverſe merchant-ſhips imployed in his Majeſty's " ſervice.

" 14. To provide a magazine for victuals for " land and ſea-ſervice.

By peruſing theſe articles, the houſe readily perceived it would be a work of infinite labor to examine the neceſſity and juſtice of each, and as there were no eſtimates made, they plainly ſaw, if they ſhould take into conſideration the particulars, the court would mount the expenſe very high: wherefore, without entering into any diſcuſſion, they in general concluded on granting his Majeſty a very large ſupply (1).

The council's conduct examined. April 2. Ruſhworth, p. 521, &c. Annals, p. 264---279.

After that, they returned to the examination of this particular grievance, that the King's council, by their bare authority, had confined to their houſes ſome who refuſed lending their money; had ſent away others to places remote from their homes; and conſtrained ſome, on the ſame account, to ſerve the King in foreign countries (2). On this point, ſir Thomas Wentworth ſaid, " If any man owes " a man diſpleaſure, and ſhall procure him to be " put into foreign imployment, it will be a matter " of high concernment to the ſubject. We know " the honor and juſtice of the King; but we know " not what his miniſters, or the mediation of em- " baſſadors may do, to work their own wrath upon " any man." Theſe debates produced this reſolution:

Reſolution of the houſe.

" That no freeman ought to be confined by any " command from the King, or privy-council, or " any other, unleſs it be by act of parliament, or " by other due courſe, or warrant of law."

Meſſage from the King concerning Buckingham. April 3. Ruſhworth, p. 523.

All theſe determinations promiſed the King no good with reſpect to his prerogative; and as he feared the commons would again attack the duke of Buckingham, he tried to divert them from it by a meſſage, delivered to the houſe by ſecretary Coke. It was upon a rumor, that the duke had ſpoken ill of the parliament at the council-board. The King aſſured, it was not true, and the ſecretary added, if the duke had ſo ſpoken, he would have contradicted himſelf, for the whole council could bear him witneſs, he was the firſt mover of calling the parliament: but he took care not to tell them, it was merely thro' policy, purſuant to the counſel of ſir Robert Cotton.

A ſecond meſſage from Charles to the commons. p. 524.

Next day, his Majeſty ſent another meſſage to the commons, deſiring them to take into conſideration the ſupply buſineſs. He alſo told them that, as to the freedom of perſons and propriety of goods, he was willing to come into any expedients which ſhould be judged convenient, by way of bill, or otherwiſe; and that the more confidence they ſhould ſhew in his grace and goodneſs, the more they ſhould prevail to obtain their deſires.

Five ſubſidies voted. p. 525, 527, &c.

Upon this meſſage, the houſe unanimouſly voted five whole ſubſidies (3), but returned immediately to the examination of grievances, and held a conference with the lords upon that ſubject.

Charles hinders the houſes from adjourning at Eaſter. April 10. Id. p. 537.

Eaſter holidays approaching, Charles deſired the commons not to adjourn, that affairs might be more expeditiouſly diſpatched. This meſſage occaſioned a debate; ſome members fearing ſuch a precedent might prejudice the houſe's privileges, and the King thenceforward imagine he had power to prevent adjournments whenever he pleaſed: but it was finally reſolved to do as his Majeſty deſired.

He preſſes the commons about ſupply.

The eleventh of April, ſecretary Coke moved the diſpatch of the ſubſidies, ſaying, the votes to grant the King money were nothing 'till turned into a bill. But being oppoſed by ſeveral, it was determined, that grievances and ſupply ſhould go hand in hand.

Reſolved, that ſupply and grievances go together.

Next day, Coke brought from Charles another meſſage to the houſe, to this effect: "That his "Majeſty had long ſince expected ſome fruit of "what was ſo happily begun; but finding a ſtop "beyond all expectation, his command was that, "without any farther delay, they ſhould proceed "in the ſupply affair: for notwithſtanding his con-"ſenting that ſupply and grievances ſhould go to-"gether, his meaning was not, that the one ſhould "give interruption to the other, nor the time be "ſpun out on any pretenſe; and therefore bid "them take heed, that they did not force him to "make an unpleaſing end of what was ſo well "begun."

which is greatly to his prejudice.

This meſſage was extremely detrimental to his Majeſty. 1. Becauſe of the threatening. 2. By reaſon of his inſtances, that the affair of ſupply ſhould be diſpatched before that of grievances: for it was not doubted that, if the firſt were finiſhed, the parliament would be immediately prorogued 5. Laſtly, Charles's unwillingneſs to redreſs the grievances, was a clear evidence, he would never be brought to it of his own accord, and conſequently it was neceſſary he ſhould be conſtrained to it. This was the more probable, as Coke, when he delivered the meſſage, added, "That the King would wil-"lingly hear any thing concerning the abuſes of "power, but not about power itſelf." Theſe were expreſſions liable to many cavils, and plain intimations, that the King reſerved to himſelf, by this reſtriction, a means to evade the grievances. In effect, Coke, being moved to explain his meaning by the word Power, refuſed it (1).

Another meſſage from Charles upon the ſame account. Ruſhworth, p. 539. Annals.

Two days after, the ſecretary delivered another meſſage from his Majeſty, to haſten the ſubſidy affair. Theſe meſſages, which came thus one upon another, gave the court-party frequent occaſions to preſs the houſe to give their Sovereign ſatisfaction. All their ſpeeches, on this head, met in one point; viz. to inſpire the houſe with a dread, that a quarrel between their Prince and them would be fatal to parliaments, and furniſh him with occaſion to proceed without them for the future. As Charles himſelf, and the lord keeper by his order, had frequently made uſe of this very method to intimidate the commons, it could not be doubted, that theſe men ſpake purſuant to the court's intentions, and poſſibly even by its expreſs order. A privy-counſellor's ſpeech in the lower houſe, laſt parliament, was not yet forgot, and whereof the commons had judged proper to take notice, in the remonſtrance they would have preſented to his Majeſty. The drift of that ſpeech was to intimate to the commons, that, if they did not content their Sovereign, they would hazard occaſioning the utter baniſhment of parliaments from England. This menace, ſo frequently inſinuated by Charles himſelf, by the lord keeper, by ſome members of the houſe known to be the court's devotees, ſometimes obſcurely, other times in very plain terms, had a quite contrary effect to what his Majeſty expected. Inſtead of terrifying the commons, it convinced them how watchful they ought to be of the King's proceedings, leſt their condeſcenſion, or even their ſilence, ſhould authoriſe ſome precedents highly detrimental to the liberties of thoſe whom they repreſented. "What! (ſaid moſt of the members among them-"ſelves) we are threatened, that if we grant not "the King whatever he requires, and when he "pleaſes, if we oppoſe his pleaſure, even when "contrary to the laws, he will govern without a "parliament, that is, with unlimited power; he "will impriſon our perſons, ſeize our eſtates, and "conſider the whole kingdom as his property! "But he does not only threaten us, he has put his "threats in execution already. Which then is beſt, "either for him to uſurp abſolute power againſt "our will, or for us to ſuffer it, nay, approve it "by our ſilence and ſervile fears? Of the two, cer-"tainly the firſt is leaſt dangerous. A time may "come, when the King ſhall have occaſion for "parliaments, and then we ſhall be able to reco-"ver the ground we ſhall have loſt: but if we "betray the intereſt of our country, by tamely "yielding to our King the power he would aſſume, "our liberty would be irrecoverably loſt. We "ſhall lay upon ourſelves and poſterity a yoke "which our forefathers could never bear, and be "held in abhorrence by the whole nation. And "after all, what ſhall we gain by our condeſcen-"ſion? Why, the King will continue the uſe of "parliaments, provided he ſhall be abſolute ma-"ſter; order them to give him ſuch a ſum, and "by ſuch a time; forbid them to examine grie-"vances; in a word, manage them intirely as he "pleaſes. Thus we ſhall prevent the King's go-"verning without a parliament, but ſhall eſtabliſh "a precedent which will render parliaments for "ever ſlaves to the King and his miniſters."

CHARLES I AN' 1628.

Thus reaſoned the majority of the commons, and tho' they did not openly expreſs themſelves in theſe very terms, the houſe by their whole conduct, evidenced theſe conſiderations to be the real foundation of all their proceedings. For this reaſon it was they determined on deſiring audience, in order to anſwer all the King's meſſages, and withal to preſent him a petition concerning billeting ſoldiers upon private houſes. Their repreſentation to his Majeſty, by the mouth of their ſpeaker, here follows: viz.

Moſt gracious and dread Sovereign,

The ſpeaker's harangue to his Majeſty on delivering the commons petition about billeting ſoldiers. Ruſhworth, p. 540.

"YOUR dutiful and loyal commons here aſ-"ſembled, were lately humble ſuitors to your "Majeſty for acceſs to your royal preſenſe: the "occaſion which moved their deſires herein was a "particular of importance, worthy your princely "conſideration; which, as it well deſerves, ſhould "have been the only ſubject of my ſpeech at this "time.

"But ſince your gracious anſwer for this acceſs, "obtained by a meſſage from your Majeſty, they "have had ſome cauſe to doubt, that your Ma-"jeſty is not ſo well ſatisfied with the manner of "their proceedings, as their hearty deſire is you "ſhould be, eſpecially in that part which concerns "your Majeſty's preſent ſupply, as if in the pro-"ſecution thereof, they had of late uſed ſome ſlack-"neſs or delay.

"And becauſe no unhappineſs of theirs can pa-"rallel with that which may proceed from a miſ-"underſtanding in your Majeſty of their clear and "loyal intentions, they have commanded me to at-"tend your Majeſty, with an humble and ſummary "declaration of their proceedings, ſince this ſhort "time of their ſiting, which they hope will give "your Majeſty abundant ſatisfaction, that never "people did more truly deſire to be indeared in the "favor and gracious opinion of their Sovereign; "and withal to let you ſee that, as you can have "no where more faithful counſel, ſo your great "deſigns and occaſions can no way be ſo ſpeedily "or heartily ſupported as in this old and ancient "way of parliament.

"For this purpoſe, they humbly beſeech your "Majeſty to take into your royal conſideration, "that altho' by ancient right of parliament, the "matters there debated are to be diſpoſed in their "true

" true method and order, and that their conſtant
" cuſtom hath been to take into their conſiderations
" the common grievances of the kingdom, before
" they enter upon the matter of ſupply; yet, to " make a full expreſſion of that zeal and affection
" which they bear to your royal Majeſty, equaling
" at leaſt, if not exceeding the beſt affections of " their predeceſſors to the beſt of your progenitors;
" they have, in this aſſembly, contrary to the or" dinary proceedings of parliament, given your
" Majeſty's ſupply precedence before the common
" grievances of the ſubject, how preſſing ſoever,
" joining with it only thoſe fundamental and vital
" liberties of the kingdom which give ſubſiſtence
" and ability to your ſubjects.

" This was their original order and reſolution,
" and was grounded upon a true diſcerning, that
" theſe two conſiderations could not be ſevered, but
" did both of them intirely concern your Majeſty's
" ſervice, conſiſting no leſs in inabling and incou-
" raging the ſubject, than in proportioning a pre-
" ſent ſuiting to your Majeſty's occaſions, and their " abilities; nay, ſo far have they been from uſing
" any unneceſſary delays, as tho', of the two, that
" of ſupply were the latter propoſition among them,
" the grand commitee, to which both were refered,
" hath made that of your Majeſty's ſupply firſt
" ready for concluſion.

" And, to be ſure your Majeſty's ſupply might " receive no interruption by the other, differing
" from uſage and cuſtom (in caſes of this nature)
" ſent up, of thoſe which concern the ſubjects by
" parcels, ſome to your Majeſty, and ſome to the " lords, to the end your Majeſty might receive
" ſuch ſpeedy content as ſuited with the largeſt and
" beſt extent of their firſt order.

" Sir, you are the breath of our noſtrils, and
" the light of our eyes, and beſide thoſe many
" comforts which, under you and your royal pro-
" genitors, in this frame of government, this " nation hath injoyed, the religion we profeſs hath
" taught us whoſe image you are; and we do all
" moſt humbly beſeech your Majeſty to believe,
" that nothing is or can be more dear unto us than
" the ſacred rights and prerogatives of your crown;
" no perſon or council can be greater lovers of you,
" nor be more truly careful to maintain them; and
" the preſerving thoſe fundamental liberties which " concern the freedom of our perſons, and pro-
" priety of goods and eſtates, is an eſſential means
" to eſtabliſh the true glory of a monarchy.

" For rich and free ſubjects, as they are beſt
" governed, ſo they are moſt able to do your Ma-
" jeſty ſervice either in peace or war, which, next
" under God, hath been the cauſe of the happy
" and famous victories of this nation, beyond other
" kingdoms of larger territories and greater num" ber of people.

" What information ſoever contrary to this ſhall
" be brought unto your Majeſty, can come from
" no other than ſuch as, for their own ends, under
" color of advancing the prerogative, do indeed
" undermine and weaken royal power by impove-
" riſhing the ſubjects, render this monarchy leſs
" glorious, and the people leſs able to ſerve your " Majeſty.

" Having (by what hath been ſaid) cleared our " hearts and proceedings to your Majeſty, our truſt
" is that, in your royal judgment, we ſhall be free
" from the leaſt opinion of giving any neceſſary
" ſtop to our proceedings in the matter of your
" ſupply, and that your Majeſty will be pleaſed to " entertain belief of our alacrity and chearfulneſs
" in your ſervice, and that hereafter no ſuch miſ-
" fortune ſhall befal us to be miſunderſtood by your
" Majeſty in any thing.

" We all moſt humbly beſeech your Majeſty to " receive no information in this or any other buſi-
" neſs from private relations, but to weigh and
" judge of our proceedings by thoſe reſolutions
" of the houſe which ſhall be preſented from our
" ſelves.

Charles I An' 1628.

" This, rightly and graciouſly underſtood, we " are confident, from the knowledge of your good-
" neſs and our own hearts, that the ending of this " parliament ſhall be much more happy than the " begining, and be to all ages ſtiled the bleſſed
" parliament, for making perfect union between
" the beſt King and the beſt people, that your Ma-
" jeſty may ever delight in calling us together, and
" we in the comforts of your gracious favor to" wards us.

" In this hope, I return to my firſt errand, which " will beſt appear by that which I ſhall humbly
" deſire you to hear, and being an humble peti-
" tion from the houſe of commons, for redreſſing
" thoſe many inconveniencies and diſtractions which " have befallen your ſubjects by the billeting ſol-
" diers in private mens houſes, againſt their wills.

" Your royal progenitors have ever held your
" ſubjects hearts the beſt gariſon of this kingdom,
" and our humble ſuit to your Majeſty is, that
" our faith and loyalty may have ſuch place in " your royal thoughts, as to reſt aſſured, that all
" your ſubjects will be ready to lay down their " lives for the defenſe of your ſacred perſon, and
" this kingdom.

" Not going our ſelves into our countries this
" Eaſter, we ſhould think it a great happineſs to " us, as we know it would be a ſingular comfort
" and incouragement to thoſe who ſent us hither,
" if we might but ſend them a gracious anſwer
" from your Majeſty in this particular, which the " reaſons of the petition we hope will move your
" moſt excellent Majeſty graciouſly to vouchſafe
" us."

The petition concerning billeting ſoldiers, preſented to the King's moſt excellent Majeſty.

Petition concerning billeting ſoldiers. Ruſhworth, p. 542.

" IN all humility complaining, ſheweth unto " your moſt excellent Majeſty, your loyal and " dutiful commons now in parliament aſſembled,
" that whereas, by the fundamental laws of this
" realm, every freeman hath, and of right ought " to have a full and abſolute propriety in his " goods and eſtate, and that therefore the billeting
" and placing ſoldiers in the houſe of any ſuch free-
" man, againſt his will, is directly contrary to the " ſaid laws, under which we and our anceſtors have " been ſo long and happily governed: yet, in ap-
" parent violation of the ſaid ancient and undoubted
" right of all your Majeſty's loyal ſubjects of this
" your kingdom in general, and to the grievous
" and inſupportable vexation and detriment of " many counties and perſons in particular, a new
" and almoſt unheard-of way hath been invented
" and put in practiſe, to lay ſoldiers upon them,
" ſcattered in companies here and there, even in " the heart and bowels of this kingdom; and to " compel many of your Majeſty's ſubjects to receive
" and lodge them in their own houſes, and both
" themſelves and others to contribute towards the " maintenance of them, to the exceeding great diſ-
" ſervice of your Majeſty, the general terror of all,
" utter undoing many of your people, inſomuch
" as we cannot ſufficiently recount, nor, in any " way proportionable to the lively ſenſe which we " have of our miſeries herein, are we able to re-
" preſent unto your Majeſty the innumerous miſ-
" chiefs and moſt grievous vexations which by this " means alone we do now ſuffer, whereof we will " not preſume to trouble your ſacred ears with par" ticular inſtances; only, moſt gracious Sovereign,
" we beg leave to offer to your moſt gracious

" view,

CHARLES I AN' 1628.

" view, a compaſſionate conſideration of a view " thereof in general.

" 1. The ſervice of Almighty God is hereby " greatly hindered, the people in many places not " daring to repair to the church, leſt in the mean " time the ſoldiers ſhould rifle their houſes.

" 2. The ancient and good government of the " country is hereby neglected, and almoſt con- " temned.

" 3. Your officers of juſtice, in performance of " their duties, have been reſiſted and indangered.

" 4. The rents and revenues of your gentry " greatly and generally diminiſhed; farmers, to " ſecure themſelves from the ſoldiers inſolence, " being, by the clamor of ſollication of their fear- " ful and injured wives and children, inforced to " give up their wonted dwelings, and to retire " themſelves into places of more ſecure habita- " tion.

" 5. Huſbandmen, who are as it were the " hands of the country, corrupted by ill example " of the ſoldiers, and incouraged to idle life, give " over work, and rather ſeek to live idly at an- " other man's charges, than by their own labors.

" 6. Tradeſmen and artificers almoſt diſcouraged, " being inforced to leave their trades, and to im- " ploy their time in preſerving themſelves and their " families from cruelty.

" 7. Markets unfrequented, and our ways grown " ſo dangerous, that the people dare not paſs to " and fro upon their uſual occaſions.

" 8. Frequent robberies, aſſaults, batteries, " burglaries, rapes, rapines, murders, barbarous " cruelties, and other moſt abominable vices and " outrages, are generally complained of from all " parts, where theſe companies have been and " had their abode, few of which inſolences have " been ſo much as queſtioned, and fewer according " to their demerit puniſhed.

" Theſe, and many other lamentable effects " (moſt dread and dear Sovereign) have by bil- " leting ſoldiers already fallen upon us your loyal " ſubjects, tending no leſs to the diſſervice of your " Majeſty, than to their impoveriſhing and deſtruc- " tion, ſo that thereby they are exceedingly diſabled " to yield to your Majeſty thoſe ſupplies for your " urgent occaſions, which they heartily deſire; and " yet they are farther perplexed with apprehenſion " of more approaching danger, one in regard of " your ſubjects at home, the other of enemies from " abroad, in both which reſpects it ſeems to " threaten no ſmall calamity to the meaner ſort of " your people, being exceeding poor, whereof in " many places are great multitudes, and therefore " in times of more ſettled and moſt conſtant ad- " miniſtration of juſtice, not eaſily ruled, are moſt " apt upon this occaſion to caſt off the reins of " government, and, by joining themſelves with " thoſe diſordered ſoldiers, are very like to fall " into mutiny and rebellion; which, in faithful " diſcharge of our duties, we cannot forbear moſt " humbly to preſent to your high and excellent " wiſdom, being preſſed with probable fears that " ſome ſuch miſchief will ſhortly inſue, if ſome " effectual and ſpeedy courſe be not taken to re- " move out of the land, or otherwiſe to diſband, " thoſe unruly companies.

" For the ſecond, we do moſt humbly beſeech " your Majeſty to take into your princely con- " ſideration, that many of thoſe companies, beſide " their diſſolute diſpoſitions and carriages, are ſuch " as do openly profeſs themſelves Papiſts, and " therefore to be ſuſpected that, if occaſion ſerve, " they will rather adhere to a foreign enemy of " that religion, than to your Majeſty, their liege " Lord and Sovereign, eſpecially ſome of their " captains and commanders, being as Popiſhly " affected as themſelves, and having ſerved in the " wars on the part of the King of Spain, and arch- " ducheſs, againſt your Majeſty's allies; which of " what pernicious conſequence it may prove, and " how prejudicial to the ſafety of your kingdom, " we leave to your Majeſty's high and princely " wiſdom.

" And now upon theſe, and many more which " might be alledged, moſt weighty and important " reaſons, grounded on the maintenance of the " worſhip and ſervice of Almighty God, the con- " tinuance and advancement of your Majeſty's " high honor and profit, the preſervation of the " ancient and undoubted liberties of your people; " and therein of juſtice, induſtry, valor, which " nearly concern the glory and happineſs of your " Majeſty and all your ſubjects, and preventing " calamity and ruin both of church and common- " wealth:

" We your Majeſty's moſt humble and " loyal ſubjects, the knights, citizens and " burgeſſes of your houſe of commons, in " the name of all the commonalty of your " kingdom, who are upon this occaſion " moſt miſerably diſconſolate and afflicted, " proſtrate at the throne of your grace and " and juſtice, do moſt ardently beg a " preſent remove of this inſupportable " burden, and that your Majeſty would be " graciouſly pleaſed to ſecure us from the " like preſſure in the time to come."

CHARLES I AN' 1628.

Remark on the behavior of King and commons.

King Charles's and his commons manner of procedure is, in reality, pleaſant enough. Nothing but evaſion and artifice on both ſides. They expreſſed not their real thoughts when they ſpake to each other, nevertheleſs they perfectly well underſtood each other's meaning, tho' they affected the contrary. The commons were very ſenſible, that their reaſons to juſtify the delay of ſupply, alledged in their repreſentation, were not valid, and that the King was thereof thoro'ly perſuaded: but they believed he would ſeem to be ſatisfied with them, in order not to oblige them to tell him to his face, they could not rely on his promiſes, and conſidered ſuch procraſtination as the only means to obtain redreſs of their grievances. Charles feigned himſelf ignorant of this motive, and took advantage of the commons uſing obſcure inſinuations, inſtead of ſpeaking plainly, as if they durſt not do otherwiſe. On the other hand, tho' Charles no way deſigned to redreſs grievances, he would however have it thought, he intended it when the ſupply affair was diſpatched. The commons, on their part, feigning not to know his intention, indeavored to have it believed, that the delay of ſupply proceeded from quite another cauſe, tho' they were certain his Majeſty could not therein be miſtaken; but as Charles deemed not himſelf obliged to uſe the ſame ceremony with his commons as they ought to uſe with him, he talked to them in a higher ſtrain, well knowing they would not, without urgent neceſſity, be induced to deliver themſelves with more clearneſs. To their repreſentations he therefore made this reply.

Mr. Speaker, and Gentlemen,

The King's reply. Ruſhworth, P. 545.

" WHEN I ſent you my laſt meſſage, I did " not expect a reply, for I intended it to " haſten you: I told you at your firſt meeting, " this time was not to be laviſhed in words, and I " am ſure it is leſs fit for diſputes, which, if I had " a deſire to entertain, Mr. Speaker's preamble " might have given me ground enough. The " queſtion is not now, what liberty you have in " diſpoſing of matters handled in your houſe, but " rather, at this time, what is fit to be done.

" Wherefore I hope you will follow my example, " in

Charles I An' 1628.

" in eſchewing diſputations, and fall to your im" portant buſineſs. You make a proteſtation of " your affection and zeal to my prerogative,
" grounded upon ſuch good and juſt reaſons, that " I muſt believe you: but I look that you uſe me
" with the like charity, to believe what I have de" clared more than once, ſince your meeting with " us, that I am as forward as you for the neceſſary
" preſervation of your true liberties. Let us not
" ſpend ſo much time in this, which may hazard
" both my prerogative and your liberties to our " enemies.

" To be ſhort, go on ſpeedily with your buſi-
" neſs, without any more apologies, for time calls
" faſt on you, which will neither ſtay for you nor
" me: wherefore it is my duty to haſten, as " knowing the neceſſity of it, and yours to give " credit to what I ſay, as to him who ſits at the " helm.

" For what concerns your petition, I ſhall make
" anſwer in a convenient time."

Project of the petition of right laid before his Majeſty by both houſes. p. 545.

The commons meaning was, as I obſerved, to reap ſome advantage by the five ſubſidies they were willing to grant his Majeſty; and this was a neceſſary condition, which they continually inſinuated, tho' they avoided uſing that expreſſion. To this end, they had prepared a petition to be preſented to his Majeſty, in the name of both houſes, to which they deſired the peers concurrence. This petition was termed the Petition of Right, becauſe it was pretended not to deſire of the King any grace or favor, but only maintenance of the ſubjects liberties. For this reaſon it was to be ſolemnly preſented to him on his throne, by way of bill, and the King was to reply to it in a parliamentary manner. A draught of it had been ſent to the lords for their concurrence (1). The King was alarmed at it. He was deſirous to avoid receiving ſuch a petition, which too manifeſtly eſtabliſhed the peoples rights, becauſe he ſaw, if he rejected it, he ſhould loſe the five ſubſidies, the bill not being yet paſſed. On the other hand, in granting the contents of that petition, he himſelf tied up his hands for the future, and withal acknowledged, that the acts of authority he had thitherto exerciſed were contrary to law. It was preciſely into this ſtreight that the commons aimed to draw him by the petition of right: wherefore he omited nothing within his power to divert this blow. As he had a great influence in the upper houſe, he ſo managed that the lords, by pretending to agree with the commons on the ſubſtance of the petition, moved their jointly requeſting his Majeſty to make theſe inſuing declarations: viz.

The King indeavors to prevent it.

Propoſitions made by the lords, touching the petition of right. Ruſhworth, p. 546. Annals, p. 282.

" 1. That the good old law called Magna
" Charta, and the ſix ſtatutes, conceived to be de-
" clarations and explanations of that law, do ſtill
" ſtand in force to all intents and purpoſes.

" 2. That his Majeſty would be pleaſed gra-
" ciouſly to declare; that, according to Magna
" Charta and the ſtatutes afore-named, as alſo
" according to the moſt ancient cuſtoms and laws
" of this land, every free ſubject of this realm hath
" a fundamental propriety in his goods, and a fun" damental liberty of his perſon.

" 3. That his Majeſty would be graciouſly
" pleaſed to declare, that it is his royal pleaſure to " ratify and confirm unto all and every his loyal
" and faithful ſubjects, all their ancient, ſeveral,
" juſt liberties, privileges and rights, in as ample
" and beneficial manner, to all intents and pur-
" poſes, as their anceſtors did injoy the ſame under
" the beſt of his moſt noble progenitors.

" 4. That his Majeſty would be farther pleaſed graciouſly to declare, for the good content of his loyal ſubjects, and for the ſecuring them from future fear; that, in all caſes within the cognisance of the common law, concerning the liberties of the ſubject, his Majeſty would proceed according to the common law of this land, and according to the laws eſtabliſhed in the kingdom, and in no other wiſe or manner. Charles I An' 1628.

" 5. As touching his Majeſty's royal prerogative,
" intrinſical to his ſovereignty, and betruſted him
" withal from God, " ad communem totius populi
" ſalutem, & non ad deſtructionem," that his Ma-
" jeſty would reſolve, not to uſe or divert the ſame,
" to the prejudice of any of his loyal people in the " propriety of their goods, or liberty of their
" perſons: and in caſe, for the ſecurity of his Ma-
" jeſty's royal perſon, the common ſafety of his " people, or the peaceable government of this " kingdom, his Majeſty ſhall find juſt cauſe, for
" reaſon of ſtate, to impriſon or reſtrain any man's
" perſon, his Majeſty would graciouſly declare,
" that, within a convenient time, he ſhall and will
" expreſs the cauſe of ſuch commitment or reſtraint,
" either general or ſpecial; and, upon a cauſe ſo
" expreſſed, will leave him immediately to be " tried according to common juſtice of the king-

Rejected by the commons. Ruſhworth, p. 548.

But the commons avoided this ſnare, plainly perceiving it to be a mere artifice to evade the petition of right, which after theſe declarations would become as uſeleſs. In effect, there was a very wide difference, as we ſhall ſee preſently, between theſe declarations and what was required in the petition. The declarations were all expreſſed in general terms, which gave the King room to cavil upon the performance of each article, as he had done in the affair of loans, and the impriſonment of ſuch as refuſed to comply. In thoſe caſes, his Majeſty pretended not to act contrary to the laws, but rather thought himſelf authoriſed by the law; and the judges of the realm had countenanced his pretenſions: but the petition of right was much fuller and more expreſs, leaving but little room for cavils. On the other hand, the difference was not leſs between the direct and parliamentary reply demanded by the commons, and the bare and general declarations which were not capable of contenting the people. So, the commons abſolutely rejected their lordſhips propoſition.

Charles ſends for both houſes to Whitehall. April 28.

King Charles, not ſucceeding in his deſign by means of the upper houſe, tried to ſatisfy the commons by making them, of his own accord, thoſe very offers which the lords had ſeemed only to requeſt at his hands. Having on that account ſent for both houſes to Whitehall, the lord-keeper, in his Majeſty's preſenſe, made them the following ſpeech.

My Lords, and ye the Knights, Citizens and Burgeſſes of the houſe of commons.

The lord-keeper's ſpeech to them. Ruſhworth, p. 549. Annals.

" YE cannot but remember the great and im" portant affairs, concerning the ſafety both
" of ſtate and religion, declared firſt from his
" Majeſty's own mouth, to be the cauſes of aſſem-
" bling this parliament; the ſenſe whereof, as it
" doth daily increaſe with his Majeſty, ſo it
" ought to do, and his Majeſty doubts not
" but it doth ſo with you, ſince the danger in-
" creaſeth every day, both by effluxion of time,
" and preparations of the enemy.

" Yet his Majeſty doth well weigh, that this ex-

Charles I An' 1628.

" penſe of time hath been occaſioned by the debate " which hath ariſen in both houſes, touching the " liberty of the ſubject; in which, as his Majeſty " takes in good part the purpoſe and intent of the " houſes, ſo clearly and frequently profeſſed, that " they would not diminiſh or blemiſh his juſt pre- " rogative; ſo he preſumes that ye will all confeſs " it a point of extraordinary grace and juſtice in " him, to ſuffer it to reſt ſo long in diſpute with- " out interruption. But now his Majeſty, conſi- " dering the length of time which it hath taken, " and fearing nothing ſo much as any future loſs " of that whereof every hour and minute is ſo pre- " cious; and foreſeeing that the ordinary way of " debate, tho' never ſo carefully huſbanded, in " regard of the form of both houſes, neceſſarily " takes more time than the affairs of Chriſtendom " can permit; his Majeſty, out of great princely " care, hath thought of this expedient to ſhorten " the buſineſs, by declaring the clearneſs of his " own heart and intention: and therefore hath com- " manded me to let you know, 'That he holdeth " the ſtatute of Magna Charta, and the other ſix " ſtatutes inſiſted upon for the ſubjects liberty, to " be all in force, and aſſures you, that he will " maintain all his ſubjects in the juſt freedom of " their perſons, and ſafety of their eſtates; and " that he will govern according to the laws and " ſtatutes of this realm; and that ye ſhall find as " much ſecurity in his Majeſty's royal word and " promiſe, as in the ſtrength of any law ye can " make; ſo that hereafter ye ſhall never have cauſe " to complain.' The concluſion is, that his Ma- " jeſty prayeth God, who hath hitherto bleſſed this " kingdom, and put into his heart to come to you " this day, to make the ſucceſs thereof happy both " to King and people: and therefore he deſires, " that no doubt or diſtruſt may poſſeſs any man " but that ye will all proceed unanimouſly to the " buſineſs."

Charles's ſecond meſſage to the commons. Ruſhworth, p. 552. Annals.

This ſnare the commons alſo avoided, as they had done the former, and firmly adhered to the petition of right. A few days after, ſecretary Coke brought them a freſh meſſage from his Majeſty, to know whether the houſe would or would not reſt on his royal word, declared to them by the lord keeper; which if they did, he aſſured them, it ſhould be royally performed.

This meſſage occaſioned great debates, becauſe Coke and others of the court-party imployed their utmoſt efforts to perſuade the houſe to what his Majeſty propoſed, namely, to lay aſide the petition of right, and reſt upon his royal promiſe. Sir Thomas Wentworth concluded the debate, ſaying, " That never houſe of parliament truſted more in " the goodneſs of their King, for their own pri- " vate, than the preſent, but we are ambitious that " his Majeſty's goodneſs may remain to poſterity, " and we are accountable to a public truſt: and " therefore, ſeeing there hath been a public viola- " tion of the laws by his miniſters, nothing will " ſatisfy him but a public amends; and our deſire " to vindicate the ſubjects right by bill, are no " more than are laid down in former laws, with " ſome modeſt proviſion for inſtruction, perform- " ance and execution." This ſo well agreed with the houſe's ſenſe, that they made it the ſubject of a meſſage to be delivered to his Majeſty by their ſpeaker.

Amidſt thoſe deliberations, the following meſſage from his Majeſty was delivered by ſecretary Coke; " That howſoever we proceed in this buſineſs we " have in hand, which his Majeſty will not doubt, " but to be according to our conſtant profeſſion, and " ſo as he may have cauſe to give us thanks; yet " his reſolution is, that both his royal care and " hearty and tender affection towards all his loving " ſubjects, ſhall appear to the whole kingdom, and " all the world, that he will govern us according " to the laws and cuſtoms of this realm; that he " will maintain us in the liberties of our perſons, " and properties of our goods, ſo as we may injoy " as much happineſs as our forefathers in their beſt " times; and that he will rectify what hath been, " or may be found amiſs among us, ſo that here- " after there may be no juſt cauſe to complain. " Wherein, as his Majeſty will rank himſelf among " the beſt of Kings, and ſhew he hath no intention " to invade or impeach our lawful liberties, or " right; ſo he will have us to match our ſelves " with the beſt ſubjects, not by incroaching upon " that ſovereignty or prerogative, which God hath " put into his hands for our good, but by containing " ourſelves within the bounds and laws of our fore- " fathers, without reſtraining them, or inlarging " them by new explanations, interpretations, ex- " poſitions, or additions in any ſort, which, he " telleth us, he will not give way unto.

Charles I An' 1628.

" That the weight of the affairs of the kingdom " and Chriſtendom do preſs him more and more, " and that the time is now grown to that point of " maturity, that it cannot indure long debate or " delay; ſo as this ſeſſion of parliament muſt con- " tinue no longer than Tueſday come ſeven-night " at the fartheſt: in which time his Majeſty, for " his part, will be ready to perform what he pro- " miſed; and if the houſe be not as ready to do " what is fit for themſelves, it ſhall be their own " faults.

" And upon aſſurance of your good diſpatch and " correſpondence, his Majeſty declareth, that his " royal intention is to have another ſeſſion of par- " liament at Michaelmas next, for perfecting ſuch " things as cannot now be done."

The commons ſtand to their reſolution of preſenting the petition of right. Ruſhworth, p. 555.

All this ſufficed not to divert the commons from their purpoſe of turning the petition of right into an act of parliament. The menace of ending the ſeſſion frightened them not, his Majeſty having too far advanced to recede. The only point was to know, whether he would grant by bill, what he was willing to grant any other way; and he could not break with the parliament on that account, without utterly forfeiting his peoples affection, beſide loſing the five ſubſidies: ſo the commons would not miſs this opportunity of firmly eſtabliſhing the ſubjects rights and privileges. Here follows what the ſpeaker, in name of the commons, ſaid to his Majeſty, having firſt thanked him for his gracious aſſurance, that he would govern according to law, and told him, that the commons greateſt confidence was in his goodneſs.

The ſpeaker's harangue to his Majeſty. Ibid. Annals.

" ——— True it is, they cannot but remember " the public truſt, for which they are accountable " to preſent and future times; and their deſires are, " that your Majeſty's goodneſs might, in fruit and " memory, be the bleſſing and joy of poſterity.

" They ſay alſo that, of late, there hath been " public violation of the laws, and the ſubjects " liberties, by ſome of your Majeſty's miniſters, " and thence conceive, that no leſs than a public " remedy will raiſe the dejected hearts of your " loving ſubjects, to a chearful ſupply of your Ma- " jeſty, or make them receive content in the pro- " ceedings of this houſe.

" From thoſe conſiderations, they moſt humbly " beg your Majeſty's leave, to lay hold on that " gracious offer of yours, which gave them aſſu- " rance that, if they thought fit to ſecure them- " ſelves in their rights and liberties, by way of " bill, or otherwiſe, ſo it might be provided with " due reſpect to God's honor and the public good, " you would be graciouſly pleaſed to give way unto " it. Far from their intentions it is, any way to " incroach upon your ſovereignty or prerogative;

Charles I An' 1628.

" nor have they the leaſt thought of ſtretching or " inlarging the former laws in any ſort, by any " new interpretations or additions; the bounds of " their deſires extend no farther than to ſome ne- " ceſſary explanation of that which is truly com- " prehended within the juſt ſenſe and meaning of " thoſe laws, with ſome moderate proviſion for " execution and performance, as in paſſed times, " upon like occaſion, hath been uſed.

" The way how to accompliſh theſe their hum- " ble deſires is now in conſideration with them; " wherein they humbly aſſure your Majeſty, they " will neither loſe time, nor ſeek any thing of your " Majeſty, but what they hope may be fit for du- " tiful and loyal ſubjects to aſk, and for a gracious " and juſt King to grant."

To this Charles replied, by the lord keeper, in theſe terms.

Mr. ſpeaker, and you gentlemen of the houſe of commons.

Ruſhworth. Annals.

" HIS Majeſty hath commanded me to tell " you, that he expected an anſwer by your " actions, and not delay by your diſcourſe. Ye " acknowledge this truſt and confidence in your " proceedings, but his Majeſty ſees not how you " requite him, by your confidence of his word and " actions: for what need explanations, if ye doubted " not the performance of the true meaning? For " explanations will hazard an incroachment upon " his prerogative. And it may well be ſaid, what " need a new law to confirm an old, if you repoſe " confidence in the declaration his Majeſty made " by me to both houſes? And our ſelves acknow- " ledge, that your greateſt truſt and confidence " muſt be in his Majeſty's grace and goodneſs, " without which nothing ye can frame will be of " ſafety, or avail to you. Yet, to ſhew clearly " the ſincerity of his Majeſty's intentions, he is " content that a bill be drawn for a confirmation " of Magna Charta, and the other ſix ſtatutes, in- " ſiſted upon for the ſubjects liberties, if ye ſhall " chuſe that as the beſt way, but ſo it may be with- " out additions, paraphraſes, or explanations.

" Thus if you pleaſe you may be ſecured from " your needleſs fears, and this parliament may have " a happy wiſhed for end: whereas by the con- " trary, if you ſeek to tie your King by new, and " indeed impoſſible bonds, you muſt be accounta- " ble to God and the country for the ill ſucceſs of " this meeting. His Majeſty hath given his royal " word, that ye ſhall have no cauſe to complain " hereafter; leſs than which hath been enough to " reconcile great Princes, and therefore ought " much more to prevail between a King and his " ſubjects.

" Laſtly, I am commanded to tell you, that his " Majeſty's pleaſure is that, without farther re- " plies or meſſages, or unneceſſary delays, ye do " what ye mean to do ſpeedily, remembering the " laſt meſſage which ſecretary Coke brought you in " point of time; his Majeſty always intending to " perform his promiſe to his power."

A meſſage from the King. May 6. Ruſhworth, p. 557.

To this anſwer the King preſently after added the following meſſage, brought by ſecretary Coke, to preſs the houſe to rely on his Majeſty's word, notwithſtanding the intimation of his good pleaſure for a bill. " That he had rather follow others, than " begin to enter into this buſineſs; loſs of time " hath been the greateſt complaint; the matter " fallen now into conſideration is, what way to " take, whether to rely on his Majeſty's word, or " on a bill. If we will conſider the advantage " we have in taking his Majeſty's word, it will be " of the largeſt extent, and we ſhall chuſe that " which hath moſt aſſurance; an act of parliament " is by conſent of King and parliament; but this " aſſurance by word is, that he will govern us by " the laws; the King promiſes that, and alſo, " that they ſhall be ſo executed that we ſhall in- " joy as much freedom as ever: this contains many " laws, and a grant of all good laws; nay, it " contains a confirmation of thoſe very laws, aſ- " ſurance, which binds the King farther than the " law can. Firſt, it binds his affection, which is " the greateſt bond between King and ſubject, and " that binds his judgment alſo, nay, his honor, " and that not at home, but abroad; the royal " word of a King is the ground of all treaty; nay, " it binds his conſcience: this confirmation between " both houſes, is in nature of a vow; for my " part, I think it is the greateſt advantage to rely " on his Majeſty's word." He farther added, " This debate was fiter to be done before the houſe, " and not before the commitees, and that it was a " new courſe to go to a commitee of the whole " houſe (1).

Charles I An' 1628.

Remarks on the King's anſwer.

This anſwer and meſſage are a clear evidence how much Charles dreaded the petition of right, which was preparing for him. He juſtly ſuppoſed it would contain not only the ſubſtance of Magna Charta, and the ſix ſtatutes, but alſo explanations which would prevent all cavils about the true meaning of theſe laws, which was what he would have avoided to approve, for fear of tying up his hands. The great charter and the ſix ſtatutes had long been in force; but that had not prevented his exacting money from his ſubjects by way of loan, and impriſoned thoſe who refuſed to comply. He was ſo far from acknowledging he had acted illegally, that he found means to get his proceedings approved by the judges. In offering therefore to confirm Magna Charta by a bill, he left things in their preſent ſtate, and the people would have reaped no benefit from the new bill. This is what the lord keeper could not forbear intimating, when he ſaid, he did not ſee any occaſion for a new law to confirm an old one. He would have thereby inſinuated, that the old law was not infringed, and therefore his Majeſty was very willing to confirm it, provided there were no additions, explanations and interpretations. But nothing was apter to ſhew the commons the neceſſity of theſe explanations, than the King's indeavors to avoid them. His extreme deſire that his word ſhould be relied on, was a very ſtrong reaſon to ſecure the ſubjects liberties by ſomething more binding. It is indeed true, that the words of Princes are capable of reconciling them, when at variance; but this ſuppoſes a mutual confidence, without which the bare word cannot beget a perfect reconciliation. Now the point was to know, whether the King's word might ſafely be taken, which the commons did not believe, tho' they durſt not openly declare it. Beſide, their having been told, that the King's promiſe to govern according to law was a greater ſecurity than the laws themſelves, was a plain indication that their Sovereign deemed it not impracticable to evade the law. Hence therefore they drew a freſh argument for binding the King by a more expreſs and poſitive law than thoſe hitherto inacted.

Let us farther obſerve, that it is not a little ſurpriſing the ſecretary, in concluding his meſſage, ſhould teach the commons how this matter ought to be debated in the houſe, inſinuating, that having recourſe to a commitee of the whole houſe was a very very unuſual method. For the eaſier comprehending the deſign of this inſinuation, the reader muſt underſtand that, before the houſe a member cannot ſpeak but once on a topic, and, having delivered in his ſentiment, is not allowed to make any replication: but when the houſe is turned into a commitee, there is greater freedom; every one may argue, anſwer, reply, as he judges requiſite. By this means the points in debate are fully cleared, ſo that it is not eaſy for each to form his judgment upon the arguments, anſwers and replies he has heard. It therefore ſeems, by what the ſecretary inſinuated to the commons, that Charles dreaded whatever explanations might ariſe from this manner of debating: but they thought not proper to receive his inſtructions, or alter their uſual method. The houſe therefore was turned into a commitee, to take into conſideration all could be urged for or againſt what was required by his Majeſty. Here follows the general ſenſe of the houſe as expreſſed by one of its members *, with whom the majority concurred: viz.

* Sir Edward Coke.

Ruſhworth, p. 558. Annals, p. 287.

"Was it ever known that general words were a "ſufficient ſatisfaction to particular grievances? "Was ever a verbal declaration of the King, "Verbum Regni? When grievances be, the par- "liament is to redreſs them. Did ever parlia- "ments rely on meſſages? They put up petitions "of their grievances, and the King never anſwered "them: the King's anſwer is very gracious; but "what is the law of the realm? that is the queſtion. "I put no diffidence in his Majeſty, the King muſt "ſpeak by a record, and in particulars, and not "in general. Did you ever know the King's "meſſage to come into a bill of ſubſidies? All "ſucceeding Kings will ſay, ye muſt truſt me as "well as ye did my predeceſſors, and truſt my "meſſages; but meſſages of love never came into "a parliament. Let us put up a petition of right: "not that I diſtruſt the King, but that I cannot "take his truſt but in a parliamentary way.

The commons fix times of the ſubſidies payments before the bill paſſed. Ruſhworth, p. 558. Annals. p. 287.

As the commons had reſolved, that ſupply and grievances ſhould go hand in hand, the petition of right was no ſooner ready, but they made a farther progreſs in the affair of ſubſidies, ordering that the two firſt ſhould be paid the tenth of July, one more the twelfth of October, another the twentieth of December, and the laſt the firſt of March. This was done to take from the King all pretext of complaint that the ſupply buſineſs was neglected; but he was not herewith ſatisfied. He wiſhed the ſubſidy-bill to be drawn and paſſed, before the petition of right was preſented him, which the commons were reſolutely determined not to do, being perſuaded that the ſubſidy-bill being once paſſed, the parliament would be inſtantly prorogued or diſſolved: ſo, that very day, they ſent the petition of right to the lords for their concurrence (1). But, before it was obtained, the commons ſaw themſelves obliged to ſuſtain two freſh attacks, one from his Majeſty, the other from the houſe of peers, where the court-party was very powerful.

May 12. Ruſhworth, p. 559. Annals.

Their lordſhips, being buſied in examining the petition of right, deſired a conference with the commons, where the lord keeper ſaid, he had propoſed to the houſe ſome alterations in the petition, to render it leſs harſh, and more agreeable to his Majeſty, to the end what was deſired might be the more readily obtained: adding that, while the lords were debating upon the commitments, they received a letter from his Majeſty, which they deſired to communicate to the commons. It was read to them accordingly, and ran thus.

CHARLES I AN' 1628.

To the right truſty and right well-beloved, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, of the higher houſe of parliament.

Carolus Rex,

K. Charles's letter to the lords, communicated to the commons. Ruſhworth, p. 560. Annals.

"WE being deſirous of nothing more than "the advance of the peace and proſperity "of our people, have given leave to free debate "upon the higheſt points of our prerogative royal, "which, in the time of our predeceſſors, Kings "and Queens of this realm, were ever reſtrained "as matters which they would not have diſcuſſed; "and in other things we have been willing ſo far "to deſcend to the deſires of our good ſubjects, as "might fully ſatisfy all moderate minds, and free "them from all juſt fears and jealouſies, which "thoſe meſſages we have hitherto ſent into the "commons houſe will well demonſtrate unto the "world; yet we find it ſtill inſiſted upon that, in "no caſe whatſoever, ſhould it never ſo nearly "concern matters of ſtate or government, we, or "our privy council, have no power to commit any "man without the cauſe ſhewed; whereas it often "happens that, ſhould the cauſe be ſhewed, the "ſervice itſelf would thereby be deſtroyed and de- "feated, and the cauſe alledged muſt be ſuch as "may be determined by our judges of our courts "of Weſtminſter, in a legal and ordinary way of "juſtice; whereas the cauſe may be ſuch, as thoſe "judges have not capacity of judicature, nor rules "of law to direct and guide their judgment in "caſes of that tranſcendent nature; which hap- "pening ſo often, the very incroaching on that "conſtant rule of government, for ſo many ages "within this kingdom practiſed, would ſoon diſ- "ſolve the very foundation and frame of our "monarchy. Wherefore as to our commons, we "made fair propoſitions, which might equally "preſerve the juſt liberty of the ſubject. So, my "lords, we have thought good to let you know "that, without the overthrow of ſovereignty, we "cannot ſuffer this power to be impeached: not- "withſtanding, to clear our conſcience and juſt "intentions, this we publiſh, that it is not in our "heart, nor will we ever extend our royal power, "lent unto us from God, beyond the juſt rule of "moderation, in any thing which ſhall be con- "trary to our laws and cuſtoms, wherein the ſafety "of our people ſhould be our only aim. And we "do hereby declare our royal pleaſure and reſo- "lution to be (which, God willing, we ſhall ever "conſtantly continue and maintain) that neither "we nor our privy council ſhall, or will, at any "time hereafter, commit, or command to priſon, "or otherwiſe reſtrain the perſon of any, for not "lending money to us, nor for any juſt cauſe "which, in our conſcience, doth not concern the "public good and ſafety of us and our people, "we will not be drawn to pretend any cauſe, "wherein our judgment and conſcience is not ſatiſ- "fied; baſe thoughts, we hope, no man can ima- "gine will fall into our royal breaſt; and that in "all caſes of this nature, which ſhall hereafter "happen, we ſhall, upon the humble petition of "the party, or addreſs of our judges unto us, "readily and really expreſs the true cauſe of their "commitment or reſtraint, ſo ſoon as with con- "veniency and ſafety the ſame is fit to be diſcloſed

This we have thought fit to ſignify, " the rather to ſhorten any long debate upon this " great queſtion, the ſeaſon of the year being ſo " far advanced, and our great occaſions of ſtate " not lending any more days for longer continuance " of this ſeſſion of parliament."

Given under our ſignet, at our palace at Weſtminſter, 20 Maii, the fourth year of our reign.

The commons remain firm. Ruſhworth, p. 561, &c.

Of this letter the commons took no notice, or rather diſſembled the concern they conceived at the artifices of their Sovereign, who, by obſcure and doubtful expreſſions, and by ſundry reſtrictions, was preparing means to evade his promiſes, at the very juncture when he wanted to have them received as ſolemn, authentic and ſatisfactory. This will evidently appear, if the terms of this letter be attentively conſidered, as well as King Charles's view in writing it: which was to evade the petition of right, and be left at liberty to make the ſame uſe of his prerogative as he had done thitherto.

The lords propound the adding a clauſe to the petition of right. May 17.

The ſecond attack the commons had to ſuſtain, came from the peers. Their lordſhips moved the adding to the petition of right a clauſe which would have rendered it uſeleſs, at leaſt, according to the court's intention, by whom, very ſeemingly, the upper houſe was directed. The additional clauſe was this: viz.

The clauſe. Ruſhworth, p. 561. Annals, p. 289. &c.

" We preſent this our humble petition to your " Majeſty, with the care not only of preſerving " our own liberties, but with due regard to leave " intire that ſovereign power wherewith your Ma- " jeſty is truſted for the protection, ſafety and hap- " pineſs of the people."

Ruſhworth, p. 566---576. Annals, 289, &c.

This addition was examined and moſt preciſely canvaſſed in the houſe of commons, and the general opinion was, that it ought to be rejected, chiefly for three reaſons. The firſt; becauſe of the ambiguity of the words " Sovereign power," which the parliaments had never uſed in ſpeaking of the King's prerogatives. The ſecond, becauſe this addition was in the nature of a ſaving of the King's ſovereignty, which rendered the petition of no force: it was alledged, that in the reign of Edward I, the parliament having preſented a like petition to the King, he would have added theſe words, " ſaving the King's right and ſovereignty," but the parliament would not conſent to it, becauſe ſuch ſavings render uſeleſs whatever they are annexed to; it was likewiſe urged that, for the ſame reaſon, the Kings would never ſuffer the clergy to inſert in any of their acts, " ſaving the honor of God and " the church." The third reaſon was that, if this addition was general, and had no reference to the petition, there was no need of admiting it: but if, on the contrary, it did refer to the petition, it evidently rendered the petition of no effect.

The ſaid clauſe being rejected by the commons, their lordſhips durſt not throw out the petition (1), on account of this ſupplement, which in reality was not abſolutely neceſſary. So, being ſatisfied with giving the King this teſtimony of their affection for his ſervice, they inſiſted no longer upon the additional clauſe. Then the two houſes reſolved on preſenting the petition to his Majeſty and intreating him to give his anſwer in full parliament, that it might be inrolled and ſerve hereafter for rule to the courts of judicature, as to a parliamentary ſtatute. The ſecond of June, Charles repaired to the parliament to give the royal aſſent to the petition of right, and thus ſpake to both houſes.

Gentlemen,

Charles's ſpeech before reading the petition.

" I Am come hither to perform my duty. I " think no man can think it long, ſince I " have not taken ſo many days in anſwering the " petition, as ye imployed weeks in framing it: " and I am come hither to ſhew you that, as well " in formal things as in eſſential, I deſire to give " you as much content as in me lies."

To this diſcourſe the lord keeper made ſome addition: but, as there is nothing very material in his ſpeech, I do not think it neceſſary to inſert it. When he had done ſpeaking, the petition was read aloud, and is as follows (2):

Charles, as has been ſeen, had uſed all poſſible indeavors to obſtruct this petition's being preſented, and to ſatisfy the commons with general promiſes, which properly bound him to nothing, and deſtroyed not his ſyſtem of government. So, notwithſtanding his feigning he came to the parliament purpoſely to paſs the petition of right, and give a ſatisfactory anſwer, he however purſued his plan, and by his anſwer ſhewed, how much he dreaded promiſing. Here follows his anſwer, wherein may be eaſily perceived the ſame general promiſes, and the ſame reſtrictions as in what he had already offered.

The King's anſwer to the Petition of Rights.

His Majeſty's reply. Ruſhworth, p. 590.

" THE King willeth, that right be done ac" cording to the laws and cuſtoms of the " realm, and that the ſtatutes be put in due exe-
" cution, that his ſubjects may have no cauſe to " complain of any wrong or oppreſſion, contrary
" to their juſt rights and liberties, to the preſerva-
" tion

CHARLES I An' 1628.

" tion whereof he holds himſelf in conſcience, as " well obliged as of his prerogative.

Remarks on this reply.

It would be here quite needleſs to make any remarks on this anſwer, ſince King Charles's deſign ſo plainly appears. It ſuffices only to obſerve that his ſaid Majeſty had indeavored to content the parliament with general promiſes, and the commons, not deeming that ſufficient, had inſiſted on the petition of right, wherein diverſe particular caſes were ſpecified. Now Charles, inſtead of giving the parliament that ſatisfaction they deſired, did in his anſwer ſtick firm to his general promiſes, without touching on any of the particular caſes ſpecified in that petition.

The commons therewith not ſatisfied. Annals, p. 304, &c.

The commons, not being ſatisfied with his Majeſty's anſwer, made no haſte to finiſh the ſubſidy buſineſs. On the contrary, they deſired a conference with the lords, where the point of commitments was thoroughly diſcuſſed. The matter in queſtion was, the power aſſumed by his Majeſty to impriſon the ſubjects, without declaring the cauſe, which King Charles had not leſſened by his anſwer, tho' it was one of the chief motives of the petition of right. Wherefore the commons, deſirous that his Majeſty ſhould be made ſenſible of their diſſatisfaction, inſtead of proceeding with the ſubſidy-bill, returned to the conſideration of grievances. On this occaſion, and at the commons inſtances, the lords paſſed upon Dr. Manwaring that ſentence I elſewhere mentioned.

They reſume the affair of grievances. Annals. Ruſhworth, p. 591.

Manwaring ſentenced. p. 593.

Charles, finding the commons otherwiſe imployed than in the buſineſs of ſubſidies, ſent them by their own ſpeaker this inſuing meſſage.

Meſſage from his Majeſty to the commons. Ibid.

" That his Majeſty having, on the petition exhibited by both houſes, given an anſwer full of " juſtice and grace, for which we and our poſterity " have juſt cauſe to bleſs his Majeſty, it is now " time to grow to a concluſion of the ſeſſion; and " therefore his Majeſty thinks fit to let you know, " that as he doth reſolve to abide by that anſwer, " without farther change and alteration, ſo he will " royally and really perform unto you what he hath " thereby promiſed: and farther, that he reſolves " to end this ſeſſion upon Wedneſday the eleventh " of this month; and therefore wiſheth that the " houſe will ſeriouſly attend thoſe buſineſſes which " may beſt bring the ſeſſion to a happy concluſion, without entertaining new matters, and ſo " huſband the time that his Majeſty may, with the " more comfort, bring us ſpeedily together again: " at which time, if there be any farther grievances " not contained or expreſſed in the petition, they " may be more maturely conſidered than the time " will now permit."

This meſſage induced the commons to believe (1) that the duke of Buckingham had done them ill offices with his Majeſty. This was intimated in the houſe, and ſir John Elliot ſtanding up, and begining to ſpeak in ſuch manner that it was thought he was going to fall upon the favorite and miniſtry, the ſpeaker ſtarted from the chair and ſaid, " There " is a command laid upon me, that I muſt com- " mand you not to proceed." Elliot thereupon ſat down: but ſome other bolder members propoſed acquainting the lords with their dangers, and then carrying their complaints to his Majeſty in a full body. Some of the court-party ſaying, that a ſpeech lately uttered by ſir John Elliot had given offenſe to his Majeſty, the houſe declared: " That " every member is free from any undutiful ſpeech, " from the begining of the parliament to that day; " and ordered, that the houſe be turned into a " commitee, to conſider what is fit to be done for " the ſafety of the kingdom; and that no man go " out upon pain of going to the Tower." But the ſpeaker *, deſiring leave to go out, obtained it, and immediately informed Charles what was going forward in the houſe. In his abſenſe it was debated, and on the point of being voted by a majority, to make his Majeſty a remonſtrance, wherein it ſhould be expreſly urged, that the duke of Buckingham was chief cauſe of all the kingdom's miſeries. But before the debate was ended, the ſpeaker returned with a meſſage from the King, commanding the houſe to adjourn till the morrow, and during ſuch adjournment all commitees to ceaſe. Next day, the ſpeaker brought from court the following meſſage.

CHARLES I An' 1628.

The ſpeaker injoins ſilence to Elliot. Ruſhworth, p. 606.

The commons complain of this violence.

The ſpeaker goes out.

* Sir John Finch.

Reſolve concerning a remonſtrance. p. 608.

The ſpeaker returns with orders to adjourn 'till the morrow. June 6.

" Whereas his Majeſty underſtanding, that ye " did conceive his laſt meſſage to reſtrain you in " your juſt privileges, to complain of any of his " miniſters; theſe are to declare his intentions, " that he had no meaning of barring you from what " hath been your right, but only to avoid all ſcan- " dals on his council and paſſed actions; and that " his miniſters might not be, nor himſelf under " their names, taxed for their counſel unto his " Majeſty, and that no ſuch particulars ſhould be " taken in hand, as would aſk a longer time of " conſideration than what he hath prefixed, and " ſtill reſolves to hold, ſo that for this time all " Chriſtendom might take notice of a ſweet part- " ing between him and his people: which if it " fall out, his Majeſty will not be long from an- " other meeting, when ſuch (if there be any) at " their leiſure and convenience may be conſi- " dered."

Another meſſage from Charles to the commons, ſent by the ſpeaker. Ruſhworth, p. 610. Annals.

King Charles, in his whole conduct, may be remarked to have been hitherto ſo firm in his principles concerning government, that he could not reſolve to recede one tittle, or if he ſeemed to make any conceſſion, he immediately rendered it uſeleſs by ſome reſtriction. This may be ſeen in his anſwer to the petition of right, but ſtill more particularly in this laſt meſſage to the commons. He would not, as he ſaid, bar them from the privilege to complain of his miniſters, but yet would have them caſt no blame on their counſels: which is, properly ſpeaking, he would not have them attacked, or at moſt, would only ſuffer them to be proſecuted for private offenſes, which they might be guilty of, like all other ſubjects, but not for ſtate-affairs, as miniſters and counſellors. The commons not being more ſatisfied with this meſſage than the former, the houſe was again turned into a commitee, and conſidered of ſome more heads to be inſerted in the remonſtrance, particularly the King's deſign to bring into the nation foreign forces. This complaint was grounded on a diſcovery the houſe had made of a privy-ſeal, expreſſed in theſe words (2).

Ruſhworth, p. 612.

CHARLES by the grace of God, &c.

" To the treaſurer, and under-treaſurer for our " exchequer for the time being, greeting. We do " hereby will and command you, out of our trea- " ſury, remaining in the receipt of our ſaid exche- " quer, forthwith to pay, or cauſe to be paid unto " Philip Burlemack of London, merchant, the " ſum of thirty thouſand pounds, to be paid by " him over by bill of exchange into the Low-

Charles's order to bring foreign forces into the kingdom. Ruſhworth, p. 612. Coke, p. 242. Annals.

(1) It was not this meſſage, but another, ſent June 5, wherein the King required the commons, " not to enter into, or " proceed with any new buſineſs, which might ſpend greater time, or lay any ſcandal or aſperſion upon the ſtate, government, " or miniſters thereof. See Ruſhworth, Vol. I. p. 605.

(2) Burlemack was called into the houſe, and confeſſed, he received thirty thouſand pounds by privy ſeal for buying horſes: that one thouſand of them were levied; that thoſe horſes and their riders were to come over, and arms provided for them in Holland: but that he heard a countermand was gone to ſtay them. Idem, p. 612.

Ruſhworth, ibid.

Then alſo, the commons ſent the peers a meſſage to deſire their concurrence in humbly petitioning the King, that a clear and ſatisfactory anſwer be given by his Majeſty in full parliament to the petition of right; to which the lords conſented. Charles then perceived it not poſſible for him to avoid giving ſuch anſwer as the parliament deſired, and therefore at length reſolved to do it with a good grace, otherwiſe he ſaw plainly the affair of ſupply would be for ever delayed. So coming to the parliament, the ſeventh of June, both houſes addreſſed him with the following petition.

Ibid. Annals.

May it pleaſe your moſt excellent Majeſty,

Petition of both houſes.

" THE lords ſpiritual and temporal, and com- " mons in parliament aſſembled, taking in " conſideration, that the good intelligence between " your Majeſty and your people doth much depend " on your Majeſty's anſwer upon their petition of " right formerly preſented; with unanimous con- " ſent do now become moſt humble ſuitors unto " your Majeſty, that you would be pleaſed to give " a clear and ſatisfactory anſwer thereunto in full " parliament."

To which the King replied. " The anſwer I " have already given you was made with ſo good " deliberation, and approved by the judgments of " ſo many wiſe men, that I could not have ima- " gined but it ſhould have given you full ſatisfac- " tion: but to avoid all ambiguous interpretations, " and to ſhew you there is no doubleneſs in my " meaning, I am willing to pleaſure you as well in " words as in ſubſtance. Read your petition, and " you ſhall have an anſwer which I am ſure will " pleaſe you."

Here the petition was read, and this anſwer was returned: " Soit fait comme il eſt deſiré. C. R." [Be it as is deſired.]

Satisfactory anſwer to the petition.

His Majeſty then proceeded. " This I am ſure " is full, yet no more than I granted you in my " firſt anſwer, for the meaning of that was to con- " firm your liberties, knowing, according to your " own proteſtations, that you neither mean nor can " hurt my prerogative. And I aſſure you, that " my maxim is, that the peoples liberties ſtrengthen " the King's prerogative, and the King's preroga- " tive is to defend the peoples liberties.

The King's ſpeech on that occaſion. Ruſhworth, p. 613.

" You ſee how ready I have ſhewed myſelf to " ſatisfy your demands, ſo that I have done my " part; wherefore, if this parliament have not a " happy concluſion, the ſin is yours, I am free " from it."

The commons examine other grievances. p. 613, 614. Annals, p. 328.

The commons being ſatisfied upon this point, began ſeriouſly to proceed with the bill of ſubſidies, yet in ſuch a manner that they made the conſideration of grievances keep pace with it, being well aſſured that as ſoon as the money-bill was paſſed, his Majeſty would cloſe the ſeſſion. They began therefore with examining a commiſſion, whereby the King had authoriſed and required a certain number of lords and gentlemen to conſider of the beſt and ſpeedieſt means for raiſing money upon the ſubject by way of impoſition or otherwiſe. This commiſſion had been granted after the ſummon to parliament, but before the convention. In all appearance, King Charles, fearing he ſhould be obliged to diſſolve this parliament for the ſame reaſons he had diſſolved the former, was willing to be firſt ſecured of means to raiſe money in caſe the parliament refuſed to grant a ſupply. Howſoever this was, the commons, after a conference with the lords, voted that the commiſſion ſhould be inſerted in the remonſtrance they were to preſent his Majeſty.

CHARLES I AN' 1628.

Reſolves of the houſe againſt Buckingham, Laud and Neile. Ruſhworth, p. 616.

Then they entered on ſcrutiniſing the conduct of Buckingham; a ſcrutiny no way favorable to that duke. He was charged with being the cauſe of all the kingdom's calamities; the loſſes at ſea; the decay of trade; the diſaſters to the armies, and of countenancing Arminianiſm and Popery. It was on this latter article obſerved, that the duke's mother was a Papiſt, and had great influence over her ſon, who had himſelf abſolute ſway over the King, and that Dr. Montague, deemed a zealous Arminian, made his court to him with great aſſiduity. In ſhort, the houſe came to this reſolution, " that p. 617. " the exceſſive power of the duke of Buckingham is " the cauſe of the evils and dangers to the King " and kingdom, and that this be added to the re- " monſtrance;" and voted " that Dr. Neile, p. 618. " biſhop of Wincheſter, and Dr. Laud, biſhop of Annals. " Bath and Wells, be named to be thoſe about the " King, who are ſuſpected to be Arminians." As this piece clearly and diſtinctly diſcovers what cauſes the commons had to complain againſt the government, I judge it neceſſary to inſert the whole. It runs thus:

The commons remonſtrance. Ruſhworth, p. 619. Annals, p. 330.

Moſt dread Sovereign,

" AS with humble thankfulneſs we, your duti- " ful commons now aſſembled in parliament, " do acknowledge the great comfort which we have " in your Majeſty's pious and gracious diſpoſition, " ſo we think it a mete and moſt neceſſary duty, " being called by your Majeſty to conſult and ad- " viſe of the great and urgent affairs of this church " and common-wealth, finding them at this time " in apparent danger of ruin and deſtruction, faith- " fully and dutifully to inform your Majeſty there- " of, and with bleeding hearts and bended knees, " to crave your ſpeedy redreſs therein, as to your " own wiſdom (unto which we moſt humbly ſub- " mit ourſelves and our deſires) ſhall ſeem moſt " mete and convenient. What the multitude and " potency of your Majeſty's enemies are abroad; " what be their malicious and ambitious ends; and " how vigilant and conſtantly induſtrious they are " in purſuing the ſame, is well known to your Ma- " jeſty; together with the dangers threatened " thereby to your ſacred perſon and your kingdoms, " and the calamities which have already fallen and " do daily increaſe upon your friends and allies, of " which we are well aſſured your Majeſty is moſt " ſenſible, and will accordingly, in your great " wiſdom, and with the graveſt and moſt mature " counſel, according to the exigency of the times " and occaſions, provide to prevent and help the " ſame.

" To which end we moſt humbly intreat your " Majeſty, firſt, and eſpecially, to caſt your " eyes upon the miſerable condition of this your " own kingdom, of late ſo ſtrangely weakened and " dejected, that unleſs, thro' your Majeſty's moſt " gracious wiſdom, goodneſs and juſtice it be ſpeed- " ily raiſed to a better condition, it is in no little " danger to become a ſudden prey to the enemies " thereof; and of the moſt happy and flouriſhing, " to be the moſt miſerable and contemptible na- " tion in the world. In the diſcoveries of which " dangers, miſchiefs and inconveniencies lying upon " us, we do freely proteſt, that it is far from our " thoughts to lay the leaſt aſperſion upon your " ſacred perſon, or the leaſt ſcandal upon your " government; for we do in all ſincerity of our " hearts, not only for our ſelves, but in the name " of all the commons of the realm (whom we re- " preſent) aſcribe as much duty as a moſt loyal " and affectionate people can do unto the beſt King " (for ſo ye are, and ſo have been pleaſed abun-

Charles I An' 1628.

" dantly to expreſs yourſelf this parliament, by " your Majeſty's clear and ſatisfactory anſwer to " our petition of right: for which, both ourſelves " and our poſterity ſhall bleſs God for you, and " ever preſerve a thankful memory for your great " goodneſs and juſtice therein) and we do verily " believe, that all, or moſt of theſe things, which " we ſhall now preſent unto your Majeſty, are " either unknown unto you, or elſe by ſome of " your Majeſty's miniſters offered under ſuch ſpe- " cious pretenſes as may hide their own ill intentions, " and ill conſequences of them from your Majeſty. " But we aſſure ourſelves, according to the good " example of your Majeſty's predeceſſors, nothing " can make your Majeſty (being a wiſe and judi- " cious Prince, and above all things deſirous of " the welfare of your people) more in love with " parliaments than this, which is one of the prin- " cipal ends of calling them, that therein your " Majeſty may be truely informed of the ſtate of " all the ſeveral parts of your kingdom, and how " your officers and miniſters do behave themſelves " in the truſt repoſed in them by your Majeſty, " which is ſcarce able to be made known unto you " but in parliament, as was declared by your bleſſed " father, when he was pleaſed to put his commons in " parliament aſſembled in mind, 'That it would " be the greateſt unfaithfulneſs and breach of duty " to his Majeſty, and of the truſt commited to them " by the country that could be, if in ſeting forth " the grievances of the people, and the condition " of all the parts of this kingdom from whence " they come, they did not deal clearly with him, " without ſparing any, how near and dear ſoever " they were unto him, if they were hurtful or dan- " gerous to the commonwealth.'

" In confidence therefore of your Majeſty's " gracious acceptation in a matter of ſo high im- " portance, and in faithful diſcharge of our duties; " we do firſt of all moſt humbly beſeech your " Majeſty to take notice, that howſoever we know " your Majeſty doth, with your ſoul, abhor that " any ſuch thing ſhould be imagined or attempted; " yet there is a general fear conceived in your " people, of ſecret working and combination, to " introduce into their kingdom innovation, and " change of our holy religion, more precious unto " us than our lives, and whatever this world can " afford. And our fears and jealouſies herein are " not merely conjectural, but ariſing out of ſuch " certain and viſible effects as may demonſtrate a " true and real cauſe: for, notwithſtanding the " many good and wholſome laws, and the pro- " viſions made to prevent the increaſe of Popery " within this kingdom; and notwithſtanding your " Majeſty's moſt gracious and ſatisfactory anſwer " to the petition of both houſes in that behalf, " preſented to your Majeſty at Oxford, we find " there hath followed no good execution nor effect, " but on the contraty (at which your Majeſty, out " of the quick ſenſe of your own religious heart, " cannot but be in the higheſt meaſure diſpleaſed) " thoſe of that religion do find extraordinary " favors and reſpect in court from perſons of great " quality and power, whom they continually re- " ſort unto, and in particular to the counteſs of " Buckingham, who herſelf openly profeſſing that " religion, is a known favorer and ſupporter of " them who do the ſame; which we well hoped, " upon your Majeſty's anſwer to the aforeſaid " petition at Oxford, ſhould not have been per- " mited, nor that any of your Majeſty's ſubjects " of that religion, juſtly to be ſuſpected, ſhould " be entertained in the ſervice of your Majeſty, or " your royal conſort the Queen: ſome likewiſe of " that religion have had honors, offices, and places " of command and authority lately confered upon " them. But that which ſtriketh the greateſt " terror into the hearts of your loyal ſubjects con- " cerning this is, that letters of ſtay of legal pro- " ceedings againſt them have been procured from " your Majeſty, by what indirect means we know " not: and commiſſions under the great ſeal, " granted and executed for compoſition to be " made with Popiſh recuſants, with inhibitions " and reſtraint, both to the eccleſiaſtical and tem- " poral courts, and officers to intermeddle with " them; which is conceived to amount to no leſs " than a toleration, odious to God; full of diſ- " honor, and extreme diſprofit to your Majeſty; " of extreme ſcandal and grief to your good " people, and of apparent danger to the preſent " ſtate of your Majeſty, and of this kingdom; " their numbers, power and inſolency daily in- " creaſing in all parts of your kingdom, and eſpe- " cially about London, and the ſurburbs thereof, " where exceeding many families do make their " abode publicly, frequent maſs at Denmark houſe, " and other places; and, by their often meetings " and conferences, have opportunities of com- " bining their counſels and ſtrength together, and " to the hazard of your Majeſty's ſafety, and the " ſtate, and moſt eſpecially in theſe doubtful and " calamitous times. And as our fear, concerning " change or ſubverſion of religion, is grounded " upon the daily increaſe of Papiſts, the open and " profeſſed enemies thereof, for the reaſons for- " merly mentioned; ſo are the hearts of your good " ſubjects no leſs perplexed when, with ſorrow, " they behold a daily growth and ſpreading of the " faction of the Arminians, that being, as your " Majeſty well knows, but a cunning way to bring " in Popery, and the profeſſors of thoſe opinions, " the common diſturbers of the Proteſtant churches, " and incendiaries in thoſe ſtates wherein they have " gotten any head, being Proteſtants in ſhew, but " Jeſuits in opinion; which cauſed your royal " father, with ſo much pious wiſdom, and ardent " zeal, to indeavor the ſuppreſſing them, as well " at home, as in the neighbor countries. And " your gracious Majeſty, imitating his moſt worthy " example, hath openly, and by your proclama- " tion declared your diſlike of thoſe perſons, and " of their opinions; who, notwithſtanding, are " much favored and advanced, not wanting friends " even of the clergy, near to your Majeſty; namely, " Dr. Neile biſhop of Wincheſter, and Dr. Laud " biſhop of Bath and Wells, who are juſtly " ſuſpected to be unſound in their opinions that " way. And it being now generally held the way " to preferment and promotion in the church, " many ſcholars do bend the courſe of their ſtudies " to maintain thoſe errors; their books and opi- " nions are ſuffered to be printed and publiſhed; " and on the other ſide, the imprinting of ſuch as " are written againſt them, and in defenſe of the " orthodox church, are hindered and prohibited; " and (which is a boldneſs almoſt incredible) this " reſtraint of orthodox books is made under color " of your Majeſty's formerly-mentioned proclama- " tion, the intent and meaning whereof, we know, " was quite contrary. And farther, to increaſe " our fears concerning innovation of religion, we " find, that there hath been no ſmall laboring to " remove that which is the moſt powerful means to " ſtrengthen and increaſe our own religion, and to " oppoſe both thoſe, which is the diligent teaching " and inſtruction of the people in the true know- " ledge and worſhip of Almighty God. And " therefore means hath been ſought out to depreſs " and diſcountenance pious, painful and orthodox " preachers; and how conformable ſoever, and " peaceable in their diſpoſition and carriage they be, " yet the preferment of ſuch is oppoſed, and, in-

" to your royal and pious heart, and that
" ſome ſpeedy courſe may be taken for redreſs
" therein.

" And if now, to all theſe, your Majeſty will be
" pleaſed to add conſideration of the circumſtances
" of time wherein theſe courſes, tending to the de-
" ſtruction of true religion within theſe your king-
" doms, have been taken here, even then when the " ſame is with open force and violence proſecuted in " other countries, and all the reformed churches in
" Chriſtendom either depreſſed, or miſerably di-
" ſtreſſed: we do humbly appeal unto your Ma-
" jeſty's princely judgment, whether there be not
" juſt ground of fear, that there is ſome ſecret and
" ſtrong co-operating here with the enemies of our " religion abroad, for the utter extirpation there-
" of? And whether, if thoſe courſes be not ſpeedi-
" ly redreſſed, and the profeſſion of true religion

" mighty God, always bent againſt the neglect of " his holy religion, the ſtrokes of whoſe divine
" juſtice we have already felt, and do ſtill feel with
" ſmart and ſorrow in great meaſure.

" And, beſide this fear of innovation in religion,
" we do, in like faithful diſcharge of our duties,
" moſt humbly declare to your Majeſty, that the " hearts of your people are full of fear of innova-
" tion and change of government, and according" ly poſſeſſed with extreme grief and ſorrow; yet

" monies by loans, than which (whatever your Ma-
" jeſty hath been informed to the contrary) there
" were never any monies demanded nor paid with " greater grief, and general diſlike of all your faith" ful ſubjects; tho' many, partly out of fear, part" ly out of other reſpects (yet moſt unwillingly) were " drawn to yield to what was required.

" The billeting ſoldiers did much augment both " their fears and griefs, wherein likewiſe they find
" much comfort upon your gracious anſwer to our " petition of right, and to that we preſented to " your Majeſty concerning this particular. Yet
" we moſt humbly beſeech your Majeſty, that we " may inform you, that the ſtill continuance and
" late re-inforcing of thoſe ſoldiers, the conditions
" of their perſons (many of them not being natives
" of this kingdom, nor of the ſame but of an op-
" poſite religion) the placing them upon the ſea-
" coaſt, where making head among themſelves,

" diers cannot be continued without exceeding
" great danger of the peace and ſafety of your
" kingdom.

CHARLES I AN' 1628.

" The report of the ſtrange and dangerous pur-
" poſe of bringing in German horſe, and riders,
" would have turned our doubts into deſpair, and
" our fears into a certainty of confuſion, had not " your Majeſty's gracious meſſage (for which we " humbly give you thanks) comforted us by the " aſſurance of your royal word, that they neither
" are, nor were intended by your Majeſty for any
" ſervice in England, but that they were deſigned
" for ſome other foreign imployment. Yet the
" ſight of the privy-ſeal, by which, it ſeemeth,
" they were to be levied; the great ſum of money,
" which, upon examination, we found to be paid
" for that purpoſe, gave us juſt cauſe of fear; that,
" much about the ſame time, there was a commiſ-
" ſion under the great-ſeal granted unto the lords,
" and others of the privy-council, to conſider of " other ways for raiſing monies, ſo particularly by
" impoſitions, gave us juſt cauſe to ſuſpect, that
" whatſoever was your Majeſty's gracious inten-
" tion, yet there wanted not thoſe who under ſome
" colorable pretenſe, might ſecretly by this, as by
" other ways, contrive to change the frame both
" of religion and government, and thereby under" mine the ſafety of your Majeſty and your king-
" doms.

" Theſe men could not be ignorant, that the " bringing in ſtrangers for aid hath been perni-
" cious to moſt ſtates, where they have been admit-
" ed, but to England fatal. We do bleſs God,
" who hath given your Majeſty a wiſe underſtand-
" ing heart to diſcern of thoſe courſes, and that " ſuch power produceth nothing but weakneſs and " calamity. And we beſeech your Majeſty to par-
" don the vehemency of our expreſſion, if in the " loyal and zealous affections we bear to your Ma-
" jeſty and your ſervice, we are bold to declare to " your Majeſty and the whole world, that we hold
" it far beneath the heart of any free Engliſhman
" to think, that this victorious nation ſhould now
" ſtand in need of German ſoldiers to defend their
" now King and kingdom.

" But when we conſider the courſe formerly
" mentioned, and theſe things tending to an appa" rent change of government; the often breaches of " parliament, whereby your Majeſty hath been " deprived of the faithful counſel, and free aids of " your people, by taking tonage and poundage,
" without grant thereof by act of parliament, ever
" ſince the begining of your Majeſty's reign to this
" preſent; the ſtanding commiſſion granted to the " duke of Buckingham, to be general of an army
" in the land in time of peace; the diſcharging
" faithful and ſufficient officers and miniſters, ſome
" from judicial places, and others from the offices
" and authorities which they formerly held in the " common-wealth: we cannot but, at the ſight of
" ſuch apparent deſolation as muſt neceſſarily fol-
" low theſe courſes, out of the depth of ſorrow lift
" up our cries to heaven for help, and next, under
" God, apply ourſelves unto your ſacred Majeſty,
" who, if you could hear ſo many thouſands ſpeak-
" ing together, do jointly implore ſpeedy help and " reformation.

" And

CHARLES I An' 1628.

" And if your Majeſty would be pleaſed to take " a farther view of the preſent ſtate of your realm, " we do humbly pray you to conſider, whether " the miſerable diſaſters, and ill ſucceſs which hath " accompanied all your late deſigns and actions, " particularly thoſe of Cadiz and the iſle of Rhee, " and the laſt expedition to Rochel, have not ex- " tremely waſted that ſtock of honor which was " left unto this kingdom, ſometimes terrible to all " other nations, and now declining to contempt " beneath the meaneſt.

" Together with our honors, we there loſt thoſe " (and not a few) who had they lived we might " have ſome better hope of recovering it again; " our valiant and expert colonels, captains and com- " manders, and many thouſand common ſoldiers " and mariners: tho' we have ſome cauſe to think " that your Majeſty is not as yet rightly inform- " ed thereof; and that of ſix or ſeven thouſand of " your ſubjects loſt at the iſle of Rhee, your Ma- " jeſty received information but of a few hundreds. " And this diſhonor and loſs have been purchaſed " with the conſumption of above a million of " treaſure.

" Many of the forts are exceeding weak and de- " cayed, and want both men and munition. And " here we cannot but with grief conſider and com- " plain of a ſtrange improvidence (we think your " Majeſty will rather call it treachery) that your " ſtore of powder, which by order of your privy- " council, dated the tenth of December 1626, " ſhould be conſtantly three hundred laſts beſide " a conſtant ſupply of twenty laſts per month " for ordinary expenſes, and were now fit (as we " conceive) to be double the proportion, is at this " time in the Tower (the preſent warrants being " ſerved) but nine laſts and forty-eight pounds in " all; which we tremble to think of. And that, " notwithſtanding this extreme ſcarcity of powder, " great quantities have been permited to be ſold " out of your Majeſty's ſtore to particular perſons " for private gain; whereof we have ſeen a certi- " ficate, ſix laſts ſold ſince the fourteenth of Janu- " ary laſt, and your Majeſty's ſtore being unfur- " niſhed of powder, which by a contract made " with Mr. Evelyn, by advice of your lords in " parliament, ought to be ſupplied monthly with " twenty laſt, at the rate of three pounds ten ſhil- " lings and ten pence a barrel; your Majeſty hath " been forced to pay above ſeven pounds a barrel " for powder, to be brought in from beyond ſeas; " for which purpoſe, twelve thouſand four hun- " dred pounds was impreſſed to Mr. Burlemack the " laſt year, and that powder not ſo good as that " by contract your Majeſty ſhould have by one " third part; all which are moſt fearful and dan- " gerous abuſes. But what the poverty, weakneſs " and miſery of our kingdom is now grown unto " by decay of trade, deſtruction and loſs of ſhips " and mariners, within theſe three years, we are " almoſt afraid to declare: and could we by any " other means have been ſure that your Majeſty " ſhould, any other way, have had a true infor- " mation thereof, we ſhould have been doubtful to " have made our weakneſs and extremity of miſ- " fortune in this kind to appear: but the importu- " nate and moſt pitiful complaints from all parts " of the kingdom, near adjoining to the ſea, in " this kind, would rend, as we think, the ſtonieſt " heart in the world with ſorrow; and the ſenſe " we have of the miſerable condition your king- " dom is in by reaſon thereof, eſpecially, for that " we ſee no poſſible means (being now ſhortly to " end this ſeſſion) how to help the ſame, adds ſuch " a weight of grief unto our ſad thoughts, as we " have not words to expreſs it: but for your Ma- " jeſty's more exact information therein, we be- " ſeech you be pleaſed to peruſe the calendar of " particulars which, with the remonſtrance, we " moſt humbly preſent unto your Majeſty.

CHARLES I An' 1628.

" One reaſon, among many, of this decay of " trade, and loſs of ſhips and mariners is, the not " guarding the narrow ſeas, the regality whereof " your Majeſty hath now in a manner wholly loſt, " being that wherein a principal part of the honor " and ſafety of this kingdom heretofore conſiſted; " and now, having abſolutely neglected it, the " town of Dunkirk doth ſo continually rob and " ſpoil your ſubjects, that we can aſſure your Ma- " jeſty (if ſome preſent and effectual remedy be " not forthwith provided) the whole trade of this " kingdom, the ſhiping, mariners, and all belong- " ing thereunto, will be utterly loſt and conſumed: " the principal cauſe of which evils and dangers " we conceive to be the exceſſive power of the " duke of Buckingham, and the abuſe of that " power; and we humbly ſubmit unto your Ma- " jeſty's excellent wiſdom, whether it be ſafe for " yourſelf, or your kingdoms, that ſo great power, " as reſts in him by ſea and land, ſhould be in the " hands of any one ſubject whatſoever.

" And as it is not ſafe, ſo ſure we are it cannot " be for your ſervice; it being impoſſible for one " man to manage ſo many and weighty affairs of " the kingdom as he hath undertaken, beſide the " ordinary duties of thoſe offices which he holds, " ſome of which, well performed, would require " the time and induſtry of the ableſt men, both of " counſel and action, your whole kingdom will af- " ford, eſpecially in theſe times of common danger.

" And our humble deſire is farther, that your " moſt excellent Majeſty will be pleaſed to take " into your moſt princely conſideration, whether, " in reſpect the ſaid duke hath ſo abuſed his power, " it be ſafe for your Majeſty and your kingdoms " to continue him, either in his great offices, or in " his place of nearneſs and counſel about your ſacred " perſon.

" And this in all humility, aiming at nothing " but the honor of Almighty God, and the main- " tenance of his true religion, the ſafety and hap- " pineſs of your moſt excellent Majeſty, and the " preſervation and proſperity of this church and " common-wealth; we have indeavored, with faith- " ful hearts and intentions, and in diſcharge of the " duty we owe to your Majeſty and our country, " to give your Majeſty a true repreſentation of our " preſent danger, and preſſing calamities, which " we humbly beſeech your Majeſty graciouſly to " accept, and to take the ſame to heart, account- " ing the ſafety and proſperity of your people your " greateſt happineſs, and their love your richeſt " treaſure. A rueful and lamentable ſpectacle we " confeſs it muſt needs be, to behold thoſe ruins " in ſo fair a houſe, ſo many diſeaſes, and almoſt " every one of them deadly, in ſo ſtrong and well- " tempered a body as this kingdom lately was. But " yet we will not doubt, but that God hath reſerved " this honor for your Majeſty to reſtore the ſafety " and happineſs thereof, as a work worthy ſo ex- " cellent a Prince, for whole long life and true fe- " licity we daily pray, and that your fame and " never-dying glory may be continued to all ſuc- " ceeding generations."

This remonſtrance, delivered by the ſpeaker (who much deſired to be excuſed) made not on Charles any great impreſſion, tho' it did on the people. All the facts therein alledged were known and indiſputable truths. As to the right, people readily believed, King Charles and his miniſters meaning was to eſtabliſh a deſpotic power, becauſe their whole procedure plainly ſhewed it: but they could not believe that the parliament had purpoſely formed a ſcheme to rob their Sovereign of his pre-

rogatives. They were the more confirmed in this opinion as, after the diſſolution of this very parliament, Charles, in the reaſons he gave for that diſſolution, complained not of the remonſtrance.

The bill of ſubſidies ſent up to the lords

The ſame day this remonſtrance was preſented to his Majeſty, the commons ſent the ſubſidy-bill to the lords for their concurrence. Soon after the King, by meſſage, acquainted them that he deſigned to end the ſeſſion the twenty-ſixth of June: whereupon the commons began to prepare a particular remonſtrance concerning the illegal levying tonage and poundage. This was a very old impoſt upon merchants goods, exported and imported, which parliaments uſually granted to the Kings, to inable them to guard the ſeas and protect commerce. The ſaid impoſt had long been conceded to every Sovereign; and it ſometimes happened, that after the death of a King, his ſucceſſor had continued levying it 'till by act of parliament granted in form. As in Charles I's reign, the court was much guided by precedents favorable to the prerogative-royal, and as they took advantage of ſuch precedents as if they had been ſo many laws, it occurred that, ſince King James's death, Charles had levied tonage and poundage, without deſiring a parliamentary ſtatute for that purpoſe, under color that ſome of his predeceſſors had practiſed it ſome time 'till the proper act had paſſed. This is what the commons exclaimed againſt, maintaining the right to be a pure grant of the people, and conſequently the King had not power to levy it without conſent of parliament; and the more as the ſeas had never been well guarded, nor the trade leſs protected than in the firſt years of this reign. To maintain therefore the peoples rights, and hinder the crown from uſurping by degrees the impoſt of tonage and poundage, as a right independant of the parliament, the commons prepared a remonſtrance upon that ſubject to be laid before his Majeſty.

Charles tells both houſes the commiſſion for raiſing money is cancelled. Ruſhworth, p. 628. Annals, p. 334.

While this remonſtrance was drawing, Charles acquainted the upper houſe, that the commiſſion for finding means to raiſe money was no other than a warrant of advice ſuiting the time and occaſions; but that now, having received a token of his peoples love, by the ſubſidy-bill ready to be paſſed, the commiſſion was become uſeleſs, and therefore he had commanded its being cancelled: as if he had ſaid, in caſe the parliament had not granted a ſupply, he ſhould have found ways to raiſe money. As to his ſaying the commiſſion was but a warrant of advice, it is ſtrange that, in ſpeaking to men of ſenſe, ſuch wretched excuſes ſhould be uſed. Next day, the commons were likewiſe informed that the commiſſion was cancelled. As the tonage and poundage buſineſs made much noiſe, it is requiſite we inſert the commons remonſtrance thereon.

Moſt Gracious Sovereign,

"YOUR Majeſty's moſt loyal and dutiful "ſubjects, the commons in this preſent par- "liament aſſembled, being in nothing more careful, "than of the honor and proſperity of your Ma- "jeſty and the kingdom, which they know do "much depend upon that happy union and relation "betwixt your Majeſty and your people, do with "much ſorrow apprehend that, by reaſon of the "incertainty of their continuance together, the "unexpected interruptions which have been caſt "upon them, and the ſhortneſs of time in which "your Majeſty hath determined to end this ſeſſion, "they cannot bring to maturity and perfection "diverſe buſineſſes of weight, which they have "taken into their conſideration and reſolution, as "the moſt important for the common good: "among other things, they have taken into eſpecial "care the preparing a bill, for the granting your "Majeſty ſuch a ſubſidy of tonage and poundage "as might uphold your profit and revenue in as "ample a manner as their juſt care and reſpect of "trade (wherein not only the proſperity, but even "the life of the kingdom doth conſiſt) would per- "mit: but being a work which will require much "time and preparation by conference with your "Majeſty's officers, and with the merchants not "only of London, but of other remote parts, "they find it not poſſible to be accompliſhed at "this time. Wherefore, conſidering it will be "much more prejudicial to the right of the ſubject "if your Majeſty ſhould continue to receive the "ſame without authority of law, after the de- "termination of a ſeſſion, than if there had been "a receſs by adjournment only, in which caſe, "that intended grant would have related to the "firſt day of the parliament; and aſſuring them- "ſelves, that your Majeſty is reſolved to obſerve "that your royal anſwer, which you have lately "made to the petition of right of both houſes of "parliament. Yet doubting leſt your Majeſty "may be miſinformed concerning this particular "caſe, as if you might continue to take thoſe ſub- "ſidies of tonage and poundage, and other im- "poſitions upon merchants, without breaking that "anſwer, they are forced by that duty which they "owe to your Majeſty, and to thoſe whom they "repreſent, to declare, 'That there ought not "any impoſition to be laid upon the goods of "merchants, exported or imported, without com- "mon conſent by act of parliament; which is the "right and inheritance of your ſubjects, founded "not only upon the moſt ancient and original con- "ſtitution of this kingdom, but often confirmed "and declared in diverſe ſtatute-laws.

"And for the better manifeſtation thereof, may "it pleaſe your Majeſty to underſtand, that altho' "your royal predeceſſors, the Kings of this realm, "have often had ſuch ſubſidies and impoſitions "granted unto them upon diverſe occaſions, eſpe- "cially for guarding the ſeas, and ſafeguard of "merchants; yet the ſubjects have been ever care- "ful to uſe ſuch cautions and limitations in thoſe "grants, as might prevent any claim to be made "that ſuch ſubſidies do proceed from duty, and "not from the free-gift of the ſubjects. And that "they have heretofore uſed to limit a time in ſuch "grants, and for the moſt part but ſhort, as for a "year or two, and, if it continued longer, they "have ſometimes directed a certain ſpace of ceſſa- "tion or intermiſſion, that ſo the right of the ſub- "ject might be more evident. At other times it "hath been granted upon accaſion of war, for a "certain number of years, with proviſo, that if "the war were ended in the mean time, then the "grant ſhould ceaſe; and of courſe it hath been "ſequeſtered into the hands of ſome ſubjects, to "be imployed for guarding the ſeas: and it is "acknowledged by the ordinary anſwers of your "Majeſty's predeceſſors, in their aſſent to the bills "of ſubſidies of tonage and poundage, that it is of "the nature of other ſubſidies, proceeding from the "good will of the ſubject. Very few of your pre- "deceſſors had it for life, until the reign of "Henry VII, who was ſo far from conceiving he "had any right thereto, that altho' he granted "commiſſions for collecting certain duties and "cuſtoms due by law, yet he made no commiſſions "for receiving the ſubſidy of tonage and poundage, "until the ſame was granted unto him in parlia- "ment. Since his time, all the Kings and Queens "of this realm have had the like grants for life, "by the free love and good-will of the ſubjects. "And whenſoever the people have been grieved, "by laying any impoſitions, or other charges upon "their goods and merchandiſes without authority "of law (which hath been very ſeldom) yet upon "complaint

Charles I An' 1628.

" complaint in parliament, they have been forthwith relieved; ſaving in the time of your royal father, who having, thro' ill counſel, raiſed the rates and charges upon merchandiſes to that height at which they now are, yet he was pleaſed ſo far forth to yield to the complaint of his people, as to offer, that if the value of thoſe impoſitions which he had ſet might be made good unto him, he would bind himſelf and his heirs by act of parliament, never to lay any other: which offer, the commons at that time, in regard of the great burden, did not think fit to yield unto. Nevertheleſs your loyal commons in this parliament, out of their eſpecial zeal to your ſervice, and eſpecial regard of your preſſing occaſions, have taken into their conſideration, ſo to frame a grant of ſubſidy, of tonage or poundage to your Majeſty, that both you might have been the better inabled for the defenſe of your realm, and your ſubjects, by being ſecure from all undue charges, be the more incouraged chearfully to proceed in their courſe of trade; by the increaſe whereof, your Majeſty's profit, and likewiſe the ſtrength of the kingdom, would be very much augmented.

" But not being now able to accompliſh this their deſire, there is no courſe left unto them, without manifeſt breach of their duty both to your Majeſty and their country, ſave only to make this humble declaration, that the receiving tonage and poundage, and other impoſitions not granted by parliament, is a breach of the fundamental liberties of this kingdom, and contrary to your Majeſty's royal anſwer to the ſaid petition of right. And therefore they do moſt humbly beſeech your Majeſty to forbear any farther receiving the ſame; and not to take it in ill part from thoſe of your Majeſty's loving ſubjects, who ſhall refuſe to make payment of any ſuch charges, without warrant of law demanded.

" And as, by this forbearance, your moſt excellent Majeſty ſhall manifeſt unto the world your royal juſtice in the obſervation of your laws: ſo they doubt not but hereafter, at the time appointed for their coming again, they ſhall have occaſion to expreſs their great deſire to advance ,, your Majeſty's honor and profit."

King Charles having notice of the contents of this remonſtrance, on the twenty-ſixth of June ſent for the ſpeaker, who returned ſome time after to the houſe, while the remonſtrance was reading. He was no ſooner come, but his Majeſty, who was now at the houſe of lords, ſent for the commons, and thus ſpake to both houſes.

Charles's ſpeech to both houſes concerning tonage and poundage. Ruſhworth, p. 631.

" IT may ſeem ſtrange that I came ſo ſuddenly to end this ſeſſion: before I give my aſſent to the bills, I will tell you the cauſe, tho' I muſt avow, that I owe the account of my actions to God alone. It is known to every one, that a while ago the houſe of commons gave me a remonſtrance; how acceptable every man may judge: and for the merit of it, I will not call that in queſtion, for I am ſure no wiſe man can juſtify it.

" Now ſince I am truly informed, that a ſecond remonſtrance is preparing for me to take away the profit of my tonage and poundage, one of the chief maintenances of my crown, by alledging, I have given away my right thereto by my anſwer to your petition:

" This is ſo prejudicial unto me, that I am forced to end this ſeſſion ſome few hours before I intended, being not willing to receive any more remonſtrances, to which I muſt give a harſh anſwer. And ſince I ſee, that even the houſe of commons begins already to make falſe conſtructions of what I granted in your petition, leſt it be worſe interpreted in the country, I will now make a declaration concerning the true intent thereof. Charles I An' 1628.

" The profeſſion of both houſes, in the time of hammering this petition, was no way to trench upon my prerogative, ſaying, they had neither intention or power to hurt it. Therefore it muſt needs be conceived, that I have granted no new, but only confirmed the ancient liberties of my ſubjects. Yet to ſhew the clearneſs of my intentions, that I neither repent, nor mean to recede from any thing I have promiſed you, I do here declare myſelf, that thoſe things which have been done, whereby many have had ſome cauſe to expect the liberties of the ſubjects to be trenched upon, which indeed was the firſt and true ground of the petition, ſhall not hereafter be drawn into example for your prejudice, and from time to time, in the word of a King, ye ſhall not have the like cauſe to complain. But as for tonage and poundage, it is a thing I cannot want, and was never intended by you to aſk, nor meaned by me, I am ſure, to grant.

" To conclude, I command you all who are here to take notice of what I have ſpoken at this time, to be the true intent and meaning of what I granted you in your petition; but eſpecially you, my lords the judges, for to you only, under me, belongs the interpretation of laws; for none of the houſes of parliament, either joint or ſeparate (what new doctrine ſoever may be raiſed) have any power either to make or declare a law without my conſent."

After this ſpeech, the ſubſidy-bill was paſſed, the lords having already given their conſent, and the parliament was prorogued to the twentieth of October. Subſidy bill is paſſed and the parliament prorogued.

Charles's ſpeech to the parliament, before this prorogation, was ſo obſcure, that it was hard to conceive on what grounds he complained of the remonſtrance the commons had prepared. He ſeems to have conſidered tonage and poundage as a right annexed to his prerogative-royal: otherwiſe, there was no need to obſerve that both houſes, while they were preparing the petition of right, had declared, they deſigned not to incroach on his prerogative. This argument, on ſuppoſition of that principle, would have been unanſwerable, and the reſt very ſuperfluous: but, as his Majeſty was conſcious he could never prove this right did belong to him independently of the parliament, he proceeded to other arguments, the weakneſs whereof is evident. He ſaid, the two houſes, by their petition of right, deſigned not to take from him tonage and poundage, whence he infered that, ſince they had no ſuch particular view, he could not with juſtice be deſired to deſiſt from it. But firſt, tho' the petition of right contained certain particular articles, theſe articles did not exclude whatever was implied in the general article, founded on the ancient ſtatutes: " That no tax, tallage, loan, benevolence, " or other charge ought to be levied by the King, " without conſent of parliament." Now tonage and poundage being of this nature, it neceſſarily followed, that it was included in the general article, or elſe it was to be proved appertaining to the crown independently of the peoples common conſent. Secondly, the two houſes had no intention to deprive him of tunage and poundage in particular, becauſe they deſigned to grant it by an act. He could not therefore conclude from thence, that he had a right to levy it without their conſent. He, as another argument, alledged, that he never deſigned to grant them this article, making his anſwer to depend on his intention. But his anſwer, " Soit fait " comme il eſt deſiré," [Be it as is deſired] manifeſtly Remarks on the King's ſpeech.

refered to the contents of the petition, and not to his Majeſty's intention in granting it. His third argument was taken from tonage and poundage being one of the beſt revenues of the crown, and his chief ſupport. This was a moſt excellent argument to demonſtrate to the parliament the neceſſity of granting him this right, and to induce him to continue the ſeſſion 'till the act was paſſed; but he could not thence infer, that he had power to levy it againſt the parliament's will, eſpecially as it was in his breaſt to have it in a legal way. He moreover perpetually inculcated, that his anſwer depended on his intention, directly contrary to the clear and expreſs terms of the anſwer itſelf, which could refer only to the petition. Finally, in taking from the houſes the power of declaring what was, or what was not law, he aſcribed it ſolely to the judges who were, as we may ſay, his creatures; ſince as he could make or unmake judges at his pleaſure, he put himſelf properly in poſſeſſion of this ſame power, independently of the two houſes: which intention appeared afterwards but too manifeſtly.

This ſeſſion was to King Charles worth five ſubſidies (1); a very conſiderable aid, wherewith the parliament purchaſed this Prince's anſwer to the petition of right, that is, the confirmation of the laws, which 'till then had paſſed for inconteſtable. On the other ſide, his Majeſty thought he had no leſs dearly bought the five ſubſidies by condeſcending to tie up his hands, in conſenting to the petition of right, contrary to his own principles, and the projects he had formed with reſpect to government: but he afterwards ſhewed that, in granting the petition of right, he had only amuſed the parliament, ſince he never regulated his conduct by what was contained in the petition. Preſently after the parliament's prorogation, Charles iſſued diverſe proclamations. The firſt was to ſuppreſs Dr. Manwaring's ſermons *. But this ſuppreſſion conſiſted only in an order to ſuch as had any copies of theſe ſermons, to deliver them to the ſecretary of ſtate, or ſome other magiſtrate (2). The ſequel will ſhew whether the court was deſirous this order ſhould be punctually executed: but the King's appearing publicly not to approve theſe ſermons was ſufficient to ſatisfy the people.

A ſecond proclamation injoined the apprehending Richard Smith, titular biſhop of Chalcedon, with all other prieſts and Jeſuits who had taken orders by authority from the See of Rome, and their commitment to Wiſbich caſtle (3). Some Jeſuits having been impriſoned in Newgate (4), his Majeſty ordered that, in caſe of conviction, they ſhould be conveyed to the ſame caſtle of Wiſbich, in the iſle of Ely. Theſe were the court's whole proceedings againſt Papiſts.

But on the other hand, King Charles took a courſe which gave a much worſe opinion of his own, or his miniſters zeal for religion. 1. He appointed commiſſioners to compound with recuſants. 2. Sir Richard Weſton, a known Papiſt, was made lord treaſurer, and afterwards earl of Portland. 3. Dr. Laud, whom the lower houſe of parliament conſidered as head of the Arminians, was tranſlated from the See of Bath and Wells to that of London. 4. Dr. Montague, who had given ſo great offenſe by his book, intitled Appeal to Cæſar, was made biſhop of Chicheſter.

Rochel being at this time cloſely beſieged by the King of France, Charles had prepared a fleet to relieve it, and the duke of Buckingham, who was to have the command, was at Portſmouth. Being juſt ready to imbark, he was pierced to the heart with a knife, and inſtantly died (5). The aſſaſſin was lieutenant John Felton, who owned that, after the commons declaration againſt that duke, he had looked on him as his country's enemy, and been thereby induced to perpetrate the deed. It appeared by his trial, that he had no accomplice, and was led to this wicked action thro' exceſs of zeal. King Charles expreſſed a no ordinary concern for this duke's tragical cataſtrophe, and in order to perpetuate to him marks of his affection, even after his death, his creatures remained in the ſame favor and poſts they had injoyed while their protector was living.

Mean while, as the relief of Rochel would not admit any farther delay, Charles ſent away the fleet deſigned for that purpoſe. But Cardinal Richlieu had uſed ſuch diligence, that the barricado he was making to prevent the Engliſh ſhips from approaching was finiſhed, ſo that the fleet was forced to return juſt as they came, having firſt been eye-witneſſes of Rochel's reduction (6).

The parliament's meeting, appointed to be the twentieth of October, was by proclamation prorogued to the tenth of January. During this interval occurred certain paſſages which furniſhed the parliament with freſh cauſes of complaint, and finally occaſioned their diſſolution. Tho' the remonſtrance concerning tonage and poundage was not preſented to his Majeſty, it was however public, and ſufficient to convince people what was the ſenſe of the commons. On this foundation, three merchants among others refuſed paying the King this duty. Rolls, one of the three, a London merchant, and member of parliament, having refuſed it, as contrary to law, the cuſtomers ſeized his goods, and, on his alledging the authority of parliament, one of the officers inſolently told him, "If all "the parliament were in you, we would take your "goods." The two others, Chambers and Vaſſal, merchants of London, the firſt of whom was an alderman, were condemned to pay tonage and poundage by the barons of the exchequer, who ordered imbargo to be laid on their effects.

orders to be preſent, his Majeſty made the following ſpeech to both houſes.

"THE care I have to remove all obſtacles "which may hinder the good correſpondency between me and the parliament, is the cauſe "I have called you together at this time, the particular occaſion being a complaint made in the "lower houſe. And for you, my lords, I am glad "to take this, and all other occaſions whereby you "may clearly underſtand both my words and actions, for as you are neareſt in degree, ſo you "are the fiteſt witneſſes unto Kings.

"The complaint I ſpeak of is, for ſtaying mens "goods who deny tonage and poundage; this "may have a ſhort and eaſy concluſion, if my "words and actions be rightly underſtood. For "by paſſing the bill, as my anceſtors have had it, "my by-paſſed actions will be included, and my "future proceedings authoriſed, which certainly "would not have been ſtuck on, if men had not "imagined that I had taken theſe duties as apperTaining to my hereditary prerogative, in which "they are much deceived, for it ever was, and ſtill "is my meaning, by the gift of my people to injoy it, and my intention in my ſpeech, at ending "the laſt ſeſſion, concerning this point, was not to "challenge tonage and poundage as of right, but "'de bene eſſe,' ſhewing you the neceſſity, not "the right by which I was to take it, until you "had granted it to me, aſſuring my ſelf, according to your general profeſſions, you wanted time, "not will to give it me,

"Wherefore now, having opportunity, I expect "that, without loſs of time, you make good your "profeſſions, and ſo by paſſing a bill put an end "to all the queſtions ariſing from this ſubject; eſpecially ſince I have cleared the only ſcruple "which can trouble you in this buſineſs. To conclude, let us not be jealous one of the other's "actions; for if I had been eaſily moved at every "occaſion, the order you made on Wedneſday laſt "might have made me ſtartle, there being ſome "ſhew to ſuſpect that you had given yourſelves "the liberty to be the inquiſitors after complaints; "the words of your order being ſomewhat too "largely penned: but looking into your actions, I "find you only hear complainers, not ſeeking complaints: for I am certain you neither pretend, nor "deſire the liberty to be inquiſitors of mens actions "before particular complaint be made.

"This I have ſpoken, to ſhew you how ſlow I "am to believe harſhly of your proceedings, likewiſe to aſſure you, that the houſes reſolutions, "not particular mens ſpeeches, ſhall make me "judge well or ill, not doubting but, according "to my example, you will be deaf to ill reports "concerning me, 'till my words and actions ſpeak "for themſelves, that ſo this ſeſſion begining with "confidence one towards another, it may end with "a perfect good underſtanding between us: which "God grant."

The commons examine matters of religion. Jan. 26. Ruſhworth, p. 645,--647, Annals.

Some days after, Charles ſent to the commons a meſſage, that the bill for tonage and poundage might be ſpeedily taken into conſideration, and no time loſt. But the commons, not being of opinion that the King had power to preſcribe to them times, fell upon matters of religion, particularly with regard to Arminianiſm: and finding that Laud, Montague and Manwaring had been prefered ſince laſt ſeſſion, ſeveral members made great complaints. Notwithſtanding his Majeſty again preſſed them by meſſage to proceed with the bill for tonage and poundage, they pretended that religion ought to have the precedency of every other buſineſs. Wherefore they began to inquire how the execution of the laws againſt Papiſts came to ceaſe, and whence it was that Papiſts were imployed and countenanced, and new ceremonies continually introduced, eſpecially at Durham, by Dr. Coſins, as angels, ſaints, crucifixes, altars, candles on Candlemas-day, and laſtly, from whence proceeded the increaſe of Arminianiſm.

CHARLES I An' 1628.

Complaints againſt Coſins.

This inquiry was interrupted by a freſh meſſage from his Majeſty, requiring them to give preference to the bill for tonage and poundage. Nevertheleſs, he declared that his meaning was not to interrupt their debates upon matters of religion, provided the houſe would not interfere in what did not belong to them. He thereby took away with one hand what he gave with the other, ſince he believed the commons had no right to meddle with religion. This meſſage hindered them not from continuing their debates. The proclamation forbiding all diſputes for and againſt Arminians was particularly complained of, wherein it was ſaid, "If there be "any difference of opinion concerning the ſe ſon"able interpretation of the thirty-nine articles, the "biſhops have power to order which way they "pleaſe." But, as ſome of the prelates were held in ſuſpicion, it was by the terms of the proclamation concluded that, in following the biſhops determination, England would be obliged to receive Popery or Arminianiſm. Theſe ſuſpicions fell chiefly upon Laud and Neile, who being the King's counſellors for matters of religion governed almoſt all the other prelates. On this account, the houſe, to prevent thoſe dangers they apprehended, judged proper to ingage in this vow.

Charles forbids the commons to meddle with religious matters. Ruſhworth, p. 648.

They regard not his orders. p. 649.

"We the commons in parliament aſſembled, do "claim, proteſt, and avow for truth, the ſenſe of "the articles of religion, which were eſtabliſhed by "parliament in the thirteenth year of our late "Queen Elizabeth, which by the public act of the "church of England, and by the general and current expoſitions of the writers of our church, "have been delivered unto us. And we reject the "ſenſe of the Jeſuits and Arminians, and all others, "wherein they differ from us."

Vow of the lower houſe concerning religion. Ruſhworth, p. 649.

As the commons aim was to perſuade people that religion was in danger, they deſired their lordſhips concurrence to petition his Majeſty for a faſt, which with ſome difficulty they obtained. Charles plainly perceived the deſign of this petition, and, tho' he did not think fit to reject it, anſwered, that the cuſtom of faſting every ſeſſion was but lately begun; that he granted it however for this time, tho' he did not ſee the neceſſity of it; but for the future would not grant a faſt, except on extraordinary occaſions. Adding, that as for the defenſe of the reformed churches abroad, fighting would do them more good than faſting.

Both houſes petition for a faſt; which Charles grants. Jan. 30. Id. p. 650. Annals.

As Charles had often preſſed the commons to proceed with the bill for tonage and poundage, and give it the precedency of matters touching religion, they thought themſelves obliged to preſent a declaration to the King to juſtify their conduct.

This declaration, which was a ſort of apology containing nothing material, I think it not neceſſary to inſert it at length. It ſuffices to ſay, the commons excuſed themſelves two ways, for not giving precedency to the bill for tonage and poundage. The firſt was, becauſe matters of religion having been firſt propoſed, the conſtant order of the houſe required they ſhould have the preference. The ſecond was, the weight and importance of the concerns of religion. They concluded with thanking the King for his promiſes to maintain religion, thereby tacitly reproaching him with non-performance.

Declaration of the commons to his Majeſty. Ruſhworth, p. 651.

Charles anſwered this declaration, not particularly, but with ſome brief notes. He told them, "he thought it ſtrange they ſhould have an ill "opinion of him with reſpect to religion." He "aſſured

p. 653. Annals.

aſſured them, "That he would never ſtop his ears "to the complaints which ſhould be brought to "him upon that ſubject, provided that in form "and matter the commons did not tranſgreſs their "limits." Concluding with theſe words: "I "muſt ſtill be inſtant with you, that you proceed "with tonage and poundage with diligence; (not "looking to be denied in ſo juſt a deſire) that you "muſt not think it ſtrange, if I, finding you ſlack, "give you ſuch farther quickening as I ſhall find "cauſe."

Religious grievances. Feb. 4. Ruſhworth, p. 655. Annals.

After this, the commons continued their debates upon matters of religion, and particularly on the proclamation, to prohibit diſputing for or againſt Arminianiſm. This was urged to be a ſnare to ſuppreſs the Puritan party, and give the Arminians more liberty, and that Laud and Montague were therein his Majeſty's adviſers. It was likewiſe complained, that the enemies of religion had procured a royal pardon under the great ſeal for the four moſt ſuſpected eccleſiaſtics in England, viz. Montague, Coſins, Sibthorp, and Manwaring, and that, in contempt of the parliament, they were even promoted to biſhopricks, or other good benefices (1). I cannot really conceive how it is poſſible to juſtify King Charles's condeſcenſion for thoſe who counſeled him ſo openly to protect, nay to prefer men ſo odious to the parliament, ſince he could not be ignorant how much he rendered himſelf ſuſpected by ſuch a conduct: at leaſt, it cannot be denied that he gave his adverſaries no ſmall advantage. But beſide its being the genius of both King and court to look on the parliament, more eſpecially the commons, with exceſſive contempt, his Majeſty could not refuſe any thing to Dr. Laud, who was his prime counſellor in eccleſiaſtical affairs. To confirm the commons in their ſuſpicions of Laud, the printers and bookſellers of London preſented them ſundry petitions, complaining of the reſtraint of books written againſt Popery and Arminianiſm, while a licenſe was never refuſed to ſuch as were compoſed in favor of Popiſh and Arminian doctrines: they even inſtanced in certain books againſt Popery, which were denied to be licenſed; affirming all this was done by the biſhop of London, or his chaplains, to whom the examination of thoſe books was commited.

Laud's character.

As Dr. Laud, afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, made a very great figure in England during the firſt fifteen years of this reign, I think it not improper here to inſert part of what is ſaid for and againſt him: not that I pretend fully to make known his genius, character or religion; which to me ſeems impracticable, conſidering what oppoſite opinions there are concerning him, it being almoſt impoſſible to affirm any thing of him, good or bad, upon the teſtimony of ſome, but what is contradicted and rejected as falſe by others. This is the common effect of parties. Scarcely can any additions be made to the eulogies which thoſe who profeſs what they term High-Church, i. e. the rigid Epiſcopalians, beſtow on this famous prelate. Lord Clarendon, in his hiſtory, expreſſes on all occaſions a very high eſteem for Laud, and finds not in him any other fault but a little too much eagerneſs to accompliſh his enterpriſes. All the reſt of that party extol him to the very ſkies. They ſee no imperfection in him; and every where praiſe his wiſdom, his good ſenſe, his learning, his piety, and above all, his zeal for the church of England, for which he finally died a martyr. The Preſbyterians, on the contrary, without denying his good ſenſe and learning, affirm, he was a rank Arminian, and almoſt a Papiſt. They ſay that, under color of a fervent zeal for the church's ceremonies, he carried them to the borders of Popery, and juſtly rendered himſelf ſuſpected of deſigning gradually to reſtore the Romiſh creed in England. That, to this end, he made even the leaſt trifles, ſuch as the reformers had not meddled with, as deeming them indifferent, to be conſidered as eſſential to religion. They thence infered that it was impoſſible for a man of his ſenſe, to be attached to things of ſo little moment, had he not entertained ſome ill deſign againſt the reformed religion. That he was the Preſbyterians and Puritans mortal enemy, becauſe from them he met with moſt oppoſition to the execution of his projects. For my part, I own that, in all has been ſaid againſt him, I have found no convincing proof of his intention to re-eſtabliſh the Roman Catholic religion in England, except we confound, as many did in thoſe days, Popery with High-church, thro' a ſpirit of party: but it is very certain, he mortally hated the Preſbyterians, and would have utterly extirpated Puritaniſm, had it been in his power. As for Arminianiſm, it is very probable he was thereto ſtrongly inclined. Take here his character given by his predeceſſor, archbiſhop Abbot, in the narrative which, in 1627, that prelate drew in his own vindication.

Archbiſhop Abbot's character of biſhop Laud. Ruſhworth, p. 440.

"This man is the only inward counſellor with "Buckingham, ſiting with him ſometimes privately "whole hours together, and feeding his humor "with malice and ſpite.

"His life in Oxford was to pick quarrels in the "lectures of the public readers, and to advertiſe "them to the then biſhop of Durham, that he "might fill the ears of King James with diſcon-"tents againſt the honeſt men who took pains in "their places, and ſetled the truth (which he called "Puritaniſm) in their auditors.

"He made it his work to ſee what books were "in the preſs, and to look over epiſtles dedicatory, "and prefaces to the reader, to ſee what faults "might be found.

"It was an obſervation what a ſweet man this "was like to be, that the firſt obſervable act he "did, was marrying the earl of D. to the lady "R (2), when it was notorious to the world, that "ſhe had another huſband, and the ſame a noble-"man, who had diverſe children then living by "her. King James did, for many years, take "this ſo ill, that he would never hear of any "great preferment of him, inſomuch that the "biſhop of Lincoln, Dr. Williams, who taketh "upon him to be the firſt promoter of him, hath "many times ſaid, that when he made mention of "Laud to the King, his Majeſty was ſo averſe "from it, that he was conſtrained often-times to "ſay, that he would never deſire to ſerve that "maſter who could not remit one fault unto his "ſervant. Well, in the end he did conquer it, to "get him to the biſhoprick of St. David's; which "he had not long injoyed, but he began to under-"mine his benefactor, as at this day it appeareth. "The counteſs of Buckingham told Lincoln, that "St. David's was the man who undermined him "with her ſon: and verily, ſuch is his aſpiring "nature, that he will underwork any man in the "world, ſo that he may gain by it."

This character is not to Laud's advantage; but it muſt be obſerved, that the archbiſhop aſcribed

Freſh quarrel between the King and commons. Ruſhworth, p. 653, 654. Annals, p. 344, &c.

While the commons were debating about religion, the ware-houſe of Mr. Rolls, merchant and member of parliament, was locked up by a purſuivant, and himſelf called forth and ſerved with a Subpœna (1). This put the houſe in a flame, and occaſioned the ſending for the officers of the cuſtoms, to know, on what account they had ſeized merchants effects, and carried them to the King's ſtore-houſe. They replied, it was for refuſing to pay tonage and poundage, with other duties. But becauſe there was an information already preſented againſt the merchants in the exchequer and ſtar-chamber, the commons reſolved not to proceed with the bill of tonage and poundage, 'till the goods were reſtored to the owners; and ordered that the barons of the exchequer ſhould be told, to make void their injunction to detain the ſaid merchant's effects. The barons replied, they did not by their injunctions determine, or any way touch upon the right of tonage and poundage; neither did they by their orders but the owners from ſuing for their goods in a lawful courſe; but whereas the merchants indeavored to take their goods out of the King's poſſeſſion by writs of Replevin, which was not a lawful courſe in the King's caſe, nor agreeable to his prerogative-royal, therefore the court of exchequer did ſtay thoſe ſuits, and declare that the owners, if they conceived themſelves wronged, might take ſuch remedy as the law allows. This anſwer, which ſignified nothing, not being ſatisfactory to the commons, a motion was made to conſider, whether ever the court of exchequer held this courſe before for ſtaying Replevins; and whether this had been done by prerogative of the King in his court of exchequer.

Ruſhworth, p. 655.

Febr. 29. p. 638. Annals.

This affair having been long debated in the houſe, the officers of the cuſtoms were again ſent for, and affirmed, that they acted by virtue of a commiſſion under the great-ſeal. One of them ſaid, "He "had ſeized the goods for duties which were due "in the time of King James, and that his Majeſty "had ſent for him, and commanded him to make "no other anſwer. Whereupon the houſe being turned into a grand commitee, a notion was made and ſeconded, whether the officers of the cuſtoms ſhould be proceeded againſt, by ſeparating their intereſt from that of the King. After ſeveral ſpeeches pro and con, a report was made from the grand commitee, that they had finally determined, Mr. Rolls ought to have the privilege of perſon and goods; which being voted, the ſpeaker was moved to put the queſtion; but he refuſed, ſaying, his Majeſty had commanded the contrary. Such a command could not but ſurpriſe the houſe: they adjourned to the twenty-fifth of February, and then were farther adjourned, by his Majeſty's order, 'till the ſecond of March. The commons being then re-aſſembled, and requiring the ſpeaker to put the queſtion, he ſaid, "I have a command from his "Majeſty to adjourn the houſe 'till the tenth of "March:" when attempting to quit the chair, he was forcibly held down * 'till ſir John Elliot had drawn the inſuing proteſtation, which was approved by the majority, tho' not without great tumult and confuſion, and even ſome blows.

Proclamation to notify the parliament's diſſolution. March 2. Id. p. 660. Annals.

As Charles expected not any ſupplies from this ſecond ſeſſion, he was very glad, at having, as he thought, a plauſible pretenſe to diſſolve the parliament: ſo, that very day, a proclamation was drawn up (2), to give notice of his deſign to diſſolve the parliament, on the tenth of March, and that the members might depart about their own affairs.

Nine members cited before the council.

Next day warrants were directed from the council to Denzil Hollis, ſir Miles Hobart, ſir John Elliot, ſir Peter Hayman, John Selden, William Coriton, Walter Long, William Stroud, Benjamin Valentine, eſqs; commanding their perſonal appearance on the morrow. Four of them, Hollis, Elliot, Coriton, and Valentine, appeared; and, refuſing to anſwer out of parliament for what was ſaid and done in the houſe, were commited cloſe priſoners to the Tower. The council likewiſe ordered the ſtudies of Hollis, Elliot and Selden to be ſealed up; and a proclamation was iſſued to apprehend them. It muſt be obſerved that the parliament not being yet diſſolved, theſe gentlemen were actually ſtill members of parliament.

Four appear and are ſent to the Tower.

On the tenth of March, his Majeſty, repairing to the parliament houſe, made the following ſpeech, addreſſing himſelf only to the lords, ſcarce any commoners being preſent †.

Then the lord keeper ſaid, " My lords, and " gentlemen of the houſe of commons, the King's " Majeſty doth diſſolve this parliament."

Remark on this diſſolution.

The parliament's diſſolution was occaſioned by the inſolence of the houſe of commons, as his Majeſty had juſt told the lords: and this inſolence, this ſeditious carriage conſiſted only in forcibly keeping the ſpeaker in his chair (after he had notified the houſe was by the King's orders adjourned) 'till a proteſtation of three very ſhort articles was ſet down in writing: this was the commons offenſe. And here it muſt be remarked, that there was a wide difference between adjourning, and proroguing or diſſolving the parliament. The Sovereign's power to prorogue and diſſolve was never queſtioned; nor do I believe that, before James I's time, any Sovereign had ever thought of adjourning parliaments: King James was the firſt who did it. Of this the commons complained as a breach of their privileges; but not finding the peers diſpoſed to diſpute this power with his Majeſty, they were forced to give way, tho' they foreſaw the pernicious conſequences ſhewed themſelves in the preſent reign. King Charles, taking advantage of this ſole precedent eſtabliſhed by the King his father, was not ſatisfied with hindering the parliament from adjourning themſelves at Eaſter, as was obſerved, but even adjourned the houſes twice at a time when the commons were debating on matters which he diſliked, and likewiſe, by his own ſingle authority, prevented the ſpeaker's puting a queſtion when required. It is no difficulty to comprehend the conſequences of this power to adjourn the houſes. The Sovereign might put a ſtop to all the debates of either houſe, by adjourning them whenever they took into conſideration any matters diſpleaſing to him. On the other hand, on ſuppoſition that the King's right was unqueſtionable, the houſe of commons had diſobeyed his orders, and violated his prerogative, which might be attended with conſequences no leſs pernicious. But King Charles, ſuppoſing his right as fully eſtabliſhed, without giving himſelf any farther trouble to prove it, reſolved to puniſh the commons, not only by a diſſolution of the parliament, a puniſhment which rather concerned the whole nation than its particular repreſentatives, but alſo in cauſing ſome of their moſt active members to be condemned as rebellious and ſeditious.

AN' 1629. To that purpoſe, he commanded the judges to meet and give their opinions upon the queſtions he had to propoſe to them, in order to be guided by their determinations, leſt he ſhould be accuſed of proceeding too arbitrarily. The queſtions, with the judges anſwers, were theſe: viz.

Queſtions propoſed by his Majeſty to the judges, concerning the impriſoned members. April 25. Ruſhworth, p. 663. Annals.

" 1. Whether, if any ſubject hath received " probable information of any treaſon, or trea- " cherous attempt, or intention againſt the King or " ſtate, that ſubject ought not to make known to " the King, or his Majeſty's commiſſioners, when " thereunto he ſhall be required, what information " he hath received, and the grounds thereof; to " the end the King, being truly informed, may " prevent the danger? And if the ſaid ſubject, in " ſuch caſe, ſhall refuſe to be examined, or to an- " ſwer the queſtions which ſhall be demanded of " him for farther inquiry and diſcovery of the truth, " whether it be not a high contempt in him, " puniſhable in the ſtar-chamber, as an offenſe " againſt the general juſtice and government of the " kingdom?

Sol. The reſolution and anſwer of all the juſtices was, " That it is an offenſe puniſhable as aforeſaid, " ſo that this do not concern himſelf, but another, " nor draw him to danger of treaſon or contempt " by his anſwer." CHARLES I AN' 1629.

" 2. Whether it be a good anſwer or excuſe, " being thus interrogated, and refuſing to anſwer, " to ſay, that he was a parliament-man when he " received this information, and that he ſpake " thereof in the parliament houſe; and therefore " the parliament being now ended, he refuſed to " anſwer to any ſuch queſtions but in the parliament " houſe, and not in any other place?

Sol. The judges ventured not to decide publicly this queſtion. But they gave this anſwer by advice privately to the attorney-general, " That this ex- " cuſe being in nature of a plea, and an error in " judgment, was not puniſhable, until he were " over-ruled in an orderly manner, to make an- " other anſwer; and whether the party were " brought in Ore tenus, or by information, for " this plea he was not to be puniſhed."

" 3. Whether a parliament-man, commiting an " offenſe againſt the King or council, not in a par- " liament way, might, after the parliament ended, " be puniſhed or not?

Sol. All the judges unanimouſly anſwered, " He " might, if he be not puniſhed for it in parlia- " ment; for the parliament ſhall not give privilege " to any, 'contra morem parliamentarium,' to " exceed the bounds and limits of his place and " duty." And all agreed, " That regularly he " cannot be compelled out of parliament to an- " ſwer things done in parliament, in a parliamen- " tary courſe; but it is otherwiſe where things are " done exorbitantly; for thoſe are not the acts of " a court."

" 4. Whether, if one parliament-man alone " ſhall reſolve, or two or three ſhall covertly con- " ſpire to raiſe falſe ſlanders and rumors againſt " the lords of the council and judges, not with " intent to queſtion them in a legal courſe, or in a " parliamentary way, but to blaſt them, and to " bring them to hatred of the people, and the go- " vernment in contempt, be puniſhable in the ſtar- " chamber after the parliament is ended?

Sol. The judges reſolve, " That the ſame was " puniſhable out of parliament, as an offenſe exor- " bitant commited in parliament, beyond the office, " and beſide the duty of a parliament-man."

The artifice of theſe queſtions conſiſted, 1. In the King's propoſing them in a general manner, as if they related not to any particular perſon. 2. In his aſcribing to one, two, or three members of the houſe, what was done by a great majority. 3. In ſuppoſing offenſes, outrages, treaſons againſt himſelf or council, and in deciding queſtions of law before the facts were ſtated (1).

By virtue of theſe determinations, the attorney-general exhibited in the ſtar-chamber informations againſt the impriſoned members, wherein he greatly agravated what had paſſed in the lower-houſe, when the ſpeaker was kept by force in the chair, but without at all mentioning the occaſion. The attorney general informs againſt the impriſoned members. Ruſhworth, p. 665.

At the ſame time, alderman Chambers, one of thoſe who refuſed paying tonage and poundage, was alſo proſecuted in the ſtar-chamber, for ſaying, " That the merchants were more ſcrewed up and " wrung in England, than in Turkey." He was condemned in a very exorbitant fine *, by which he was reduced to wretched circumſtances. Chambers condemned for refuſing tonage, &c. May 6. Id. p. 670, 671. Annals.

Mention has already been made of the court's artifice to remove from the parliament ſuch gentlemen as they ſuſpected, by nominating them ſheriffs

* 2000l. He had alſo other loſſes.

(1) Judge Whitlock often highly complained againſt this way of ſending to the judges for their opinions beforehand, and ſaid, " That if biſhop Laud went on in this way, he would kindle a flame in the nation." Whitlock, p. 13.

of their reſpective counties, which obliged them to ſwear to the due execution of their office. Walter Long, of Wiltſhire, eſq; being made ſheriff of the county a little before ſummoning the laſt parliament, was nevertheleſs elected, and he prefered this ſervice to that which his office obliged him to. While the parliament ſat, Long was left undiſturbed, but, on its diſſolution, the court entered an information againſt him in the ſtar-chamber for breach of his oath, and he was fined two thouſand marks.

Long fined. Ruſhworth, p. 684, &c. Append. Annals.

The other members, who were in ſeveral priſons, having petitioned the judges to be releaſed upon bail, by virtue of Habeas Corpus, when the judges were met, and ready to deliver their opinions, the priſoners were not brought to the bar according to the rule of court. Whereupon, proclamation being made for the bringing them in, the court was informed, that, by his Majeſty's own warrant, they were removed to the Tower. Then came a letter from his Majeſty to the judges, ſignifying to the court, that the priſoners were not ſuffered to appear before them by reaſon of their inſolent carriage towards him: i, e, inſtead of applying themſelves to the King for pardon, they had addreſſed themſelves to the judges to be releaſed upon bail, according to law. Not to inſiſt too long on this buſineſs, I ſhall content my ſelf with ſaying, that they were detained in priſon from March 'till October, without being tried, or obtaining the benefit of Habeas Corpus. In fine, the court of King's-Bench having unanimouſly agreed, "That the "court, as this caſe is, ſhall have juriſdiction, "tho' the offenſes were commited in parliament, "and that the impriſoned members ought to plead," judgment was given againſt them upon a Nihil Dicit (1). They were to be impriſoned during his Majeſty's pleaſure, and moreover, Elliot was fined two thouſand pounds, Hollis a thouſand marks, and Valentine five hundred pounds.

The impriſoned members fined. Ruſhworth, p. 679, 680, &c. Append. Annals. June 24.

King Charles's conduct, as well in diſſolving the parliament, as in what was done afterwards, could not but breed diſcontent among the people. Murmurs were every where heard: libels were diſperſed about London againſt the King's counſellors, and particularly againſt biſhop Laud, and the lord treaſurer Weſton, who were accuſed of inciting his Majeſty to theſe violent proceedings. For this reaſon Charles, to prevent greater complaints, publiſhed a declaration, notifying to the people his reaſons for the laſt parliament's diſſolution. Notwithſtanding this declaration's prolixity, I judge it neceſſary to inſert the whole in this place, leſt I ſhould be charged with having either paſſed over in ſilence, or too much abridged what may ſerve for King Charles's juſtification. We muſt obſerve that it was dated the tenth of March, the very day the parliament was diſſolved, tho' it was not publiſhed that day, but ſome time after.

Ruſhworth, p. 662.

The King's declaration, to all his ſubjects, notifying the cauſes which moved him to diſſolve the laſt parliament.

"HOwſoever Princes are not bound to give "account of their actions, but to God alone; "yet, for the ſatisfaction of the minds and af-"fections of our loving ſubjects, we have thought "good to ſet down thus much by way of declara-"tion, that we may appear to the world in the "truth and ſincerity of our actions, and not in "thoſe colors in which we know ſome turbulent and "ill-affected ſpirits (to maſque and diſguiſe their "wicked intentions, dangerous to the ſtate) would "repreſent us to public view.

"We aſſembled our parliament the ſeventeenth "day of March, in the third year of our reign, "for the ſafety of religion, for ſecuring our king-"doms and ſubjects at home, and our friends and "allies abroad. And therefore, at the firſt ſiting "down of it, we declared the miſerable afflicted "eſtate of thoſe of the Reformed religion in Ger-"many, France, and other parts of Chriſtendom; "the diſtreſſed extremities of our deareſt uncle, "the King of Denmark, chaſed out of a great "part of his dominions; the ſtrength of that party "which was united againſt us: that (beſide the "Pope and the houſe of Auſtria, and their ancient "confederates) the French King profeſſed the "rooting out of the Proteſtant religion: that of "the Princes and ſtates on our party, ſome were "over-run, others diverted, and ſome diſabled to "give aſſiſtance. For which, and other impor-"tant motives, we propounded a ſpeedy ſupply of "treaſure, anſwerable to the neceſſity of the "cauſe.

Charles I An' 1629.

"Theſe things in the begining were well reſented "by the houſe of commons, and with ſo much "alacrity and readineſs, that they agreed to grant "a liberal aid: but before it was brought to any "perfection, they were diverted by a multitude of "queſtions raiſed among them, touching their "liberties and privileges, and by other long diſ-"putes, that the bill did not paſs in a long time; "and by that delay, our affairs were put into a "far worſe caſe than at the firſt; our foreign "actions, then in hand, being thereby diſgraced "and ruined for want of timely help.

"In this, as we are not willing to derogate from "the merit and good intentions of thoſe wiſe and "moderate men of that houſe (to whoſe forward-"neſs we attribute that it was propounded and re-"ſolved ſo ſoon) ſo we muſt needs ſay, that the "delay of paſſing it when it was reſolved, occa-"ſioned by cauſeleſs jealouſies, ſtired up by men "of another temper, did much leſſen both the re-"putation and reality of that ſupply. And their "ſpirit, infuſed into many of the commiſſioners "and aſſeſſors in the country, hath returned up the "ſubſidies in ſuch a ſcanty proportion, as is in-"finitely ſhort, not only of our great occaſions, "but of the precedents of former ſubſidies, and "of the intentions of all well-affected men in that "houſe.

"In thoſe large diſputes, as we permited many "of our high prerogativss to be debated, which "in the beſt times of our predeceſſors had never "been queſtioned without puniſhment or ſharp "reproof; ſo we did indeavor to have ſhortened "thoſe debates, for gaining time, which would "have much advantaged our great affairs, both "at home and abroad. And therefore, both by "ſpeeches and meſſages, we did often declare our "gracious and clear reſolution to maintain, not "only the parliament, but all our people, in their "ancient and juſt liberties, without either viola-"tion or diminution, and in the end, for their full "ſatisfaction and ſecurity did by an anſwer, framed "in the form by themſelves deſired, to their par-"liamentary petition, confirm their ancient and "juſt liberties and rights, which we reſolve with "all conſtancy and juſtice to maintain.

"This parliament howſoever, beſide the ſettling "our neceſſary ſupply, and their own liberties, "they waſted much time in ſuch proceedings "(blaſting our government, as we are unwilling to "remember) yet we ſuffered them to ſit, until "themſelves deſired us to appoint a time for their "receſs, not naming either adjournment or pro-"rogation.

(1) They refuſed to put in other plea than denying the court's juriſdiction in this caſe.

"Whereupon,

CHARLES I AN' 1629.

" Whereupon, by advice of our council, we re-
" ſolved to prorogue and make a ſeſſion; and to " that end prefixed a day, by which they might
" (as was mete in ſo long a ſiting) finiſh ſome
" profitable and good laws; and withal gave or" der for a gracious pardon to all our ſubjects;
" which, according to the uſe of former parlia-
" ments, paſſed the higher houſe, and was ſent
" down to the commons. All which being gra-
" ciouſly intended by us, was ill entertained by
" ſome diſaffected perſons of that houſe, who by " their artifices, in a ſhort time, raiſed ſo much
" heat and diſtemper in the houſe, for no other
" viſible cauſe but becauſe we had declared our
" reſolution to prorogue, as our council ad-
" viſed, and not to adjourn, as ſome of that houſe
" (after our reſolution declared, and not before)
" did manifeſt themſelves to affect; that ſel-
" dom hath greater paſſion been ſeen in that
" houſe, upon the greateſt occaſions. And ſome
" glances in the houſe, but upon open rumors
" abroad, were ſpread that, by our anſwer to the " petition, we had given away not only our impo-
" ſitions upon goods exported and imported, but
" the tonage and poundage: whereas in the de" bate and hammering of that petition there was " no ſpeech or mention in either houſe concerning
" thoſe impoſitions, but concerning taxes and
" other charges within the land; much leſs was
" there any thought thereby to debar us of tonage
" and poundage, which, both before and after the " anſwer to that petition, the commons, in all
" their ſpeeches and treaties, did profeſs they were " willing to grant. And at the ſame time many " other miſinterpretations were raiſed of that peti" tion and anſwer, by men not well-diſtinguiſhing
" between well-ordered liberty and licenciouſneſs;
" as if, by our anſwer to that petition, we had let
" looſe the reins of our government. And in this
" diſtemper the houſe of commons, laying aſide
" the pardon (a thing never done in any former " parliament) and other buſineſs fit to have been " concluded in that ſeſſion, ſome of them went " about to frame and contrive a remonſtrance
" againſt our receiving tonage and poundage, which " was ſo far proceeded in, the night before the pre-
" fixed time for concluding the ſeſſion, and ſo
" haſtened by the contrivers thereof, that they
" meaned to have put it to the vote of the houſe
" next morning, before we ſhould prorogue that
" ſeſſion. And therefore, finding our gracious fa-
" vors in the ſeſſion, afforded to our people, ſo ill
" requited, and ſuch ſiniſter ſtrains made upon our
" anſwer to that petition, to the diminution of our " profit, and (which was more) to the danger of " our government; we reſolved to prevent the " finiſhing of that remonſtrance, and other dan" gerous intentions of ſome ill-affected perſons, by
" ending the ſeſſion next morning, ſome few hours
" ſooner than was expected; and by our own mouth
" to declare to both houſes the cauſe thereof: and
" for hindering the ſpreading of thoſe ſiniſter in" terpretations of that petition and anſwer, to give
" ſome neceſſary directions for ſettling and quiet-
" ing our government, until another meeting;
" which we performed accordingly the ſix and
" twentieth of June laſt.

" The ſeſſion thus ended, and the parliament
" riſen, that intended remonſtrance gave us occa-
" ſion to look into the buſineſs of tonage and pound-
" age. And therefore, tho' our neceſſities pleaded
" ſtrongly for us, yet we were not apt to ſtrain
" that point too far, but reſolved to guide ourſelf
" by the practiſe of former ages, and examples of " our moſt noble predeceſſors, thinking thoſe coun-
" ſels beſt warranted which the wiſdom of former
" ages, concurring with the preſent occaſions, did
" approve; and therefore gave order for a diligent
" ſearch of records: upon which it was found that,
" altho' in the parliament holden in the firſt year
" of the reign of King Edward the fourth, the " ſubſidy of tonage and poundage was not granted
" unto that King, but was firſt granted unto him
" by parliament in the third year of his reign; yet
" the ſame was accounted and anſwered to that " King, from the firſt day of his reign, all the
" firſt and ſecond years of his reign, and until it
" was granted by parliament. And that, in the " ſucceeding times of King Richard the third,
" King Henry the ſeventh, King Henry the " eighth, King Edward the ſixth, Queen Mary
" and Queen Elizabeth, the ſubſidy of tonage and
" poundage was not only injoyed by every of thoſe
" Kings and Queens, from the death of each of " them deceaſing until it was granted by parliament
" unto the ſucceſſor; but in all thoſe times, being
" for the moſt part peaceable, and not burdened
" with like charges and neceſſities as theſe modern " times, the parliament did moſt readily and chear-
" fully, in the begining of every of thoſe reigns,
" grant the ſame, as a thing moſt neceſſary for
" guarding the ſeas, ſafety and defenſe of the realm,
" and ſupportation of the royal dignity. And in " the time of our royal father, of bleſſed memory,
" he injoyed the ſame a full year, wanting very " few days, before his parliament began; and " above a year before the act of parliament for the " grant of it was paſſed: and yet, when the par" liament was aſſembled, it was granted without " difficulty. And in our own time, we quietly re" ceived the ſame three years and more, expecting
" with patience in ſeveral parliaments the like
" grant thereof, as had been made to ſo many of " our predeceſſors; the houſe of commons ſtill
" profeſſing, that multitude of other buſineſſes, and
" not want of willingneſs on their part, had cauſed
" the ſettling thereof to be ſo long defered. And " therefore, finding ſo much reaſon and neceſſity
" for receiving the ordinary duties in the cuſtom-
" houſe, to concur with the practiſe of ſuch a ſuc-
" ceſſion of Kings and Queens, famous for wiſdom,
" juſtice and government, and nothing to the con" trary but that intended remonſtrance, hatched
" out of the paſſionate brains of a few particular
" perſons; we thought it was ſo far from the wiſ-
" dom and duty of a houſe of parliament, as we " could not think that any moderate and diſcreet
" man (upon compoſed thoughts, ſeting aſide paſ-
" ſion and diſtemper) could be againſt receiving of
" tonage and poundage; eſpecially ſince we do,
" and ſtill muſt purſue thoſe ends, and undergo
" that charge for which it was firſt granted to the " crown; it having been ſo long and conſtantly
" continued to our predeceſſors, as that in four ſe-
" veral acts of parliament, for the granting there-
" of to King Edward the ſixth, Queen Mary,
" Queen Elizabeth, and our bleſſed father, it is in
" expreſs terms mentioned to have been had and
" injoyed by the ſeveral Kings, named in thoſe
" acts, time out of mind, by authority of parlia" ment. And therefore, upon theſe reaſons, we " held it agreeable to our King's honor, and ne-
" ceſſary for the ſafety and good of our kingdom,
" to continue the receipt thereof, as ſo many of " our predeceſſors had done. Wherefore, when a
" few merchants (being at firſt but one or two) fo-
" mented, as it is well known, by thoſe evil ſpi-
" rits which would have hatched that undutiful re-
" monſtrance, began to oppoſe the payment of our " accuſtomed duties in the cuſtom-houſe, we gave
" order to the officers of our cuſtoms to go on,
" notwithſtanding that oppoſition, in receiving the " uſual duties, and cauſed thoſe who refuſed to be " warned to attend at the council-board, that, by the

Charles I An' 1629.

" the wiſdom and authority of our council, they " might be reduced to obedience and duty; where " ſome of them, without reverence or reſpect to " the honor and dignity of that preſenſe, behaved " themſelves with ſuch boldneſs and inſolency of " ſpeech, as was not to be indured by a far meaner " aſſembly, much leſs to be countenanced by a " houſe of parliament againſt the body of our " privy-council.

" And as in this we did what, in reaſon and " honor was fit for the preſent, ſo our thoughts " were daily intentive upon the re-aſſembling our " parliament, with full intention, on our part, to " take away all ill-underſtanding between us and " our people; whoſe loves, as we deſire to conti- " nue and preſerve, ſo we uſed our beſt indeavors " to prepare and facilitate the way to it. And, to " this end, having taken a ſtrict and exact ſurvey " of our government, both in the church and com- " mon-wealth, and what things were moſt fit and " neceſſary to be reformed; we found in the firſt " place, that much exception had been taken at a " book, intitled, Appello Cæſarum, or, An Ap- " peal to Cæſar; and publiſhed in the year 1625, " by Richard Montague, then bachelor of divi- " nity, and now biſhop of Chicheſter; and becauſe " it did open the way to thoſe ſchiſms and divi- " ſions which have ſince inſued in the church, we " did, for remedy and redreſs thereof, and for the " ſatisfaction of the conſciences of our good peo- " ple, not only, by our public proclamation, call " in that book, which miniſtered matter of offenſe; " but, to prevent the like danger for hereafter, re- " printed the articles of religion, eſtabliſhed in the " time of Queen Elizabeth, of famous memory; " and by a declaration before thoſe articles, we " did tie and reſtrain all opinions to the ſenſe of " thoſe articles, that nothing might be left for pri- " vate fancies and innovations. For we call God " to record, before whom we ſtand, that it is, " and always hath been our heart's deſire to be " found worthy of that title, which we account the " moſt glorious in all our crown, Defender of the " Faith. Neither ſhall we ever give way to the " authoriſing any thing whereby any innovation " may ſteal or creep into the church; but to pre- " ſerve that unity of doctrine and diſcipline eſta- " bliſhed in the time of Queen Elizabeth, whereby " the church of England hath ſtood and flouriſhed " ever ſince.

" And as we were careful to make up all breaches " and rents in religion at home, ſo we did by our " proclamation and commandment, for the execu- " tion of laws againſt prieſts and Popiſh recuſants, " fortify all ways and approaches againſt that fo- " reign enemy; which, if it hath not ſucceeded " according to our intention, we muſt lay the fault " where it is, in the ſubordinate officers and mi- " niſters in the country, by whoſe remiſneſs, " Jeſuits and prieſts eſcape without apprehenſion, " and recuſants, from thoſe convictions and penal " ties which the law and our commandment would " have inflicted on them. For we do profeſs, " that as it is our duty, ſo it ſhall be our care to " command and direct well; but it is the part of " others to perform the miniſterial office. And " when we have done our office, we ſhall account " ourſelf, and all charitable men will account us " innocent, both to God and men: and thoſe who " are negligent we will eſteem as culpable, both to " God and us; and therefore will expect that here- " after they give us a better account.

" And as we have been careful for the ſetling " religion, and quieting the church; ſo were we " not unmindful of the preſervation of the juſt and " ancient liberties of our ſubjects, which we ſe- " cured to them by our gracious anſwer to the pe- " tition in parliament, having not ſince that time " done any act whereby to infringe them. But " our care is, and hereafter ſhall be, to keep them " intire and inviolable, as we would do our own " right and ſovereignty, having for that purpoſe " inrolled the petition and anſwer in our courts of " juſtice.

" Next to the care of religion, and of our ſub- " jects rights, we did our beſt for the provident " and well-ordering of that aid and ſupply, which was " granted us the laſt ſeſſion, whereof no part hath " been waſtfully expended, nor put to any other " uſe than thoſe for which it was deſired and grant- " ed; as upon payment of our fleet and army; " wherein our care hath been ſuch, as we choſe " rather to diſcontent our deareſt friends and allies, " and our neareſt ſervants, than to leave our ſol- " diers and mariners unſatisfied, whereby any vexa- " tion or diſquiet might ariſe to our people: we " have alſo, with part of thoſe monies, begun to " ſupply our magazines and ſtores of munition, " and to put our navy into a conſtant form and " order. Our fleet likewiſe is fiting, and almoſt " in a readineſs, whereby the narrow ſeas may be " guarded, commerce maintained, and our king- " doms ſecured from all foreign attempts. Theſe " acts of ours might have made this impreſſion in " all good minds, that we were careful to direct " our counſels, and diſpoſe our actions, as might " moſt conduce to the maintenance of religion, " honor of our government, and ſafety of our peo- " ple. But with miſchievous men once ill-affect- " ed, 'Seu bene, ſeu male facta premunt;' and " whatſoever once ſeemed amiſs, is ever remem- " bered; but good indeavors are never re- " garded.

" Now all theſe things, which were the chief " complaints laſt ſeſſion, being by our princely " care ſo ſeriouſly reformed; the parliament re- " aſſembled the twentieth of January laſt. We ex- " pected, according to the candor and ſincerity of " our own thoughts, that men would have framed " themſelves for the affecting a right underſtand- " ing between us and our people. But ſome few " malevolent perſons, like empirics and leud ar- " tiſts, did ſtrive to make new work, and to have " ſome diſeaſe on foot, to keep themſelves in re- " queſt, and to be imployed and entertained in the " cure. And yet to manifeſt how much offenſes " have been diminiſhed, the commitees for grie- " vances, commitees for courts of juſtice, and com- " mitees for trade, have, ſince the ſiting down of " the parliament, received few complaints, and " thoſe ſuch as they themſelves have not thought " to be of that moment or importance with which " our ears ſhould be acquainted.

" No ſooner therefore was the parliament ſet " down, but theſe ill-affected men began to ſow " and diſperſe their jealouſies, by caſting out ſome " glances and doubtful ſpeeches, as if the ſubject " had not been ſo clearly and well dealed with, " touching their liberties, and touching the peti- " tion anſwered laſt parliament. This being a " plauſible theme, thought on for an ill purpoſe, " eaſily took hold on the minds of many who " knew not the practiſe. And thereupon the ſe- " cond day of the parliament, a commitee was ap- " pointed to ſearch, whether the petition and our " anſwer thereunto were inroled in the parliament " roll, and in the courts at Weſtminſter, and in " what manner the ſame was done. And a day " alſo was then appointed, on which the houſe, " being reſolved into a commitee, ſhould take into " conſideration thoſe things, wherein the liberty " of the ſubject had been invaded, againſt the pe- " tition of right. This, tho' it produced no other " effect of moment or importance, yet was ſuffi-

" cient

Charles I An' 1629.

" cient to raiſe a jealouſy againſt our proceedings, " in ſuch as were not well acquainted with the " ſincerity and clearneſs of them. There followed " another of no leſs ſkill; for altho' our proceeding " before the parliament, about matters of religion, " might have ſatisfied any moderate men of our " zealous care thereof (as we are ſure it did the " moſt) yet, as bad ſtomachs turn the beſt things " into their own nature, for want of good di- " geſtion, ſo theſe diſtempered perſons have done " the like of our good intents, by a bad and " ſiniſter interpretation. For, when they did ob- " ſerve, that many honeſt and religious minds in " that houſe did complain of thoſe dangers which " threatened the church, they likewiſe took the " ſame word in their mouth, and their cry like- " wiſe was, 'Templum Domini! Templum Do- " mini!' when the true care of the church never " came into their hearts: and what the one did out " of zeal unto religion, the other took up as a " plauſible theme to deprave our government, as " if we, our clergy and council, were either " ſenſeleſs or careleſs of religion, and this " wicked practiſe hath been to make us ſeem to " walk before our people as if we halted before " God.

" Having, by theſe artifices, made a jealous " impreſſion in the hearts of many; and a day " being appointed to treat of the grant of tonage " and poundage, at the time prefixed, all expreſs " great willingneſs to grant it. But a new ſtrain " is found out, that it could not be done without " great peril to the right of the ſubject, unleſs we " ſhould diſclaim any right therein, but by grant " in parliament; and ſhould cauſe all thoſe goods " to be reſtored, which, upon commandment from " us, or our council, were ſtayed by our officers " until thoſe duties were paid, and conſequently " ſhould put ourſelves out of the poſſeſſion of the " tonage and poundage, before they were granted; " for elſe, it was pretended, the ſubject ſtood not " in fit caſe to grant it: a fancy and cavil raiſed " on purpoſe to trouble the buſineſs, it being " evident, that all the Kings before-named did " receive that duty, and were in actual poſſeſſion " of it, before, and at the very time when it was " granted to them by parliament. And altho' " we, to remove all difficulties, did from our own " mouth, in thoſe clear and open terms, which " might have ſatisfied any moderate and well- " diſpoſed minds, declare, that it was our mean- " ing, by the gift of our people, to injoy it; and " that we did not challenge it of right, but took it " de bene eſſe,' ſhewing thereby, not the right, " but the neceſſity by which we were to take it; " wherein we deſcended, for their ſatisfaction, ſo " far beneath ourſelf, as we are confident never " any of our predeceſſors did the like, or was the " like ever required or expected from them. Yet " for all this, the bill of tonage and poundage was " laid aſide, upon pretenſe they muſt firſt clear " the right of the ſubject therein; under color " whereof, they entertain the complaints, not " only of John Rolles, a member of their houſe, " but alſo of Richard Chambers, John Foukes, " and Bartholomew Gilman, againſt the officers of " our cuſtoms, for detaining their goods, upon " refuſal to pay the ordinary duty, accuſtomed to " be paid for the ſame. And upon theſe com- " plaints, they ſend for the officers of the cuſtoms, " inforcing them to attend day after day, by the " ſpace of a month together; they cauſe them to " produce their letters patent under our great ſeal, " and the warrants made by our privy council " for levying thoſe duties. They examine the " officers upon what queſtions they pleaſe, thereby " to intrap them for doing our ſervice and com- " mandment. In theſe and other their proceedings, " becauſe we would not give the leaſt ſhew of " interruption, we indured long, with much pa- " tience, both theſe and ſundry other ſtrange and " exorbitant incroachments and uſurpations, ſuch " as were never before attempted in that houſe.

Charles I An' 1629.

" We are not ignorant how much that houſe " hath, of late years, indeavored to extend their " privileges, by ſeting up general commitees for " religion, for courts of juſtice, for trade, and " the like; a courſe never had until of late: ſo as, " where in former times the knights and bur- " geſſes were wont to communicate to the houſe ſuch " buſineſs as they brought from their countries; " now there are ſo many chairs erected, to make " inquiry upon all ſorts of men, where complaints " of all ſorts are entertained, to the unſufferable " diſturbance and ſcandal of juſtice and government, " which having been tolerated a while by our " father and ourſelf, hath daily grown to more and " more height; inſomuch that young lawyers " ſiting there take upon them to decry the opinions " of the judges; and ſome have not doubted to " maintain, that the reſolutions of that houſe muſt " bind the judges; a thing never heard of in " ages paſſed. But, in this laſt aſſembly of par- " liament, they have taken on them much more " than ever before.

" They ſent meſſengers to examine our attorney- " general (who is an officer of truſt and ſecrecy) " touching the execution of ſome commandments " of ours, of which, without our leave firſt ob- " tained, he was not to give account to any but " ourſelf. They ſent a captious and directory " meſſage to the lord treaſurer, chancellor, and " barons of the exchequer, touching ſome judicial " proceedings of theirs in our court of exchequer.

" They ſent meſſengers to examine, upon ſundry " queſtions, our two chief juſtices, and three other " of our judges, touching their judicial proceed- " ings at the goal-delivery at Newgate, of which " they are not accountable to the houſe of com- " mons.

" And whereas ſuits were commenced in our " court of ſtar-chamber, againſt Richard Chambers, " John Foukes, Bartholomew Gilman, and " Richard Philips, by our attorney-general, for " great miſdemeanors; they reſolved that they were " to have privilege of parliament againſt us for " their perſons, for no other cauſe but becauſe they " had petitions depending in that houſe; and " (which is more ſtrange) they reſolved that a ſig- " nification ſhould be made from that houſe by a " letter, to iſſue under the hand of their ſpeaker, " unto the lord keeper of our great-ſeal, that no " attachment ſhould be granted out againſt the " ſaid Chambers, Foukes, Gilman, or Philips, " during their ſaid privilege of parliament. Whereas " it is far above the power of that houſe, to give " directions to any of our courts at Weſtminſter, " to ſtop attachments againſt any man, tho' never " ſo ſtrongly privileged; the breach of privilege " being not in the court which grants, but in the " party or miniſter who puts in execution ſuch " attachments. And therefore, if any ſuch letter " had come to the lord keeper, as it did not, he " ſhould have highly offended us if he had obeyed " it. Nay, they went ſo far, as they ſpared not " the honor of our council-board, but examined " their proceedings in the caſe of our cuſtomers, " interrogating what this or that man of our " council ſaid, in direction of them in the buſineſs " commited to their charge. And when one of " the members of that houſe, ſpeaking of our " counſellors, ſaid, we had wicked counſel; and " another ſaid, that the council and judges fought " to trample under feet the liberty of the ſubject;

Charles I An' 1629.

" and a third traduced our court of ſtar-chamber, " for the ſentence given againſt Savage, they " paſſed without check or cenſure by the houſe. " By which may appear how far the members of " that houſe have of late ſwollen beyond the rules " of moderation, and the modeſty of former times; " and this under pretenſe of privilege and freedom " of ſpeech, whereby they take liberty to declare " againſt all authority of council and courts at " their pleaſure.

" They ſent for our ſheriff of London, to ex- " amine him in a cauſe whereof they had no juriſ- " diction: their true and ancient juriſdiction ex- " tending only to their own members, and to the " conſervation of their privileges, and not to the " cenſure of foreign perſons and cauſes, which have " no relation to their privileges, the ſame being " but a late innovation. And yet upon an inforced " ſtrain of a contempt for not anſwering to their " ſatisfaction, they commit him to the Tower of " London, uſing that outward pretext for a cauſe " of commiting him, the true and inward cauſe " being for that he had ſhewed himſelf dutiful " to us and our commandments, in the matter " concerning our cuſtoms.

" In theſe innovations (which we will never " permit again) they pretended indeed our ſervice; " but their drift was to break, by this means, " thro' all reſpects and ligaments of government, " and to erect a univerſal overſwaying power to " themſelves, which belongs only to us, and not " to them.

" Laſtly, in their proceedings againſt our " cuſtomers; they went about to cenſure them as " delinquents, and to puniſh them, for ſtaying " ſome goods of certain factious merchants in our " ſtore-houſe, for not paying thoſe duties which " themſelves had formerly paid, and which the " cuſtomers, without interruption, had received " of all other merchants, many years before, and " to which they were authoriſed, both by our " great-ſeal, and by ſeveral directions and com- " mandments from us and our privy council.

" To give ſome color to their proceedings " herein, they went about to create a new privilege " (which we will never admit) that a parliament- " man hath privilege for his goods againſt the " King; the conſequence whereof would be, that " he may not be conſtrained to pay any duties to " the King, during the time of privilege of par- " liament. It is true, they would have this caſe " to have been between the merchants and our " farmers of our cuſtoms, and have ſevered them " from our intereſt and commandment, thereby " the rather to make them liable to the cenſure and " puniſhment of that houſe. But, on the other " ſide we, holding it both unjuſt and diſhonorable " to withdraw our ſelf from our officers, in any " thing they did by our commandment, or to diſ- " avow any thing which we had injoined to be " done, upon Monday the twenty-third of Febru- " ary, ſent a meſſage unto them by ſecretary Coke, " thanking him for the reſpect they had ſhewed, in " ſevering the intereſt of our farmers from our own " intereſt and commandment. Nevertheleſs, we " were bound in honor to acknowledge a truth, " that what was done by them was done by our ex- " preſs commandment and direction; and if, for " doing thereof our farmers ſhould ſuffer, it would " highly concern us in honor. Which meſſage was " no ſooner delivered unto them, but in a tumul- " tuous and diſcontented manner they called, ' ad- " journ, adjourn;" and thereupon, without any " cauſe given on our part, in a very unuſual man- " ner, adjourned until the Wedneſday following.

" On which day, by the uniform wiſdom of our " privy council, we cauſed both houſes to be ad- " journed until the ſecond day of March; hoping " that, in the mean time, a better and more right " underſtanding might be begot between us and " the members of that houſe, whereby the parlia- " ment might come to a happy iſſue. Charles I An' 1629.

" But underſtanding, by good advertiſement, " that their diſcontent did not in that time digeſt " and paſs away; we reſolved to make a ſecond " adjournment until the tenth of March; which " was done, as well to take time to our ſelf, to " think of ſome means to accommodate thoſe " difficulties, as to give them time to adviſe better; " and accordingly we gave commandment for a " ſecond adjournment in both houſes, and for ceſ- " ſation of all buſineſs 'till the day appointed; " which was very dutifully obeyed in the higher " houſe, no man contradicting or queſtioning it. " But when the ſame commandment was delivered " in the houſe of commons by their ſpeaker, it was " ſtraitways contradicted; and altho' the ſpeaker " declared unto them, it was an abſolute right and " power in us to adjourn, as well as to prorogue " or diſſolve, and declared and read unto them " diverſe precedents of that houſe to warrant the " ſame; yet our commandment was moſt con- " temptuouſly diſobeyed, and ſome riſing up to " ſpeak, ſaid, they had buſineſs to do before the " houſe ſhould be adjourned.

Here his Majeſty introduced a tedious detail of what paſſed in the houſe, when the ſpeaker was forcibly detained in the chair, while the remon- ſtrance was drawing. This account is much agra- vated, being taken word for word from the attorney general's information again Elliot. But it contains in ſubſtance no more than what has been already obſerved.

" While the duke of Buckingham lived, he was " intitled to all the diſtempers and ill-events of for- " mer parliaments; and therefore much indeavor " was uſed to demoliſh him, as the only wall of " ſeparation between us and our people. But now " he is dead, no alteration was found among thoſe " invenomed ſpirits which troubled then the bleſſed " harmony between us and our ſubjects, and con- " tinue ſtill to trouble it. For now, under the pre- " tenſe of public care of the common-wealth, they " ſuggeſt new and cauſeleſs fears, which in their " own hearts they know to be falſe, and deviſe " new engines of miſchief, ſo to caſt a blindneſs " upon the good affections of our people, that they " may not ſee the truth and largeneſs of our heart " towards them. So that now it is manifeſt, the " duke was not alone the mark theſe men ſhot at, " but was only, as a near miniſter of ours, taken up, " on the bye, and in their paſſage to their more " ſecret deſigns; which were only to caſt our " affairs into a deſperate condition, to abate the " powers of our crown, and to bring our govern- " ment into obliquy; that in the end all things " may be overwhelmed with anarchy and con- " fuſion.

" We do not impute theſe diſaſters to the whole " houſe of commons, knowing that there were a- " mong them many religious, grave and well- " minded men; but the ſincerer and better part of " the houſe were overborne by the practiſes and cla- " mors of the other, who, careleſs of their duties, " and, taking advantage of the times and our ne- " ceſſities, have inforced us to break off this meet- " ing; which, had it been anſwered with like duty " on their parts as it was invited and begun with " love on ours, might have proved happy and " glorious, both to us and this whole nation.

" We have thus declared the manifold cauſes we " had to diſſolve this parliament, whereby all the " world may ſee how much they have forgot their " former ingagements at the entry into this war,

" themſelves

CHARLES I AN' 1629.

" themſelves being perſuaders to it; promiſing to " make us feared by our enemies, and eſteemed by
" our friends: and how they turned the neceſſities
" grown by that war, to inforce us to yield to " conditions incompatible with monarchy.

" And now, that our people may diſcern
" theſe provocations of evil men (whoſe puniſh-
" ments we reſerve to a due time) have not changed
" our good intentions to our ſubjects, we do here
" profeſs to maintain the true religion and doctrine
" eſtabliſhed in the church of England, without
" admiting or conniving at any back-ſliding, either
" to Popery or Schiſm. We do alſo declare, that " we will maintain the ancient and juſt rights and " liberties of our ſubjects, with ſo much conſtancy
" and juſtice, that they ſhall have cauſe to acknow" ledge that, under our government and gracious
" protection, they live in a more happy and free
" eſtate than any ſubjects in the Chriſtian world.

" Yet let no man hereby take the boldneſs to
" abuſe that liberty, turning it to licenciouſneſs,
" nor miſinterpret the petition, by perverting it to
" a lawleſs liberty, wantonly or frowardly, under
" that or any other color, to reſiſt lawful and ne-

" ſubjects in their juſt liberties, ſo we do and will " expect, that they yield as much ſubmiſſion and
" duty to our royal prerogatives, and as ready obe" dience to our authority and commandments, as " hath been performed to the greateſt of our pre-
" deceſſors.

" And for our miniſters, we will not that they
" be terrified by thoſe harſh proceedings which " have been ſtrained againſt ſome of them: for, as
" we will not command any thing unjuſt or diſ-
" honorable, but ſhall uſe our authority and prero-
" gatives for the good of our people, ſo we will " expect, that our miniſters obey us, and they ſhall
" aſſure themſelves we will protect them.

" As for our merchants, we let them know we " ſhall always indeavor to cheriſh and inlarge the " trade of ſuch as be dutiful, without burdening
" them beyond what is fiting: but the duty of five
" in the hundred, for guarding the ſeas, and de-
" fenſe of the realm, to which we hold ourſelves
" ſtill obliged (and which duty hath continued with" out interruption ſo many ſucceſſions of ages) we " hold no good or dutiful ſubject will deny it, be" ing ſo neceſſary for the good of the whole king-

" us, in a thing ſo reaſonable, and wherein we re" quire no more, nor in no other manner than ſo
" many of our predeceſſors have done, and have " been dutifully obeyed; let them not deceive
" themſelves, but be aſſured, that we ſhall find
" honorable and juſt means to ſupport our eſtate,
" vindicate our ſovereignty, and preſerve the au-
" thority which God hath put into our hands.

" And now having laid down the truth and
" clearneſs of our proceedings, all wiſe and diſcreet

" free paſſage of the goſpel, indifferent and equal
" adminiſtration of juſtice, freedom from oppreſ-
" ſion, and the great peace and quietneſs which " every man injoyeth under his own vine and fig-tree)
" the happineſs of this nation can be paralleled by " any of our neighbor countries; and if not, then
" to acknowledge their own bleſſedneſs, and for the " ſame be thankful to God, the author of all good-
" neſs."

Remark on this declaration.

This declaration, or rather apology, produced not the effect King Charles expected. It was very difficult for his ſaid Majeſty to perſuade the Engliſh, that a dozen members of parliament had formed a project to ſubvert the government, introduce anarchy, and uſurp the royal authority, without the leaſt appearance of any advantage either to themſelves or others. It would have been ſtill more unaccountable that, admiting King Charles to be ſo juſt a Prince, and ſo tender of his people, as he would have been thought, theſe men ſhould have had ſufficient credit to bring over the majority of the commons to their ſentiments. On the other hand, Charles in his declaration defended himſelf very weakly, on the articles concerning recuſants, tonage and poundage, and in general, on the cauſes of the parliament's diſſolution: for, in agravating the commons crime in not inſtantly obeying the adjournment, he not only ſuppoſed his power inconteſtible, tho' it was not ſo, but alſo omited the immediate cauſe of their non-compliance, viz. the ſpeaker's refuſal, by his expreſs command, to put the queſtion, which was a manifeſt violation of parliamentary freedom. Wherefore, notwithſtanding this apology, complaints and murmurs were louder than ever. People openly diſcourſed, that the King's aim was utterly to deſtroy the privileges of parliament, and the ſubjects liberties; nor did the after proceedings againſt the impriſoned members contribute towards undeceiving the complainants. It was added, that trade was ruined, religion in danger, and the nation on the brink of being inſlaved, if theſe miſchiefs were not redreſſed by a new parliament. Charles, hearing theſe rumors, iſſued this proclamation: viz.

Proclamation againſt falſe rumors touching parliaments. March 27. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 3. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIX. p. 62.

" THAT, notwithſtanding his Majeſty's late " declaration, for ſatisfying the minds and
" affections of his loving ſubjects, ſome ill-diſpoſed
" perſons do ſpread falſe and pernicious rumors
" abroad, as if the ſcandalous and ſeditious propo-
" ſition in the houſe of commons, made by an
" outlawed man, deſperate in mind and fortune,
" and tumultuouſly taken up by ſome few, after
" that, by his Majeſty's royal authority, he had " commanded their adjournment, had been the " vote of the whole houſe, whereas the contrary
" is the truth; for it was then decried by the wiſeſt
" and beſt affected, and ſince diſavowed, upon " examination, by ſuch as were ſuſpected to have
" conſented thereunto, and affirmed, as well by " them, as others who ſerved in the houſe that " day, to be a thing of a moſt wicked and dange" rous conſequence to the good eſtate of this king" dom; and it appeareth to be ſo, by thoſe im-
" preſſions which this falſe rumor hath made in " mens minds, whereby, out of cauſeleſs fears, the " trade of the kingdom is diſturbed, and merchants
" diſcouraged to continue their wonted traffic. His
" Majeſty hath thought it expedient, not only to
" manifeſt the truth thereof, but to make known
" his royal pleaſure; that thoſe who raiſe or nouriſh
" falſe reports ſhall be ſeverely puniſhed; and ſuch
" as chearfully go on with their trade have all good
" incouragement; not purpoſing to over-charge
" his ſubjects by any new burdens, but to ſatisfy
" himſelf with thoſe duties which were received by " the King his father, of bleſſed memory, which
" his now Majeſty neither can, nor will diſpenſe
" withal; but ſhall eſteem them unworthy of his " protection who ſhall deny the ſame, his Majeſty
" intending to imploy it for the defenſe of his " kingdom, dominion of the ſeas, and ſafe-guard
" of the merchants, eſpecially by ſuch ſhiping as
" are now making ready, and ſuch farther pre" parations, for aid of his friends and allies, as " need ſhall require. And whereas, for ſeveral ill
" ends, the calling again of a parliament is di-

" his frequent meeting with his people, his love to
" the uſe of parliaments; yet the late abuſe hav-

" ſumption for any to preſcribe any time to his Ma-
" jeſty for parliaments; the calling, continuing
" and diſſolving of which is always in the King's

" clinable to meet in parliament again, when his " people ſhall ſee more clearly into his intents and

A writing publiſhed againſt King Charles. Ruſhworth, Vol. I. Appendix, p. 12. Annals.

About this time appeared a writing, intitled, A Propoſition for his Majeſty's ſervice, to bridle the impertinency of parliament. To all appearance, had the ſaid piece been preſented to his Majeſty, it had never been publiſhed. Accordingly, it was afterwards declared in the ſtar-chamber to be a ſeditious libel (1). It however ſerves to ſhew, that many people imagined Charles to be taking meaſures to throw off the yoke of parliaments, ſince he evidently followed ſome of the maxims propoſed in this writing. There was even no likelihood of his intending to call another parliament, 'till he had found means of having the commons more at command, as in his laſt proclamation he had very clearly intimated.

Charles makes peace with France. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 24. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIX. p. 66--86--88. Annals.

Rochel being taken, King Charles thought not proper to continue a war with France, which could bring him no advantage, nor ſerve him for pretenſe to aſk money of his parliament, ſince he was determined not to call any. As France had no quarrel with him but concerning the Queen's domeſtics, which was not a ſufficient motive to proſecute ſuch war, a peace was quickly concluded between the two crowns, thro' mediation of the republic of Venice. It was ſigned the fourteenth of April, about a month after the parliament's diſſolution. So little did the Gallic court regard what had paſſed with reſpect to her Majeſty's ſervants, that they were ſatisfied with inſerting in the treaty of peace this article: " The articles and contract of the marriage
" of the Queen of Great-Britain are to be confirm" ed faithfully. And as for the ſaid Queen's
" houſhold, if there be any thing to be added or
" diminiſhed, it ſhall be done by a mutual conſent
" freely and willingly, as it may be judged fit
" and convenient for the ſervice of the ſaid Queen."

September 6. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIX. p. 101.

This peace was ſworn to the inſuing September.

Remark on the Kings of England's opulency.

King Charles had now freed himſelf from the parliament's yoke, and deſigned not to reſume it. But withal, he had deprived himſelf of thoſe ſupplies of money which parliaments were accuſtomed to grant the Kings, not only on urgent and extraordinary occaſions, but alſo as marks of affection and zeal, when the people were pleaſed with the government. One may venture to ſay, no Prince in Europe equals in riches ſuch Kings of England as are beloved by their ſubjects. Not only their ordinary revenue, if well managed, are more than ſufficient to inable them to keep ſplendid and magnificent courts; but it is properly the Sovereign of England alone who has never any need to accumulate treaſures againſt extraordinary exigencies. He conſtantly finds in the purſes of his ſubjects, and by a free donative, whatever is neceſſary to ſupport the honor of his ſtate. There is not in Europe any one Potentate who can, like him, be ſure of never wanting money. But what muſt he do to procure his peoples affection? Nothing but what is moſt practicable and eaſy: a thing moſt juſt, and which is moſt adapted to his kingdom's welfare and to his own intereſt. In a word, he muſt obſerve the laws to which himſelf and predeceſſors have conſented, and which were deemed expedient for both Sovereign and ſubject. The pride therefore and inſatiable avarice of favorites and miniſters are the only things which make him ſometimes loſe the advantages naturally flowing from that government's happy conſtitution. Theſe men, impatient of any bounds to their illicitous thirſt of ruling deſpotically, ſeek all poſſible means to inſtil into their royal patron a deſire to ſet himſelf above the laws, and to render himſelf abſolute like ſome other Monarchs; i. e. they do whatever in them lies to convert their Sovereign's true and ſolid felicity into real miſery: for tho' a King of England ſhould render himſelf abſolute, he could never, by oppreſſion and violence, obtain from his people what he may freely receive by ſubmiting to the laws and conſtitution of the government. We have ſeen in the two late reigns of William III, and Queen Anne, and we daily ſee in that of the Prince on the throne, ſuch undeniable proofs of what I advance, that I think it needleſs to make any addition. I ſhall only obſerve, that the moſt famous and moſt eſteemed Engliſh Monarchs, as Edward I, Edward III, Henry V, Henry VIII, and Elizabeth, conſtantly followed the ſame maxim, and thereby rendered their reigns flouriſhing and felicitous. Whereas James I, Charles I, Charles II, James II, who took a contrary courſe, became unhappy, and performed nothing either for their own or the nation's glory.

Charles I An' 1629.

Cauſes of the peoples diſcontent.

King Charles I, like his father, was extremely fond of arbitrary power, and had no favorites or miniſters who were not of the ſame principles His privy-council gradually became a deſpotic court, which deemed itſelf above the laws. The ſtar-chamber was another court, the moſt rigorous ever was, the ſeverity whereof fell chiefly upon thoſe who pretended to diſpute the prerogative-royal. The high-commiſſion perfectly ſeconded the council and ſtar-chamber, and under color of rooting out ſchiſm, oppreſſed as Puritans thoſe who refuſed ſubmiting to deſpotiſm. Laſtly, all the judges being of the court's nomination, and devoted to the King, omited no opportunity to ſupport the prerogative-royal, and ſtretch it to the pitch his Majeſty wiſhed. The parliament only could cure theſe diſorders; but King Charles was determined not to call any more, parliamentary maxims being diametrically oppoſite to his. He was of opinion that parliaments had greatly incroached on the prerogative-royal, in the foregoing reigns, and the parliament could not but dread the conſequences of thoſe general maxims which King Charles ſtrove to introduce into the government; and the rather, as they evidently perceived thoſe conſequences not to be bare ſpeculations, but really put in practiſe. This dread induced them to deny the King ſome things readily granted by former parliaments to his predeceſſors, becauſe they were free from any ſuch apprehenſions. But as the nation in general was more inclined to be ruled by the parliament, than by the court, theſe contraſts bred in the peoples minds a diſtaſte to the court, the fatal effects whereof the King afterwards experienced.

Diminution of the King's revenues.

The late parliament's diſſolution, and King Charles's univerſally-known determination never to call another, had not only deprived him of the extraordinary ſupplies he might have expected from

(1) The project contained in this writing, was framed in 1613 by ſir Robert Dudley, the earl of Leiceſter's ſon. However, the earls of Bedford, Somerſet, and Clare, ſir Robert Cotton, Mr. Selden, and Mr. St. John were commited for diſperſing it, and queſtioned in the ſtar-chamber; but ſir David Fowles, upon oath, diſcovered the author, and ſo ended this buſineſs. the commons, but had likewiſe greatly prejudiced him with reſpect to his treaſury. Thoſe five ſubſidies granted by the parliament came far ſhort of what was expected. As every man's quota towards a ſubſidy is ſettled by commiſſioners in each county, and by aſſiſtants belonging to the towns and villages, in proportion to his poſſeſſions, either poverty, or decay of trade, or ſome ſuch excuſe was pleaded to leſſen the tax. On the other hand, the commiſſioners and aſſiſtants, not being the court's devotees, readily enough allowed theſe excuſes, and appeared much more inclinable to favor their neighbors than his Majeſty. This occaſioned a very conſiderable diminution of the ſubſidies uſual amount. Moreover tonage and poundage were not paid without compulſion. There was continually occaſion to uſe violence, to ſeize effects, and impriſon the merchants, to oblige them to pay what the houſe of commons had declared illegal: beſide, they practiſed a thouſand artifices to defraud the King of a duty wherewith they thought themſelves unjuſtly burdened. To cure theſe inconveniencies, the council were forced to give very expreſs orders, even to the impowering the officers of the cuſtoms to enter into any ſhip, veſſel, or houſe, and to ſearch into any trunk or cheſt, and break any bulk whatſoever, in default of the payment of duties. But beſide that this had never been practiſed before, another inconvenience aroſe. Theſe officers, under color of ſearching, uſed many oppreſſions and knaveries, which made people ſtill more clamorous. In a word, the King reaped not half the benefit from tonage and poundage he had before his variance with the parliament, and the people were abundantly more diſſatisfied than ever. But to hinder their diſcontent from turning into rebellion, the council gave ſtrict orders to have the militia, both horſe and foot, compleated, armed, and inſtructed in the exerciſe of arms (1). It was thereby intended to intimidate the people, and keep them in awe, while, on the other hand, they were amuſed with orders for a rigorous execution of the laws againſt recuſants. But theſe orders muſt have been neglected, ſince the nation's complaints on that ſubject never ceaſed during the whole courſe of this reign.

Several monopolies, which bring in money to the King. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 12, 103.

Mean while, as Charles was neceſſitated for money, and it was eaſy to foreſee that his ordinary revenues would not be ſufficient to ſupply his expenſes, the miniſters found no better way to augment his Majeſty's revenue, than by granting monopolies: that is, the King, by his letters patent, formed companies, to whom alone he gave the privilege of vending certain wares or commodities, and who were to pay him for it ſuch a yearly revenue. This was directly contrary to the peoples rights, and highly deſtructive to trade: but in thoſe days, the nation's advantage was what the court had leaſt in view. This abuſe went ſuch a length that, in a manner, all ſorts of goods were monopoliſed, and the ſale ingroſſed by ſome company, even to old rags. I ſhall not here ſpecify theſe monopolies, becauſe, not having been all eſtabliſhed at once, they will perhaps be mentioned hereafter (2).

AN' 1630. Treaty about a peace with Spain. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIX. p. 219, 226. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 75.

Since Charles had undertaken to make war upon France, the Spaniſh war was no more talked of than if even the thought of it had never exiſted. Tho' in all his ſaid Majeſty's ſpeeches to the foregoing parliaments, and in all his meſſages to the commons, he had labored to ſhew how neceſſary this war was for the welfare of all Europe, and of England more particularly. He had frequently inſinuated, that England and Ireland were in ſo great danger of being invaded by the Spaniards, that it was not poſſible to be too ſpeedy in applying a remedy to that ſo preſſing a miſchief: and yet the Spaniards never made any attempt which might confirm thoſe dreads wherewith Charles would have inſpired the parliament. The King of Spain, contented with not being attacked, undertook nothing againſt England, knowing he was in no danger from that quarter. However, after concluſion of the peace between France and England, he thought proper to terminate differences with the Engliſh, wherein he met not with any obſtacle, Charles not being in condition to enter upon hoſtilities. So after ſome negociations, a pacification between the two crowns was concluded, in November, 1630.

Concluſion of the peace. Novemb. 5.

Preſbyterianiſm had lately gained ground in England, notwithſtanding a ſtrong oppoſition from the prelates, and particularly Laud, biſhop of London, ſworn enemy to the Puritans. This prelate ſeldom miſſed any opportunity to ſhew the hatred he bore them, and ſuch opportunities very frequently offered. Beſide his being King Charles's moſt intimate counſellor, eſpecially for eccleſiaſtical matters, he had almoſt the ſole direction of the high-commiſſion, after the archbiſhop of Canterbury was excluded on account of Sibthorp's ſermon. He therefore, to prevent the growth of Preſbyterianiſm, ſo managed that his Majeſty ſent certain inſtructions to the archbiſhops, with a command to impart them to the biſhops of their provinces, in order to their being obſerved. The chief end of theſe inſtructions was to hinder any Preſbyterian miniſter from gliding into the church of England, and to diſcover the careleſs obſervers of the rites preſcribed by the canons. Laud himſelf was the author of theſe inſtructions, which were agreeable to certain conſiderations * which he had ſome time ſince laid before his Majeſty. As the Preſbyterians were not ignorant whence ſprang the evil, they entertained a moſt implacable enmity to this prelate, the effects whereof they afterwards made him feel, when they found opportunity.

His Majeſty had this year the ſatisfaction of having a ſon, named Charles, of whom his Queen was delivered the twenty-ninth of May.

Birth of Prince Charles.

Guſtavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, had expreſſed a great deſire to relieve Germany, haraſſed by the Emperor, but his wars with Poland had prevented his executing that deſign. On this account, the Kings of France and England joined to procure a peace between thoſe two crowns, wherein they finally ſucceeded. King Lewis XIII's aim was, by this diverſion, to humble the Auſtrian family; and King Charles I, was in hopes, thro' the King of Sweden's means, he ſhould recover the Palatinate for his brother-in-law. The above-mentioned pacification was no ſooner concluded, than King Guſtavus prepared to enter Germany at the head of a formidable army. At the ſame time, he made a private agreement with the King of England, whereby Charles ingaged to furniſh him with ſix thouſand men, in the marquis of Hamilton's name, as if that nobleman had, at his own charge, levied thoſe forces. Such pretenſes rarely deceive the public; nevertheleſs, they give to thoſe Potentates who uſe them, the aſſurance to affirm all to be done againſt their conſent. To avoid my returning to thoſe matters, I ſhall ſay here in two words, Charles was the dupe of Guſtavus. When the Swede, after ſeveral victories over the Imperialiſts, was able in his turn to aſſiſt the King of Bohemia, he would have impoſed on him ſuch hard conditions, that he could not think of accepting them: ſo Charles withdrew his troops, which had done good ſervice in the war, and recalled ſir Henry Vane, who was with the King of Sweden, in quality of embaſſador. Thus terminated this kind of league, whereon I think it needleſs to particulariſe, it not having occaſioned in the affairs of this reign any alteration.

A commiſſion to compound with thoſe who had neglected to receive knighthood. Jan. 28. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIX. p. 119, 175. July 6. Ruſhworth. Vol. II. p. 70. Annals.

I return now to domeſtic affairs. King Charles's ordinary revenues not ſufficing for his expenſes, it was neceſſary to find means to raiſe a farther ſupply. One of theſe was, to attack ſuch as had neglected receiving the order of knighthood at his Majeſty's coronation, tho' they had been ſummoned. It was a cuſtom practiſed even from the Conqueſt, that ſuch as had fifteen pounds yearly in land, were obliged to ſerve in the wars, and thoſe who were not capable of ſerving, compounded with the King, and for a certain ſum were releaſed from this ſervice. To this purpoſe, ſuch as were worth fifteen pounds annually, were to be made knights, that is, fit to ſerve the King. In proceſs of time, the number of thoſe who were to take the order of knighthood was limited to ſuch as had twenty pounds per annum. What was originally but a bare cuſtom, was converted to a law in the reign of Edward II, and after that, ſome of the ſucceeding Kings took advantage of it, as may be ſeen in Rymer's collection, &c. but in general, tho' this ſtatute was not aboliſhed, it had been long diſuſed. Charles I, building on the ſtatute's being ſtill in force, ſince it was never expreſly repealed, put it in practiſe at his coronation, and pretended to be extremely condeſcending in ſummoning to take knighthood ſuch only as had annually forty pounds, tho' at that time forty pounds were much leſs than twenty pounds in Edward II's days. He found but very few willing to obey theſe ſummons, the uſe whereof was intirely obſolete. King Charles himſelf overlooked this non-compliance; poſſibly for fear it might ſome how prejudice him with regard to the ſupplies he was to aſk of the parliament: but after the diſſolution of his third parliament, he deemed not himſelf obliged to a like precaution. He therefore nominated commiſſioners to compound with thoſe who had neglected to appear, as well for their contempt, as for being excuſed from receiving the order of knighthood. The commiſſioners had this inſtruction, "To take no leſs than after the rate of thrice and "half as much, as the perſons compounding were "found rated in the ſubſidy." Multitudes being ſummoned on this occaſion, their compoſitions brought his Majeſty more than a hundred thouſand pounds. This was looked on afterwards as a grievous oppreſſion, and the parliament repealed the ſtatute whereon it was grounded.

Innovations in divine ſervice.

Mention has already been made of biſhop Laud's extraordinary zeal for the church of England. This church, at the Reformation, thought fit to retain certain ceremonies, not as abſolutely neceſſary, but rather as indifferent, and which conſequently ſhe believed it not proper to remove from divine ſervice. Laud was not only ſcrupulouſly attached to theſe ceremonies, but likewiſe to whatſoever ſerved to imbelliſh the externals of religion, and ſeemed more inclined to increaſe the number than ſuppreſs any of thoſe which moſt offended the Puritans. Of this inclination he gave a proof, when he conſecrated St. Catherine-Creed church, which had been lately repaired. On this occaſion, he uſed ſome formalities which he might have forborne, as being too like what is practiſed in the Romiſh church on ſuch ſolemnities. The manner of conſecration was thus:

Charles I An' 1630.

An' 1631. Ceremonies obſerved by biſhop Laud at the conſecration of a church. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 77. Annals, p. 386.

At the biſhop's approach to the weſt-door of the church, ſome, who were prepared for it, cried with a loud voice, "Open, open ye everlaſting doors, "that the King of glory may enter in!" And preſently the doors were opened, and the biſhop, with ſome doctors and many other principal men, went in, and immediately falling down upon his knees, with his eyes lifted up, and his arms ſpread abroad, uttered theſe words: "This place is holy, the "ground is holy, in the name of the Father, Son, "and Holy Ghoſt, I pronounce it holy."

Then he took up ſome of the duſt, and threw it up into the air ſeveral times, in his going up towards the chancel. When they approached near to the rail and communion-table, the biſhop bowed towards it ſeveral times, and returning, they went round the church in proceſſion, ſaying the hundredth Pſalm; after that the ninteenth Pſalm, and then ſaid a form of prayer, "Lord Jeſus Chriſt, &c." and concluding, "We conſecrate this church, and "ſeparate it unto thee, as holy ground, not to be "profaned any more to common uſe."

After this the biſhop, being near the communion-table, and taking a written book in his hand, pronounced curſes upon thoſe who ſhould afterwards profane that holy place, by muſters of ſoldiers, or keeping profane law-courts, or carrying burdens thro' it, and at the end of every curſe, he bowed towards the eaſt, and ſaid, "Let all the people ſay, "Amen."

When the curſes were ended, he pronounced a number of bleſſings upon all thoſe who had any hand in framing and building that ſacred and beautiful church, and thoſe who had given, or ſhould hereafter give any chalices, plate, ornaments, or utenſils; and at the end of every bleſſing, he bowed towards the eaſt, ſaying, "Let all the people ſay, "Amen."

After this followed the ſermon; which being ended, the biſhop conſecrated and adminiſtered the ſacrament in manner following.

As he approached the communion-table, he made ſeveral lowly bowings, and coming up to the ſide of the table where the bread and wine were covered, he bowed ſeven times, and then, after the reading many prayers, he came near the bread, and gently lifting up the corner of the napkin wherein the bread was laid, and when he beheld the bread, he laid it down again, flew back a ſtep or two, bowed three ſeveral times towards it, then he drew near again, and opened the napkin, and bowed as before.

Then he laid his hand on the cup, which was full of wine, with a cover upon it, which he let go again, went back, and bowed thrice towards it; then he came near again, and lifting up the cover of the cup, looked into it, and ſeeing the wine, he let fall the cover again, retired back and bowed as before; then he received the ſacrament, and gave it to ſome principal men; after which many prayers being ſaid, the ſolemnity of the conſecration ended.

Had Laud taken all theſe ceremonies, both in conſecration of the church and in adminiſtration of the ſacrament, from a ritual of the church of England made ſince the Reformation, there would have been nothing to object. But ſome years after, the houſe of commons accuſed him in form, of having exactly copied the Roman Pontifical, which was found in his ſtudy. He denied it, alledging two ſeemingly very frivolous reaſons: Firſt, that the Pontifical preſcribes aſhes to be thrown up by the biſhop who conſecrates the church, whereas whereas he threw up in the air duſt, which he found on the ground (1). Secondly, that he obſerved a form communicated to him by biſhop Andrews. But as there is ſo little difference between duſt and aſhes, and as biſhop Andrews's form agreed with that in the Pontifical, this anſwer was not much approved. Howſoever this be, it cannot be denied, that it was affectation to uſe on this occaſion, both for conſecrating the church, and adminiſtering the ſacrament, a different form from that of the church of England, and to chuſe one ſo very like the Roman Pontifical. This gave a great advantage to his adverſaries, who thence took occaſion to charge him with a deſign to introduce Popery: but he little regarded what could be alledged againſt him; his royal patron's favor had ſo exalted him, that it was not in the power of his enemies to hurt him, but, on the contrary, he had frequent opportunities to be revenged on them. While he was moſt exclaimed againſt, three Oxonian divinity-doctors, having preached againſt Arminianiſm, were expeled the univerſity, and ſome others, who had undertaken their defenſe, were turned out of their offices. This was under color of obſerving the King's proclamation, and it was not doubted but Laud was the author of theſe violent proceedings.

Three doctors expelled Oxford, for preaching againſt Arminianiſm. Ruſhworth, Vol, II. p. 110. Annals.

Mean while, Charles's miniſters were diligently ſeeking means to raiſe money, and daily were offered new projects, whereof they choſe ſuch as they judged moſt expedient. Among theſe means, as has been obſerved, monopolies were at firſt moſt in vogue. At the begining of the year 1632, the King, by his patent under the great ſeal, incorporated the ſoap-makers. This patent alone is affirmed to have been worth to him ten thouſand pounds (2). There was another company ſettled for making cards, of whom the King bought them at eighteen ſhillings per groſs, and, ſealing them, ſold them again. But I ſhould be too tedious was I to ſpecify all the monopolies made in this reign by the King's authority (3).

Nor were monopolies the only methods practiſed to raiſe money: diverſe other means were deviſed. Soon after Charles, by proclamation, commanded all peers, gentlemen, eccleſiaſtics and others, whoſe ſtay in London was not abſolutely neceſſary, to depart within forty days, and reſide in their reſpective counties, and at their manſion-houſes. This injunction ſeemed grounded on his Majeſty's deſire to hinder the nobility and gentry from waſting their eſtates by a needleſs reſidence in London, where they were obliged to be at a great expenſe. But it was afterwards perceived that Charles had another end in it, when ſuch were ſummoned before the ſtar-chamber as had neglected to obey the proclamation, and were condemned in grievous fines to his Majeſty's uſe. At the ſame time, Charles appointed commiſſioners to puniſh thoſe who, contrary to former prohibitions, had inlarged the city of London by new buildings. From all theſe deviſes King Charles drew very conſiderable ſums; all the fines in which the offenders were condemned being intirely to his own benefit. The ſtar-chamber uſed exceſſive rigor on theſe occaſions.

July 24. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIX. p. 177—184.

About the ſame time, the city of London was fined fifteen hundred marks, becauſe the mayor and aldermen had neglected to take inquiſition of the death of one doctor Lamb, who paſſed for a conjurer, and of whom the duke of Buckingham had made uſe, but for what purpoſe I know not. This man, being eighty years old, was purſued by the mob from ſtreet to ſtreet, and died within a few days, either of the fatigue he underwent, or of the bruiſes he had received.

CHARLES I AN' 1632.

The city of London fined. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 145. Annals. 1628. Howes.

I have already obſerved that Preſbytery, or, as it was then termed, Puritaniſm, daily gained ground, notwithſtanding the efforts uſed by King, prelates, high-commiſſion, ſtar-chamber, and courts of juſtice, to ſtop its progreſs. As theſe efforts tended not towards better informing the Preſbyterians, but conſiſted only in the exceſſive ſeverity exerciſed upon them, when their zeal cauſed them to offend, they were the more exaſperated againſt the church of England, as they ſaw, at the ſame time, that the Arminians and Papiſts were left unmoleſted, or if orders were ſometimes given againſt them, ſuch orders were never executed. This made them exclaim againſt the biſhops, and charge them with deſigning to introduce Popery and Arminianiſm into the church. Unhappily, they imputed to the whole church of England thoſe violences which ought to have been aſcribed to the circumſtances of the times, and the particular character of ſome prelates who, having credit at court, inſinuated to King Charles, that nothing was more oppoſite to regal authority than Preſbyterian church-government. All who were not very ſubmiſſive to his Majeſty were conſidered as Puritans, and as ſuch frequently oppreſſed: ſo, by a fatal policy, men well-affected to the church of England, but enemies to arbitrary power, were forced, contrary to their inclinations, to join with the Puritans, in order to ſtrengthen their party, and inable them to oppoſe the court's deſigns. I am perſuaded that this conduct gave Puritaniſm many adherents whom it otherwiſe would never have had. What makes me of this opinion is, that Preſbyterianiſm never made ſo great a progreſs as during the firſt fifteen years of this reign, tho' it had never been more perſecuted. After all, this conduct is not to be aſcribed to the church of England. We find not in her principles and doctrines any thing repugnant to charity, or tending to violence; but it was wholly owing to the character and deſigns of the court-prelates, of the King's miniſters and counſellors, who were for elevating the royal authority to the higheſt degree. They were of opinion, that nothing would more conduce thereto than the humbling, or rather the utter ruin of the Puritans, and unfortunately conſidered as ſuch all who oppoſed their deſign, anſwerably to King James's maxim. Hence it occurred that, by confounding thus the State-Puritans with the Church-Puritans, they conſtrained, as I may ſay, the former to join with the latter.

Attempts to eradicate Puritaniſm, and remarks thereon.

The deſign of ruining Preſbyterianiſm deſtroyed all regard to the ſcruples of tender conſciences, even in things of ſmall moment, left by the reformers in the public worſhip, rather as indifferent than abſo-

(1) According to Ruſhworth (Vol. II. p. 78, 79.) biſhop Laud's words are: "Whereas it was ſaid, I threw up duſt in "the air, this I deny; and where it was alledged that this was in imitation of the Roman Pontifical, that (ſaid he) is a "miſtake, for the Pontifical preſcribes Aſhes not Duſt to be caſt abroad." However it was expreſsly depoſed by two witneſſes that he threw up duſt.

lutely needful. On the contrary, whatſoever gave moſt offenſe to the Preſbyterians was not only induſtriouſly practiſed, but alſo repreſented as neceſſary, and ſundry novelties added which ſerved to widen the breach and render quite impracticable the deſirable union. Of this the reader will hereafter be convinced: but before I quit this ſubject, I cannot forbear relating a paſſage which clearly proves what I have advanced.

Proceſs againſt the recorder of Saliſbury. February. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 153. State-Tryals. Vol. I.

In the city of Saliſbury was a collegiate church, named St. Edmonds, which with its revenues, like the reſt of that kind, came by act of parliament into the hands of Henry VIII, and remained in the crown 'till the reign of James I, who ſold it to a private perſon, and he to another, ſo that it paſſed ſucceſſively thro' ſeveral hands, 'till at length the laſt proprietor ſold that edifice to the pariſhioners of St. Edmonds, who repaired and made it their parochial church. The windows (which had 'till then been preſerved) were painted in the antique guſto, and among other matters repreſented the creation, wherein God the Father appeared ſtanding in the form of an old man, creating the world during the firſt ſix days, but on the ſeventh the painter had made him ſiting, to denote the day of reſt. This ignorant artiſt had commited ſeveral groſs miſtakes, having alloted to one day the work performed on another, and, in expreſſing the creation of the ſun and moon, had put in the Almighty's hand a pair of compaſſes, as if about to meaſure them. Henry Sherfield, recorder of Sarum, and pariſhioner of St. Edmonds, having called a veſtry, repreſented to the pariſhioners, that theſe pictures gave offenſe, and were apt to lead people to ſuperſtition: that the painter had been guilty of diverſe errors, and beſide, the repreſentation of God the Father like an old man, offended the eyes of good Chriſtians. Whereupon the veſtry thought proper to take down the windows (1), and put up in their ſtead others, not painted. Armed with this order, Sherfield ſent for a glazier, and ſhewing him with his cane the glaſs which was to be changed, brake ſome of the panes, as being little anxious for their preſervation.

On this outrage, an information was exhibited againſt Sherfield, in the ſtar-chamber, by the attorney general, ſhewing that, contrary to the canons, which forbid any private perſon to alter or innovate any thing in the fabric or ornament of a church, without ſpecial licenſe from the dioceſan biſhop, Sherfield, being ill-affected to the diſcipline of the church of England, and the government thereof by prelates, did combine with ſome others of the ſame opinion, and undertake, by a bare order of the veſtry, and in contempt of the King and the dioceſan, to break down the windows of St. Edmond's church, which contained excellent pictures of the creation, made hundreds of years ſince, and were a great ornament to the church: that he commited this profane act contrary to the order of the biſhop, who by letter had injoined him to deſiſt from this deſign: that, by this ill example, other wicked and ſchiſmatical perſons, ill-affected to the government of the church of England under his Majeſty, might be incouraged to take the like violent courſes.

Sherfield anſwered, that the church of St. Edmonds was a lay-fee, and had ſo continued ever ſince it fell to the crown, and therefore it was legally exempted from the dioceſan biſhop's juriſdiction: that conſequently thoſe who had purchaſed the church, had lawful power to alter the windows, as they had before made other alterations in the ſteeple, walls, pulpit, and other parts, without any complaints from the biſhop: that after all, he had only taken down ſome ſmall quarries of glaſs to ſhew the glazier what was to be altered, and that the hiſtory of the creation might ſtill be plainly diſcovered: that the painting was ſo far from being fine, that when done it coſt not above forty ſhillings. Then he ſet forth the groſs blunders of the painter, and proved by acts of parliament, made in the reign of Edward VI, and Elizabeth, that all pictures ſhall be removed from churches. Finally, he denied that he was ill-affected to the government of the church under biſhops, or had acted in contempt of the King, or ever received a letter from the biſhop of Saliſbury upon this ſubject. Whereupon the biſhop of London ſaid, that he pretended not to juſtify the painter's errors, but only to obſerve to the court, that God being called in ſcripture, the "Ancient of Days," might be the occaſion of the painter's repreſenting God the Father like an old man: but that Sherfield was much more to blame than the painter, for daring to make alterations without licenſe. In ſhort, Sherfield was fined five hundred pounds (contrary to the opinion of ſome of his judges, who would have mounted his fine to a thouſand) and condemned to make a public acknowledgment of his fault, before ſuch perſons as the biſhop ſhould pleaſe to nominate. I thought my ſelf obliged to relate this inſtance, in order to ſhew what methods were taken to ruin Preſbyterianiſm. One may readily comprehend that ſuch ſeverities could not but produce very ill effects among the people, and alienate them from, inſtead of reconciling them to the church of England.

Charles I An' 1632.

Charles gains ſir Thomas Wentworth;

In the account I have given of the third parliament held in this reign, I had ſometimes occaſion to ſpeak of ſir Thomas Wentworth, knight of the ſhire for the county of York. This gentleman did, in the houſe of commons, give frequent proofs of his zeal for maintaining the peoples liberties and the parliament's privileges. By that he became formidable to the court, tho' he took care not to run into any exceſs with regard to the King and his miniſter. On the contrary, he always ſoftened his opinions with ſome honorable and reſpectful expreſſions, yet ſeldom failed oppoſing the court's pretenſions. As he was one of the greateſt head-pieces then in England, Charles ſoon perceived that his parts and capacity might be very ſerviceable to him, if he could gain him to his intereſt. He therefore ſet about it, after, or poſſibly before the parliament's diſſolution, and ſucceeded ſo well, that Wentworth became one of the moſt zealous promoters of the royal authority, or rather of the deſpotic power King Charles ſtrove to eſtabliſh.

whom he makes preſident of the council of York. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIX. p. 8, 10, 410. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 158.

On this account, his Majeſty judged him the propereſt perſon to be intruſted with the preſidentſhip of the northern council. As this is one of the heavieſt grievances complained of by the Engliſh againſt Charles I, and one of the moſt noted occaſions wherein that Prince diſcovered his deſign to ſet up unlimited power, it will be neceſſary briefly to ſhew what was this northern council, and what uſe King Charles would have made of it to ſubject his people to deſpotiſm.

Remark on the council of York.

On the ſuppreſſion of leſſer monaſteries in the twenty-ſeventh year of Henry VIII's reign, there were, for two or three years ſucceſſively, diverſe inſurrections in the north. Mean while, as Henry VIII's meaning was not to ſtop there, but likewiſe deſigned to ſuppreſs all the other monaſteries, he thought proper to take ſome care to prevent like commotions in thoſe quarters. To that purpoſe, he eſtabliſhed at York a court of juſtice, under the ſpecious pretenſe of eaſing his poor ſubjects, who had not wherewithal to proſecute their ſuits in the courts of Weſtminſter: but his real intent was, that this court ſhould obſerve all movements among ſuch of the northern nobility and gentry as were ſuſpected, in order to puniſh them immediately, in caſe it was perceived they were attempting to excite any freſh inſurrections. A commiſſion therefore was granted to the biſhop of Landaff, the firſt preſident, and others, by virtue whereof was eſtabliſhed this new council in the north, otherwiſe ſtiled the court of York. The juriſdiction of this court extended over Yorkſhire, Northumberland, Cumberland, Weſtmoreland, the biſhoprick of Durham, the county of the cities of York, Kingſton upon Hull, and Newcaſtle upon Tine. The King's commiſſion was no other than a commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer, with one additional clauſe, whereby the council was impowered to hear all cauſes, real and perſonal, when one or both of the parties, by reaſon of their poverty, could not proſecute their rights, according to the national laws. This clauſe, tho' illegal, produced no ill effect, nor any complaint, whether the new court exerciſed that part of the commiſſion at all, or only ſo ſparingly that the poor thereby found eaſe and benefit.

Id. p. 162.

In the firſt year of King James I's reign in England, a commiſſion was granted to lord Sheffield, preſident of the court of York, which varied not from the former, only it had reference to inſtructions which his Majeſty was to ſend him. Whether theſe inſtructions were or were not ſent, does not appear; but it is evident that, in making the power of this court to depend on the King's inſtructions, the intent was, that its deciſion ſhould not be ſo much according to law, as according to his Majeſty's private orders: and, in effect, King James, in the ſeventh year of his reign, granted the ſame lord Sheffield a new commiſſion, omiting theſe two clauſes, which were in the firſt, That they ſhould inquire "per ſacramentum bonorum & legalium ho-"minum," and hear and determine, "ſecundum le-"ges Angliæ." Thus was the court's power limited only by thoſe particular inſtructions, which were the firſt we find to have been ſent thither.

Thenceforwards, whenever the commiſſion was renewed, which was on every change of preſident or counſellor, the King ſent new inſtructions, tending to render the York court independent, not only of the Weſtminſter courts, which are the courts of the whole kingdom, but even of all laws whatever.

March 21. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 150, &c.

King Charles renewed this commiſſion in favor of lord Wentworth, with a power more ample than that wherewith any of his predeceſſors had been inveſted. In 1632, a clauſe was added, whereby, among other particulars, authority was given him to hear and determine all offenſes and miſdemeanors, ſuits, debates, controverſies and demands, cauſes, things and matters whatſoever contained in the inſtructions annexed to his commiſſion. But what were theſe inſtructions? In the parliament of 1640, Mr. Edward Hyde, then member of parliament, and afterwards earl of Clarendon, being deputed by the commons to the upper houſe concerning the court of York, ſaid in his ſpeech to their lordſhips, that in the inſtructions of 1632 and 1637, containing fifty-eight articles, "there was "ſcarce one which was not againſt or beſide the "law." From whence he took occaſion to aſk, "What have the good northern people done, that "they only muſt be disfranchiſed of all their pri-"vileges, and be governed according to the diſ-"cretion of the court of York?" Nay, tho' the court might proceed diſcretionally, ſpecial proviſion was made, in the King's inſtructions, that no fine, no puniſhment ſhould be leſs than by law appointed. This court was afterwards aboliſhed by the ſame parliament of 1640.

The King's journey to Scotland. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 175, &c. Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 60, &c. Guthry's Mem.

King Charles, having ruled three or four years without a parliament, injoyed great eaſe and tranquillity. His will began gradually to paſs for law; there was no houſe of commons to complain publicly, and he ſaw none about his perſon but ſuch as were always ready to flatter him, and cheriſh his principles touching government. On the other hand, he was freed from the incumbrance and expenſe of a war, which had created him great trouble, and rendered him too dependent on the parliament. In fine, tho' he was not ignorant that, in general, the people were diſcontented, he perceived not the leaſt appearance of rebellion, the grandees of his realms and the neighboring Princes being ſo diſpoſed as not to countenance thoſe who ſhould attempt to diſturb the ſtate. His affairs being in this ſituation, he believed this the propereſt time he could pitch on to viſit Scotland, where three important affairs required his preſenſe. 1. He was deſirous of being there crowned. 2. He intended to hold a parliament for procuring money. 3. He deſigned to take there ſome meaſures for the execution of a project long ſince formed, to reduce the Stotiſh kirk to a perfect conformity with the church of England, and utterly ſubvert Preſbytery. To this end it was that he took with him Laud, biſhop of London, and at his arrival in Scotland made him privy-counſellor of that kingdom. He departed London the thirteenth of May 1633, and, being come to Edinburg, was crowned with the uſual ſolemnities. That done, he held a parliament, which gave him the largeſt ſubſidy had ever been granted to any King of Scotland before him. The third point, concerning religion, requires ſome explication: but as I intend to be elſewhere more particular on that head, I ſhall here advance only juſt what is abſolutely neceſſary to ſhew King Charles's deſign.

Remark touching the eſtabliſhed religion in Scotland. Salmonet. Nalſon, p. 142, &c.

The reformation was eſtabliſhed in Scotland in the reign of Queen Mary, mother of James I, upon the plan of the Genevan and Swiſs churches. The hierarchy was utterly ſuppreſſed, and the church-government commited to preſbyters, and national ſynods, in Scotland termed general aſſemblies. Nevertheleſs the biſhops were ſtill continued, tho' diveſted of all eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction. They retained only their revenues, lands, houſes, ſeat in parliament, and generally all temporal advantages annexed to the epiſcopal dignity. From the begining of the reformation, that is, from the year 1561, to the cloſe of the ſixteenth century, the prelatical eſtate underwent ſundry revolutions, whereon I ſhall not here inlarge, becauſe I deſign to treat thereof in another place. It now ſuffices to ſay, that James I, becoming King of England, found means to make the Scotiſh parliament reſtore epiſcopacy to its priſtine luſter, and give the biſhops their ancient juriſdiction over the church. This was the firſt ſtep to lead the kirk of Scotland to the deſired point, that is, to a perfect conformity with the church of England. But the tedious treaty of the Prince his ſon's marriage with the Spaniſh Infanta, and the affairs of Bohemia and the Palatinate, hindered him from fully executing his project. Charles I, had this work no leſs at heart than his father: but as, in the begining of his reign, he was ingaged in a war with Spain, and afterwards with France, and moreover his diſputes with his parliaments affording him little leiſure to think on other matters, he could not ſeriouſly ſet about this affair 'till the others were concluded. In the parliament at Edinburg, in the year 1633, among other acts preſented to be paſſed, there were particularly two, viz. the third and fourth. The firſt of theſe bore title; "An Acts concerning religion. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 183, &c.

CHARLES I An' 1633.

" An act anent his Majesty's royal prerogative and " apparel of kirkmen:" The other, " An act for the " ratification of the acts touching religion." These were the only acts which met with any opposition, on account of the consequences which some feared the King would draw from them hereafter. Of these acts the first was properly but a confirmation of a like act passed in the reign of King James VI, impowering his Majesty to regulate the ecclesiastics vestments as he judged proper. Now, as from that time the design of altering the Scotish kirk's discipline had shewed itself more and more, some of the members of this parliament suspected King Charles would make use of this act to introduce the surplice. And, in effect, being asked if he designed it, he made no answer; but taking a list of the whole members out of his pocket, said, " Gen- Ib. p. 183. " tlemen, I have all your names here, and I'll " know who will do me service, and who will " not, this day." However, about thirteen prime nobles, and as many barons and burgesses declared, that they agreed to the act for his Majesty's prerogative, but dissented from that part of it which regarded the apparel of kirkmen.

Id. p. 186. The other act I mentioned, was thus expressed; " Our sovereign Lord, with the advice and con- " sent of the estates, ratifies and approves all and " whatsoever acts and statutes made before, anent " the liberty and freedom of the true kirk of God, " and religion presently professed within this realm, " and ordains the same to stand in their full force " and effect, as if they were specially mentioned " and set down herein."

Opposition to these acts.

I have already hinted, that in the reign of James VI, and especially after his accession to England, he made several innovations in the kirk of Scotland, particularly with respect to the episcopal jurisdiction, which had been restored. The whole artifice of this act consisted therefore in these words, " the religion presently professed:" for thereby were confirmed all the innovations in the Scotish kirk's discipline, whereto those who opposed the act would not agree. They were very willing to ratify the acts made in favor of religion, as established by an act passed in the sixth year of James VI, when the bishops had no power or jurisdiction; but would not admit these words, " presently professed." During these contests, King Charles, with some emotion, said; " I will have no distinction, but " command you to say, I or No." Whereupon the dissenting lords and gentlemen said, ' No.' Nevertheless, both acts passed by a majority of votes. Some did afterwards aver that fraud was used in collecting the suffrages. However that be, King Charles's eagerness to have these two acts passed, convinced the people of Scotland that the project of making greater innovations in the kirk still subsisted, and that those acts were a sort of preparative to accomplish it. On the other hand, the opposition Charles met with shewed him, it was not yet time to act openly, and that it was necessary to take other measures to facilitate the success of his design.

The Puritans persecuted in England.

It it was indeavored in Scotland to ruin Presbyterism by indirect means, it was thought proper to proceed in England with less caution. Accordingly, all possible efforts were used to destroy it utterly, by persecuting the Puritans, for whom there was not the least condescension. The court and bishops laid it down for a rule, not to depart, on their account, from one tittle of what was practised in the church of England, for fear they should grow too powerful, and the indulgence shewn them prove detrimental to the church. But there was a yet stronger motive, viz. the implacable hatred borne them by King Charles, his ministers, and above all by the bishops of London and Winchester, which made them earnestly seek all occasions to oppress them: and these occasions were easy to be found. They had only to press the observation of the canons without dispensing with one article, in order to cause the Presbyterians to commit offenses, which exposed them to the rigor of the ecclesiastical and civil laws. But as the bishops could not be every where, and wanted people to inform them of what passed, the bishop of Winchester * bethought himself in his primary visitation, to oblige by oath the church-wardens and sworn-men to turn informers, that none might escape their inquiry. The oath was as follows:

June. Oath appointed by the bishop of Winchester. Rushworth, Vol. II. p. 186. Annals.

" You shall swear, that you and every of you, " without all affection, favor, hatred, hope of re- " ward and gain. or fear of displeasure or malice " of any person, shall present all and every such " person and persons, of or within your parish, " who hath commited any offense, fault or crime, " or omited any part of duty, which he is injoined " to perform: wherein you shall deal uprightly, " and according to truth; neither of malice pre- " senting any contrary to truth, nor of corrupt af- " fection sparing to present any, and to conceal the " truth; having in this action God before your " eyes, with an earnest zeal to maintain truth, and " suppress vice. So help you God, and the con- " tents of this book."

With this oath were delivered the subsequent instructions, according to which they were to proceed.

" 1. As to the articles concerning the church, " they are to inquire, whether they have the book " of constitutions, or canons ecclesiastical, and a " parchment register-book, book of common- " prayer, and book of homilies, &c? And whe- " ther the coommunion table be placed in such con- " venient sort within the said chancel or church, as " that the minister may be best heard in his prayer " and administration?

" And doth he observe all the orders, rites and " ceremonies prescribed in the common prayer, and " administering the sacrament? And whether " doth the minister receive the sacrament, kneel- " ing at the same, and administereth to none " but such as do kneel, as by the twelfth canon is " directed?

And " whether doth the minister wear the surplice while " he is saying the public prayers, and administer- " ing the sacraments? Whether doth the minister " catechise and instruct the youth of ignorant per- " sons of your parish in the ten commandments, " &c.? And whether he doth solemnise marriage, " the banes not being three several Sundays and " holy-days first published in time of divine ser- " vice? Charles supports wakes and revels. Rushworth, Vol. II. p. 191.

Hence may be seen, how very careful the bishop of Wincheſter was to hinder any Presbyterian ministers from geting into the church of England. But tho' the oath, injoined by this prelate, was a real outrage upon the laws, the parliament alone having power to prescribe such oaths, none dared to attack him directly. The Presbyterians were sure to meet with no incouragement from court. On the contrary, their dislike of a thing was a sufficient reason with the court strenuously to support it. Of this I shall produce two very remarkable instances. The Presbyterians were offended at the feasts of the dedications * of churches, because they were only occasions of riot and debauchery, and because these days seldom passed without some disorders. In Somersetshire, where these revels abounded, the lord chief justice Richardson and baron Denham, in their circuits, made an order, with the whole bench's concurrence, that these revels should be suppressed. But the chief justice, being commanded to attend the council-board, was severely reprimanded, and injoined to revoke the order made at the assizes. A second proof of what I advanced is this.

* Vulgarly termed wakes or ales;

and recreations on Sundays, after divine service. October 18. Annals. Heylin.

The Presbyterians, notwithstanding the late King's proclamation, affecting still to forbid their servants to be present at these revels, or to use any recreations publicly on Sundays after divine service, King Charles revived and confirmed the proclamation published by his father, commanding that the people should not be troubled or molested in their recreations. The court was afraid that, by degrees, a maxim deemed by them prejudicial to their interest would be established, viz. that when a custom, not ill in itself, occasioned abuses, it ought to be abolished. This maxim seeming to them too general, because it might be applied to things of great consequence, they opposed to the utmost of their power.

This same year, in October, the Queen was delivered of a second son, who was named James, and created duke of York.

Rumor of a design to restore Popery.

The Presbyterians were prepossessed, that a scheme was formed to re-establish Popery in England. This notion in general ought not to seem strange, since it is certain that, from the Reformation, this project had never been interrupted: but the authors thereof must be carefully distinguished. Had the Presbyterians been satisfied with believing that some private Roman Catholics had formed such a design, it may be affirmed, they would not have been mistaken; but they went much farther. They imagined that the King's ministers, the council, bishops, and particularly the new archbishop of Canterbury, were the authors of this project. If they did not directly charge the King with it, at least they were persuaded, either that he incouraged it, or suffered himself to be carried farther than he intended, by persons who concealed from him their real design. The Papists themselves gave occasion for these suspicions, in shewing openly their hopes of quickly seeing a change in favor of their religion. We find in a diary, kept by Laud of what daily occurred to him, that this very year 1633 he had the offer of a cardinal's cap, if he would help to restore the Romish religion. For my part, I verily believe that neither King Charles, the archbishop (1), nor indeed many of the ministers ever formed such a design: at least, in all has been urged on this subject, I have not met with any proof which appeared, I will not say sufficient to convince me, but even to carry with it the least probability. Nevertheless, it is certain this opinion was spread among the people, and the Presbyterians used all their indeavors to gain it belief. I do not know whether they believed it themselves, or only thought it for their advantage to cast this reproach upon the church of England, in order to strengthen their own party, wherein they finally succeeded, even beyond their expectations. But since this opinion produced in time surprising effects, I cannot forbear shewing whereon it was grounded.

CHARLES I AN' 1633.

August 4. Diary. Welwood, p. 51, 52.

Grounds and reasons of this opinion.

1. While James was only King of Scotland, before the death of Queen Elizabeth, he was suspected to favor the Papists (2). Elizabeth herself was not free from such a suspicion, as appears in the history of her reign. After James's accession to the throne of England, he always expressed great tenderness for the Catholics. This he shewed on several occasions, as in the powder-plot; by his expressions in favor of Catholics in all his speeches to the parliament; by the places of trust which he gave indifferently to Papists and Protestants, as he owned himself in his famous apology; by his continual refusal to execute the laws against recusants; and lastly, by the little zeal and affection he expressed for the Protestant religion, in the two negociations with Spain and France, concerning his son's marriage. I say nothing here of his conferences with the archbishop of Ambrun, because they were not known in his life-time, nor can be affirmed to be faithfully related. All this gave no small cause to suspect, that King James had some ill design with regard to religion, and had left the execution to the care of his successor.

2. Charles I, when Prince at Madrid, sent a letter to the Pope, which might have rendered him suspected. This suspicion might be confirmed by the private articles which he is reported to have signed, on occasion of his marriage with the Infanta.

3. After Charles was on the throne, he always shewed a very singular condescension for the Catholics, several of whom were raised to the highest stations and imploys. Conway, secretary of state, was a Papist: Weston, who was created earl of Portland and made lord treasurer, was so likewise. Indeed the duke of Buckingham professed the Reformed religion, but it was generally believed he would have made no difficulty to change it for the mass: beside, his mother and his duchess were stanch Romanists. The parliament, as I have observed, presented to Charles a large list of recusants, to whom were commited the places of most trust in their respective counties. In short, tho' the King had positively promised to proceed rigorously against the recusants, he seems not to have performed his promise, since the following parliaments were frequently obliged to renew their instances, and always in vain. If King Charles gave any orders upon that subject, they were never executed, and every one

(1) Wilson's observation about him seems just; "Laud, says he, would never bring his neck under the obedience of the "Roman yoke, tho' he might stick for the grandeur of the clergy, p. 753. Compl. Hist.

Charles I An' 1633.

one believed the court connived at the neglect of thoſe who were charged with the execution, ſo that this was a perpetual cauſe of complaint during this whole reign.

4. King Charles had a very particular complaiſance for his Queen, and ſhe was not only a Papiſt, but likewiſe exceſſively zealous for her religion. This gave occaſion to fear, ſhe had formed the project of reſtoring it in England, and would finally draw her conſort into her ſentiments.

5. The Preſbyterians, who were looked on as the greateſt enemies to Popery, were furiouſly oppreſſed and perſecuted, while the Arminians and Papiſts were ſuffered to live unmoleſted. Hence it was infered, that the court acted with ſuch warmth againſt that ſect, only to make way by their deſtruction to the reſtoration of Popery.

6. Arminianiſm was ſo openly countenanced by the court, and ſome of the leading prelates, that many believed, there was a deſign to make uſe of it as a means to effect a change of religion with greater facility.

Clarendon. Vol. I. p. 73. Coke.

7. As this notion of a deſign to reſtore Popery ſpread itſelf over the kingdom, the church of England's chiefs were more attached to all the rites and ceremonies which gave moſt offenſe to ſcrupulous conſciences. Kneeling at the ſacrament, wearing the ſurplice, confirmation, keeping ſaints-days, proceſſions, bowing to the altar, and the like, which offended the Preſbyterians, as being relics of Popery; theſe things I ſay, were preſſed by the biſhops with the ſame eagerneſs as if religion muſt have fallen with them, and as if they were abſolutely neceſſary to ſalvation. This cauſed many to ſuſpect, that the obſervance of all theſe points was preſſed with deſign to pave the way for the more eaſy reception of the Popiſh tenets hereafter.

8. The heads of the church of England were not ſatisfied with zealouſly maintaining the ceremonies and rites uſed in their church ſince the Reformation but thereto made certain additions to could not by the canons be juſtified. This occaſioned all theſe matters to be conſidered as innovations tending to Popery. What Laud had done in conſecrating St. Catherine-Creed church, and in adminiſtering the Sacrament, was of this kind. When ſome complained of all this, thoſe prelates who countenanced them, alledged a ſtatute, which impowered Queen Elizabeth and her ſucceſſors, in caſe of any abuſes and indecencies in divine ſervice, to preſcribe ſuch ceremonies as they ſhould judge proper for God's glory and the decency of his worſhip. Now as his Majeſty never failed approving what was injoined by the biſhops, many ſuſpected, that the royal authority was made uſe of to ſupport theſe ſeemingly inconſiderable innovations, with deſign to take advantage of the ſame authority to juſtify alterations of far greater conſequence.

9. Laſtly, the church's little regard to tender conſciences, and her obſtinacy in refuſing to relax in any the moſt inſignificant point, as for inſtance, the ſurplice, gave occaſion to believe that theſe particulars would not be ſo zealouſly adhered to, had there not been ſome other latent deſigns.

Such (as far as I have been able to obſerve) were the grounds whereon was founded the peoples belief of a ſettled intention to introduce Popery. However, theſe are only preſumptions, whence it cannot, as I ſaid, be juſtly infered, that this belief was well-grounded. But, on the other hand, it muſt be confeſſed, that the chief prelates, who were not ignorant of the conſequences drawn from their conduct, were extremely careleſs in clearing themſelves, or in taking meaſures to remove, or at leaſt weaken theſe ſuſpicions. They regarded the Preſbyterians with the utmoſt contempt, as a ſet of ſtubborn, obſtinate, people, who, inſtead of being indulged, ought to be humbled. Nor was it ſolely on the account of religion that the Puritans ruin was judged neceſſary. They were alſo conſidered as perſons who, by the principles of their creed, were inclined to oppoſe all authority in the ſtate, as well as in the church, and conſequently they could not be kept too low. This bred between the two factions a moſt implacable enmity, which is not yet extinct. The Preſbyterians, who were under oppreſſion at the time I am ſpeaking of, had their turn afterwards, and oppreſſed, nay utterly deſtroyed the church of England. In the violent motion cauſed by this enmity, the biſhops were the firſt ſufferers. Laud loſt his head on a ſcaffold. The monarchy was ſubverted, and in its fall even the Sovereign had a bloody cataſtrophe. The church of England diſappeared for ſome time, and was, as it were, buried in the ſtate's ruins: nor was it without a wonderful providence that the monarchy and church were at length reſtored to their priſtine ſplendor.

Charles I An' 1633.

King Charles, as has been hinted, had a deſign to introduce the church of England's rites into the kirk of Scotland. This project was formed by his father King James, who had even ordered that divine ſervice ſhould be celebrated in his royal chapel at Edinburg, in the ſame manner as in his chapel at Whitehall: but, whether this order was neglected, or the Scots would not frequent the chapel, Charles thought proper not only to renew it, but likewiſe annexed diverſe particulars, to prevent the ſaid chapel's being hereafter deſerted. On the eighth of October, he ſent to the biſhop of Dunblane, dean of his chapel at Edinburg, theſe ſubſequent articles: viz.

Articles for his Majeſty's royal chapel at Edinburg. Octob. 8. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 205. Annals, p. 442.

"OUR expreſs will and pleaſure is, that the "dean of our chapel, who now is (and his "ſucceſſors) ſhall be aſſiſtant to the right reverend "father in God, the archbiſhop of St. Andrews, "at the coronation, ſo often as it ſhall happen.

"2. That the book of the form of our coro- "nation lately uſed, be put in a little box, and laid "into a ſtandard, and commited to the care of the "dean of the chapel, ſucceſſively.

It muſt be obſerved, that King Charles I's coronation had been performed according to the church of England's rituals.

"3. That there be prayers twice a day, with "the choir, as well in our abſenſe, as otherwiſe, "according to the Engliſh liturgy, 'till ſome "courſe be taken for making one which may fit "the cuſtom and conſtitution of that church.

"4. That the dean of the chapel look care- "fully, that all who received the bleſſed ſacra- "ment there, received it kneeling; and that there "be a communion held in that our chapel, the firſt "Sunday of every month.

"5. That the dean of our chapel, who now is, "and ſo ſucceſſively, come duly thither to prayers "upon Sundays, and ſuch holy-days as that "church obſerves, in his whites, and preach ſo, "whenever he preacheth there: and that he be not "abſent from thence, but upon neceſſary occaſion "of his dioceſe, or otherwiſe, according to the "courſe of his preferment.

"6. That theſe orders ſhall be our warrant to "the dean of our chapel. That the lords of our "privy council, the lords of the ſeſſions, the "advocate, clerks, writers to the ſignet, and "members of our college of juſtice, be com- "manded to receive the holy communion once "every year at leaſt, in that our chapel royal, and "kneeling, for example-ſake to the kingdom. "And we likewiſe command the dean aforeſaid, "to make report yearly to us, how we are obeyed "therein, and by whom; as alſo if any man ſhall "refuſe, in what manner he doth ſo, and why.

"7. That

CHARLES I AN' 1633.

"7. That the copies, which are conſecrated to "our uſe, be delivered to the dean, to be kept "upon inventory by him, and in a ſtandard pro- "vided for that purpoſe; and to be uſed at the "celebration of the ſacrament in our chapel "royal (1)."

Beſide theſe articles, his Majeſty wrote to the dean, ordering him to certify to the lords of the privy council, if any of thoſe appointed to communicate in his chapel royal, did not perform theſe articles, to the end ſuch order might be taken as his Majeſty, by his former letters, had appointed.

It is hence viſible that, not only the whole council of Scotland, but alſo thoſe who were in public imployments, and court-places, were prepared to conform to the church of England, otherwiſe they would not have been imployed, or continued in their poſts. It was with them Charles deſigned to begin, that, as himſelf ſaid, they might ſerve for example to the reſt. We ſhall quickly ſee what occurred when his Majeſty would have obliged the whole Scotiſh nation to a like compliance.

The communion-table placed altar-wiſe in St. Gregory's church. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 207. Annals.

While Charles was ſeeking means to ingage the Scots to a conformity with the church of England, on the contrary, no indeavors were ſpared in order to alienate from her the Preſbyterians in England, by affecting ſuch uſages and cuſtoms as were apteſt to give them offenſe. At that time, the church of England's chieftains, inſtead of undeceiving thoſe who prepoſterouſly imagined ſhe was leaning to Popery, ſeem to have taken all poſſible care to confirm their ſuſpicions, by induſtriouſly conforming to the Romiſh church in matters of ſmall moment, and without any neceſſity, as if it was done purpoſely to brave them. In October 1633, the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, as ordinaries of St. Gregory's church, which ſtood near the Cathedral, removed the communion-table from the middle of the chancel, to the upper-end, placing it there altar-wiſe: for doing which they alledged two reaſons. 1. That, in the King's chapel, and all cathedrals, the communion-tables were placed in that manner, and therefore it was fit other churches ſhould con-

Vol. I. p. 73, 74. reaſon, added to the great care taken about kneeling at the ſacrament, cauſed many to believe, that the indeavoring to inſpire ſuch extraordinary reverence for the communion-table, and the always naming it altar, was not without deſign: and therefore certain of St. Gregory's pariſhioners complained of this removal, by appeal to the court of Arches (2); but the council, having thereof notice, prevented the ſentence, by ordering the dean of the Arches to confirm, by his authority, what had been done in November 3. St. Gregory's church. Some few days after, his Majeſty being preſent in council, cauſed this affair to be debated, and, approving what the dean and chapter of St. Paul's had done, gave command that, if thoſe pariſhioners proceeded in their appeal, the dean of the Arches ſhould caſt them, and confirm the removal. This ſentence, given by the King's ſovereign authority, without waiting the judgment of that court, to whoſe cogniſance this matter properly belonged, proved a ſource of oppreſſions to many miniſters and congregations, who were not willing to comply. There was ſcarce a church in England, except the cathedrals and the King's chapel, where the communion table was placed altar-wiſe, at the upper-end of the chancel. But after his Majeſty had confirmed the removal in St. Gregory's church, the like diſputes aroſe in numberleſs places, and the high commiſſion had frequent occaſions of chaſtiſing ſuch miniſters as were ſuſpected of too little zeal for the church of England. As, ſince the Reformation, the altars were converted into communion-tables, and placed in the middle of the chancel, to avoid ſuperſtition, many imagined the tables were again changed into altars, with intent to revive a ſuperſtitious worſhip.

CHARLES I AN' 1633.

It becomes the occaſion of many ſuits.

England being then in profound peace, and almoſt wholly unconcerned in what paſſed abroad, I can ſpeak here only of domeſtic affairs. It is very true that each, taken ſingly, may ſeem of ſmall conſequence, but all together may ſerve to ſhew King Charles's character, his court's genius, the conduct of his magiſtrates and, in general, the cauſes of that terrible revolution, whereof lord Clarendon has given the hiſtory.

AN' 1634. Pryn informed againſt in the ſtar-chamber. Febr. 7. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 220, &c State-Trials. Annals, p. 446.

February 1634, was ſolemnly heard in the ſtar-chamber, a cauſe which made a great noiſe, and which ſhewed the extreme ſeverity of that court againſt ſuch as were ſuſpected not to be ſubmiſſive enough to the government. The caſe was this. Mr. William Pryn * had compiled and printed a large quarto volume, of more than a thouſand pages, intitled, Hiſtrio-Maſtix. The author's main drift was to demonſtrate that ſtage-plays, balls, maſques, &c. were unlawful and anti-chriſtian: but, in treating his ſubject, he had interperſed ſundry reflections, applicable to the King, the Queen, and the church, who approved or tolerated theſe abuſes. It was pretended, his aim in general was to ſhew, there was a deſign to reduce religion to a kind of Paganiſm, in order to make way for Popery. This outrage was repreſented by the King's council in the blackeſt colors they could poſſibly give it. Finally, after a ſolemn hearing of three days, the book was condemned to be burned by the common hangman, a thing 'till then unuſual in England. As for the author, ſentence paſſed upon him, that he ſhould be expelled Lincoln's-Inn, diſabled to practiſe, degraded of his degree in the univerſity †, ſet on the pillory, have his ears cut off, impriſoned during life, and fined five thouſand pounds. The publiſher, who was likewiſe printer of the book, was fined five hundred pounds, and the chaplain who licenſed it, fifty pounds.

Wrong policy of the court in oppreſſing the Puritans.

This ſentence, to diſintereſted perſons, ſeemed exorbitantly rigid. It more particularly mortified the Preſbyterians of whom the majority agreed with Pryn in principles. They could not help perceiving, in the ſeverity exerciſed upon this writer, a malicious deſign to diſgrace their ſect, and oppreſs them on all occaſions. The truth is, the Preſbyterian party, tho' very numerous, as plainly appeared afterwards, labored then under oppreſſion. They had againſt them, the King, the miniſters, the council, the ſtar-chamber, the high-commiſſion, the church of England's chiefs, the Arminians, the Papiſts, the lord-lieutenants of the counties, the judges, and generally all the magiſtrates: nevertheleſs they gained ground daily. This would ſeem incredible, was it not conſidered, that thoſe at court themſelves were the main cauſers of this ſect's increaſe. The court looked on as Puritans all who did not ſhew ſubmiſſion enough to the King, or would not allow ſufficient extent to the prerogative royal, and, by oppreſſing them as ſuch, or by refuſing them all kinds of imployments, ingaged them unavoidably to ſide with the Preſbyterians. As King Charles's pretenſions, with regard to government, were not approved by the majority of the nation, it gradually occurred, that almoſt all England became Preſbyterian, according to the ſenſe given to that term by the courtiers and their partiſans; tho' it is certain there were in the Preſbyterian party multitudes who were very well-affected to the church of England, but could not allow the King's principles concerning government. This party therefore, tho' continually oppreſſed, grew daily more numerous, waiting with patience for a parliament, where they were almoſt ſure of finding protectors: but at the time we are now upon, there was no appearance of Charles's deſigning to call a parliament. As nothing conſtrained him to it, he took care not to expoſe himſelf to the ill humors of a houſe of commons, and hazard ſeeing revived thoſe complaints which had obliged him to diſſolve the three preceding parliaments.

Ship-money ſet on foot.

Moſt certain it is that, in governing without a parliament, Charles debared himſelf of the extraordinary grants uſually received thence by Sovereigns; but he believed not that applying to the houſe of commons was the ſole means of obtaining extraordinary ſupplies. He had, by the lord keeper, expreſly told the parliament, and frequently intimated himſelf, that he could find money without the aſſiſtance of parliaments: and yet, the petition of right having intervened ſince that time, and having, by his anſwer, bound himſelf not to raiſe any tax without the conſent of both houſes, he by that anſwer ſeemed to be deprived of all methods which, before the petition was preſented, he had imagined might be legally put in practiſe. But expedients to evade the moſt ſolemn promiſes are ſeldom wanting to men in power. On ſuch occaſions, there are miniſters and counſellors who inſinuate to their maſters, that promiſes made by Sovereigns bind no farther than they think proper. William Noy, attorney-general, who was one of theſe daring counſellors, laſt year, furniſhed his Majeſty with a method of raiſing the extraordinary ſupply he wanted, without a parliament's concurrence. This was, by impoſing a tax upon the people, under color of maintaining a certain number of ſhips to guard the ſeas. But this bold counſellor died before he had ſeen the effects of his advice; tho' not 'till he had unhappily ingaged his Prince in a buſineſs which for ever deprived him of his peoples confidence, and was one of the main cauſes of his ruin (1).

Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 246, 247. Annals. Coke.

The attorney-general's death prevented not Charles's puting his advice in practiſe. To that purpoſe he directed, to the mayors and head officers of the maritime towns, writs to much the ſame effect with this, directed to the mayor of London (2), viz.

But theſe pretenſions of the Londoners were not capable of inducing King Charles to deſiſt from his reſolve. We ſhall, on the contrary find, that this tax, which was at firſt peculiar to the maritime towns, was impoſed on the whole kingdom (1).

Laud's injunction to the Walloon and French churches. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 206, 272, 293, 314, 321, Annals. Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 83.

After Laud's promotion to the archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, his zeal for the church of England and againſt the Preſbyterians, ſeemed to be much increaſed. By his Majeſty's order, he held a private correſpondence with the biſhops of Scotland, concerning the liturgy and canons deſigned to be introduced into the kirk, and whereon we ſhall preſently treat more amply. It now ſuffices to ſay, that it was he who was charged with the conduct and execution of this project: but his labors were not confined ſolely to the converſion of the Scots, nor even to that of the Engliſh Preſbyterians. The Dutch, the Walloons, the French, who, ſince the reign of Edward VI, had taken refuge in England, obtained from the preceding Sovereigns diverſe immunities, and particularly the liberty of celebrating divine ſervice after their manner, that is, the Preſbyterian, and formed ſeveral congregations both in London and other parts of the kingdom. But Laud could not bear they ſhould any longer injoy this privilege: and therefore ſent them theſe two injunctions, having firſt ſecured King Charles's approbation and conſent.

Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIX. 583.

" 1. That all the natives of the Dutch and Wal- " loon congregations, in his grace's dioceſe, ſhould " repair to their ſeveral pariſh-churches of thoſe " ſeveral pariſhes where they inhabited, to hear " divine ſervice and ſermons, and perform all du- " ties and payments required in that behalf.

" 2. That the miniſters, and all other of the " Dutch and Walloon congregations, who were " not natives and born ſubjects to the King's Ma- " jeſty, or any other ſtrangers who ſhould come " over to them, while they remained ſtrangers, " might have and uſe their own diſcipline, as for- " merly they have done; yet it was thought fit, " that the Engliſh liturgy ſhould be tranſlated " into French and Dutch, for the better ſet- " tling of their children to the Engliſh govern- " ment."

Beſide that he, by theſe injunctions, impoſed upon theſe foreign churches a liturgy which they did not approve, and in a manner quite annihilated the ſaid congregations, ſince he excluded all who were born in the kingdom, that is, all the deſcendants of ſuch as had fled hither in the reign of Edward VI, and conſequently there could be but very few remaining of thoſe born abroad.

Hereupon the Dutch * churches at Norwich preſented a petition to the biſhop of that dioceſe, remonſtrating, that the archbiſhop's injunctions were contrary, not only to ſeveral orders of the council formerly given in favor of their congregations, but alſo to the privileges granted them when they firſt ſettled in England, and continued to them during the reigns of Edward VI, Queen Elizabeth, and James I, and confirmed alſo by his preſent Majeſty's royal promiſe. The biſhop of Norwich not returning a favorable anſwer to their petition, they applied to the archbiſhop himſelf, who anſwered in writing; that his Majeſty was determined his in-

An' 1635.

Thus argued the prelate in juſtification of ſuch a breach of the privilege granted to theſe congregations, and confirmed by four Kings, of whom his preſent Majeſty was one, urging his Majeſty's, or rather his own ſole will and pleaſure. It was manifeſt, that the King's good pleaſure on which he laid ſo much ſtreſs, was rather his approbation of what the archbiſhop had undertaken, than a warrant to undertake it. The Preſbyterians, having no other way to be revenged on his ſaid grace, publiſhed ſeveral libels againſt him, taking notice of all the innovations he had brought into the church, pretending they were ſo many ſteps towards Popery. They forgot not to upbraid him with the pictures he had fixed in the windows of his chapel at Lambeth, particularly that of God the Father, in the form of a little old man. They obſerved ſeveral other particulars, whereof this prelate was afterwards accuſed by the houſe of commons: but this is not the proper place to ſpeak of this impeachment, or of the archbiſhop's defenſe.

Reproaches againſt the archbiſhop. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 273.

Informations againſt ſuch as reſide in London, contrary to the King's proclamation. Id. p. 288. Annals.

Charles, ever neceſſitous, imployed his miniſters in deviſing means to raiſe money. In the beginning of 1635, the attorney-general preſented informations in the ſtar-chamber againſt ſeveral hundreds of perſons, peers, knights, gentlemen, ladies, and others, for diſobeying his Majeſty's proclamation, commanding them not to reſide in London. I meet not with the ſentence given upon theſe informations, but in all probability, conſidering the ſtar-chamber's zeal to ſupport his Majeſty's royalty, the parties accuſed eſcaped not without being fined.

Ship-money laid upon the whole kingdom. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIX. 658, 670. Ruſhworth.

The tax to provide and maintain a certain number of ſhips to guard the ſeas, was impoſed in 1634, for the year 1635, only on the maritime towns: but in 1635, Charles diſpatched away his writs for ſhip-money all over the kingdom for the year 1636 (2). The reaſon or rather pretenſe of this general impoſt was, that the kingdom was in great danger, on account of the league lately concluded between France and the Netherlands. Tho' there was no appearance how this league, which was not againſt England, could put the kingdom in danger, nevertheleſs King Charles infered, that the two moſt formidable naval powers being united, it was abſolutely neceſſary that England ſhould have a ſtrong fleet to preſerve the dominion of the ſea, otherwiſe ſhe might be inſulted, and her trade diſturbed. This tax being impoſed by virtue of the prerogative-royal, ſeveral private perſons refuſed paying the ſums whereat they were rated: nay ſome even ſued the magiſtrates and other officers appointed to levy the money, aſſerting, that the ſubject could be taxed only by act of parliament. This oppoſition was the reaſon that, in the year 1636, ſhip-money ſcarce exceeded two hundred thouſand pounds *, tho' much larger ſums were expected by his Majeſty. Mean while Charles, conſidering that, by means of this tax, he ſhould have a ſettled revenue, beſide that it would be a precedent to make uſe of his prerogative on other occaſions, reſolved to ſupport his project at all events: but to guard it againſt all objections of being illegal, and contrary to his anſwer to the petition of right, he deſired to make appearance of being authoriſed on this occaſion to exert his prerogative. To that end, he ſent to the judges of the realm, and required their opinion concerning his right of levying this tax. As the judges depended wholly on the court, they very readily decided in favor of the King, and gave him their opinion in writing: but Charles thought not proper to publiſh their determination, being ſatisfied with keeping it private 'till occaſion of uſing it ſhould offer. This will appear in the ſequel: but we muſt firſt treat of ſome other paſſages which intervened during this interval.

Charles requires the judges opinion concerning this matter.

This year 1635, King Charles renewed a former commiſſion to confirm defective titles to ſuch as held lands of the crown. He pretended this to be a mere act of grace, and that his ſole aim was to ſecure the poſſeſſion of lands to thoſe who held them by diſputable titles: nevertheleſs, this commiſſion was regarded as a manifeſt oppreſſion: for, under color of examining defective titles, all the proprietors were obliged to produce their titles, to which, how valid ſoever they might be, the commiſſioners made objections: ſo, to avoid a law-ſuit with the King, wherein, conſidering the judges diſpoſition, they were ſure of being caſt, the proprietors were forced to compound, and give money to ſecure their lands, which were otherwiſe in danger of returning to the crown.

His Majeſty ſoon after iſſued a proclamation, commanding all perſons, except ſoldiers, mariners, merchants, and their factors, not to depart the kingdom without his licenſe. Several of the Engliſh Sovereigns had, on ſome particular occaſions, iſſued a like injunction, but it was doubted whether ſuch a prohibition was neceſſary when this proclamation was publiſhed.

The villanies and abuſes of informers, I mean perſons who watched peoples actions, in order to accuſe them in caſe they infringed the laws, were become ſo inſufferably exorbitant, that the King was forced, if not utterly to aboliſh them, at leaſt, to qualify them by certain directions, whereto he injoined ſtrict obſervance.

Diverſe ſuits about altars. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 300, 301. Annals.

The Preſbyterians were ſtill moleſted on every occaſion, or whenever they gave their adverſaries ſome advantage, thro' exceſs of zeal, which was not always well regulated. Samuel Ward, a miniſter in Ipſwich, boldly preached againſt the King's book of ſports, and alſo ſaid, "That the church "of England was ready to ring changes in re-"ligion." For this he was ſuſpended by the high-commiſſion, and afterwards impriſoned for refuſing to make a public recantation. The church-wardens of Beckington, in Somerſetſhire, refuſing to place the communion-table otherwiſe than it had been for ſixty years, were by the biſhop of Bath and Wells excommunicated. Theſe men appealed to the Arches, but their appeal was rejected. Then they petitioned his Majeſty, but with as little ſucceſs. So the church-wardens lay a whole year under excommunication, and were afterwards ſhut up in the common jail, whence they were at length releaſed by the biſhop, on their public ſubmiſſion and penance. It would be too tedious to relate all the actions which were entered in the high-commiſſion upon the two juſt-mentioned articles. It ſuffices to obſerve, that the number was exceſſive, and the high-commiſſion always moſt rigorouſly chaſtiſed ſuch as dared to ſwerve from what the church preſcribed.

Laud deſigns to viſit the univerſities. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 324. Laud's Diar. Annals.

On the other hand, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, ever zealous for the church of England, conſidered as Puritans all who neglected the leaſt rite or ceremony of that church. This prelate, being informed of ſome remiſneſs in the two univerſities, could not ſuffer ſuch a flagrant abuſe. There were at Cambridge three chapels where divine ſervice was daily performed, tho' they had never been conſecrated. This neglect, which in his eyes appeared ſo blameable, exciting his zeal, he reſolved to viſit the univerſities, as metropolitan. He met with ſome oppoſition, the univerſities maintaining, that he had not the right of viſiting as archbiſhop, tho' they did not deny he might viſit by the King's commiſſion, if his Majeſty was pleaſed to appoint him. But, not being ſatisfied with a borrowed power, he brought the caſe before the King, who decided it in his favor, after having himſelf ſupported the prelate's reaſons with arguments, and anſwered the univerſities objections. The archbiſhop being ſo well ſupported, could not fail of obtaining the victory.

Proclamation to forbid foreigners to fiſh on the Britiſh coaſt. May 10. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 322. Annals, p. 476.

King Charles, as I obſerved, being determined on continuing the tax for maintenance of thoſe ſhips alloted to guard the ſeas, and having laſt year given orders for levying it this year, 1636, was obliged to ſeek a pretenſe for arming a navy. This tax, termed by the Engliſh, ſhip-money, and which for ſhortneſs I ſhall term ſo hence forwards, was grounded on the neceſſity of guarding the ſeas. But none could perceive the danger whereto, as his Majeſty alledged, England was expoſed by the alliance between France and the United Netherlands. To this pretenſe therefore was to be added that of preſerving the dominion of the narrow ſeas. Charles accordingly iſſued a proclamation, declaring, "Whereas King James did, in the ſeventh year "of his reign, ſet forth a proclamation touching "fiſhing; whereby all perſons, of what nation or "quality ſoever (being not his natural-born ſub-"jects) were reſtrained from fiſhing upon any of "the coaſts and ſeas of Great Britain, Ireland, "and the reſt of the iſles adjacent, until they had "orderly obtained licenſes in that behalf. Since "which time, neither the King his father, nor "himſelf have made any conſiderable execution "of the ſaid proclamation, but have expected a "voluntary conformity thereto. But now finding, "by experience, that all the inconveniencies which "occaſioned that proclamation are rather increaſed "than abated, and his Majeſty, well knowing how "far he is obliged in honor to maintain the rights "of his crown, has thought it neceſſary to renew "the aforeſaid reſtraint of fiſhing, and to declare, "that his reſolution is to keep ſuch a competent "ſtrength of ſhiping upon his ſeas, as may be "ſufficient both to hinder farther incroachments "upon his regalities, and aſſiſt and protect thoſe "his good friends and allies, who ſhall henceforth, "with licenſe, indeavor to take benefit of fiſhing "upon his coaſts."

CHARLES I AN' 1636.

Theſe friends were the Hollanders, who came every year and fiſhed for herrings on the coaſt of Scotland. It was therefore manifeſt that, after thirty years forbearance, he ſought a quarrel with the Dutch, only to have occaſion to fit out a fleet, which ſerved for pretext to impoſe the tax of ſhip-money. This quarrel produced the two famous treatiſes, intitled Mare Liberum, and Mare Clauſum, the former compoſed by Grotius, the latter by Selden. But Charles regarded not arguments drawn from hiſtory, or ancient treaties between the two nations; he made uſe of a more effectual method, viz. a fleet under conduct of Algernoon earl of Northumberland. This fleet attacking the diſperſed fiſhers, who little expected it, and ſinking ſome, forced the reſidue to retire into Engliſh harbors as the ſafeſt retreat, and in ſhort, to give Charles thirty thouſand florins, for permiſſion to continue their fiſhing that ſummer (2).

Not long after, his Majeſty alſo raiſed thirty thouſand pounds by a commiſſion, to inquire concerning depopulations and converſions of arable lands to paſture, ſince the tenth year of Queen Elizabeth (3). There were many offenders of this kind, and ſo heavy a fine was impoſed in the ſtar-chamber on ſir Anthony Roper, that the reſt, to avoid a like treatment, ſpeedily compounded with his Majeſty.

But ſhip-money was the moſt important article, and as ſuch regarded at court. The King neither would nor could depart from it, on three main accounts. Firſt, becauſe he ſhould be deprived of a very conſiderable aid, which he deſigned to render fixed and cuſtomary. Secondly, in deſiſting from this tax, after levying it two years ſucceſſively, he would have given cauſe to believe he had no power to impoſe it, and conſequently had acted illegally. Thirdly, being determined never more to call a parliament, it highly concerned him to eſtabliſh his prerogative in ſuch a manner that none ſhould dare to conteſt it. So the city of London, having petitioned the board, that the twenty ſhips they were rated at, might be reduced to ten, received a very ſharp anſwer, to this purport.

To that end, the lord keeper having aſſembled all the judges in the ſtar-chamber, told them, the King was very well pleaſed with their indeavors, in their ſeveral circuits, to perſuade his ſubjects to pay ſhip-money; but however, his Majeſty, hearing that ſome refuſed to pay this tax, had thought fit to have recourſe to their advice for his direction in this caſe, and had commanded him to publiſh their opinions for the ſatisfaction of his ſubjects. " might plead ignorance. That however, it was " not his Majeſty's purpoſe to ſtop the actions or " ſuits which have been, or ſhould be brought con- " cerning this matter, but only to prevent ſuch as " ſhould bring their action from being ſurpriſed". He concluded with ſaying, " If any contrary opi- " nion ſhould yet remain among men, it muſt " proceed from thoſe who are ſons of the law, or " from ſome not towards the law. And as to the " former, you the judges of the realm, are and ever " have been accounted the fathers of the law, then " will it ill become the ſon to diſpute againſt, or " take upon him to be wiſer than the father".

Remark on this matter.

We may readily comprehend, that the artifice of thoſe queſtions, propoſed to the judges, lay in the ſuppoſition of ſome great danger the kingdom was in, for inſtance, a ſudden and unexpected invaſion, which moſt certainly was not then the caſe: nevertheleſs, on the bare poſſibility of ſuch extraordinary peril, King Charles eſtabliſhed a principle which gave him power to impoſe not only ſhip-money, but any other tax he ſhould pleaſe for the future. The judges prevarication conſiſted in that, feigning not to ſee the artifice of thoſe queſtions, they without examination admited his Majeſty's ſuppoſition, and decided this nice point on the foundation of ſome extraordinary and unforeſeen emergency, which was not indeed impoſſible. However, two of the judges, viz. Hutton and Crooke, joined not in opinion with the others: yet were they prevailed on to ſign like their brethren, by the conſideration of its being the opinion of the Body. Let it be farther obſerved, that the order to enter the judges determination in the courts of juſtice, and to publiſh it thro' all parts of the realm, was very extraordinary, ſince thereby the King pretended to make it a ſort of law, whereby the courts were to proceed in judging ſuch ſuits as might afterwards be commenced on this buſineſs. This had never been practiſed, but with regard to parliamentary ſtatutes.

Hampden's proſecution. Idem p. 480, &c. State Trials. Vol. I. Annals. p. 482,608.

After theſe precautions, King Charles deemed himſelf ſufficiently authoriſed to order proſecutions againſt ſuch as refuſed paying ſhip-money. He imagined none would be ſo daringly obſtinate as to mantain a refuſal before judges who had already declared their opinion, and could not give a contrary judgment, without rendering themſelves ridiculous. There was however a gentleman, who being perſuaded, notwithſtanding the judges determination, that ſhip-money was illegal, and contrary to the petition of right, reſolved to ſtand the ſhock, and refuſe to pay the ſaid impoſt. Mr. Hampden of Buckinghamſhire was the man, who being rated at twenty * ſhillings, choſe rather to be caſt at law than pay voluntarily. This caſe was argued in the exchequer chamber, before all the judges of England, who were ſent for to render the judgment more ſolemn and authentic. Tho' the point was only to decide, whether Mr. Hampden ſhould pay twenty ſhillings or not, it nevertheleſs was the moſt important cauſe had ever been argued in any court of judicature. The matter in queſtion was, to determine, whether the King had power to tax his ſubjects without the parliament's concurrence, and whether the people were obliged to pay taxes ſo impoſed. Accordingly, his Majeſty's and Mr. Hampden's counſel did, on this occaſion, diſplay whatever wit, learning, knowledge of the laws, ſolidity of reaſoning, ſubtilty and chicanry, are capable of producing. There were ſome who pleaded four days together. Doubtleſs, it is ſcarce expected I ſhould inſert here all the arguments alledged on both ſides, in this ſo celebrated a diſpute; wherefore I ſhall content my ſelf with ſuccinctly giving a general idea of this matter.

* Not ten, as M. Rapin has it.

The King's counſel maintained, That his Majeſty was head of the ſtate, and obliged to protect it when in danger: that this danger might be ſuch as required immediate remedy. Hence they infered, that what was alledged in favor of the laws was not to the purpoſe, ſince caſes might occur where it was impracticable to obſerve them; conſequently their execution was reſtrained by neceſſity, and, in theſe caſes of neceſſity, the King had abſolute power to impoſe taxes for the kingdom's defenſe, for which they urged diverſe precedents in former reigns. They added, as the people were not called to the King's council to give their opinion, whether there was or was not a neceſſity to impoſe taxes for the nation's defenſe, it followed, that his Majeſty, by his council's advice, was the ſole judge: that the King having, in this preſent caſe, deemed it requiſite, he might lawfully impoſe ſhip-money, and his ſubjects could not refuſe paying it, without incurring the guilt of diſobedience.

CHARLES I AN' 1636.

Summary of the argument on both ſides.

The counſel for Mr. Hampden acknowledged his Majeſty for head of the ſtate, and that it was incumbent on him to defend it; but withal maintained, that the law had provided means to put the realm in a ſtate of ſafety, by inveſting the King's perſon with ſundry privileges which were for that purpoſe. For inſtance, the right of being aſſiſted by the poſſeſſors of the crown-fees, of arming the cinque-ports, fines, confiſcations, tunage and poundage, and other cuſtoms of which he was actually in poſſeſſion, and which he had himſelf declared to be deſigned for defenſe of the ſeas. Laſtly, ſuppoſing and allowing all theſe means to be exhauſted, the King had another infallible way, which was to call a parliament, and demand a ſupply for all extraordinary occaſions.

But the King's counſel chiefly inſiſted on the poſſibility of ſuch ſudden and unforeſeen caſes as would not afford time to call a parliament. This was their main argument, and the ſole foundation of the advantages they pretended to draw from the precedents of former reigns. Tho' the principles they would have eſtabliſhed tended to put it in the King's power to impoſe taxes whenever he pleaſed, they durſt not however aſſert it in plain terms, but limited his power to caſes of neceſſity, whereof they nevertheleſs would have his Majeſty alone to be judge, which indeed came to the very ſame amount.

To this Mr. Hampden's counſel replied: 1. Theſe caſes were very rare, and granting his Majeſty had a power, in ſuch caſes, to impoſe extraordinary taxes, this neceſſity ought to be very evident. 2. His Majeſty, on ſuch a ſuppoſition, having exacted loans from his ſubjects, the parliament had declared them void, and the King, in his anſwer to the petition of right, acknowledged he had no power to demand them. 3. At this preſent juncture, there was no cauſe to apprehend any ſudden invaſion, ſince his Majeſty was in peace with all his neighbors. 4. The King himſelf did not think the danger imminent, ſince the writs ſent to the counties to fit out ſhips being dated the ſeventh of Auguſt, theſe ſhips were not to be at Portſmouth 'till the firſt of March following, and conſequently even his Majeſty was of opinion there was ſeven months time to prevent the danger, in which ſpace a parliament might eaſily be aſſembled.

I ſhall not any longer dwell on this topic, which would lead me too far, ſhould I relatet he objections, anſwers and replies of both parties. It ſuffices to make this general remark, that the counſel for Mr. Hampden pleaded expreſs laws, " Magna " Charta", the ſubſequent ſtatutes, and the petition of right. The King's counſel inſiſted chiefly on precedents and inſtances deduced from ſome former reigns, and on the impoſſibility, in certain caſes, cafes, of ſtrictly obſerving the laws: whence they infered, that the laws were not ſo general, but that they were limited by extraordinary caſes, and his Majeſty, being bound to defend the ſtate, ought to be the ſole judge of ſuch caſes. I find not that they indeavored to prove the kingdom to have then actually been in one of theſe extraordinary caſes, or in imminent danger.

Charles I An' 1636.

Hampden caſt.

The cauſe having been many days debated, from the begining of November 'till Chriſtmaſs, and in the following terms, 'till May and June, judgment was given againſt Mr. Hampden, and he was condemned to pay the ſum he was taxed at. Thence forwards, no one would have recourſe to the law, ſince it would have been in vain, after ſo ſolemn a judgment (1).

King Charles's deſigns touching Scotland.

While indeavors were uſing in England to carry the prerogative-royal higher than ever, King Charles finally determined to execute the project he had formed with regard to Scotland, viz. to reduce the kirk to a perfect conformity with the church of England. This ſcheme was laid by King James, at his acceſſion to the crown of England: nay, before he left Scotland he had found means to reſtore epiſcopacy, as will preſently be evident. From that time, the biſhops were always protected and countenanced by James I, and Charles I, who gained the parliaments to their intereſt, and moreover exerted their prerogative in favor of the prelates; for with them the execution of their deſign was to begin. As the troubles which this affair occaſioned in Scotland, were the main cauſes of King Charles I's misfortunes and ruin, I think it indiſpenſibly neceſſary to trace them to their origin, and the rather, as they had great influence on the affairs of England. Beſide, tho' many foreign writers have treated of the differences between Charles I, and his Scotiſh ſubjects, I know not of any who has undertaken to explain this matter clearly, or handled it with impartiality.

The ſtate of epiſcopacy in Scotland from the reformation 1637.

The reformation was received in Scotland, by public authority, in the reign of Queen Mary, 1560, juſt before King Francis II's deceaſe, and while the Queen his widow was yet in France. The firſt who imbraced the reformed religion in Scotland, under the former reigns, were much perſecuted, even to the time I have been ſpeaking of, and yet their number failed not increaſing daily.

The prelates deemed themſelves bound in conſcience to perſecute the Reformed. They were at once their adverſaries and judges, and conſequently it was in a manner impoſſible but this conduct ſhould draw on them the ſufferers implacable hatred. Accordingly, the ſtates decree to admit the reformation had no ſooner paſſed than the biſhops loſt all their credit and authority. Very certainly, the plan whereon the new church's government was at firſt ſettled, was not any way favorable to epiſcopacy, but it was reſolved to conform to the Swiſs churches diſcipline. The Reformed had a too great averſion for biſhops to remain under their yoke, eſpecially as very few prelates agreed to the late alterations in religion. All done in their favor was, the council ordered that ſuch as would imbrace the reformation ſhould injoy their revenues, on condition they would maintain miniſters. This plainly ſhews that, tho' their revenues were left them, there was no intention to continue in their hands the church's government. It was not ſo in England, when the reformation was received in Edward VI's reign. Far from being prejudiced againſt biſhops, the Engliſh, on the contrary, could not but own it was by means of the leading prelates that the reformation was eſtabliſhed. There was therefore no motive, either of hatred or policy, to incline the Engliſh to throw of epiſcopal government, tho' they ſhould be ſuppoſed to conſider it as a matter of indifferency. But in Scotland, paſſions, policy and reaſon it ſelf required a deliverance from the yoke of biſhops, of whom the majority, to the very utmoſt of their ability, oppoſed the reformation. Thus were eſtabliſhed preſbyteries and national ſynods, or general aſſemblies, and to their care was commited the ſettling of church diſcipline.

Charles I An' 1636.

Originally, thoſe general aſſemblies had, or perhaps uſurped, a very great authority. It was even neceſſary their power ſhould be great, to inable them to defend the reformation againſt the inceſſant attacks of its adverſaries. Queen Mary, who arrived ſoon after in Scotland, was a zealous Papiſt, and many of the prime nobility were of like ſentiments: ſo the Romiſh faction was ſtill very ſtrong, and in condition to obſtruct the reformation's progreſs. On the other hand, the general aſſembly, then conſiſting wholly of miniſters, vigorouſly ſupported the new creed, ſpite of the Catholic party's moſt ſtrenuous efforts. Mean while, notwithſtanding the Reformed ardently labored to aboliſh epiſcopacy by public authority, they could not obtain of the parliament any expreſs act for that purpoſe. At length, in 1566, the general aſſembly ſolemnly approved the diſcipline of the Swiſs church, and of a parity among the miniſters. This was ſufficient to overthrow at once the ſpiritual power of the biſhops, but not to deprive them of their temporal privileges: ſo, from the year 1561, to Queen Mary's depoſition in 1567, the biſhops ſtate and condition were very uncertain. They injoyed their revenues, ſat in parliaments, but their ſpiritual juriſdiction was acknowledged by few, tho' they labored for its preſervation. The general aſſembly had declared for the Preſbyterian government, but the parliament was not yet come to any deciſion. Mean while, the prelates were in a very indifferent and dubious ſituation, ſince the people, who highly venerated the general aſſembly, could not, after they had been condemned there, acknowledge them for paſtors. Thus, nothwithſtanding their ſpiritual authority was not expreſly abrogated by the parliament, it was, as I may ſay, reduced to nothing, ſince they could not exerciſe it, the general aſſembly directing all eccleſiaſtical affairs. This has occaſioned warm controverſies about epiſcopacy, ſome affirming it to have been utterly aboliſhed in Scotland, and others, that it always ſubſiſted. One cannot but wonder at a diſpute about a fact of this nature, and it is no leſs ſurpriſing that the parliament of Scotland ſhould, for upwards of thirty years, have delayed uſing their authority to ſettle the church government. It is therefore abſolutely requiſite to explain the reaſon; otherwiſe it would be difficult to comprehend what occasioned the troubles of Scotland, whereof we muſt neceſſarily treat ſomewhat largely. But before we deſcend to particulars, it will be needful to obſerve, that we muſt carefully diſtinguiſh the benefice from the office of a biſhop. By the benefice, I mean the revenues, lands, honors, privileges, in a word, all the temporalities annexed to the epiſcopal dignity. By the office I underſtand the ſpiritual juriſdiction and functions of a biſhop. If this diſtinction be not always borne in memory, it will not be poſſible to form a clear idea of the diſputes upon this ſubject.

Nalſon, p. 140.

It is certain that, from the year 1560, when the reformation was eſtabliſhed in Scotland, to the year 1569, the church of that kingdom was governed by Preſbyteries, Dioceſan and Provincial Synods, General Aſſemblies, and that they even appointed ſuperintendants, who continued 'till the year 1575. It is no leſs certain, that the general aſſemblies condemned and rejected epiſcopal government above thirty years, and, during that time, conſtantly demanded and earneſtly ſollicited the abolition of epiſcopacy, with reſpect both to temporals and ſpirituals. Nevertheleſs, from the begining of the reformation, 'till 1592, no expreſs act of parliament could be obtained, either for or againſt epiſcopacy, or to approve or reject the Preſbyterian government, if we except the interval between the years 1571 and 1575, of which mention ſhall be made hereafter.

Had the general aſſemblies confined their demands to the aboliſhing epiſcopacy, as to the ſpiritual functions, very probably, they would eaſily have obtained it: but after abolition of the epiſcopal office as far as in them lay, they were not ſatisfied with deſiring that their acts might be confirmed by parliament, but demanded alſo the name of biſhop might be aboliſhed, and the biſhops deprived of all temporal honors and privileges in general, as the right of ſiting in parliament, &c. But the court always oppoſed it ſtrenuouſly, becauſe the biſhopricks and abbies being filled by the King, he could almoſt depend on as many votes in parliament as there were biſhops and abbots. For the ſame reaſon, the court, by ſecret practiſes, hindered the parliament from paſſing any act to eſtabliſh Preſbytery, and to abrogate the ſpiritual juriſdiction of biſhops, becauſe it was perceived that this would tend to deprive them of their temporal honors. Not but that, in the actual practiſe of the church, Epiſcopacy was really aboliſhed, and Preſbytery eſtabliſhed; but however, as long as there was no expreſs act to aboliſh epiſcopacy, the biſhops and abbots could not be prevented from voting in parliament, which was a great advantage to the court: ſo the name and title of biſhops and abbots ſtill ſubſiſted. They held the lands annexed to their predeceſſors, tho' the office had actually ceaſed. This is ſo true, with reſpect to the abbots, as not to admit any diſpute. The abbies were in the poſſeſſion of laics, who ſat in parliament by the name and title of abbots. As to the biſhops, the matter is not ſo clear, becauſe the title of biſhop was confered on eccleſiaſtics. Had the court beſtowed the biſhopricks on laics, it would have given too much advantage to the general aſſembly, who deſired nothing more than a plauſible pretenſe to preſs the abolition of prelates temporalities. This demonſtrates that one may rationally affirm, there were, and were not, at the ſame time, biſhops in Scotland. Scotland had biſhops, if we conſider its having perſons ſo ſtiled, who held the lands and revenues of the Sees, and who, as ſuch, had a ſeat in parliament. It had none, with reſpect to the ſpiritual functions, which were aboliſhed by the general aſſembly's decrees, and by actual practiſe, tho' not expreſly repealed by parliament. All objections, replications, &c. in this diſpute, wholly turn upon the confuſion of the ſpiritual and temporal ſtates of the biſhops. Some very manifeſtly prove epiſcopacy to have all along ſubſiſted in Scotland, provided they confine the meaning of that word to temporals: but their proofs, with regard to ſpirituals, are extremely defective. Others evidently ſhew, that epiſcopacy was aboliſhed as to the ſpiritual functions, by virtue of acts paſſed by the general aſſembly. But they cannot prove it was aboliſhed, with reſpect to the temporal privileges, ſince the parliament had not yet made any deciſion. As neither can produce any expreſs act of parliament, at leaſt 'till ſuch a time, they alledge ſome from whence they indeavor to draw inferences to their advantage. But this requires a farther explication. For the readier comprehending this matter, we muſt neceſſarily diſtinguiſh the various circumſtances of Scotland from the reformation's original introduction, viz. in the reign of Mary; in that of James VI, during his minority; under the ſame Prince after aſſuming the government, according to the ſeveral miniſters or favorites, by whoſe counſels he was directed; and laſtly, under the ſame King James after his acceſſion to England: during all which time the biſhops ſtate and ſituation depended on the intereſts of thoſe who were in the adminiſtration.

Queen Mary's reign laſted 'till the year 1567. This Princeſs was a zealous Catholic, and yet, ſo long as her natural brother, the earl of Murray, had any credit with her, the reformation was not attacked: but, towards the cloſe of her government, under Bothwel's adminiſtration, the general aſſembly loſt ground. However, in 1566, they made the above-cited decree, to approve of the Swiſs church's diſcipline, and of a parity among the miniſters, which intirely deſtroyed epiſcopacy. But Mary, regardleſs of this decree, openly reſtored the archbiſhoprick of St. Andrew's, notwithſtanding the aſſembly's oppoſition.

The interval from the depoſing Queen Mary, in 1567, to 1573, was a time of troubles and diſcord, under the adminiſtration of diverſe regents, whoſe authority was not firmly eſtabliſhed; ſo that it was very difficult for the parliament effectually to ſettle eccleſiaſtical diſcipline. All can be ſaid is, that they rejected not what the general aſſembly had eſtabliſhed, tho' they did not thereto actually conſent. On the other hand, in 1572 and 1573, the regent, for ſome private views, cauſed ſome acts to be paſſed in favor of epiſcopacy, but which were afterwards repealed. Theſe were the acts, viz.

By the firſt, which is the forty-ſixth of the parliament held in 1572, it is declared, "The archbiſhops and biſhops have the authority, and are ordained to convene and deprive all inferior perſons, being miniſters, who ſhall not ſubſcribe the articles of religion, and give their oath for acknowledging and recognoſcing our ſovereign Lord and his authority, and bring a teſtimonial in writing thereupon, within a month after their admiſſion." Nalſon, p. 141.

By the forty-eighth act of the ſame parliament, it is declared, "That archbiſhops and biſhops have authority at their viſitations to deſign miniſters glebes."

By the fifty-fourth of the ſaid parliament, "archbiſhops and biſhops were authoriſed to nominate and appoint, at their viſitations, perſons in every parochin for making and ſeting the taxation, for upholding and repairing kirks and kirkyards, and to convene, try, and cenſure all perſons who ſhall be found to have applied to their own uſe the ſtones, timber, or any thing elſe pertaining to kirks demoliſhed.

Charles I An' 1636.

By the fifty-fifth of the parliament in 1573, "archbiſhops and biſhops were authoriſed to admoniſh perſons married, in caſe of deſertion, to "adhere, and in caſe of diſobedience, to direct "charges to the miniſter of the parochin to proceed to the ſentence of excommunication."

In theſe four acts appear ſome ſigns of the epiſcopal juriſdiction, or at leaſt, that the parliament did not look upon epiſcopacy as utterly aboliſhed. But, on the other hand, if the biſhops actually exerciſed their functions at that time, where was the neceſſity of the parliament's authoriſing them to act in moſt of the particulars ſpecified in theſe ſtatutes? But here is a yet more forcible objection againſt the biſhops: and that is, they who have thus cited theſe acts have curtailed them, and paſſed over in ſilence the ſuperintendants who were joined with the biſhops, whence is infered, that the biſhops were impowered only as the parliament's commiſſioners.

I next proceed to the time of King James's majority, or at leaſt of his aſſuming the government, tho' he was not actually a major. The earl of Morton having loſt his head in 1581, the duke of Lenox and earl of Arran ruled the young King as they pleaſed. They were afterwards expulſed by the Ruthens; but James ſoon recalled Arran, who became more powerful than ever. It is certain, this favorite's aim was to diſingage his royal maſter from the intereſt of England, and to countenance the duke of Guiſe's ſcheme to attack Queen Elizabeth by Scotland. It was therefore the favorite's buſineſs to curb the too great power of the general aſſembly, who ſtrongly oppoſed the execution of this project. In order to ſucceed, his readieſt way was, not only to protect the biſhops, but alſo to give them authority over the miniſters, that theſe might be humbler: and to that purpoſe, he, in the parliament of 1564, procured the four ſubſequent acts, viz.

Nalſon, p. 142.

The hundred and thirtieth ran: "That none of "his Majeſty's lieges and ſubjects preſume or take "upon hand to impugn the dignity and authority "of the three eſtates of this kingdom, whereby "the honor and authority of the King's Majeſty's "ſupreme court of parliament, paſſed all memory "of man, hath been continued, or to ſeek or "procure the innovation or diminution of the "power and anthority of the ſame three eſtates, "or any of them in time coming, under the pain "of treaſon."

By the hundred and thirty-firſt, "All judgments "and juriſdictions, as well in ſpiritual as temporal "cauſes, in practiſe and cuſtom, during the twenty-four years by-paſſed, not approved by the "King and three eſtates in parliament, are diſcharged; and it is declared, that none of his "Highneſs's ſubjects, of whatſoever quality, eſtate "or function they be, ſpiritual or temporal, preſume, or take upon hand to convocate, convene, "or aſſemble themſelves together for holding councils, conventions, or aſſemblies, to treat, conſult, or determinate in any matter of eſtate, "civil or eccleſiaſtical (except in the ordinary "judgments) without his Majeſty's ſpecial commandment, or expreſs licenſe had and obtained "to that effect."

By the hundred and thirty-ſecond, "biſhops are "authoriſed to try and judge miniſters guilty of "crimes meriting deprivation."

The hundred and thirty-third ordains, "That "miniſters, exerciſing any office beſide their calling, be tried and adjudged culpable by their ordinaries."

It is evident that the drift in theſe four acts was, to aboliſh the general aſſemblies with the preſbytery, and reſtore the epiſcopal government. But it muſt be obſerved;

1. Theſe acts were made during the tyrannical uſurpation of the earl of Arran, who had formed the project of admiting into Scotland a Papiſtic army: nor is it much to the biſhops credit that he ſhould deem them proper inſtruments to countenance that deſign. 2. The general aſſembly ſolemnly proteſted againſt theſe acts, maintaining, it was not in the King's or parliament's power to regulate or vary the government of the church, without the church's own concurrence; that it could not reaſonably be pretended that four biſhops, who were preſent in this parliament, and whoſe ſpiritual power was long ſince aboliſhed, and four laics, under the denomination of abbots, were legitimate repreſentatives of the whole church, or that their conſent to theſe acts ſhould be conſidered as the conſent of the national church. 3. Theſe four acts were repealed by the parliament of 1592.

Charles I An' 1636.

I muſt now proceed to another juncture, when King James, freed from the earl of Arran's tyranny, having relinquiſhed the chimerical projects ſuggeſted by that favorite, was better acquainted with his true intereſts. I mean the year 1587. Tho', at the begining of this year, Queen Elizabeth had beheaded Mary, King James's mother, he was ſoon comforted by the hopes of one day poſſeſſing the crown of England, which he was afraid of loſing, in caſe he continued to form projects againſt religion, as he had done during Arran's miniſtry. He p. 161. therefore, this ſame year, gave the royal aſſent to the act of annexation, whereby were adjoined to the crown, "all lordſhips and baronies pertaining to "whatſoever archbiſhops, or biſhops, abbots, "priors, nuns and monks; reſerving always to "archbiſhops, &c. and others poſſeſſors of great "benefices of the eſtate of prelates, and which be"fore had or hath vote in parliament, the princi"pal caſtles and fortalices."

It may from this act be infered, that the depriving biſhops of their lands, was depriving them withal of the right of ſiting in parliament, ſince that right was wholly founded on poſſeſſion of the baronies: nay, it ſeems that the title of biſhop began now to be confered on laics, which gave them only poſſeſſion of the chief caſtle appertaining to the ſee. At leaſt we find that, ſhortly after, the biſhoprick of Cathneſs becoming vacant, by the death of Robert earl of March, the King's uncle, the general aſſembly petitioned his Majeſty to confer that ſee on ſome eccleſiaſtic.

Finally, in 1592, the parliament repealed and Ib. p. 163. annulled not only the above-cited acts of 1583, but alſo ſuch as were contrary to the diſcipline eſtabliſhed, "approving, ratifying and confirming the aſ"ſemblies, preſbyteries and ſynods, with the diſci"pline and juriſdiction of the kirk, as moſt juſt "and godly, notwithſtanding whatſoever ſtatutes, "acts, canons, civil or municipal laws made in "the contrary. Farther, they abrogated all acts "granting commiſſion to biſhops, and other judges "conſtitute in eccleſiaſtical cauſes; and ordained "preſentation to benefices, to be directed to preſ"byteries, with power to give collation there"upon."

This act was confirmed in 1593, and the power of preſbyteries ſolemnly acknowledged, by the parliament in 1594, act one hundred and twenty-nine.

Was not all this ſufficient abſolutely to aboliſh Ibid. epiſcopacy? By the act of 1587 the biſhops were diſpoſſeſſed of their lands; and by that of 1592 they loſt all manner of juriſdiction. For how could the power of the preſbyteries and general aſſemblies, be conſiſtent with the epiſcopal juriſdiction? And yet, there were perſons who ſtill bore the name of biſhop, by reaſon of their holding caſtles formerly appertaining to the ſees; for it appears not on what what other ſcore they could be ſtiled biſhops: nay, very ſeemingly, diverſe of theſe ſees were in lay-hands; at leaſt, the abbies and priories were certainly ſo.

But matters did not long continue on the ſame footing. Whether the general aſſemblies uſurped too much authority, after they were freed from the biſhops, or for ſome other reaſons, King James laid new ſchemes, and determined on re-eſtabliſhing the prelates. Then, as at many other junctures, the court had ſuch great influence over the parliament, that in a manner whatever was required was inacted.

Nalſon, p. 164.

James therefore, in 1597, ſo managed, that "the privilege of a voice in parliament was granted to the whole kirk; and under that name to biſhops and abbots, even as in times of Papiſtry. As to the office and ſpiritual government of biſhops, the parliament remited them to the King and the aſſembly, intending not to derogate from the provincial and general aſſemblies, and other whatſoever preſbyteries and ſeſſions, nor from the diſcipline eſtabliſhed in the kirk."

This act evidences that the biſhops had loſt their right of ſeat in parliament, ſince there was occaſion for reſtoring it them. By virtue of the ſaid act, they reſumed their places in parliament, and even ſir Robert Spotſwood, a laic, took his ſeat there, as abbot of New-Abbey. The King deſired nothing more at that time, than to re-introduce to the parliament the biſhops and abbots. But he did not ſtop there, as will preſently appear.

Mean while, as the general aſſembly ſtill continued ſtrenuouſly oppoſing eccleſiaſtics promotion to poſts of authority in the ſtate, and as the people ſeemed more inclined to follow the general aſſembly's determinations than thoſe of the parliament, it was to be feared this diſſenſion would finally occaſion diſturbances in the realm. To prevent this inconvenience, James cauſed the general aſſembly, held at Montroſs, in the year 1600, to be preſſed ſo earneſtly to conſent to what the parliament of 1597 had granted the biſhops, that they were obliged either to comply, or break with him abſolutely. They therefore approved this act, but on certain conditions, the ſubſtance whereof was, that the biſhops ſhould act in parliament only as the kirk's commiſſioners or deputies, and be ſubject to the general aſſembly. The conditions impoſed on them were as follow, viz.

1. They ſhall obtain a commiſſion from the general aſſembly, to act in their name in parliament, and ſhall ſwear to obſerve the following articles.

2. They ſhall move nothing, without having expreſs order from the kirk, on pain of being deprived of their office.

3. They ſhall not conſent, no not by their ſilence, to any thing againſt the liberties of the kirk, under the ſame penalty.

4. They ſhall be accountable to each general aſſembly for their behavior in the diſcharge of their commiſſion ſince the laſt aſſembly; be obliged to demand the approbation, and ſubmit to the determination and cenſure of the aſſembly, without any appeal, on pain of being pronounced infamous and excommunicated.

5. They ſhall be ſatisfied with that portion of their benefices the King ſhall pleaſe to allot them, for their ſubſiſtence, that they may not be a burden to the miniſters who are already, or ſhall be hereafter ſettled in their benefices.

6. They ſhall not ſuffer their benefices to go to decay, or diſpoſe of any thing belonging thereto, without conſent of the King and the general aſſembly, and ſhall allow that inhibitions be directed to them for that purpoſe.

7. They ſhall exerciſe the functions of paſtors in their own congregations, and be ſubject to the cenſure of their own preſbyteries and the general aſſembly, like the reſt of the miniſters who are not commiſſioned.

CHARLES I AN' 1636.

8. In the adminiſtration of diſcipline, and in every thing relating to the government of the kirk, they ſhall uſurp no power or juriſdiction beyond what is adjudged to other miniſters, on pain of forfeiting their office.

9. In preſbyteries and general and provincial aſſemblies, they ſhall demean themſelves in the ſame manner as other miniſters, and ſhall be liable to their cenſure.

10. None of thoſe who ſit in parliament ſhall be members of the general aſſemblies, unleſs they be expreſly deputed by their preſbyteries.

It is manifeſt, from theſe conditions, inſerted in the acts of parliament made to confirm that of 1597, what was the intention of the Montroſs aſſembly, in agreeing, thro' complaiſance to his Majeſty, that the biſhops ſhould ſit in parliament. The prelates imbraced what was for their advantage, viz. the aſſembly's conſent to the privilege granted them: but never performed any of the conditions. The court was then favorable to them; but it was ſtill more ſo, after King James's acceſſion to the crown of England.

Soon as James became King of England, he formed, as has been ſaid, the project of eſtabliſhing in the Scotiſh kirk the diſcipline and hierarchy of the church of England. To accompliſh this deſign, it was requiſite he ſhould reſtore the biſhops to all the rights they had injoyed before the reformation, and accordingly he reſolved to begin with this reſtoration. His power in the parliament was very great, during the laſt years of his being in Scotland; but it was nothing in compariſon of what it was after his acceſſion to the throne of England. It ſuffices to ſay, that this influence was in proportion to the means he had of diſpenſing to his Scotiſh ſubjects favors which he had not been able to confer on them in their country. We have ſeen, in the hiſtory of his reign, how he ſhowered on them his bounties, whereof the Engliſh could not forbear complaining. It is not therefore much to be wondered at that the members of the Scotiſh parliament ſhould be at his devotion. He made uſe of his credit, in the year 1606, and obtained the inſuing parliamentary ſtatutes, viz.

"The ancient and fundamental policy, conſiſting in the maintenance of the three eſtates of parliament, being of late greatly impaired, and almoſt ſubverted, eſpecially by the indirect aboliſhing of the eſtate of biſhops by the act of annexation: albeit it was never meaned by his Majeſty, nor by his eſtates, that the ſaid eſtate of biſhops, being a neceſſary eſtate of the parliament, ſhould any way be ſuppreſſed; yet, by diſmembering and abſtracting from them of their livings, being brought in contempt and poverty, the ſaid eſtate of biſhops is hereby reſtored, and and redintegrate to their ancient and accuſtomed honors, dignities, prerogatives, privileges, lands, teindes, rents, as the ſame was in the Reformed kirk, moſt amply and free, at any time before the act of annexation; reſcinding and anulling all acts of parliament made in prejudice of the ſaid biſhops in the premiſſes, or any of them, with all which hath followed, or may follow thereupon, to the effect they may peaceably injoy the honors, dignities, privileges and prerogatives competent to them, or their eſtate, ſince the reformation of religion." p. 143.

Thus far, however, it concerned only the temporalities, there not being in the act a ſingle word whence it might be infered, that the parliament reſtored restored the biſhops to their ſpiritual functions, or ancient juriſdiction. Indeed the general aſſembly pretended, that the King and parliament could make no alterations in the ſpirituals, without the kirk's conſent; but they had no power to hinder the King and parliament from beſtowing the crown lands on whom they pleaſed, or from admiting into the parliament ſuch as they thought proper. But King James's intention was not to ſtop there.

In 1609, his ſaid Majeſty, under color of confirming the act of 1606, obtained of the parliament a ſecond ſtatute, which, in confirming the former one, ſubjoined a clauſe, whereby the biſhops were intirely re-inſtated in their priſtine authority, privileges and juriſdiction. By virtue of this latter act it was that the biſhops took poſſeſſion of the kirk's government, notwithſtanding the Montroſs aſſembly's terms or conditions, which they little regarded, and preſumed were annulled by this ſtatute. But the general aſſembly formerly proteſted againſt this act, affirming the parliament have not power, without the kirk's conſent, to reſtore a ſpiritual office which hath been aboliſhed. They likewiſe proteſted againſt eccleſiaſtics being promoted to civil poſts, as pernicious to religion. Their proteſtation was rejected: nevertheleſs it was printed and diſperſed over the whole realm.

The general aſſembly's oppoſition had a great effect on the people, who loved not the biſhops, and had been fifty years uſed to the Preſbyterian government. They exclaimed, that the parliament had been gained to impoſe on them epiſcopal government, which was odious to the whole nation, not only without conſulting the kirk, but even quite contrary to its inclination. This oppoſition convinced King James, that, notwithſtanding the parliament's authority, he ſhould find it very difficult to reduce the Scots to obedience, ſo long as the general aſſembly oppoſed the prelates reſtoration. He reſolved therefore to cauſe a general aſſembly to be held at Glaſgow, in 1610, where he took care to gain a majority of votes, and whereof thoſe ſame prelates were the chief directors. The aſſembly, thus diſpoſed agreed, that the biſhops ſhould reſume all their ſpiritual functions, together with the kirk's government. After that, in 1612, James called a parliament, who, on the Glaſgow aſſembly's conſent, paſſed an act, whereby the biſhops were reſtored to all their ſpiritualities.

The prelates adverſaries, aſtoniſhed at this procedure, were forced to be ſilent, the torrent being too violent to be reſiſted. Beſide, the general aſſemblies becoming leſs neceſſary ſince the biſhops had the church's government, his Majeſty very rarely licenſed their convening, and when he did, it was after he had taken all neceſſary precautions to be aſſured that the biſhops would be directors and managers. In 1617, he moreover obtained of the parliament an act, whereby it was ordained, that the biſhops ſhould be elected by the chapters, and conſecrated with the accuſtomed rites, meaning thoſe introduced of late years. As, during the troubles in Scotland on account of religion, the people, as will preſently appear, loudly complained of the prelates reſtoration, the Glaſgow aſſembly's conſent, in 1610, was objected to them inceſſantly. For this reaſon, the firſt general aſſembly which King Charles was obliged to grant in 1638, found no better method to evade this objection, than to declare the Glaſgow aſſembly void originally.

Such was the ſtate of epiſcopacy in Scotland, from the reformation's introduction to the reign of Charles I, who, at his acceſſion to the throne, found it fully eſtabliſhed, tho' contrary to the bent of the nation in general, as in the ſequel manifeſtly appeared. James I, as has been obſerved, had formed the deſign of reducing the Scotiſh kirk to a like eſtabliſhment with the church of England. He had made therein a conſiderable progreſs, and Charles purſued the deſign with ſtill more ardor than his father. But, as hitherto, I have only treated of what regards the biſhops, it is requiſite, before we enter upon a relation of that kingdom's troubles, which firſt commenced in 1637, to mention the meaſures ſucceſſively taken by the two Kings to accompliſh their deſign.

CHARLES I An' 1636.

When King James had intirely reſtored epiſcopacy in Scotland, he reſolved to complete his work gradually. To that purpoſe, he began with the five articles mentioned in the hiſtory of his reign, which he cauſed to be approved by the general aſſembly of Perth, by means perhaps no leſs illegal than violent (1). The biſhops governed the preſbyteries, by making themſelves moderators, ſo that it was not poſſible to chuſe any for commiſſioners to the general aſſembly, but ſuch as they thought proper. However this be, the five articles being approved, his Majeſty, who by long experience was well acquainted with the genius and character of the Scots, judged it firſt of all intirely neceſſary to curb the petulancy and boldneſs of the miniſters, for fear they ſhould raiſe diſturbances in the kingdom. The people had for them a great veneration, which was even augmented after reſtoring the biſhops, becauſe theſe latter were much more ſedulous to maintain their grandure and authority, than gain the love of their flocks. Charles, in order to compaſs his ends, erected in Scotland a high-commiſſion, like that in England, but which, 'till then, was unheard-of in Scotland. As the Scots had never beſtowed on their Sovereign the title of ſupreme head of the church, as was done in England, there had been no occaſion to eſtabliſh in Scotland a high-commiſſion, to exerciſe, in his Majeſty's name, the ſupremacy. But James I, who was extremely prone to ſtretch his prerogative, readily believed, he had no leſs right to exerciſe the ſupremacy in Scotland than in England, tho' 'till then he had never even dreamed of any ſuch matter. Howſoever this may have been, by means of this new court, which was at firſt exceſſively rigid, excommunicating and depriving the miniſters for the leaſt offenſe, he kept them ſo in awe, that not one durſt move. This, with the favors heaped on ſuch as ſhewed a readineſs to countenance his deſigns, rendered him in a manner ſecure of ſucceſs in his undertaking, which advanced daily. Nothing was wanting to complete it, but making the Engliſh liturgy and canons be received in Scotland, which once effected, there would be no difference between the churches of both kingdoms. This was as eaſy to be accompliſhed as what had been done already: ſo his Majeſty having convened a general aſſembly at Aberdeen, it was repreſented to them; that divine ſervice was, in the Scotiſh kirk performed very indecently, every miniſter having liberty to compoſe public prayers, and uſe what expreſſions he pleaſed, which was liable to great inconveniencies: that it would therefore be proper to compile a liturgy, to be uſed in every church thro'out Scotland, to the end people might every where pray with one heart and one mouth. It muſt be obſerved, that it was not moved to receive the Engliſh liturgy, but only to compoſe one proper for the kirk of Scotland: whereupon diverſe members of the aſſembly believed, they might without danger agree,

(1) The articles were, kneeling at the ſacrament, communicating the ſick, private baptiſm, confirmation, keeping ſome feſtivals.

that a common-prayer book ſhould be uſed, and the rather, as the reformed churches of Geneva, Swiſſerland, France and Germany had their ſeveral liturgies, tho' very different from that of the Engliſh. This motion being approved, the aſſembly appointed commiſſioners to compoſe the new liturgy, and this nomination may readily be preſumed to have been agreeable to his Majeſty's deſire. Theſe commiſſioners, of whom the majority were prelates, after imploying a conſiderable time in framing this liturgy, only copied that which was ſet forth in England, in the reign of Edward VI, and ſent it the King for his approbation.

The Palatinate, and Spaniſh match affairs ſo ingroſſed King James, during the latter years of his life, that he could not effectually think of finiſhing the work he had undertaken in Scotland. As he knew the Scots perfectly, and their ſtrong prepoſſeſſion for Preſbytery, he doubleſs thought proper to defer the execution of his deſign 'till he had compleated his two grand affairs. He was apprehenſive that, if unluckily any diſturbances ſhould occur in Scotland on account of the liturgy, it might divert him from what was then the chief object of his labor. I have in the hiſtory of his reign related how he was amuſed for many years, and therefore he could not finiſh what he had begun, but, being over-taken by death, left it to the care of his ſucceſſor.

Burnet. Mem. Ham.

Charles I was no leſs eager than his father, to eſtabliſh in Scotland the church of England's diſcipline. But his circumſtances, in the begining of his reign, admited not his applying himſelf to the finiſhing this affair ſo expeditiouſly as he wiſhed. His wars with Spain, and afterwards with France, his projects touching his prerogative, with his continual quarrels with the parliaments, demanded his whole application. Beſide, it was not proper in theſe junctures to rouze the Scots, who indeed ſeemed quiet and ſubmiſſive, but were nevertheleſs highly diſcontented; nor was his Majeſty thereof ignorant. He therefore waited 'till he had concluded peace with France and Spain, and rendered himſelf, as it were, abſolute by this diſſolution of three parliaments, by his reſolution never to call any more, and by eſtabliſhing his prerogative, concerning taxes, without the concurrence of parliament. Then it was he began to think ſeriouſly of compleating the Scotiſh kirk's reduction to a perfect conformity with the church of England.

Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 386. Annals, 614, &c.

He had not however been idle with reſpect to Scotland during theſe firſt years of his reign. Tho' he had delayed the execution of his deſign, it was ever in his thoughts, and he had taken ſome meaſures which ſeemed to warrant ſucceſs. 1. He had either continued or renewed the high-commiſſion, introduced by the King his father. 2. He had almoſt aboliſhed the general aſſemblies, by not allowing any ſince his acceſſion to the throne. 3. He had ſo ſupported and countenanced the biſhops, that they had intirely in their power all the clergy, whom they ruled with a very heavy hand. 4. He had gained a great number of the miniſters by means of benefices and eccleſiaſtical offices or dignities, which were granted only to thoſe on whoſe compliance he could depend. 5. He had ſo filled the Scotiſh council, in whoſe hands the adminiſtration of affairs is lodged during the Sovereign's abſenſe, that there was ſcarce a privy counſellor but what was ingaged to promote his deſigns.

Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 67.

6. In this council were diverſe prelates, and the archbiſhop of St. Andrews was veſted with the chancellorſhip, the principal office in all Scotland (1). 7. He had ſecured the lords of ſeſſion, that is, of the college of juſtice and, in a word, all who had places depending on the court. 8. He had charged Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury, to hold continual correſpondence with the biſhops and council of Scotland, and take with them the neceſſary meaſures to accompliſh the deſign. It ſeemed therefore impoſſible his Majeſty ſhould meet with any oppoſition from a diſperſed people, without leaders, without ſupport, and deſtitute of their magiſtrates aſſiſtance.

CHARLES I AN' 1636.

With all theſe advantages, Charles undertook to finiſh what ſtill remained to be done in Scotland. To that purpoſe, after a reviſal of the liturgy, tranſmited to the late King, he returned it to Scotland, with orders to have it received in the kirk: but, on the objection that this liturgy, being word for word the ſame with that of the church of England, the Scots might take offenſe at the impoſing on them the liturgy of another kingdom, he thought proper to make ſome alterations, and ordained that, inſtead of the Engliſh verſion of the Pſalms, and of the Epiſtles and Goſpels, the Scotiſh tranſlation ſhould be inſerted in the liturgy of Scotland. That done, he was of opinion it could not, with the leaſt ſhadow of reaſon be alledged by way of complaint, that he aimed at impoſing the Engliſh liturgy on the kirk of Scotland, tho' the ſole difference between them was only what is above hinted.

AN' 1637. Deſign to ſend the new liturgy into Scotland, put off. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. p. 386, &c. Annals. Nalſon. Clarendon.

While the liturgy was under reviſal, his Majeſty diſpatched away to Scotland a book of canons for the kirk's government, and theſe canons injoined a conformity to the liturgy, tho' it was not yet publiſhed, nor ſo much as known to the people. This was ſuch a groſs error, that it muſt be ſurpriſing King Charles and his miniſters could ever be thereof guilty. The pretenſe to introduce theſe new canons was, that the acts of the general aſſemblies not being printed, but contained in a number of huge MS. tomes, remained unknown to the people. On this account, Charles fancied they would be obliged to him for his care in extracting the chief and moſt material particulars in a moderate volume which might be in every one's hands. It ſeems ſometimes, that certain Princes imagine they have a ſovereign power, not only over the bodies, but likewiſe the intellectuals of their ſubjects, to make them credit the groſſeſt abſurdities. We have here two remarkable inſtances. Charles undertakes to perſuade the people of Scotland, that he pretends not to impoſe on them the Engliſh liturgy, tho' it is the very ſame, not only in ſubſtance but word for word, becauſe the verſion of the epiſtles and goſpels is different. On the other hand, he would have them believe, that the book of canons is no other than a bare abſtract from the acts of their general aſſemblies, tho' the reverſe is manifeſt. From the reformation's introduction to the Glaſgow aſſembly, in 1610, i, e, during fifty years, the general aſſemblies had always condemned and rejected epiſcopacy, and all their acts, not one excepted, ſuppoſed the Preſbyterian government: whereas, contrariwiſe, the book of canons ſuppoſed, in every article, the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy, and epiſcopal government. How then was it poſſible to perſuade the Scots, that this book of canons was abſtracted from the acts of their general aſſemblies? this was impoſing on them very unaccountably (2).

Charles ſends into Scotland the book of canons. Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 84.

(1) This office had never been in the hands of a churchman ſince the Reformation. He made likewiſe nine biſhops lords of ſeſſion, or privy counſellors. Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 67. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 386.

(2) Lord Clarendon (Vol. I. p. 83, 85, 86.) juſtly obſerves, as ſomewhat ſtrange, that neither theſe canons, nor the liturgy, were communicated to the Scotiſh clergy, nor paſſed their approbation. They were compiled by ſome Scotiſh biſhops, and tranſmited from Scotland to archbiſhop Laud, Juxton, biſhop of London, and Wren of Norwich, who reviſed, and put the finiſhing hand to them.

Charles I An' 1637.

The liturgy being ready, Charles diſpatched it to Scotland, and appointed it to be read in all the churches of Edinburg on Eaſter-day, this year 1637: but, on farther conſideration, this order was revoked. His Majeſty was told, That it might be dangerous to ſurpriſe the people with reading the liturgy before they were prepared. That it was properer to defer it ſome months, in order to ſee whether, in that interval, the male-contents would attempt any oppoſition. In that caſe, they might be cruſhed before they had time to take juſt meaſures, and the bad ſucceſs of their attempt would only ſerve to farther his Majeſty's deſign. This reaſon appeared ſo plauſible, that Charles ordered reading the liturgy to be defered 'till Sunday the twenty third of July, the ſame year. During this whole interval, there was not in Edinburg any unuſual motion, nor the leaſt appearance that the King's orders would be at all oppoſed (1). To be ſtill ſecurer, the council eight days before, cauſed it to be publiſhed in every church of that city, that the liturgy would be read on the inſuing Sunday. No perſon ſtired the whole week, and all there was ſo quiet that the council doubted not of ſucceſs.

and afterwards the liturgy. Ib. p. 86. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 387. Nalſon, p. 6. &c. Annals. p. 615.

The liturgy ordered to be read in the churches of Edinburg.

Neverthelefs next Sunday, the lord-chancellor, moſt of the grand counſellors, ſome biſhops, the lords of ſeſſion or judges of the realm, and the magiſtrates of Edinburg, repairing to St. Giles's church, the cathedral of that city, when the dean opened the book to read the liturgy, the meaner ſort of people, with claping of hands, execrations and outcries, raiſed ſo hideous a noiſe, that it was not poſſible to hear a word. Whereupon the biſhop of Edinburg, who was to preach, ſteping into the pulpit, with thoughts to appeaſe the people, was received with the ſame clamors and imprecations, and had not a ſtool, thrown at his head, been diverted by the hand of one preſent, the right reverend would have been in great danger of brayning. Nor did the lord-chancellor and judges meet with more reſpect. At laſt, the provoſt and bailiffs of the city came from their places, and with much difficulty thruſt out the inraged populace, and, ſhuting the doors, the Dean read the liturgy, tho' continually interrupted by the noiſe without, and volies of ſtones ſhowered in at the windows. The like tumults occurred in all the other churches of Edinburg, neverthelefs, not one perſon was either killed or wounded. The biſhop of Edinburg alone ran ſome hazard, as well in the church as in retiring to his abode. This firſt tumult was raiſed only by the rabble, no perſon of condition or name appearing therein. The magiſtrates of Edinburg openly diſavowed theſe diſorders, and promiſed the council to uſe their indeavors to diſcover and chaſtiſe its authors and abetors. They alſo offered to take order for the ſecurity of ſuch miniſters as ſhould be appointed to read the liturgy another time, and wrote to his grace of Canterbury to clear themſelves, intreating he would repreſent to his Majeſty their innocence.

Harveſt approaching, abundance of people left Edinburg, and went into the country. Mean while, the city magiſtrates prayed the council that the liturgy might not be read, they having obſerved the people were not yet diſpoſed to receive it: but in October, after the harveſt, ſo great a concourſe of people flocked to Edinburg, that it was eaſy to ſee a freſh ſtorm was gathering. The council therefore iſſued three proclamations. The firſt, to order all ſtrangers to depart the city within twenty four hours. A ſecond, for removing the ſeſſion (2) from Edinburg to Dundee (3). A third, for calling in and burning a ſeditious book, intitled, "A diſpute againſt the Engliſh Popiſh ceremonies, "obtruded upon the Kirk of Scotland". The firſt and laſt were not much regarded.

On the morrow, the eighteenth of October, multitudes flocked together tumultuouſly in Edinburg ſtreets, and ſeeing the biſhop of Galloway, as he was going to the council, a great croud followed him all the way with continual curſing, but however did him no hurt. They even beſet the council-houſe, demanding the biſhop's perſon, tho' it was in their power to have ſeized, nay, to have killed him, while he was in the ſtreet. The council, finding themſelves thus beſet, ſent for aſſiſtance to the magiſtrates; who anſwered, they were themſelves ſorrounded in their town-houſe by their own citizens, who threatened to tear them piecemeal, if they did not ſign a certain paper; which for fear of their lives they were forced to do. The paper contained theſe three particulars; viz. 1. That the magiſtrates ſhould join with the people in petitioning againſt the liturgy. 2. That by their authority they ſhould preſently reſtore to their pulpits Ramſey and Rollock, two miniſters, greatly beloved by the people. 3. That they ſhould reſtore to his place one Henderſon, another ſilenced reader. Upon this the earls of Traquaire and Wigton, of whom the firſt was lord-treaſurer, came to the town-houſe to adviſe with the magiſtrates, what was beſt to be done for the ſafety of the biſhop of Galloway, who was ſtill beſet. After this conſultation, the two earls, returning to the council, were inſulted by the populace. The earl of Traquaire was thrown down, his hat, cloak and white-ſtaff taken from him, the people crying out, "God "defend all thoſe who will defend God's cauſe, "and God confound the ſervice-book and all "the maintainers of it". Preſently after, the provoſt came to the council, and declared that, tho' he had uſed his utmoſt indeavors, it was not poſſible to appeaſe the people. At length, the lords of the council applied to ſome of the gentry, and others, who where now aſſembled to ſign the petition againſt the ſervice-book. Theſe perſons credit with the populace was greater than that of the magiſtrates, and did finally prevail with them to retire. This ſecond tumult, wherein no perſon was killed or wounded any more than in the firſt, yet ſeemed more important and dangerous, becauſe in the other none but the rabble were concerned, whereas in this it plainly appeared, the mutineers were contenanced by ſeveral lords and gentlemen, as well as by the better ſort of citizens.

Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 403, 404. Nalſon, p. 12.

The tumult being appeaſed, a proclamation was publiſhed, forbiding any meetings in the ſtreets or elſewhere; a proclamation of no uſe, at a time when the council could not be ignorant how much their authority was contemned by thoſe whom they would have intimidated. Accordingly, ſo far were the male-contents from being terrified, that they ſent to the board their commiſſioners, requiring, that the ſilenced miniſters might be reſtored, and that they might have aſſurance for the punctual performance of what had been lately promiſed them by the magiſtrates. The council could eaſily ſee, by this conduct, that the male-contents had no design to ſtop here. And in effect, very ſoon after, the lord chancellor received two petitions; one in the name of all the men, women, children and ſervants of Edinburg againſt the liturgy. The other from the nobility, gentry, and burgeſſes * of the ſame city, againſt the liturgy and book of canons.

* Alſo the miniſters.

Women and children petition the council againſt the ſervice-book. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 405.

The firſt alledged, "That they had a long time "winked at ſome alterations, being put in hope "that no farther innovations ſhould follow. But "now, ſeeing they were like to be conſtrained to "imbrace another ſervice, not approved by church "and kingdom, and which had neither been agi-"tated nor received either by general aſſembly or "parliament; they therefore deſired, that they "might have the happineſs of injoying their reli-"gion, as it had been reformed in that land, and "authoriſed by his Majeſty.

Petition of the nobles, &c. Id. p. 406. Nalſon, p. 13, 14, &c. Annals.

In the ſecond, the petitioners complained, "That "whereas they were attending a gracious anſwer to "their former ſupplications againſt the ſervice-"book, they were ſurpriſed and charged by pub-"lic proclamation, to depart out of the town with-"in twenty-four hours thereafter, under pain of "rebellion; by which their fears of a more ſe-"vere and ſtrict courſe of proceeding were aug-"mented. Wherefore they were conſtrained to "remonſtrate that, in the book of common prayer, "drawn up and ſet forth by the archbiſhops and "biſhops, were ſown the ſeeds of diverſe ſuperſti-"tions, idolatry, and falſe-doctrine, contrary to "the religion eſtabliſhed in the realm, by diverſe "acts of parliament. That in the book of ca-"nons, &c. it was ordained, 'That whoſoever "ſhall affirm, that the form of worſhip in-"ſerted in the common-prayer and adminiſtra-"tion of the ſacraments, doth contain any thing "repugnant to the ſcriptures, or are corrupt, ſu-"perſtitious, or unlawful in the ſervice and worſhip "of God, ſhall be excommunicated, and not be "reſtored, but by the biſhop of the place, or "archbiſhop of the province.' That beſide it is "ordained, that 'where in any of the canons there "is no penalty expreſly ſet down, the puniſhment "ſhall be arbitrary, as the biſhop ſhall think fiteſt.' "All which canons were never ſeen or allowed in "any general aſſembly, but were impoſed con-"trary to order of law appointed in the realm "for eſtabliſhing conſtitutions eccleſiaſtical. Laſt-"ly, that the biſhops had not only begun to urge "the acceptance of thoſe things, by injunctions "given in provincial aſſemblies, but alſo by open "proclamation and charge of 'Horning' (1). "Wherefore the petitioners craved, that this mat-"ter might be put to the trial, and the prelates "be taken order with according to the laws of the "realm, and not ſuffered to ſit any more as judges "until the cauſe were tried and decided according "to juſtice."

The King ſends a proclamation of doubtful meaning. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 408. Nalſon, p. 16. Annals, p. 623.

Charles judged it not proper to anſwer theſe petitions, being on the contrary determined to puniſh ſeverely the authors of the late tumults. However he commanded the privy-council to iſſue a proclamation on this occaſion, ſuppoſing, tho' without any foundation, it would be capable of ſatisfying the people. After mention in the proclamation of the lords petition, &c. it was ſaid, "His Majeſty, "in a juſt reſentment of that foul indignity †, hath "been moved to delay the ſignification of his "royal and gracious intentions, in giving to his "ſubjects ſuch ſatisfactory anſwers to their peti-"tions, as in equity might be expected from ſo "juſt and religious a Prince: but yet, his Majeſty "being unwilling that his loyal and faithful ſub-"jects ſhould be poſſeſſed with groundleſs and un-"neceſſary doubts and fears, his Majeſty is pleaſed, "out of his goodneſs to declare, that as he abhor-"eth all ſuperſtition of Popery, ſo he will be moſt "careful that nothing be allowed within his Ma-"jeſty's dominions, but that which ſhall tend to "advancement of true religion, as it is at preſent "profeſſed within his moſt ancient kingdom of "Scotland; and that nothing is or was intended to "be done therein, againſt the laudable laws of this "his Majeſty's native kingdom.

† Meaning the recent diſturbances at Edinburg.

CHARLES I AN' 1637.

It muſt be obſerved that, according to his ſaid Majeſty, the true religion was that of the church of England. That by the religion 'at preſent profeſſed,' he underſtood that only which contained the hierarchy and epiſcopacy; and by his native kingdom's laws he meaned thoſe which were inacted after the King his father's acceſſion to the crown of England, and whereof I have already made mention. It is at leaſt certain the male-contents gave this ſenſe to his general expreſſions, whence they infered, he was very far from relinquiſhing the purſuit of what he had undertaken, and ſtill farther from pardoning the late diſorders at Edinburg. Wherefore, they reſolved to take meaſures, not only to ſecure themſelves from his Majeſty's reſentment, but likewiſe to cauſe all the innovations complained of to be aboliſhed (2).

Another proclamation. Feb. 19.

Some time after, the council having removed the ſeſſion to Sterling, Charles ſent them another proclamation, with orders to have it publicly read in the principal towns of Scotland. The proclamation was to this effect:

AN' 1638. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 731. Annals, p. 623. Nalſon, p. 16.

"WE find our royal authority much injured by "ſome late petitions and declarations given "in to our council againſt the book of common-"prayer, and canons of the church, both in the "matter and in the carriage thereof; whereby "we conceive thoſe of our nobility, gentry and "others, who kept and aſſiſted theſe meetings, "for contriving and forming the ſaid petitions, to "deſerve and be liable to our high cenſure, both "in their perſons and fortunes; yet, becauſe we "believe that what they have done herein is out of "a prepoſterous zeal, we are graciouſly pleaſed "to diſpenſe therewith, and with what may be "their fault or error therein, to all ſuch as, upon "ſignification or declaration of our pleaſure, ſhall "retire themſelves as becometh good and dutiful "ſubjects. To which purpoſe, our will and plea-"ſure is, that you diſcharge all ſuch convocations "and meetings in time coming, under the pain of "treaſon: and alſo, that you command, charge, "and inhibit all our lieges and ſubjects, that none "of them preſume, nor take in hand, to reſort nor "repair to our burgh of Sterling, nor to any other "burgh where our council and ſeſſion ſits, 'till firſt "they declare their cauſe of coming to our coun-"cil, and procure their warrant to that effect. "And as concerning any petitions which ſhall here-"after be given us, upon this or any other ſubject, "we are likewiſe pleaſed to declare, we will not "ſhut our ears therefrom, ſo that neither the "form nor matter be prejudicial to our regal au-"thority."

Remark on this proclamation.

This proclamation was not ſufficient to ſatisfy the male-contents. Firſt, there was not a word concerning the ſubject of their petition, and by that they could perceive, his Majeſty had no deſign to ſuppreſs

CHARLES I An' 1638.

ſuppreſs the liturgy and canons. Secondly, Charles repreſented, as a ſignal condeſcenſion, the pardon he was pleaſed to grant for their fault in preſenting a petition without his leave: this ſhewed them that, according to the King's intention, obedience was their only courſe for the ſame. Thirdly, the King clearly intimated to them, he would receive no more petitions, ſince he declared, he would reject ſuch as ſhould, by the matter and form, be prejudicial to his authority. Was not this ſaying, he would reject all? In fine, they evidently perceived that their Sovereign, in forbiding all meetings, ſought only to diſunite and hinder them from concerting meaſures to obtain their deſires. In reality, I comprehend not how King Charles could flatter himſelf that ſuch a proclamation ſhould produce the effect he expected, and the rather, as there were not in Scotland forces ſufficient to ſupport his authority. The male-contents were not ſo ſtupid as to be ignorant of his Majeſty's deſign. So, on the morrow, the earls of Hume and Lindſay, accompanied by a numerous croud of nobles and people, came and publicly read in Sterling a proteſtation againſt the proclamation, the preſenſe and authority of the council not being capable of hindering it. The ſame proteſtation was publicly read in Lithgow and Edinburg, immediately after the proclamation had been there publiſhed.

Proteſtation of the male-contents. Feb. 19. Whitlock, p. 27.

In this proteſtation the male-contents ſaid, "They "had preſented a ſupplication on the twenty-third "of September, and another on the eighteenth of "October; as alſo a remonſtrance December the "nineteenth, againſt the ſervice-book, and the ca-"nons, as well as againſt the archbiſhops and "biſhops, as their parties, having the ſame day "preſented a declinator againſt them, to prevent "their being judges in their own cauſe. But the "council having refuſed to admit this declina-"tor, they found themſelves obliged to make the "following proteſtation.

Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 735. Annals. Nalſon, p. 11.

"1. That they might have immediate recourſe "to the King, to preſent their grivances, and in a "legal way to proſecute the ſame before the ordi-"nary competent judges.

"2. That the archbiſhops and biſhops could "not be reputed or eſteemed lawful judges, 'till "they had purged themſelves of ſuch crimes as were "laid to their charge.

"3. That no proclamation, nor any act of "council, paſſed in preſenſe of the archbiſhops and "biſhops, could any ways be prejudicial to the "ſupplicants.

"4. That neither they, nor any who had joined, "or ſhould join with them againſt innovations, "ſhould incur any danger in life, lands, or any "political or eccleſiaſtical pains, for not obſerving "ſuch acts, books, canons, rites, judicatures, pro-"clamations, introduced without or againſt the acts "of general aſſemblies, or acts of parliament, and "the ſtatutes of the kingdom.

"5. That if any inconveniences ſhould fall out "thereupon, they could not be imputed to them, "ſince the council refuſed to hear their juſt remon-"ſtrances.

"6. That their requeſts tended to no other end, "but to the preſervation of the true reformed reli-"gion, and the laws and liberties of his Majeſty's "kingdom."

The male-contents erect tables to manage their affairs.

King Charles and the Scotiſh council had hitherto flattered themſelves that the male-contents might be curbed by acts of authority. But this proteſtation plainly ſhewed they were too powerful to be forced to obedience, either by orders of the council, or by proclamations. They were perſuaded the King ſought only to ſurpriſe them, and deſigned not to deſiſt from his pretenſion. On the other hand, they had conceived extreme averſion to the biſhops, whom they regarded as authors of all the evils under which the church labored. The more they perceived his Majeſty averſe to their aſſembling themſelves to conſult in common about their affairs, the more plainly they diſcovered the neceſſity of their union, without which they would be infallibly cruſhed, one after another. So, before they could know what effect their proteſtation had upon the King, as they expected no good from court, they erected at Edinburg, which was at their own devotion, ſeveral tables (as they termed them) to manage their affairs. There were four principal ones: 1. Of the nobles. 2. Of the gentry. 3. Of the burroughs. 4. Of the miniſters.* Theſe tables conſulted of what they thought fit to be propoſed at the general table, conſiſting of commiſſioners ſelected from the other four tables. Never was Sovereign more punctually obeyed than this general table, by all who diſapproved the innovations introduced into the church within thirty or forty years, i. e. by in a manner the whole kingdom.

CHARLES I An' 1638.

Nalſon, p. 20. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 734.

* The gentry alſo, according to their ſeveral ſhires, had many ſubordinate tables.

They ſubſcribe the covenant. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 734. Nalſon, p. 20. Annals, p. 626.

The firſt produce of theſe tables was the famous covenant, or general band taken by the Scots, for maintenance of their religion from all innovations. For the better underſtanding what this covenant was, it muſt be obſerved that, in 1580, while the duke of Lenox and earl of Arran, King James's favorites, were ſuſpected of evil deſigns againſt the Proteſtant religion, the general aſſembly thought it neceſſary to draw up a confeſſion of Faith, and cauſed it to be ſubſcribed by all the ſubjects, and by the King himſelf, to whom they preſented a very humble petition on that occaſion. As James could not reject this requeſt, without confirming the peoples ſuſpicions, which might have been of dangerous conſequence, he did not only himſelf ſubſcribe the ſaid confeſſion of faith, but likewiſe injoined its being ſubſcribed to by perſons of all degrees. This paſſed in the years 1580 and 1581, and again in 1590,, with a new clauſe, whereby the ſubſcribers ingaged to maintain the true religion and the King's perſon.

Explication of the covenant.

It was this confeſſion of faith of 1580 which was revived this preſent year 1638, by order of the general table, and offered all ſorts of people to ſign. Hitherto, nothing of all this could give his Majeſty any juſt cauſe of complaint, at leaſt, as to the matter, ſince it was the ſame confeſſion which the King his father, and the whole kingdom, had ſigned in 1580 and 1581. It is true, as to the form, he could juſtly complain, that his approbation had not been required. But the tables, not ſatisfied with the bare confeſſion of faith, they likewiſe ſubjoined a certain obligation, whereby the ſubſcribers bound themſelves by oath, to maintain religion as it was in 1580, and to reject all the innovations introduced ſince into the church. This was directly contrary to King Charles's deſigns. Part of the oath which, being annexed to the confeſſion of Faith, was named the covenant, that is, contract, agreement, or league among the ſubſcribers, was as foliows:

Oath annexed to the covenant. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 739.

"FInally, being convinced in our minds, and "confeſſing with our mouths, that the pre-"ſent and ſucceeding generations in this land are "bound to keep the foreſaid national oath and ſub-"ſcription inviolable: we noblemen, barons, gen-"tlemen, burgeſſes, miniſters and commons under "ſubſcribing, conſidering diverſe times before, "and eſpecially at this time, the danger of the "true Reformed religion, of the King's honor, "and of the public peace of this kingdom, by the "manifold innovations and evils generally con-"tained, and particularly mentioned in our late "ſupplications, complaints, and proteſtations, do hereby

Charles I An' 1638.

" hereby profeſs before God, his angels, and the " world, ſolemnly declare, that with our whole " hearts we agree and reſolve, all the days of our " life, conſtantly to adhere unto, and to defend " the foreſaid true religion, and forbearing the " practiſe of all novations, already introduced in " matters of the worſhip of God, or approbation " of the corruptions of the public government of " the kirk, or civil places and power of kirkmen, " 'till they be tried and allowed in free aſſemblies, " and in parliament, to labor by all means lawful " to recover the purity and liberty of the goſpel, " as it was eſtabliſhed and profeſſed before the fore- " ſaid novations. And becauſe, after due exami- " nation, we plainly perceive, and undoubtedly " believe, that the innovations and evils contained " in our ſupplications, complaints and proteſtations, " have no warrant of the word of God, are con- " trary to the articles of the aforeſaid confeſſions, " to the intention and meaning of the bleſſed Re- " formers of religion in this land, to the above- " written acts of parliament, and do ſenſibly tend " to the re-eſtabliſhing of the Popiſh religion and " tyranny, and to the ſubverſion and ruin of the " true Reformed religion, and of our liberties, " laws and eſtates; we alſo declare, that the " aforeſaid confeſſions are to be interpreted, and " ought to be underſtood of the foreſaid novations " and evils, no leſs than if every one of them " had been expreſſed in the foreſaid confeſſions; " and that we are obliged to deteſt and abhor " them, among other particular heads of Papiſtry " abjured therein: and therefore, from the know- " ledge and conſcience of our duty to God, to our " King and country, without any worldly reſpect " or inducement, ſo far as human infirmity will " ſuffer, wiſhing a farther meaſure of the grace of " God for this effect, we promiſe and ſwear by the " great name of the Lord our God, to continue " in the profeſſion and obedience of the foreſaid " religion; that we ſhall defend the ſame, and " reſiſt all theſe contrary errors and corruptions, " according to our vocation, and to the utmoſt of " that power which God hath put into our hands, " all the days of our life. And in like manner, " with the ſame heart, we declare before God and " men, that we have no intention or deſire to " attempt any thing which may turn to the diſ- " honor of God, or to the diminution of the " King's greatneſs and authority; but, on the " contrary, we promiſe and ſwear, that we ſhall, to " the utmoſt of our power, with our means and " lives, ſtand to the defenſe of our dread Sovereign " the King's Majeſty, his perſon and authority, in " the defenſe and preſervation of the foreſaid true " religion, liberties and laws of the kingdom; as " alſo to the mutual defenſe and aſſiſtance, every " one of us of another, in the ſame cauſe of main- " taining the true religion, and his Majeſty's au- " thority, with our beſt counſels, our bodies, " means, and whole power, againſt all ſorts of " perſons whatſoever, &c.

This covenant, like an alarm-bell, brought in all ſuch Scots as were diſſatisfied with the government, which was indeed almoſt the whole nation. It was univerſally ſubſcribed to by great and ſmall, the privy counſellors, judges, biſhops, and ſuch miniſters as were dignitaries in the church, only excepted. Theſe were, a little before, veſted with the whole authority, both in church and ſtate, the King verily believing, that to have for him thoſe who were in the public places and offices was ſufficent to awe all the reſt. But when the breach was once made, by publication of the covenant, the number, not the quality of adherents, was to be conſidered, and then the royaliſts were ſcarcely one in a thouſand; ſo that King, council, judges, and biſhops, were on a ſudden without authority and power. To urge the laws was in vain: the covenant was the ſole law the people would follow with reſpect to religion, as being bound by a ſolemn oath. Thus, the King's authority being no longer regarded, and his promiſes diſtruſted by the people, as tending, in their opinion, only to deceive them, it is not ſtrange that Charles's after-indeavors to extinguiſh the flame ſhould prove fruitleſs. I have dwelled the longer on the riſe of theſe Scotiſh troubles, becauſe it ſeemed to me abſolutely requiſite for the underſtanding what paſſed afterwards in England. For the ſame reaſon, I am alſo obliged to touch on the effects produced by the covenant in Scotland: but I ſhall indeavor to be as brief as poſſible.

Charles I An' 1638.

Tho' the ſtandard of rebellion was, as it were, erected in Scotland, and King Charles had little or no proſpect of freeing himſelf from theſe difficulties, he could not yet deſiſt from his project. He ſtill hoped the gathering ſtorm might, by ſome artifice, be diſpelled. He was ſo ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed in favor of the royal authority, that tho' he ſaw it little regarded, he fancied that his declaration and proclamations, couched moſtly under ambiguous terms, would be ſufficient to reduce the Scots to their duty. But he reflected not that, before the rupture, people were in a manner conſtrained to ſhut their eyes, and ſeem not to ſee what they ſaw: but that, the breach once made, the male-contents were too wiſe to be taken in his ſnares, and too daring or audacious to refrain from publiſhing the artifices deſigned purely for their amuſement. Charles likewiſe deceived himſelf in another particular. As the Scots inceſſantly pleaded their laws, he thought to ſilence them, by alledging, on his ſide, the laws inacted within forty years, not conſidering that theſe ſame laws were the main cauſe of their complaints, and what they wiſhed were abrogated: ſo, in urging theſe acts of parliament, whereby the innovations had been approved, he only confirmed their belief of his intending to ſupport them, and conſequently it was requiſite to uſe ſome violent means to make him deſiſt. His Majeſty had for him the laws in force, ſince they were never repealed; and the people believed, they might rightfully procure abolition of thoſe laws, impoſed on them by corruption, artifice, and violence, complaining, that theſe new laws were inacted in violation of the old. Thus, both ſides exclaimed againſt breach of the laws.

K. Charles's wrong meaſures with reſpect to Scotland.

The male-contents ſaid, " James and Charles " had eſtabliſhed epiſcopal government in the kirk, " contrary to her conſent, who ought to have been " conſulted in ſuch an affair, which concerned re- " ligion alone, and could be decided only by the " general aſſembly. But inſtead of following the " ſettled rules of the kirk, the biſhops were firſt " introduced into the parliament, and then, by " means of the biſhops, whatever was deſired was " inacted, tho' the King and parliament had no " right to appoint new offices, and new juriſdic- " tions in the kirk, without the conſent of the kirk " herſelf, repreſented by the general aſſembly, and " not by five or ſix biſhops, with as many lay- " abbots, who were allowed a ſeat in parliament. " To accompliſh this deſign, ſeveral other artifices " were uſed, as bribing the Glaſgow aſſembly, a- " boliſhing general aſſemblies, erecting a high- " commiſſion, inconſiſtent with the liberties of the " kingdom. In a word, the King had exerciſed, " and ſtill did exerciſe a power repugnant to the " privileges of the ſubjects, in impoſing upon them " a liturgy and canons, deteſted by almoſt the " whole nation, without aſking the conſent of kirk " or parliament. By this management, no leſs " violent than artful, the government of the kirk " was intirely altered, not only without the peoples

" advice, but againſt their will, as plainly appear" ed by the great number of ſubſcribers to the co" venant, and the few who refuſed to ſign it.
" They thought themſelves therefore authoriſed,
" by virtue of their privileges, to demand the re-
" ſtoration of religion in its purity, ſuch as it was in
" 1580, and the abolition of all innovations. If " the King complained, that this covenant was " made without his participation and conſent, he " ought to blame none but himſelf, ſince he had " reduced them to this neceſſity, by refuſing to
" hearken to their moſt humble petitions. This " covenant ſeemed contrary to law, only becauſe
" it was ſuppoſed the peoples privileges were not
" invaded, tho' the contrary was evident. Scot-
" land was a monarchy, conſiſting of a happy mix" ture of the King's prerogatives and the peoples
" privileges. This union was ſo abſolutely neceſ-
" ſary, that it was not poſſible to ſeparate theſe
" two things, without deſtroying the conſtitution
" of the government. It was very true, if the " people would injoy their privileges, they were to " pay all due obedience to the King: but it was
" no leſs true, that the King could require this obe-
" dience only as he protected the people in their " liberties. If they ſhould be ſo ſenſeleſs as to pay
" a punctual obedience to laws advantageous to
" the crown, while the King made no ſcruple to
" ſubvert the conſtitution, by aſſuming abſolute
" power, they ſhould only ſupply him continually
" with arms, to reduce them to perfect ſlavery.
" In ſhort, the deſign of their covenant was not,
" as it was induſtriouſly inſinuated, to rob the " King of his juſt rights, but to hinder him from
" ſtretching his prerogative beyond the limits of " the law."

The King's reaſons. Annals, p. 630, &c. Nalſon, p. 169. &c.

King Charles on his ſide alledged; " the Scots,
" under the falſe pretenſe that their privileges were " violated, were runing into open rebellion, by " refuſing to pay the King due obedience. In
" ſigning a league directly contrary to the rights of " the crown, they uſurped a power which was ſo
" far from being legal, that it was even repugnant
" to the laws. Their complaints in general about
" the breach of their privileges were groundleſs,
" ſince there was but one article in queſtion con" cerning religion, that is, not the doctrine but " the diſcipline of the church. Epiſcopacy had " been immemorially eſtabliſhed in the church of " Scotland. It had indeed been under a ſort of
" eclipſe ſince the reformation, at a time when the " regulation of the diſcipline was more conſidered,
" than the reformation of the doctrine. Preſbyte-
" rian government had been eſtabliſhed in the " church of Scotland by general aſſemblies only,
" who were not Sovereigns, and whoſe decrees
" were of no force, 'till approved and confirmed
" by parliament. From 1561 to 1592, the par" liament never approved it, and if the parliament,
" held that year, had their reaſons to confirm it,
" the following parliaments had ſtronger to aboliſh
" it, and reſtore epiſcopal government. Herein
" nothing was done contrary to law or cuſtom,
" ſince no man could be ignorant that the parlia" ment, which repreſents the whole nation, has " power to annul and repeal all former acts. The " male-contents could not queſtion this maxim,
" without groſly contradicting themſelves, ſince
" their Preſbyterian government could be founded
" only on the act of parliament made in 1592,
" whereby were repealed all the ancient laws in " favor of epiſcopacy. How then was it poſſible
" to ſhew, that the parliament of 1592 had power
" to aboliſh epiſcopacy, and that of 1612 no right
" to aboliſh Preſbyterian government? As to the " general aſſemblies, to which was aſcribed abſo-
" lute power in matters of religion, this power was " either natural or acquired. If natural, whence
" was it that, before the reformation, ſuch aſſem-
" blies, conſiſting only of preſbyters without biſhops,
" were never heard of? If it was an acquired power,
" they muſt have received it from the nation, that
" is, from the King and parliament. Conſequent-
" ly they were ſubject to the parliament, and their " acts could not be valid but as confirmed by the " parliament. If they had received the unlimited
" power aſcribed to them, where was the act which " granted it, and why was it not produced? Nay,
" tho' ſuch act ſhould be produced, that would " not be ſufficient, unleſs it was ſhewn withal to
" be irrepealable; otherwiſe it would be ſtill evi" dent they depended on the parliament, and con-
" ſequently their acts had not the force they pre-
" tended to give them, unleſs approved by par" liament, and the approbation unrepealed. Theſe
" general aſſemblies were firſt inſtituted at the re-
" formation, for the direction of affairs, and the " eaſe of King and parliament in the examination
" of what was to be changed or altered with re-
" ſpect to religion: but it was too true, they had
" uſurped by degrees an authority very prejudicial
" to the crown, and improper for ſubjects. As to " the liturgy, mentioned by the male-contents in
" ſo contemptuous a manner, as if it was intended " to be introduced on purpoſe to lead the people
" gradually to Popery, he had but one thing to " plead in its favor, namely, that it was compoſed
" by biſhops who ſuffered martyrdom for the " Proteſtant religion, and therefore it was very im-
" pertinent to ſay ſuch perſons had a mind to re-
" ſtore Popery, when they were manifeſtly uſing
" their utmoſt indeavors to purge the public wor-
" ſhip of every thing tending that way. If the " King his father and himſelf had deſired to intro-
" duce the liturgy into the church of Scotland, it
" was becauſe they believed it conducive to the edi" fication of the faithful, and to the baniſhing the " indecency with which divine ſervice was perform-
" ed in that church, where every miniſter made
" what prayers he pleaſed, and often without any
" premeditation, which was liable to great incon-
" veniences. Herein he had nothing in view but " the good and benefit of his ſubjects of Scotland,
" and it was injuring him in the higheſt degree to
" impute to him a deſign of introducing Popery,
" which on the contrary he abhored." As to the book of canons, he defended himſelf as above intimated, and therefore it is needleſs to enter on a repetition.

After having thus ſeen both parties reaſons, it will not be difficult to conceive the motives of their conduct, without my being obliged to diſplay them hereafter. I ſhall only add, that the male-contents, having reſolved to improve the King's friends imbecility, and the advantage given them by their covenant to aboliſh the innovations complained of, uſed not ſo much the juſteſt and moſt legal means, as thoſe they judged propereſt for their purpoſe. On the other hand, Charles conſtantly adhered to the acts of parliament, whereby theſe pretended innovations were eſtabliſhed, feigning not to ſee, in that reſpect, the leaſt cauſe of complaint againſt himſelf, or the King his father.

King Charles diſpatches into Scotland marquis Hamilton. May. Burnet's Mem. of Hamilton. p. 38, &c. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 745, &c.

Matters having reached the point above-mentioned, by the almoſt univerſal ſubſcription of the covenant, Charles concluded on ſending marquis Hamilton into Scotland, to repreſent his perſon, under title of his high-commiſſioner. He preſumed that this Scotiſh grandee, being inveſted with ſo eminent a character, would, by his credit and induſtry, reduce the people to a compliance, without giving them any real ſatisfaction, being yet extremely loath to drop his project. The tables having thereof notice, doubted not but his Majeſty's aim aim was to amuſe and ſurpriſe them, and therefore they uſed all poſſible means to divert the impending danger. I ſhall not deſcend to particulars, but content myſelf with ſaying, that the high-commiſſioner was received by the male-contents coldly and diſreſpectfully, nay, that they contrariwiſe prepared to oppoſe him vigorouſly, in caſe he offered to aſſert his authority.

Burnet's Mem. of Hamilton. Nalſon, p. 635.

Mean while his Majeſty having diſpatched away to Scotland a ſhip fraught with arms (1) for Edinburg caſtle, the tables determined on making thereof ſeizure, as apprehending Charles intended to ſurpriſe them, while he ſhould amuſe them with negociations. This reſolution could not be executed, becauſe the King's party, having notice, inſtantly unladed the veſſel, and tranſported the arms to Dalkeith, where the council then reſided. For this reaſon, the tables ſet a guard near the caſtle gate to prevent theſe arms from entering. At the ſame time the male-contents received two ſhips laden with arms for their ſervice. This affront his Majeſty would not eaſily digeſt: but the male-contents deemed it not prudent to be expoſed to a ſurpriſe, on pretenſe that the rupture between the King and them was not yet complete.

The high-commiſſioner, being come to Edinburg, offered to the male-contents conſideration theſe three propoſitions: viz.

Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 750.

1. What they ſhould expect to hear, in the King's name, for accommodating their grievances?

2. What might be expected from them, for returning to their former obedience?

3. That they ſhould renounce and deliver up their late covenant.

To which they anſwered,

1. That they inſiſted on a general aſſembly, and a parliament.

Id. p. 732, 753. Annals, p. 636.

2. That they could not return to his Majeſty's obedience, ſince they had never departed from it.

3. That they would ſooner renounce their baptiſm than their covenant (2).

The marquis had brought with him a declaration, which however he was to make uſe of but in caſe of neceſſity, becauſe King Charles was not diſpoſed to promiſe the leaſt condeſcenſion to the Scots, unleſs conſtrained. But the marquis ſoon perceived it was not poſſible to bring the male-contents to obedience, without amuſing them at leaſt with hopes that his Majeſty would have ſome regard to their grievances. He therefore thought proper to publiſh the declaration, tho' it evidently appeared, by the very expreſſions, that the King would not properly be liable to any kind of obligation. What follows is the moſt material part of the declaration, and ſhews wherein conſiſted King Charles's condeſcenſion:

His Majeſty's declaration. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 735. Annals, p. 639.

"And for farther clearing of ſcruples, we do "hereby aſſure all men: that we will neither now "nor hereafter, preſs the practiſe of the ſervice-"book, or the foreſaid canons, nor any thing of "that nature, but in ſuch 'a fair and legal way, "as ſhall ſatisfy all our loving ſubjects,' that we "neither intend innovations in religion or laws; "and, to this effect, have given order to diſcharge "all acts of council there anent. And for the "high-commiſſion, we ſhall ſo rectify it, 'with "the help and advice of our privy-council,' that "it ſhall never repugn the laws, nor be a juſt grie-"vance to our loyal ſubjects; and what is farther "fiting to be agitated in general aſſemblies and "parliaments, for the good and peace of the kirk, "and peaceable government of the ſame, in eſta-"bliſhing the religion 'at preſent poſſeſſed,' ſhall "likewiſe be taken into our royal conſideration, "in a free aſſembly and parliament, which "ſhall be indicted and called with our beſt conve-"nience."

CHARLES I AN' 1638.

Charles muſt have been wrongly informed of the Scots diſpoſition, to imagine that a declaration with ſo many reſtrictions and ambiguous expreſſions ſhould be capable of contenting them. This declaration was no ſooner proclaimed at Edinburg market-croſs, but the tables cauſed a reply, in form of a proteſtation, to be publicly read in the ſame place, the ſubſtance whereof was:

Proteſtation againſt it.

1. That no proclamation or declaration could ſettle their fears, nor ſecure them from the re-entry of any evil or innovation.

Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 758. Annals, p. 641. Nalſon, p. 39.

2. That they poſitively inſiſted on a general aſſembly and a parliament, which the King did not promiſe to call.

3. That the proclamation did not mention their complaints and grievances, but under the name of diſorders, faults and miſdemeanors, &c.

4. That the King took it for granted, he had abundantly and ſufficiently ſatisfied their fears, by his two former proclamations, and by his preſent declaration.

5. That this proclamation ſuppoſed them guilty of unlawful combination, or rebellion.

6. That it did not diſallow nor diſcharge any of the innovations complained of, but left liberty to any prelate or perſon to practiſe the ſame.

7. That it plainly evidenced his Majeſty's intentions of preſſing the practiſe of thoſe innovations in a legal way, that is, according to thoſe laws which were the ſubject of their complaints.

8. That his Majeſty did not promiſe to aboliſh but only to rectify the high-commiſſion, with the advice of his privy-council, implying the King's power, with conſent of his council, to eſtabliſh any judicatory within his kingdom, without conſent of the three eſtates convened in parliament.

The marquis returns to court. He uſes ſundry artifices to break the male-contents meaſures.

The high-commiſſioner, being better informed of the Scotiſh affairs, by ocular demonſtration, judged it expedient to go perſonally and acquaint his royal maſter. He repaired therefore to court, and ſpeedily returned with a power to call a general aſſembly and a parliament: but as for the aſſembly, he would previouſly be aſcertained what perſons it ſhould be compoſed of; and what was to be debated. This limitation the tables rejected, as tending to render uſeleſs the aſſembly. They likewiſe told him, if the King refuſed to convene a general aſſembly, they believed they were ſufficiently authoriſed to call one themſelves.

Burnet's Mem. p. 61. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 762. Nalſon, p. 45.

He offers eleven propoſitions which are rejected.

Seemingly, Charles's high-commiſſioner had orders to grant a general aſſembly, if it could not be avoided, but however to imploy his utmoſt efforts, either that the tables ſhould deſiſt from their demand, or at leaſt, if he granted an aſſembly, to clog the favor with conditions which ſhould prevent his Majeſty's ſchemes from receiving any prejudice. It was doubtleſs in obedience to this order, that he tendered to the tables eleven articles, as ſo many conditions on which he was willing to call the aſſembly. As in all probability, he had very expert ſpies, he was tolerably well acquainted with what the tables intended to do in order to reap great advantages by a general aſſembly, and theſe eleven conditions ſolely tended to render their meaſures ineffectual. The tables, being compoſed of the ableſt head-pieces in Scotland, readily diſcovered the high-commiſſioner's drift. So they replied to theſe eleven articles, ſo as to ſhew him it would be very difficult to ſurpriſe them. Nevertheleſs he was not diſcouraged, and, under color of complying with the male-contents, reduced the eleven conditions to theſe two, which however contained the ſubſtance of the eleven and tended to the ſame purport.

He reduces them to two.

Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 762. Nalſon, p. 48.

" 1. That no layman ſhould have voices in " chuſing miniſters to be ſent from the ſeveral " Preſbyteries to the general aſſembly, nor any but " the miniſters of the ſame Preſbytery.

" 2. That the aſſembly ſhould not go about to " determine things eſtabliſhed by act of parlia- " ment, otherwiſe than by remonſtrance, or peti- " tion, to the parliament".

Explication of theſe two propoſitions.

To comprehend the end and motive of the firſt of theſe conditions, it muſt be obſerved, that it was very plainly perceived in Scotland, ſince the Glaſgow aſſembly in 1610, how eaſily Charles could ſecure a majority of votes among the miniſters, whether by fears or hopes, or by preſent and real favors. For this reaſon the male-contents had reſolved not to let the miniſters have the ſole direction of religious affairs, and therefore had erected four tables, whereof that of the miniſters, which was but the third, could not determine any matter without concurence of the other three, and the general table's approbation. Moreover, when the tables had demanded a general aſſembly, they had at the ſame time reſolved, that this aſſembly ſhould be compoſed not only of the miniſters, but alſo of lay-elders, who ſhould be perſons of authority, and whoſe number ſhould exceed that of the miniſters. In ſhort, they deſigned the miniſters, who were to be ſent to the aſſembly, ſhould be elected not only by the miniſters themſelves of each Preſbytery, but alſo by the lay-elders. Marquis Hamilton, who had intelligence of their intention, laid therefore a double ſnare for them, in the former of his two conditions. The firſt ſnare conſiſted in that, feigning to be ignorant of their deſign to ſend lay-elders to the general aſſembly, he ſuppoſed it was to be compoſed of miniſters only. The ſecond conſiſted in that he pretended, the nomination of theſe miniſters for the aſſembly ſhould be made by the miniſters alone, without the lay-elders participation. He thereby indeavored to break ſuch meaſures as the tables had judged neceſſary to ſecure themſelves from the court-articles.

With regard to the ſecond condition, it is evident that, by things already eſtabliſhed by acts of parliament, he underſtood all the innovations complained of, which had been introduced ſince the year 1606, and which for the moſt part were, as was obſerved, founded upon acts of parliament. So, by this ſecond condition, he broke, ſtill more directly than by the firſt, thoſe meaſures the tables might take, to have theſe innovations examined and declared ſuch by the general aſſembly. Wherefore the tables rejected theſe two conditions, regarding them as ſo many traps to inſnare them, ſince they could not accept them without being at the King's mercy. This affair was arrived at ſuch a point that the tables were ſatisfied the innovations complained of were really innovations, and of their right to require their abolition. The buſineſs was only to deviſe procuring the ſatisfaction they demanded. On the other hand, King Charles did not in the leaſt doubt the validity of the acts of parliament whereby theſe pretended innovations were eſtabliſhed: and he poſſibly ſtill leſs queſtioned his power to introduce the liturgy and canons. But his concern was to find the propereſt means to maintain his own and the parliament's authority, and to diſpel the ſtorm which was gathering in Scotland.

The tables reject them.

State of affairs in Scotland.

Charles I An. 1638.

Marquis Hamilton, clearly perciving he had to deal with men who were on their guard, and that it would be difficult to ſurpriſe them, reſolved to take a ſecond journey to England, to acquaint his Majeſty with the ſtate of affairs. By puting the male-contents in hope that their gracious Sovereign would grant ſuch a general aſſembly as they deſired, he, with great difficulty obtained, that the election of commiſſioners ſhould be delayed 'till his return, which was fixed to the twenty firſt of September. During his abſenſe, the tables expecting only new ſnares, or freſh delays from the court (1), reſolved that a general aſſembly ſhould be held, either with the King's permiſſion, if he would grant it, or without his conſent, and that the election of commiſſioners ſhould be the twenty ſecond of September. In this interval, they ſent to all the Preſbyteries, directions, in eight articles, not to chuſe any ſuſpected miniſter, and to elect every where lay-elders, who ſhould be perſons of authority, and more numerous than the miniſters. In a word, they laid all practicable meaſures to have an aſſembly at their devotion, wherein they perfectly ſucceeded, Charles's party being every where ſo weak, that they were not in condition to oppoſe it with any ſucceſs.

Hamilton returns to England. Aug. 25. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 765, 710. Nalſon. p. 48.

The high-commiſſioner, being returned to Scotland with new inſtructions, inſtantly ordered a proclamation to be publiſhed, containing in ſubſtance theſe three principal articles:

New proclamation. Sept. 22.

" 1. That his Majeſty revoked the ſervice- " book, the book of canons, the high-commiſſion, " and the five articles of Perth.

Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 759. Nalſon, p. 52.

" 2. That for the future none of his ſubjects, " whether eccleſiaſtical or civil, ſhould be liable " to the trial and cenſure of the parliament, or " general aſſembly.

" 3. That perſons of all ranks ſhould be required " to ſign the confeſſion of faith of 1580, with the " oath he had annexed, but very different from that " of the covenant".

After publiſhing this proclamation, the high-commiſſioner ſummoned a general aſſembly to meet, at Glaſgow, the twenty firſt of November, this year 1638, and a parliament, at Edinburg, the fifteenth of May, next year 1639.

The high-commiſſioner convenes both aſſembly and parliament.

It was not without reaſon that the male-contents expected from his Majeſty ſome new ſnare. Tho' the confeſſion of faith which Charles ordered to be ſigned, was exactly the ſame with that prefixed to the covenant, the oath annexed by the King imported, that they ſwore to maintain the religion at preſent profeſſed, which was utterly deſtroying the oath of the covenant, whereby the ſubſcribers were bound to reject all the innovations introduced ſince 1580. This deceit was ſo palpable, and ſo very detrimental to King Charles's affairs, that his council, to prevent its ill effects, were obliged to publiſh a declaration, that the meaning of that oath was, that they ſwore to maintain the religion profeſſed in the year 1580. But notwithſtanding this, the tables cauſed a proteſtation againſt the proclamation to be publicly read, to ſhew, as they pretended, that his Majeſty acted not with ſincerity; that, by certain ambiguous clauſes, reſtrictions, and additions, he took away with one hand, what he gave with the other, and reſerved to himſelf a liberty to maintain, at a more convenient ſeaſon, the innovations he ſeemed to depart from.

(1) This, it ſeems, was the grand deſign of the court, as appears by one of the King's letters to the high-commiſſioner, " In " a word (ſays his Majeſty to him) gain time by all the honeſt means you can, without forſaking your grounds". Burnet's Mem. of Hamilt. p. 56.

Attempts to get the King's covenant ſigned. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 786.

During the interval between publiſhing this proclamation, and the general aſſembly, the high-commiſſioner and council uſed all poſſible indeavors to make all ſorts of people ſign the confeſſion of faith as ſent by his Majeſty, and the tables, on their part, forgot nothing to oppoſe it. But at this juncture there occured a matter of great importance, which muſt not be omited. Many grandees, barons, gentlemen, miniſters, burgeſſes, who were not commiſſioners to the general aſſembly, preſented to the Preſbytery of Edinburg an information againſt David Lindſey, biſhop of Edinburg, and at the ſame time againſt all the other prelates. The ſubſtance of this information, which contained ſeveral articles, ſome whereof were doubtleſs greatly agravated, was, that Lindſey and his brethren had not performed the conditions required of them by the Montroſs aſſembly. The deſign of this information was to prevail with the Preſbytery to ſummon, as they did accordingly, the biſhops to appear before the aſſembly, which was to be held at Glaſgow: for as the abolition of epiſcopacy was now determined on, it was neceſſary that the general aſſembly ſhould have ſome ground or pretenſe to proſecute and try the biſhops; and for this the information was intended.

The intent of it.

What paſſed in the general-aſſembly at Glaſgow. Nalſon, p. 95, &c. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 842, &c. Burnet's Mem. of Hamilt.

The general aſſembly met, at Glaſgow, on the day appointed, conſiſting of ſuch members as the tables had deſired, or rather preſcribed. The King's party was ſo weak that they durſt not make any oppoſition, and the matters to be debated had been directed by the tables, who had ſent their inſtructions to the commiſſioners. In a word, as in the aſſembly of 1610, and thoſe inſuing, King James had ſo managed as to have every thing tranſacted as he pleaſed, the tables had now taken the ſame precautions to get annulled whatſoever they did not approve. Wherefore marquis Hamilton's grand aim was viſibly to raiſe conteſts and diſputes which ſhould afford him occaſion to diſſolve the aſſembly.

Nalſon, p. 98, &c. Nov. 21, 22. Burnet's Mem. of Hamilt. p. 99. Annals.

The firſt day paſſed in peruſing Charles's commiſſion. The ſecond day, a letter from his Majeſty, containing nothing extraordinary, was read. Then the aſſembly proceeded to the choice of a moderator: but at the ſame time Dr. Hamilton preſented, from the biſhops, a declinator, that is, a proteſtation againſt the legality of that aſſembly, and the high-commiſſioner would have this declinator read firſt. But it was objected, there was no aſſembly without a moderator, and conſequently it was neceſſary to begin with his election. The high-commiſſioner, finding he could not prevail, proteſted againſt the refuſal to read the declinator before the choice of a moderator, and ordered his proteſtation to be entered. Before the moderator was choſen, the high-commiſſioner entered a ſecond proteſtation, that this choice ſhould prejudice neither the King's prerogative, nor any law of the kingdom, nor bar his Majeſty from taking legal exceptions, either againſt the perſon elected, or the election it ſelf. After that, they unanimouſly choſe for moderator Mr. Alexander Henderſon, a miniſter.

Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 847.

Nov. 23.

The third day, the high-commiſſioner urged, that the biſhops declinator might be read. But he was told, the aſſembly was not formed 'till the commiſſions of elections were examined, and ſuch commiſſioners as were preſent, known to be duly authoriſed. This affair was of more importance than at firſt view it appears. As the declinator contained reaſons to ſhew that the election of all the commiſſioners, or at leaſt of the majority, was null, it was eaſy to perceive, that theſe reaſons would come too late after the commiſſioners power ſhould be allowed, and they admited for members of the aſſembly. The high-commiſſioner not being able to obtain his deſire, entered a third proteſtation on that head, and a fourth, the ſame day, againſt the choice of Mr. Archibald Johnſton, for clerk-regiſter of the aſſembly, becauſe he had been clerk of the general table at Edinburg.

CHARLES I AN' 1638.

Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 847.

The fourth day, the commiſſions of elections were examined. But the high-commiſſioner firſt entered a fifth proteſtation, to take exception againſt their elections in his own due time.

Nov. 24.

The commiſſions examination, not being ended the fourth day, was continued the fifth. It may be imagined, that the elections which were agreeable to the inſtructions of the table were generally approved, and that means were not wanting to weaken or intirely reject thoſe which were otherwiſe.

Nov. 25, 26.

The ſixth day, the twenty ſeventh of November, was at length read the biſhops declinator, wherein, by diverſe reaſons, they pretended to prove the aſſembly's illegality. After reading the declinator, the high-commiſſioner cauſed to be read ſome other proteſtations, ſent him from ſeveral places, againſt the lay-elders right of voting at the general aſſemblies, and elections of the miniſters by laymen.

Nalſon, p. 99, 112. Annals.

The ſeventh day, November twenty eight, it was moved in the aſſembly to debate, whether the biſhops cauſe ſhould be judged, notwithſtanding their declinator. As, after ſeveral ſpeeches on this ſubject, the moderator was going to put the queſtion, the high-commiſſioner roſe up and ſaid, ſince they pretended to aſſume a right to judge the biſhops, he could not give his conſent, nor ſtay any longer with them. Then after a tedious harangue, wherein he repreſented his royal maſter's gracious conceſſions in his laſt declaration, he diſſolved the aſſembly in the name, and by the authority of his Majeſty; alledging theſe four principal reaſons.

The high-commiſſioner diſſolves the aſſembly. Nalſon, p. 115. Burnet's Mem. of Hamilt. Annals.

1. Lay-elders were introduced into the aſſembly to vote there, which, ſuppoſing there were ſuch a law, or cuſtom, had been diſcontinued for more than forty years.

His reaſons. Ruſhworth, Vol. II. p. 849, &c. Nalſon, p. 117.

2. The miniſters, choſen commiſſioners, were elected by lay-elders, contrary to cuſtom and practiſe.

3. The few commiſſioners choſen contrary to the inſtructions of the tables, had been thrown out by mere cavils.

4. The cited biſhops were to be tried by perſons who had already declared againſt them.

Remark on this matter.

It may, with regard to theſe reaſons be obſerved, that the high-commmiſſioner was not ignorant, before the aſſembly's convention, of the manner of electing the commiſſioners, or that the biſhops cauſe was to be brought before the general aſſembly. Conſequently theſe reaſons would have been as ſtrong to hinder the aſſembly from meeting, as they were to diſſolve it, the ſeventh day: but he was unwilling to give the male-contents the advantage of juſtly complaining that he had amuſed them with the hopes of an aſſembly, which he intended not to hold. He expected to find in the aſſembly's procedure cauſes or pretenſes to diſſolve it, and his frequent proteſtations were ſo many expedients, to uſe which he intended at a proper ſeaſon. But as, moſt ſeemingly, he had Charles's expreſs order to diſſolve the aſſembly, in caſe they ſhould take upon them to try the biſhops, and as this was properly the very firſt motion made, it was not in his power to ſtay for other pretenſes. He was forced therefore to uſe the ſame reaſons for diſſolving the aſſembly, as might have ſerved to hinder its meeting.

Charles found not in the aſſembly ſuch prompt obedience as he expected; tho' he had little reaſon for thoſe expectations, conſidering how the Scots ſtood affected. It was eaſy to foreſee, that the covenanters, who had reſolved to hold an aſſembly, even ſhould not his Majeſty have given his conſent, were not diſpoſed to break up, after a ſeven days ſeſſion, without having finiſhed any affair. They had a mind utterly to aboliſh epiſcopacy, with all the innovations introduced into the kirk during the laſt forty years; and, after all the ſteps they had taken, it was not likely they would ſuddenly relinquiſh their projects, and return to petitions and ſupplications, which thitherto had proved ſo ineffectual. They ſaw moreover, that the King imployed means to prevent his conſenting to their deſires, or if he feigned to have any condeſcenſion for them, it was only to gain time, and that he reſerved to himſelf the power of maintainnig the innovations, at a more favorable juncture. This at leaſt was their firm belief, and the ſudden diſſolution of an aſſembly ſo earneſtly deſired confirmed them in it: wherefore they were unwilling to neglect ſuch a fair opportunity. They had the whole kingdom on their ſide, and knew that the great diſcontents which reigned in England would not admit Charles's making any conſiderable efforts againſt Scotland. On theſe accounts it was that the aſſembly of Glaſgow continued their ſeſſion by their own authority, notwithſtanding their diſſolution in the King's name, and a proclamation publiſhed next day (1), to which they were contented to anſwer, as uſual, by proteſtation. Thus had King Charles the mortification to ſee his authority contemned, and the acts of parliament, procured by his father to introduce the hierarchy into the kirk, ſerve for foundation to a Scotiſh rebellion. Hence Sovereigns ſhould learn not to introduce any innovations but what are abſolutely neceſſary. It is certain, the reformation had been eſtabliſhed in Scotland on the Preſbyterian plan, in the ſame manner as in Swiſſerland, Geneva, France, Germany and the United Netherlands; that this ſame government ſubſiſted there 'till James VI acceded to England: that this Prince was poſſeſſed with the deſign of introducing epiſcopal government, and that Charles his ſon and ſucceſſor was no leſs eager to purſue the ſame project. The queſtion is not to know, whether epiſcopal government be good or bad in itſelf; but ſuppoſing it good and even excellent, the point is to know, whether the church of Scotland could not be without it, and whether Charles I, had ſufficient reaſon to hazard the peace of that kingdom, and his own, in order to ſupport a deſign, the execution whereof was not abſolutely neceſſary.

Theſe acts evidence that Charles was not in the wrong when he ſaid, " the general aſſemblies of " Scotland had uſurped a kind of ſovereignty in " religious affairs," ſince this is ſeen boldly to annul, by their authority, things eſtabliſhed by acts of parliament. But, as I ſaid, in the diſpute between this Prince and his Scotiſh ſubjects, the concern was not to examine the parties right, but to uſe the moſt effectual means to attain their reſpective ends. This was the courſe taken by the general aſſembly of Glaſgow. As the parliament was to meet next May, and they knew they ſhould be ſupported, they were willing to give the parliament occaſion to aboliſh all the innovations complained of, on the foundation of its being the kirk's univerſal ſentiment. It muſt be farther remarked, concerning this aſſembly, that before the ſeſſions began, the tables had uſed their utmoſt indeavors to hinder ſigning the confeſſion of faith of 1580, with the obligatory clauſe annexed by the King. But as this did not prevent its being ſubſcribed by many, the aſſembly of Glaſgow thought proper to explain the confeſſion, and decide, that it virtually contained the abolition of epiſcopacy, tho' the biſhops were not mentioned. So by this explication, they who had ſigned the confeſſion by Charles's order, had ſubſcribed the abolition of epiſcopal government. The high-commiſſioner, hearing the aſſembly of Glaſgow were upon this explication, made haſte and publiſhed lished a quite different one, wherein he attempted to prove, that episcopacy subsisted in 1580, and consequently, signing the confession of that year could not be deemed abjuring episcopacy. A very long and particular answer was made to this explication. But without entering on a discussion of the facts alledged on both sides, I shall only observe, that what I before advanced touching the ambiguity in the name of bishops, must be chiefly applied to these two papers. The marquis very well proved that the name, title, temporal rights of the bishops, were not abolished by the parliament, 'till the year 1580; but he very lamely proved, that 'till then the kirk of Scotland had been governed by bishops. The benefice had subsisted 'till that year, but the office was abolished, if not by act of parliament, at least by the custom and practise of the kirk. Contrariwise, the authors of the answer evidently shewed, that episcopacy, as to the office, was abolished by the general assembly, as far as lay in their power, and by the practise of the kirk: but they could not prove that the order of bishops was abolished 'till the year 1592.

An' 1639. Two parties in England.

Hitherto I have attempted to shew the rise of the Scotish troubles, to make it the better conceived, how far the English ought to have been concerned in the war which presently after brake out between the King and his subjects of Scotland. There were two parties in England, the courtiers, with all rigid episcopalians, who, being most fervently attached to the hierarchy, firmly believed, the Scots were in the wrong to reject so obstinately this hierarchy, established thirty years by acts of parliament. Salmonet. These looked on the Scots as rebels, and as such wished to see them chastised. The other party consisted of Puritans, under which denomination were included not only the Church Puritans, but also the State-Puritans, that is, all those who disliked the government, and thought the King assumed a power which belonged not to him. This party, tho' without posts or imployments, and continually oppressed, was however abundantly superior in number to the other, as plainly appeared afterwards. These, far from disapproving the Scots conduct, said, that the Kings, James and Charles, having manifestly introduced innovations into the kirk, the Scots could not be justly blamed for desiring things might be restored to their former state. When, therefore, the history of these troubles is read, the authors are to be distinguished. Some represent the conduct of the Scots as a real rebellion, flowing from a settled design of breaking all the bands of subjection and obedience to the King, and of utterly destroying monarchial government. Others, on the contrary, speak of the King's behavior to the Scots as really tyrannical, and pretend he had no less design to render himself absolute in Scotland than in England.

Charles resolves on a war with Scotland. Burnet's Mem. of Hamil. p. 113. Clarendon. Warwick's Mem.

Charles's party in Scotland was very weak, and consequently he had no other way than to use English troops to reduce the Scots to obedience. Accordingly, he took this course (1). No sooner had he notice, that the general assembly of Glasgow continued their session by their own authority, and that the people approved their conduct, he determined on levying a body of forces in England, to reduce the male-contents of Scotland to their duty. But as the English might naturally ask, by what reason were they bound to venture their lives in defense of the King's interests in Scotland, he thought this objection should be obviated, by supposing the Scots to have already levied an army for the invasion of England. Thence he infered, it was incumbent on him to provide for the kingdom's defense, by raising sufficient forces to repel the attacks of his adversaries. There was little probability that the Scots should think of invading England, if they were left unmolested; but it was necessary to excite the English by a dread of some imaginary danger.

CHARLES I An' 1639.

He supposes it a defensive war.

His Majesty thought not proper to call a parliament to inable him to raise the forces he wanted. Experience had taught him, that he was not to expect any great assistance from parliaments, except he would alter his maxims, and redress the peoples grievances, which was not his design. On the contrary, he flattered himself, that he should easily reduce the Scots, and then be still more absolute in England. He chose therefore to suppose a defensive war, and on that supposition summoned the nobility to attend him at York, the first of April following, each with as many horse as he could raise, and to inform the court, within a fortnight, of what number could be brought. Thus did the Kings of England formerly prepare to withstand the invasions wherewith they were menaced. But the ancient manner and this widely differed, in two respects. First, there were certain crown-lands, whose possessors were obliged to find the King troops, according to the frontiers which were threatened. Most of these lands lay in the northern counties, because of the neighborhood of Scotland, which was the only quarter whence land invasions were to be apprehended: but the tenants of such lands lying in Kent or Suffex, were not obliged to furnish troops for defense of the northern borders against the Scots; or the tenants in the north, to defend the southern frontiers when menaced from France. Whereas Charles I, without any distinction of counties, or making the least difference between those who did, and those who did not hold these crown-lands, directed his summons to all the nobles in general. Again, this method of raising troops was anciently practised only when the realm was actually invaded, or in danger of being so, or at least, when there was a war proclaimed, and judged necessary for the nation's safety. But King Charles was contented to suppose only, tho' contrary to all appearance, that the Scots intended to invade England, and under color of defending the kingdom, his real design was to attack the Scots, on account of his own interests.

Summons the lords to bring troops to York. April 9. Clarendon, p. 91, 93, Rushworth, Vol. III. p. 910. Burnet's Mem. of Hamil.

Remark on these summons.

His Majesty demands money of the clergy. Rushworth, Vol. II. p. 797, 819, &c. Annals, p. 738, 767.

But, as having troops was not sufficient, without money to subsist them, Charles used two ways, beside those already in practise, as ship-money and others, to increase his revenues. The first was to demand voluntary contribution of the clergy, by means of the archbishop of Canterbury. Laud wrote, for that purpose, a circular letter to the bishops and all the clergy, to exhort them to contribute liberally for defense of the kingdom, which was in extreme danger of a Scotish invasion. He added, by way of postscript, that his Majesty expected from the clergy a larger sum than what they were wont to give in the usual way. The second means his Majesty used was, to set his Queen upon writing to the Catholics, to incite them to aid their Prince on this urgent occasion: these two methods brought in very near what Charles expected.

The Queen writes to the Catholics on the same account. Rushworth, Vol. II. p. 820.

Beside the cavalry to be brought by the nobility to York, all the courtiers were obliged to find such a number of foot, horse, dragoons, beasts of draught,

(1) This was the course marquis Hamilton had from the begining advised him to take; namely, to send his fleet quickly with two thousand land soldiers in it, and send down arms to the northern counties of England; to garison Berwick with fifteen hundred men, and Carlisle with five hundred; and to come himself in person with a royal army. and a certain quantity of ammunition. The whole amounted to nineteen thouſand four hundred and eighty three foot, twelve hundred and thirty three horſe (1), beſide the troops of the nobility, and thirteen hundred and fifty horſes for the carriages. Moreover, Charles equiped a ſquadron of ſixteen warlike ſhips, the command whereof was given to marquis Hamilton, who was come back to his Majeſty.

Rushworth, Vol. II. p. 820.

Charles ſet out for York the twenty-ſeventh of March *, and on the ninth of April, iſſued a proclamation, to revoke ſundry monopolies, licenſes, and commiſſions, which he had granted by his letters patent. But, very ſeemingly, this was only to amuſe the people, and the proclamation was not executed, ſince, next year, he publiſhed another, to revoke thoſe very monopolies which ſhould have been aboliſhed by this. On the twenty-ninth of May, King Charles reviewed his army, which conſiſted of nineteen thouſand ſix hundred and fourteen men, beſide five thouſand on board the fleet, his own guards, and the gariſons of Berwick and Carliſle.

While Charles was making his preparations, the male-contents were not idle. They had likewiſe got together a body of forces (2); but their hopes were not ſo much grounded on their army as on their friends in England, and even at court. Some have ſuſpected marquis Hamilton, one of Charles's chief favorites, of not having, at this juncture, faithfully ſerved his maſter. As it was the King's intereſt to exaſperate the Engliſh againſt the Scots, and perſuade them, that theſe laſt were in manifeſt rebellion, it was the Scots intereſt on the contrary to ſhew, they had never any ill deſign againſt England, and if they took arms it was purely in their own defenſe. They knew the war's ſucceſs depended on the aſſiſtance England ſhould frankly concede to its Prince, and not on the aid he ſhould forcibly extort in virtue of his prerogative. And therefore their friends in England had adviſed them to have in view two things eſpecially: Firſt, to clear themſelves as fully as poſſible from the crime of rebellion, which his Majeſty laid to their charge. Secondly, to avoid whatſoever might excite the Engliſh to ingage in the war, for fear of giving King Charles the advantage of being able to ſay, they were undertaking an offenſive war. They punctually followed theſe two advices, the former, by diſperſing in England, by means of their emiſſaries, a great number of papers, wherein they ſet forth, with all poſſible clearneſs, the cauſes of their diſcontents, and the King's intentions. They forgot not to inſinuate, that it concerned England no leſs than Scotland, to oppoſe the arbitrary power aſſumed by the King, as well in eccleſiaſtical as civil affairs. They followed the ſecond advice, by obeying with intire ſubmiſſion a proclamation publiſhed by his Majeſty in Scotland, to forbid the Scotiſh army to approach within ten miles of the borders of England. By this obedience they evidently ſhewed, the war was not offenſive on their ſide. It is not unlikely, that ſome of their friends had counſelled King Charles to iſſue this proclamation, on purpoſe to afford them opportunity to give this proof of it.

The King led into ſundry errors. Annals, Nalſon, p. 174. &c. Annals. p. 739, &c. Rushworth, Vol. III. p. 937, 965. Coke.

But this was not the only advantage the Scots reaped from the counſels given this Prince by their ſecret friends. He was perſuaded, that their obedience to his proclamation was the effect of their fear; and was thereby induced to ſend another proclamation to Edinburg, commanding the Scots to lay down their arms on point of being declared guilty of treaſon, offering however pardon to all who ſhould comply with his orders, and return to their duty. Nothing could be more prejudicial to him, in Scotland, than ſuch a proclamation, which ſhewed he required a ſpeedy obedience without any conditions; but the magiſtrates of Edinburg would not ſuffer it to be publiſhed. The ſame notion, that the Scots were intimidated, cauſed him to commit another error, in ſending the earl of Holland, with three thouſand foot and a hundred horſe, into Scotland by way of Kelſey. Leſley, the Scotiſh general, having intelligence of Holland's march, detached againſt him five or ſix thouſand foot and five hundred horſe, who made him ſtop ſhort. He ſent however a trumpet, commanding them to retire, according to their promiſe. It was anſwered, he would do better to withdraw himſelf; and indeed he found it requiſite to take their advice. The earl of Holland's ingreſs, which proved abortive, freed the Scots from their promiſe of not approaching the borders, and on the morrow, Leſley marched towards Kelſey, upwards of twelve thouſand ſtrong.

King Charles then began to perceive that the obedience of the Scots was not owing to their fear, and hitherto he followed wrong counſels. Wherefore he ſuddenly determined to ſtand on the defenſive, and that very day wrote to marquis Hamilton, who was in the Frith with the warlike ſquadron, ordering him not to begin hoſtilities, tho' he had been ſent there to take all poſſible advantages over the Scots. But this reſolution was taken ſomewhat too late, after what he had juſt done, at leaſt if he had no other deſign than to make the public believe he had undertaken the war only in his own defenſe. But he had a ſtronger reaſon not to ingage too far: for, on notice of the Scots approach, moſt of his generals had adviſed him not to give battle, tho' he was much ſuperior in number of troops, which he could aſcribe only to their unwillingneſs to hazard their lives in his quarrel.

The two armies were ſo near each other, that a battle was daily expected, tho' in reality, both ſides were alike reſolved to ſtand on the defenſive. But, when it was leaſt thought on, lord Dumfermling, a Scot, came to the King's camp with a trumpet, and preſented to his Majeſty, in name of the Scots, a very humble petition, intreating him to appoint commiſſioners to negociate a peace. Charles replied, he had ſent a proclamation to Edinburg, whereby he offered his ſubjects of Scotland the free injoyment of their religion and laws, with a pardon to ſuch as ſhould return to their duty: that this proclamation had been rejected with contempt; but he deſired it might be publiſhed in the Scotiſh army, after which he would be graciouſly pleaſed to hear their petitions. Lord Dumfermling returning with this anſwer, the Scotiſh general ordered the proclamation to be publicly read in the army, which done, his Majeſty appointed ſix commiſſioners to treat with the Scots (3).

CHARLES I AN' 1639.

In the conference held the eleventh of June, between the commiſſioners of both parties, the Scots deſired three things; viz.

Their demands. Nalſon, p. 234.

" 1. That the acts of the late aſſembly at " Glaſgow ſhould be ratified in the inſuing par- " liament.

" 2. That all matters eccleſiaſtical might be " determined by the aſſemblies of the kirk, and " matters civil by parliament.

" 3. That his Majeſty's ſhips, and forces by " land be recalled; that all perſons, ſhips, and " goods arreſted be reſtored; and that all excom- " municate perſons, incendiaries, and informers " againſt the kingdom, who had cauſed theſe " commotions for their own private ends, might be " returned to ſuffer their deſerved cenſure and " puniſhment".

King Charles hereupon deſiring the Scots to give in writing the reaſons and grounds of their demands, lord Loudon, one of the Scotiſh deputies, ſaid, Their deſires were only to injoy their religion and liberties according to the kingdom's eccleſiaſtical and civil laws, and that they would not inſiſt on any point which was not ſo warranted; humble offering all civil and temporal obedience to his Majeſty, which could be required or expected of loyal ſubjects. Charles anſwered, If this was all deſired, the peace would ſoon be concluded: and indeed, he inſtantly granted what lord Loudon demanded, in the very ſame words, and on the ſame terms.

Ibid. 236. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 942. Annals.

Then the Scotiſh deputies gave in writing the reaſons and grounds of their three demands, and added, it was alſo deſired, that parliaments might be held at ſet times, once at leaſt in two or three years, by reaſon of his Majeſty's abſenſe, which hindered his ſubjects in their complaints and grievances to have immediate acceſs to his Majeſty. They took occaſion likewiſe to declare in this paper, that it had always been far from their thoughts to refuſe due obedience to their native King, or to make any invaſion upon England. They ſaid, theſe were calumnies, the authors whereof they moſt humbly deſired might be made a public example.

It was the fifteenth of June before King Charles returned his anſwer, which muſt have imbaraſſed him. He had filled all England with complaints concerning the horrible rebellion of the Scots, and yet theſe ſame people, whom he would have to be deemed rebels, deſired only to injoy their religion and liberties. On the other hand, he had levied a great army, and prepared a fleet, on pretext to defend England againſt the invaſion the Scots were mediating: but they never harbored any ſuch thought. At laſt, he gave his anſwer to this effect.

June 17.

The King's anſwer. Nalſon, p. 238. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 944. Annals. Burnet's Mem. of Hamilton, 141.

" 1. That he could not ratify or approve the " acts of the general aſſembly at Glaſgow.

" 2. That, notwithſtanding, he was pleaſed to " confirm and make good whatſoever his com- " miſſioner had granted and promiſed in his name.

" 3. That, according to the petitioners deſire, " all matters eccleſiaſtical ſhould be determined " by the kirk, and matters civil by the parlia- " ment.

" 4. That a free general aſſembly ſhould be " held at Edinburg the ſixth day of Auguſt, and " a parliament at the ſame place, the twentieth of " Auguſt next inſuing.

" 5. That upon the Scots diſarming and diſbanding " their forces, and diſcharging all their pretended " tables and conventions, and reſtoring to every one " whatſoever had been taken and detained from " them ſince the late pretended general aſſembly, " his Majeſty would preſently after recal his fleet, " and retire his land-forces, and cauſe reſtitution to " be made to all perſons of their ſhips and goods, " detained and arreſted ſince the aforeſaid aſſem- " bly".

CHARLES I AN' 1639.

Upon this anſwer, the ſeven following articles were finally agreed on, the ſeventeenth of June, wherein however was no mention of the principal reaſons of the quarrel, becauſe theſe matters were to be examined by the general aſſembly and parliament of Scotland. So, notwithſtanding theſe articles were termed Articles of Pacification, it could not but be a very doubtful peace, ſince nothing was yet decided touching the grounds of the war.

Articles agreed on.

Articles of peace. Nalſon, p. 239. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 945.

" 1. The forces of Scotland to be diſbanded and " diſſolved, within eight and forty hours after " the publication of his Majeſty's declaration be " agreed upon.

" 2. His Majeſty's caſtles, forts, ammunitions " of all ſorts, and royal honors to be delivered after " the ſaid publication, ſo ſoon as his Majeſty can " ſend to receive them.

" 3. His Majeſty's ſhips to depart preſently after " delivery of the caſtles, with the firſt fair wind, " and in the mean time no interruption of trade or " fiſhing.

" 4. His Majeſty is graciouſly pleaſed to cauſe " to be reſtored all perſons, goods and ſhips, " detained and arreſted ſince the firſt day of laſt " November.

" 5. There ſhall be no meetings, treatings, " conſultations, or convocations of his Majeſty's " lieges, but ſuch as are warranted by act of par- " liament.

6. All fortifications to deſiſt, and no farther " working therein, and they to be remited to his " Majeſty's pleaſure.

" 7. To reſtore to every one of his Majeſty's " good ſubjects their liberties, lands, houſes, goods " and means whatſoever, taken or detained from " them by whatſoever means ſince the aforeſaid " time".

June 18. Nalſon, p. 240, 247. Whitelock, p. 31.

Purſuant to theſe articles, the Scots diſbanded their troops, but in ſuch a manner, if we may credit King Charles's partiſans, that they could eaſily re-aſſemble them in caſe of neceſſity (1). This ſeems to me very probable, ſince it is certain, the readineſs ſhewn by the two parties to ſtrike up a pacification was a mutual occaſion of diſtruſt (2).

Charles nominates the earl of Traquair for his high-commiſſioner.

As the general aſſembly and parliament were to meet in Auguſt, King Charles appointed the earl of Traquair to repreſent his perſon, in quality of high-commiſſioner. This noble perſonage, who was treaſurer of Scotland, was intirely devoted to him, and it was with him that the Scotiſh biſhops and archbiſhop Laud, before the rupture, held a ſtrict correſpodence, in order to accompliſh his Majeſty's deſigns. King Charles gave him the ſubſequent inſtructions, ſigned with his own hand.

(1) The King juſtly performed the articles on his part; but the Scots kept part of their forces in body, and all their officers in pay. Whitlock, p. 31.

(2) Charles, during his ſtay in Scotland, gained James earl of Montroſs to his ſide, and much lenified the earls of Loudon and Lothian. Nalſon, Vol. I. p. 244.

Lord Traquair's inſtructions. Nalſon, p. 245, &c. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 949. Annals, p. 783.

Inſtructions given to the earl of Traquair, lord high-commiſſioner for Scotland.

" AT the firſt meeting of the aſſembly, before
" it be brought in diſpute who ſhall preſide,
" you ſhall appoint him who was moderator in the
" laſt aſſembly, to preſide in this 'till a new mode-
" rator be choſen.

" We allow that lay-elders ſhall be admited
" members of this aſſembly; but in caſe of the elec" tion of commiſſioners for Preſbyteries, the lay-
" elders have had voice, you ſhall declare againſt
" the informality thereof; as alſo againſt lay-elders
" having voice in fundamental points of religion.

" At the firſt opening of the aſſembly, you ſhall
" ſtrive to make the aſſembly ſenſible of our good-
" neſs, that notwithſtanding all that is paſſed,
" whereby we might have been juſtly moved not
" to hearken to their petitions, yet we have been
" graciouſly pleaſed to grant a free general aſſem-
" bly, and for great and weighty conſiderations,
" have commanded the archbiſhops and biſhops
" not to appear at this aſſembly.

" You ſhall not make uſe of the aſſeſſors in " public, except you find you ſhall be able to carry
" their having vote in the aſſembly.

" You ſhall labor to your utmoſt, that there be " no queſtions made about the laſt aſſembly; and
" in caſe it come to the worſt, whatever ſhall be " done in ratification, or with relation to the for" mer aſſembly, our will is, that you declare the " ſame to be done as an act of this aſſembly, and " that you conſent thereto only upon theſe terms,
" and no ways as having any relation to the for" mer aſſembly.

" You ſhall by all means ſhun the diſpute about
" our power in aſſemblies; and if it ſhall be urged
" or offered to be diſputed, whether we have the " negative voice, or the ſole power of indicting,
" and conſequently of diſſolving, except you ſee
" clearly that you can carry the ſame in our favor,
" ſtop the diſpute; and rather than it be decided
" againſt us, ſtop the courſe of the aſſembly until
" we be advertiſed.

" For the better facilitating our other ſervices,
" and the more peaceable and plauſible progreſs
" in all buſineſſes recommended to you, we allow
" you at any time you ſhall find moſt convenient,
" after opening the aſſembly, to declare that, not-
" withſtanding our own inclination, or any other
" conſiderations, we are contented, for our peoples
" full ſatisfaction, to remit epiſcopacy, and the
" eſtate of biſhops to the freedom of the aſſem-
" bly; but ſo, as no reſpect be had to the deter" mination of the point in the laſt aſſembly.

" But in giving way to the aboliſhing epiſco-
" pacy, be careful that it be done without the " appearing of any warrant from the biſhops,
" and if any offer to appear for them, you are
" to inquire for their warrant, and carry the " diſpute ſo, as the concluſion ſeem not to be " made in prejudice of epiſcopacy as unlawful,
" but only in ſatisfaction to the people for ſetling
" the preſent diſorders, and ſuch other reaſons of " ſtate: but herein you muſt be careful that our " intentions appear not to any.

" You ſhall labor, that miniſters depoſed by
" the laſt aſſembly, or commiſſions flowing from " them, for no other cauſe but ſubſcribing the " petition or declinator againſt the laſt aſſembly,
" be, upon their ſubmiſſion to the determination
" of this aſſembly, reponed in their own places;
" and ſuch other miniſters as are depoſed for no
" other faults, that they be tried of new; and
" if that cannot be, ſtrive that commiſſions
" may be directed from this aſſembly, for trying
" and cenſuring them, according to the nature of " their proceſs. CHARLES I AN' 1639.

" That, immediately upon the concluſion of this
" aſſembly, you indict another at ſome convenient
" time, as near the expiring of the year as you
" can, and if you find that Aberdeen be not a place
" agreeable, let Glaſgow be the place; and if that " cannot give content, let it be elſewhere.

" The general aſſembly is not to meddle with " any thing that is civil, or which formerly hath
" been eſtabliſhed by act of parliament, but upon
" his Majeſty's ſpecial command or warrant.

" We will not allow of any commiſſioner from
" the aſſembly, nor any ſuch act as may give " ground for continuing the tables or conventi-
" cles.

" In caſe epiſcopacy be aboliſhed at this aſſem-
" bly, you are to labor that we may have the " power of chuſing ſo many miniſters, as may
" repreſent the fourteen biſhops in parliament; or
" if that cannot be, that fourteen others, whom
" we ſhall preſent, be agreed to, with a power
" to chuſe the lords of the articles for the nobility
" for this time, until the buſineſs be farther conſi-
" dered upon.

" We allow that epiſcopacy be aboliſhed, for
" the reaſons contained in the articles; and the " covenant 1580, for ſatisfaction of our people,
" be ſubſcribed, provided it be ſo conceived,
" that thereby our ſubjects be not forced to abjure
" epiſcopacy, as a point of Popery, or contrary
" to God's law, or the proteſtant religion; but " if they require it to be abjured, as contrary to
" the conſtitution of the church of Scotland,
" you are to give way to it rather than to make
" a breach.

" After all aſſembly-buſineſs is ended, and im" mediately before prayers, you ſhall, in the faireſt
" way you can, proteſt, that, in reſpect of his
" Majeſty's reſolution of not coming in perſon,
" and that his inſtructions to you were upon ſhort
" advertiſement, whereupon many things may have
" occured wherein you have not had his Majeſty's
" pleaſure; and for ſuch other reaſons as occaſion
" may furniſh, you are to proteſt, that in caſe
" any thing hath eſcaped you, or hath been con-
" deſcended upon in this preſent aſſembly, preju-
" dicial to his Majeſty's ſervice, that his Majeſty
" may be heard for redreſs thereof in his own time
" and place (1).

Farther inſtructions to the earl of Traquair.

Right truſty,

" WE have hitherto commanded Hamilton
" to anſwer ſeveral of your letters, but that " of the ſixteenth of Auguſt being of more weight
" than any of your former, we have thought fit to
" anſwer it ourſelf.

" And whereas you ſay, that nothing will ſatisfy
" them, except in terminis, the laſt aſſembly be " named and ratified, or that way be given to " the diſcharging epiſcopacy, as abjured in that " church, as contrary to the confeſſion of faith
" 1580, and the conſtitutions of the ſame, you
" being yet in ſome hope that the word abjured
" may be got changed, and that in drawing up
" the words of the act, it be only condemned as " contrary to the conſtitution of the church: we in " this point leave you to your inſtructions, they " being

" being full, if you conſider what we have ſaid " concerning epiſcopacy, and ſubſcribing the con- " feſſion of faith 1580, we thinking it fit to declare " hereupon unto you, that let their madneſs be " what it will, farther than we have declared " in our inſtructions, in theſe points, we will not " go.

" For the ſervice-book, and book of canons, tho' " we have been and are content they be diſcharged, " yet we will never give our voice nor aſſent that " they be condemned, as containing diverſe heads of " popery and ſuperſtition; in like manner, tho' " we have been and are content that the high- " commiſſion be diſcharged, yet we will never " acknowledge that it is without law, or deſtruc- " tive to the civil and eccleſiaſtical judicatories " of that our kingdom: nor that the five articles " of Perth, tho' diſcharged with our approbation, " be condemned, as contrary to the aforeſaid con- " feſſion. As concerning the late aſſemblies, we " cannot give our conſent to have them declared " null, ſince they were ſo notoriouſly the acts of " our father of happy memory; it ſeeming ſtrange " that we having condeſcended to the taking away " theſe things they complained of, which were " done in thoſe aſſemblies, they will not be content " therewith, without laying an aſperſion on our " father's actions. Wherefore if the aſſembly " will, in deſpite of your indeavor, conclude con- " trary to this, you are to proteſt againſt their " proceedings in theſe points, and be ſure not to " ratify them in parliament.

" Concerning the yearly indiction of general aſ- " ſemblies, and the confeſſion of faith, we com- " manded Hamilton, in his of the ſixteenth, to " anſwer that point to this effect, that we think " it infinitely to our prejudice that we ſhould con- " ſent to tie ourſelf for the keeping yearly of their " aſſemblies, not needing to repeat the reaſons, " they being well enough known to you; ſeeing " at Berwick it was conceived upon debate of that " point, that your having power to indict a new " one within the year, would ſave that diſpute, " which you are by all means to eſchew. But if " this will not give ſatisfaction, you are by no " means to give your aſſent to any ſuch act, nor to " ratify the ſame in parliament.

" The article in your inſtructions, which is only " that the covenant 1580 ſhall be ſubſcribed, you " muſt have eſpecial care of, and how you proceed " therein; that the bond be the ſame which was " in our father's time, " mutatis mutandis"; and " that you give your aſſent no other ways to " the interpretations thereof, " than may ſtand " with our future intentions well known to you"; " nor is the ſame otherwiſe to be ratified in par- " liament.

" Thus you have our pleaſure fully ſignified in " every particular of your letter; which you will " find no ways contrary to our reſolution taken at " Berwick, and our inſtructions given to you there. " But if the madneſs of our ſubjects be ſuch, " that they will not reſt ſatisfied with what we " have given you power and authority to con- " deſcend to, which nothwithſtanding all their inſo- " lencies we ſhall allow you to make good to " them, we take God to witneſs, that what miſery " ſoever ſhall fall to that country hereafter, it is no " fault of ours, but their own procurement. And " hereupon we do command you, that if you cannot " compoſe this buſineſs according to our inſtruc- " tions, and what we have now written, that you " prorogue the parliament 'till next ſpring; and " that you think upon ſome courſe how you may " make publicly known to all our ſubjects, what " we had given you power to condeſcend to. And " becauſe it is not improbable, that this way may " produce a preſent rupture, you are to warn and " aſſiſt Ruthven for the defenſe of the caſtle of " Edinburg; and to take in general the like care " of all our houſes and forts in that kingdom; " and likewiſe to advertiſe all ſuch as are affected " to our ſervice, that timouſly they may ſecure " themſelves; and ſo we bid you heartily fare- " well".

CHARLES I AN' 1639.

It is plain from theſe inſtructions, that the King had ſome private intentions, to which the earl of Traquair was privy. The following letter may help to diſcover part of theſe intentions, at leaſt with reſpect to the biſhops.

His Majeſty's letter to the archbiſhop of St. Andrews.

Right truſty, and well beloved counſellor, and reverend father in God, we greet you well.

" YOUR letter, and the reſt of the biſhops " (ſent by the elect of Cathneſs) to my lord " of Canterbury, hath been by him communicated " to us: and after ſerious conſideration of the con- " tents thereof, we have thought fit ourſelf to " return this anſwer to you for direction accord- " ing to our promiſe, which you are to commu- " nicate to the reſt of your brethren. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 951. Nalſon, p. 248. Annals, p. 785.

" We do in part approve of what you have ad- " viſed, concerning the prorogating of the aſſem- " bly and parliament, and muſt acknowledge it " to be grounded upon reaſon enough, were reaſon " only to be thought on in this buſineſs: but con- " ſidering the preſent ſtate of our affairs, and " what we have promiſed in the articles of paci- " fication, we may not (as we conceive) without " great prejudice to ourſelf and ſervice, condeſcend " thereunto, wherefore we are reſolved (rather neceſ- " ſitated) to hold the aſſembly and parliament at " the time and place appointed; and for that end " we have nominated the earl of Traquair our " commiſſioner, to whom we have given inſtruc- " tions, not only how to carry himſelf at the ſame, " but a charge alſo to have a ſpecial care of your " lordſhips, and thoſe of the inferior clergy, who " have ſuffered for their duty to God, and obe- " dience to our commands. And we do hereby " aſſure you, that it ſhall be ſtill one of our " chiefeſt ſtudies, how to rectify and eſtabliſh the " government of that church aright, and to repair " your loſſes, which we deſired you to be moſt " confident of.

" As for your meeting to treat of the affairs of " the church, we do not ſee at this time how that " can be done; for within our kingdom of Scot- " land we cannot promiſe you any place of ſafety; " and in any other of our dominions we cannot " hold it convenient, all things conſidered; where- " fore we conceive, that the beſt way would be " for your lordſhips to give in, by way of pro- " teſtation or remonſtrance, your exceptions againſt " this aſſembly and parliament to our commiſſio- " ner, which may be ſent by any mean man, ſo he " be truſty, and deliver it at his entring into the " church; but we would not have it to be either " read or argued in this meeting, where nothing " but partiality is to be expected, but to be repre- " ſented to us by him; which we promiſe to take " ſo into conſideration as becometh a Prince ſen- " ſible of his own intereſt and honor, joined with " the equity of your deſires; and you may reſt " ſecure, that tho' perhaps we may give way for " the preſent, to that which will be prejudicial " both to the church and our own government, " yet we ſhall not leave thinking in time how to " remedy both.

" We muſt likewiſe intimate unto you, that we " are ſo far from conceiving it expedient for you,

" or

CHARLES I AN' 1639.

" or any of my lords of the clergy, to be preſent at " this meeting, as we do abſolutely diſcharge your " going thither; and for your abſenſe, this ſhall " be to you, and every of you, a ſufficient war- " rant. In the interim, your beſt courſe will be " to remain in our kingdom of England, 'till ſuch " time as you receive our farther order, where we " ſhall provide for your ſubſiſtance; tho' not in " that meaſure as we could wiſh, yet in ſuch a way " as you ſhall not be in want.

" Thus you have our pleaſure briefly ſignified " unto you, which we doubt you will take in good " part. You cannot but know, that what we " do in this, we are neceſſitated to; ſo we bid " you farewell".

Whitehall, Aug. 6. 1639. C. R.

The late peace very uncertain.

I have already hinted, that the late peace between King Charles and his Scotiſh ſubjects did not properly conſiſt in the ſeven articles of pacification, ſince there was no mention there of the true ground of the quarrel, but only of what paſſed after the rupture. Indeed, both parties agreed to lay down their arms; but the peace could not be ſaid to be concluded, ſo long as the motives of difference ſtill ſubſiſted. If the Scots demands and the King's anſwer be conſidered, ſuch ambiguity on both ſides will appear, that the peace muſt have been deemed very doubtful. The Scots reduced their demands to this, " That they might injoy " their religion and liberties, according to the " eccleſiaſtical and civil laws of the kingdom, " offering in return all obedience to his Majeſty, " which could be required or expected of loyal " ſubjects". The King granted this their deſire, in the ſame words, and on the ſame conditions. But there was a palpable ambiguity as well in the demand, as in the anſwer. The Scots underſtood by the laws of the kingdom, thoſe which were in force before King James's acceſſion to England, and all the innovations by them complained of; but Charles had in view ſuch as were lately inacted. The condition was no leſs equivocal, for the obedience promiſed by the Scots, related to the obſervance of the ancient laws, but that expected by the King, was founded on the late laws. Both parties muſt have perceived the equivocation in what was to be the foundation of the peace, ſince neither of the parties could be ignorant of what had occaſioned the breach. But however, both ſides feigned not to perceive it, in order to be freed from their perplexity in recurring to hoſtilities. The Scots had flattered themſelves that, conſidering the diſcontents which reigned in England, Charles would not be able to levy forces to reduce them to obedience. But, contrary to their expectation, they beheld him approach their borders, at the head of twenty thouſand men, while they had not above twelve thouſand, without reckoning his fleet, which interrupted their commerce. It was therefore their intereſt, by all means to labor avoiding a deciſion of the quarrel by arms. The loſs of a battle would have certainly reduced them to ſlavery: beſide, their friends in England diſſuaded them from runing any hazard, and made them hope they ſhould, very ſpeedily, put it out of the King's power to hurt them. For theſe reaſons, they were contented with the general demand of their religion and liberties, in order to gain time, knowing, that when matters came to be diſcuſſed, they ſhould find means to include all their pretenſions in this general demand. Nor was Charles on his ſide, leſs imbaraſſed. Tho' he had an army ſuperior in number of troops, he was apprehenſive of treacheries, or at leaſt, that his Engliſh ſubjects would not chearfully venture their lives for his ſake: ſo that the loſs of a battle would not only have occaſioned the loſs of Scotland, but even put his affair in England in a very faſtidious ſituation. Therefore, tho' he could not poſſibly be ignorant of what the Scots underſtood by their religion and laws, finding they did not explain themſelves more clearly, he took them at their word, in a belief that, at a more convenient ſeaſon, it would be in his power to give theſe terms the ſenſe which to him ſeemed moſt natural. It may therefore be affirmed, that his peace, which yet decided nothing, was concluded on very uncertain foundations, and that both parties, when they laid down, were in much the ſame ſtate as when they took up their arms. But it was eaſy to foreſee a time would come, when it would be neceſſary to explain what hitherto remained in obſcurity.

CHARLES I AN' 1639.

Clarendon, p. 98, 99. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1019.

The biſhops failed not, purſuant to his Majeſty's counſel, to preſent a declinator or proteſtation to the high-commiſſioner (1), who receiving it publicly, as he entered the church, was contented with ſending it to the King, without communicating it to the aſſembly (2). King Charles was deſirous to have in his hands ſuch a paper, that he might uſe it upon occaſion, or at a properer juncture.

The biſhops declinator. Aug. 10, 11. Nalſon, p. 246. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 952.

In the general aſſembly, held at Edinburg by his Majeſty's order, the high-commiſſioner had ſufficient intereſt to hinder any mention of the former aſſembly at Glaſgow. Nevertheleſs, there paſſed diverſe acts very little to King Charles's likeing, to which however the high-commiſſioner gave his conſent.

Acts of the general aſſembly. Auguſt. Nalſon, p. 252.

" The firſt contained the cauſes of thoſe evils " which had lately happened in the kirk of Scot- " land." Theſe cauſes, being ſix in number, were in ſubſtance: " 1. Preſſing the ſervice-book, " the books of canons and of conſecration and " ordination, and the high-commiſſion. 2. The " five articles of Perth. 3. Changing the kirk " government into epiſcopal government. 4. The " civil imploies confered on kirkmen. 5. The " keeping and authoriſing the aſſemblies in 1606, " 1608, 1610, 1616, 1617, 1618. 6. The " want of lawful and free general aſſemblies." It was therefore ordained by this act, that all theſe abuſes ſhould be aboliſhed, and the kirk reſtored to its former ſtate. To this act the high commiſſioner conſented verbally, and promiſed to have it ratified in the inſuing parliament. Likewiſe another act paſſed for better obſerving the Sabbath.

Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 958.

After which followed a ſupplication of the general aſſembly to the commiſſioner, deſiring that a book intitled The large Declaration; and written by the * dean of Durham, a Scot, * againſt his country-men, might be called in. To this the commiſſioner gave no other anſwer, but that he would " impart " the ſame to his Majeſty."

Id. p. 960. Nalſon, p. 253. * Dr. Balcanquel.

Then was preſented to the high-commiſſioner another ſupplication from the aſſembly, and the lords of the privy council, wherein they petitioned, that it might be injoined, by act of council, that the confeſſion and covenant ſhould be ſubſcribed by all his Majeſty's ſubjects in Scotland, of what rank and quality ſoever. The high-commiſſioner, by advice of the council, anſwered, that he thought himſelf bound in conſcience to approve of the covenant and, as earl of Traquair, would ſubſcribe it as heartily as any ſubject in the kingdom; but as the King's commiſſioner he could not do it, except a clauſe was added, that this covenant was the ſame with that ſubſcribed by King James VI, in the years 1580, 1581, and 1590. Whereupon the aſſembly made a new act, injoining all the kirk's members in general to ſign the covenant, with this clauſe prefixed to the ſubſcribers names:

p. 964.

"We ſubſcribe this covenant according to the "explanation it hath received from the general "aſſembly, that is, as declaring the five articles "of Perth, the government of the kirk by biſhops, "and the beſtowing of civil places on kirkmen, "to be unlawful within this kirk."

Ibid. Annals.

The aſſembly then concluded on preſenting to his Majeſty a petition, praying him to cauſe theſe acts to be ratified by parliament. That done, they appointed the laſt Tueſday in July 1640, for holding another general aſſembly at Aberdeen, without conſulting the high-commiſſioner.

Remark on theſe acts. Nalſon, p. 255.

The acts paſſed in this aſſembly plainly ſhew what the Scots underſtood by their religion, viz. that profeſſed in 1580. The aſſembly had likewiſe determined, contrary to Charles's pretenſions, that epiſcopacy was aboliſhed (1) by the confeſſion of faith of the year 1580, tho' the biſhops were not even mentioned. Whereas, Charles pretended, the national religion to be that actually profeſſed ſince the year 1606, and afterwards eſtabliſhed by diverſe parliamentary ſtatutes and general aſſemblies. Contrariwiſe, the Edinburg aſſembly declared, that the aſſemblies held from 1606, to 1618, were void, and thereby annulled the acts of parliament by which they were confirmed and ratified. As to the covenant, the ſame aſſembly, in pretending to admit the clauſe annexed by the earl of Traquair, had rendered it of no effect, by ſuch additional explication. Traquair was loudly blamed for not ſtoutly oppoſing this interpretation; nay, when he came to render Charles account of his commiſſion, a Scotiſh biſhop (2) accuſed him of treaſon, and offered to ſuffer as a traitor, if he made not good his accuſation.

Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 955.

Annals, p. 790.

Acts of the Scotiſh parliament.

By what had paſſed in the aſſembly, King Charles ſaw plainly what he was to expect from the parliament which met after the aſſembly ſeparated. Before ratification of the aſſembly's acts was propoſed, they preſented to the high-commiſſioner ſome acts, which ſhewed they were no leſs reſolved on maintaining the peoples privileges, and guarding againſt the artifices by which the court had for forty years cauſed the parliament to paſs what they pleaſed. I have mentioned elſewhere the manner of chuſing lords of the articles in the Scotiſh parliament, but it is neceſſary to explain this matter ſomewhat more clearly, for the better underſtanding how advantageous this method was grown to his Majeſty. Ever ſince the reign of David Bruce, i. e. for about three hundred years, it had been cuſtomary in Scotland, that when the parliament met, there were elected a certain number of nobles, biſhops, barons, and burgeſſes, who were ſtiled Lords of the Articles. The buſineſs of this ſelect commitee was to examine and prepare the bills which were to be moved in parliament; and as they had power to reject ſuch as they did not judge neceſſary or convenient, it rarely occurred that thoſe they admited were ever thrown out. The manner of election, ſettled at a juncture when the bad conſequences could not be foreſeen, was thus: The body of the nobility nominated eight biſhops, theſe biſhops named eight lords, the ſixteen elect biſhops and lords choſe eight barons §, theſe twenty-four elected eight burgeſſes. This cuſtom ſubſiſted without many inconveniencies, 'till James VI attempted to reſtore epiſcopacy. That Prince, as we have ſeen, began with reſtoring the biſhops and lay-abbots to their ſeats in parliament; and thereby had at his command the votes of all the church's repreſentatives. So the nobility, in chuſing eight biſhops, could name only ſuch as were devoted to the Sovereign, from whom they received their benefices. Theſe eight biſhops made it their chief care to name eight lords on whom the King might rely. The ſixteen never failed chuſing eight barons of the ſame party, and conſequently the eight burgeſſes, elected by the twenty-four, were alſo court devotees. By this means, King James obtained of the parliament the above-cited acts, to reſtore epiſcopal government in the kirk, notwithſtanding the general aſſemblies vigorous efforts. This alſo occaſioned the complaint, publicly diſperſed in writing, that Charles I, in his journey to Scotland, had practiſed illegal methods to obtain the two acts touching religion, whereof I have made mention. It is ſaid that, among the eight lords then choſen by the biſhops, three were ſuſpected of Popery.

p. 182.

As ſince that time the face of affairs had been greatly changed in Scotland, and the King had no longer any power there, the parliament, which met by his Majeſty's order, at Edinburg, in 1639, reſolved to prevent the inconveniencies flowing from election of lords of the articles. To that purpoſe, they preſented to the high-commiſſioner an act, declaring null and void whatever ſhould be done in parliament, before the ancient method of electing lords of the arches ſhould be altered. This act was founded not only on the above-hinted inconveniencies, but chiefly on the parliament's diſpoſition utterly to aboliſh the order of biſhops, whence followed a neceſſity to alter the manner of chuſing lords of the articles. Beſide, in all appearance, the parliament was willing to obviate thereby Charles's demand, that fourteen miniſters or lay-abbots of his chuſing might ſupply the biſhops places.

Whitlock, p. 31.

Beſide this act, which was very material at this juncture, the parliament preſented alſo ſeveral others, all tending to leſſen the King's prerogative.

"2. By the ſecond it was inacted, that the coin "ſhould not be meddled with, but by advice of "parliament.

Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1027. Annals.

"3. By the third, that no ſtranger ſhould be "intruſted with keeping any caſtles, nor other "perſon put in them, but by advice of the eſtates." This was becauſe Charles had lately made two Engliſhmen governors of Edinburg and Dunbarton caſtles.

"4. That no patent of honor be granted to any "ſtranger, but ſuch as have a competency of land-"rent in Scotland.

"5. That no commiſſion of juſticiary or lieu-"tenancy may be granted but for a limited time.

"6. They proteſted againſt the precedency of "the lord-treaſurer, and lord privy-ſeal, becauſe, "as they alledged, the ſame was not warranted "by a poſitive law."

There were others of a like nature, all prejudicial to the King, but which it is needleſs to inſert. It may reaſonably be preſumed that the high commiſſioner did not believe himſelf ſufficiently authoriſed to give his conſent to all theſe acts, without acquainting his Majeſty.

Charles prorogues the parliament; Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 955.

King Charles, perceiving what courſe his affairs were taking in the Scotiſh parliament, readily comprehended, from theſe introductuory proceedings, that his commiſſioner would be little able to follow his inſtructions, and therefore ordered him, by letter only, to prorogue the parliament 'till the ſecond of June 1640, and if he met with oppoſition, to declare, that the members who ſhould continue to aſſemble were guilty of high-treaſon. This order being ſignified to the parliament, met not with that compliance Charles had perhaps expected. They however brake up, but in ſuch a manner as was no leſs diſagreeable to the King, than if they had continued their ſeſſion. Before they parted, they made a declaration, importing; that the earl of Traquair had not power to prorogue the parliament on his Majeſty's letter, without conſent of the parliament itſelf: that this order was owing to miſ-informations, the parliament not having given the King any offenſe, or cauſe of complaint: that hitherto parliaments were never prorogued without their own conſent, and conſequently this prorogation was contrary to the uſage of the kingdom. They complained moreover, that Traquair and the council had ſeveral ways violated the privileges of parliament, during this preſent ſeſſion. They finally declared that, tho' they might legally remain aſſembled, notwithſtanding the prorogation, they were willing to break up, in order to give the King a proof of their obedience; but however thought proper to leave a commitee of ſome of each eſtate, to preſent a remonſtrance to his Majeſty, and attended his gracious anſwer, and to aſſure the King on all occaſions of the parliament's ſincere intention to pay him all due obedience. The declaration concluded with a proteſtation, that if any outrages and inſolencies ſhould be commited, they could not be imputed to them, ſince they were conſtrained to uſe the propereſt means to ſecure kirk and ſtate from the impending miſery and confuſion.

They break up, but leave a commitee.

Charles refuſes the commitee's deputies audience. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. p. 956, 1031.

The commitee, purſuant to that power given them by the parliament, ſent the earl of Dunfermling and lord Loudon to preſent a remonſtrance to his Majeſty. But Charles refuſed to give theſe deputies audience, as coming without warrant from the high-commiſſioner, and without communicating to him the occaſion of their journey. After their departure, his Majeſty ſent for the earl of Traquair, and ordered him to report to the council what had paſſed in Scotland ſince the pacification. It was on his ſaid lordſhip's report, and without hearing what the Scots had to ſay in their juſtification, that the council of England unanimouſly declared, it was abſolutely neceſſary to reduce the Scots to their duty by force of arms. Mean while, as this reſolution ſeemed ſomewhat too precipitate, ſince it was not yet known what the Scots might plead in their defenſe, Charles, perceiving how prejudicial this haſty proceedure might be to his affairs, permited the Edinburg commitee to ſend their deputies. But this was more for decency, than to ſee whether there would be any reaſon to alter the reſolution already taken; Charles not being ignorant of what could be alledged on this occaſion.

An' 1640. Other deputies come from Scotland. They preſent his Majeſty two petitions. Ibid.

Purſuant to his Majeſty's permiſſion, ſoon after arrived four deputies, viz. the earl of Dunfermling, lord Loudon, ſir William Douglaſs, and Mr. Robert Berkley, and preſented to him two petitions. The firſt was from the late general aſſembly, held at Edinburg, who, after thanking him for being pleaſed to conſent that eccleſiaſtical affairs ſhould be determined in the aſſembly of the kirk, prayed him to ratify their conſtitutions by the parliament. By the other petition, the four deputies deſired to be heard before ſome of the counſellors of both kingdoms, and that the earl of Traquair's report to the council of England might be given them in writing under his hand. Charles thought not proper to grant either of theſe articles: however, he appointed a commitee of the council to hear them, to which the deputies would not agree, ſaying, they were ſent to his Majeſty to juſtify the Scotiſh parliament's proceedings, and not to the council of England, who had not over the Scots any juriſdiction. To remove this objection, his Majeſty vouchſafed to hear them perſonally, in preſenſe of the commitee he had appointed. Lord Loudon made a long ſpeech in vindication of their tranſactions in Scotland; for that was the ſole motive of the deputation. But the King, feigning to believe, and being very willing to ſuppoſe they were come to treat with him of agreement, objected to them, that their powers were inſufficient, ſince they could neither offer nor accept any terms. Some few days after, the council of England declared, that the Scotiſh deputies had power only to juſtify the proceedings of their countrymen. And indeed, they had been ſent only for that purpoſe, and not to treat with the King (1).

Charles uſes artifice. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 992, 1033, &c.

It was reſolved, as I ſaid, in the council of England, to reduce the Scots to obedience by force. It is neceſſary therefore to ſhew upon what this reſolution was founded. Tho' King Charles was not by any means pleaſed with the general aſſembly of Edinburg's acts, he had no reaſon however to complain, ſince they were approved by his high-commiſſioner, authoriſed for that purpoſe by a commiſſion under the great ſeal. Wherefore being deſirous to hinder theſe acts from being ratified by the parliament, judged it properer to ground the breach occaſioned by the Scotiſh parliament's prorogation, on the proceedings of the parliament, than on thoſe of the aſſembly. He complained therefore,

Nine of theſe eleven articles were trifling. As after prorogation of the parliament, the Scots had great reaſon to apprehend that Charles intended to renew the war, the precautions they took for their defenſe could not be deemed a juſt cauſe of invad- ing them, tho' their fears had been vain. At leaſt, all theſe proceedings could have been eaſily repaired by the concluſion of a good peace. But the moſt material article, whereon his Majeſty chiefly inſiſted, was:

This letter, tho' no date appears, was written before the peace. At leaſt, lord Loudon, who was commited to the tower on that account, affirmed it, and I find not that he was ever contradicted. On the other hand, Charles, who pretended to re- ceive great advantages from this letter, never ſaid it was penned ſince ſigning the articles of pacifica- tion. Whence it may be infered, either the ſubſcri- bers forgot to date it, or the date was not ſervice- able to his Majeſty who produced it. However this be, tho' the letter was never ſent to France, ſince it was put into Traquair's hands in Scotland, Charles, who had reſolved on renewing the war, made great uſe of it to vindicate his conduct. He pretended, the Scots deſigned to introduce a fo- reign army into their country to invade England, and therefore he was indiſpenſibly obliged to defend his Engliſh ſubjects. But it will be ſeen hereaf- ter, that he reaped not from it all the advantages he wiſhed.

The uſe King Charles made of this letter. Clarendon, p. 103.

On this foundation however, he determined to renew the war with Scotland. But tho' he alledged many reaſons, as we have ſeen, it is certain his chief motive was the abolition of epiſcopacy, to which he could not conſent. Could this ſingle point have been adjuſted, the reſt were not conſiderable enough to oblige the two parties to take arms again. So, the whole queſtion of right between Charles and the Scots was reduced to this: Whether James and Charles could alter the Scotiſh kirk's govern- ment, notwithſtanding the ſame kirk's oppoſi- tion; and whether the Scots might demand the abo- lition of epiſcopacy, eſtabliſhed on the ruins of Ship-money levied. Rushworth, Vol. III. p. 968. 985. Nalson, p. 258, &c. Annals.

The war being resolved, Charles took all possible measures to have a numerous army, by taxing, as usual, each county to find a certain number of troops. On the other hand, a sea-fight between the Spaniards and Dutch, near the coast of England, furnished King Charles with a pretense to renew his warrants for the payment of ship-money. As on this occasion the Dutch, who were the aggressors, had shewed little regard to the sovereignty of the sea which Charles assumed, his Majesty loudly complained of the affront he had received, and on this foundation seemed bent to equip a powerful fleet to preserve the dominion of the sea, and defend the kingdom. Wherefore he ordered ship-money, as well as the arrears of that tax, to be levied with great severity. The sheriff of Northamptonshire (1) having sent to court a petition of the county against ship-money, the council reprimanded him very sharply, commanding him to do his office, on pain of exemplary punishment. On the other hand, sir John Finch, being made lord-keeper on the death of lord Coventry, delivered to the judges a speech, exhorting them to use in their circuits all their authority to promote this tax. So, it was evident Charles was resolved to compass his ends, follow who would, and that this imposition was grown by degrees a standing tax upon the people.

* Algernoon Percy. Northumberland made general, and Strafford lieutenant general. Rushworth, Vol. III. p. 983. Annals, p. 797.

Finally, his Majesty nominated the earl of Northumberland * for general of the army against Scotland, and gave him for lieutenant-general Thomas lord Wentworth, deputy of Ireland, lately created earl of Strafford. As he always dreaded the correspondents the Scots had in England, and for that reason durst not trust his council with all his affairs, he appointed a secret council, consisting of three persons only, namely, the archbishop of Canterbury, marquis Hamilton, and the earl of Strafford (2). These three intirely directed the King's most important affairs, and were the persons who, after mature deliberation, counselled him to call a parliament. But as his Majesty objected to them that, before the subsidies, which the parliament should grant, could be payed, he should be reduced to great straits, the secret council provided against this inconvenience, by advising him to borrow of each of his counsellors, or others who should be willing to lend, the sums he should want to supply his present occasions. The earl of Strafford alone subscribed twenty thousand pounds. The counsellors example being followed by some other lords, King Charles was inabled to make preparations for the war, before he had received any parliamentary assistance. So, the parliament was called for the thirteenth of April, and a few days after his Majesty issued a proclamation, to revoke the same patents which had served to establish monopolies, tho' they had been once before called in to no manner of purpose.

"THERE was never a King who had a "more great and weighty cause to call his "people together than my self. I will not trouble "you with the particulars; I have informed my "lord-keeper, and commanded him to speak, and "desire your attention."

Charles I An°. 1640.

Then sir John Finch, lord-keeper, began:

My lords, and you the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons,

"You are here this day assembled, by his Ma- "jesty's gracious writ and royal command, to hold "a parliament, the general, ancient and greatest "council of this renowned kingdom. By you, as "by a select choice and abstract, the whole king- "dom is presented to his Majesty's royal view, "and made happy in the beholding his excellent "and sacred person. All of you, not only the "prelates, nobles and grandees, but in your per- "sons, who are of the house of commons, every "one, even the meanest of his Majesty's subjects, "are graciously allowed to participate and share in "the honor of those counsels, which concern the "great and weighty affairs of the King and king- "dom. You come all armed with the votes and "suffrages of the whole nation: and I assure my- "self your hearts are filled with that zealous and "humble affection to his Majesty's person and go- "vernment, which so just, so pious and so gra- "cious a King hath reason to expect from all his "subjects. I doubt not, but you rejoice at this "day's meeting, and methinks you should do so "too; and good reason you have to do so, and "with all humbleness of heart to acknowledge the "great goodness of his Majesty, who sequestering "the memory of all former discouragements in pre- "ceding assemblies, is now, of a fatherly affection "to his people, and a confidence that they will not "be failing in their duty to him, who is pleased "graciously to invite you and all his loving sub- "jects to a sacred unity of hearts and affections, "in the services of him and of the common-wealth, "and in the execution of those counsels which tend "only to the honor of his Majesty, and to the "good and preservation of you all. His Majesty's "kingly resolutions are seated in the ark of his "sacred breast, and it were a presumption of too "high a nature for any Uzziah, uncalled, to touch "it: yet his Majesty is now pleased to lay by the "shining beams of his Majesty, as Phœbus did to "Phaeton, that the distance between sovereignty "and subjection should not bar you of that filial "freedom of access to his person and counsels; only "let us beware how, with the son of Clymene, we "aim not at the guiding of the chariot, as if that "were the only testimony of fatherly affection: and "let us ever remember, that tho' the King some- "times lays by the beams and rays of his Majesty, "he never lays by Majesty itself.

"In former parliaments, you have been advised "with, for the preventing and diverting of those "dangers which, by foreign and more remote "counsels, might have tended to the dishonor "and ruin of this nation; therein his Majesty's "great wisdom and providence hath for many "years eased you of that trouble, his Majesty "having, with great judgment and prudence, not "only seen and prevented our danger, but kept "up the honor and splendor of the English "crown, of which at this day we find the happy "and comfortable experience, Almighty God hav- "ing vouchsafed such success to his Majesty's "counsels, that our fleece is dry, when it raineth

" They have led a multitude after them into " a courſe of diſloyalty and rebellious treaſon, ſuch " as former times have not left in mention, not " this preſent age can any where equal; they have " taken up arms againſt the Lord's Anointed, their " rightful Prince, and undoubted Sovereign, and " following the wicked counſels of ſome Achitopel, " they have ſeized on the trophies of honor, and " inveſted themſelves with regal power and autho- " rity. Such, and ſo many acts of diſloyalty and " diſobedience, as (let their pretenſes be what they " will) no true Engliſh, or Chriſtian heart but " muſt acknowledge them to be the effects of foul " and horrid treaſon.

" The laſt ſummer his Majeſty, at his own " charge, and at the vaſt expenſe of many of his " faithful and loving ſubjects of England, went " with an army, and then they took upon them " the boldneſs to out-face and brave his royal " army, with another of their own raiſing; yet " for all this, his Majeſty's goodneſs was not leſ- " ſened by that, nor could his gracious nature forget " what he was to them, nor what they were to " him; but conſidering with himſelf they were " ſuch " quos nec vincere, nec vinci, glorioſum " fuerat," out of his piety and clemency, choſe " rather to paſs by their former miſcarriages, upon " their humble proteſtations of future loyalty and " obedience, than by juſt vengeance to puniſh " their rebellions.

CHARLES I AN° 1640.

" But his Majeſty (who is ever a-wake for the " good and ſafety of all his ſubjects) hath ſince too " plainly diſcovered, that they did but prevari- " cate with him to divert the ſtorm which hung " over their heads, and, by gaining time, to pur- " chaſe themſelves more advantage, for purſuing " their rebellious purpoſes.

" For, ſince his Majeſty came from Berwick, it " is come to his certain knowledge, that, inſtead of " performing that loyalty and obedience which, by " the laws of God, of nature and nations, they owe " unto him, they have addreſſed themſelves to fo- " reign ſtates, and treated with them to deliver them- " ſelves up to their protection and power (as, by " God's great providence and goodneſs, his gracious " Majeſty is able to ſhew under the hands of the " prime ring-leaders of that faction) than which no- " thnig could be of more dangerous conſeqeunce to " this and his Majeſty's other kingdoms. Whoſoever " they be who do, or ſhall wiſh England ill, " they may know it to be of too tough a com- " plexion and courage, to be aſſailed in the face, " or to be ſet upon at the fore-door: and therefore " it is not unlikely but they may (as in former " times) find out a poſtern-gate.

" There were heretofore two of them, Scotland " and Ireland, and both of them had their ſeveral " defenſes.

" Ireland, thro' his Majeſty's juſt and prudent " government, is not only reduced from the diſ- " temper of former times, but ſettled in ſuch a " condition of peace and, during his Majeſty's " happy reign, ſo altered and civiliſed, that, inſtead " of being a charge to him (as it was to his pre- " deceſſors) it hath yielded to him ſome revenue, " and his ſubjects there do daily give very accep- " table teſtimonies of their loyal and dutiful affec- " tion, both to his perſon and government. And " now lately, at the parliament aſſembled, they " have not only, with full and free conſent, made " his Majeſty a chearful aid towards his preſent " preparations to reduce his diſaffected ſubjects in " Scotland to their due obedience, but they have " alſo profeſſed and promiſed, that they will be " ready with their perſons and eſtates, to the utter- " moſt of their ability, for his Majeſty's future " ſupply, as his great occaſions, by the continuance " of his forces againſt that diſtemper, ſhall require; " ſo that the hopes of hurting England that way, " are quite extinct.

" Scotland then only remains, whither (as to a " weak and diſtempered part of the body) all " the rheums and fluxes of factious humors make " way.

" His Majeſty hath taken all theſe and much " more into his princely conſideration, and to avoid " a manifeſt and apparent miſchief, threatened to " this and his other kingdoms, hath reſolved, by " the means of a powerful army, to reduce them " to the juſt and modeſt conditions of obedience.

" It is a courſe his Majeſty takes no delight in, " but is forced unto it; for ſuch is his Majeſty's " grace and goodneſs to all his ſubjects, and ſuch

Charles I An' 1640.

" it is and will be to them (how undutiful and " rebellious ſoever they now are) that if they put " themſelves into a way of humility becoming " them, his Majeſty's piety and clemency will ſoon " appear to all the world. But his Majeſty will " not indure to have his honor weighed at the com- " mon beam, nor admit any to ſtep between him " and his virtue; and therefore as he will, upon no " terms, admit the mediation of any perſon what- " ſoever; ſo he ſhall judge it as high preſumption " in any perſon to offer it, and as that which he " muſt account moſt dangerous to his honor, to " have any conceit, that the ſollicitation of others " can, by any poſſibility, better incline him to " his people than he is, and ever will be, out " of his own grace and goodneſs.

" The charge of ſuch an army hath been " thoroughly adviſed, and muſt needs amount " to a very great ſum, ſuch as cannot be imagined " to be found in his Majeſty's coffers, which how " epmty ſoever, have neither yet been exhauſted " by unneceſſary triumphs, or ſumptuous buildings, " or other magnificence whatſoever, but moſt " of his revenue, and whatſoever, hath come " from his ſubjects, hath been by him imployed " for the common good and preſervation of the " kingdom, and, like vapors ariſing out of the " earth and gathered into a cloud, are fallen in " ſweet and refreſhing ſhowers upon the ſame " ground. Wherefore his Majeſty hath now at " this time called this parliament, the ſecond means " under God's bleſſing to avert theſe public cala- " mities threatened to all his kingdoms, by the " mutinous behavior of them.

" And as his Majeſty's predeceſſors have ac- " cuſtomed to do with your fore-fathers, ſo his " Majeſty now offers you the honor of working " together with himſelf, for the good of him and " his, and for the common preſervation of your " ſelves and your poſterity.

" Counſels and deliberations which tend to bene- " fit or profit, may indure diſputes and debates, " becauſe they ſeem only accompanied with per- " ſuaſions; but deliberations which tend to pre- " ſervation are waited upon by neceſſity, and " cannot indure either debate or delay; of ſuch " nature are the bleeding evils which are now to " be provided againſt.

" This ſummer muſt not be loſt, nor any mi- " nute of time foreſtowed, to reduce them of Scot- " land, leſt by protraction here they gain time " and advantage to frame their parties with foreign " ſtates.

" His Majeſty doth therefore deſire, upon theſe " preſſing and urgent occaſions, that you will for " a while lay aſide all other debates, and " that you would paſs an act for ſuch and ſo " many ſubſidies, as you in your hearty affection " to him, and to your common good, ſhall " think fit and convenient for ſo great an action, " and withal that you would haſten the payment " of it, as ſoon as may be: and his Majeſty aſſures " you all, that he would not have propoſed any " thing out of the ordinary way, but that ſuch is " the ſtraitneſs of time, that unleſs the ſubſidies be " forthwith paſt, it is not poſſible for him to put " in order ſuch things, as muſt be prepared before " ſo great an army can be brought into the field.

" And indeed had not his Majeſty, upon the " credit of his ſervants, and ſecurity out of his own " eſtate, taken up and iſſued between three and " four hundred thouſand pounds, it had not been " poſſible for his Majeſty to have provided thoſe " things to begin with which were neceſſary for " ſo great an enterpriſe, and without which we " could not have ſecured Berwick and Carliſle, " or avoided thoſe affronts which the inſolency " of that faction might have put upon us, by injur- " ing the perſons and fortunes of his loyal ſubjects " in the northern parts. Charles I An' 1640.

" To avoid all queſtion and diſpute which may " ariſe, touching his Majeſty's taking of tonage " and poundage, his Majeſty has commanded me " to declare unto you, that he hath taken it only " de facto, according to the example of former " Kings, from the death of their paſſed prede- " ceſſors, until the parliament had paſſed an act " for it themſelves. That, in like manner, his " Majeſty deſires not to claim it, but by grant " of parliament; for this purpoſe, his Majeſty hath " cauſed a bill to be prepared in the ſame form " as it paſſed to his royal father of bleſſed me- " mory, adding only words to give it him from " the firſt of his Majeſty's reign.

" This, and the bill of ſubſidies, his Majeſty " expects (for the preſſing reaſons before delivered " unto you) may be diſpatched with all ſpeed, " which his Majeſty commanded me to tell you " he ſhall graciouſly accept, as the welcome " pledges of your loving, happy, and dutiful " affection to him, his perſon and government.

" And his Majeſty is graciouſly pleaſed to give " you his royal word, that afterwards he will give " you time for conſidering ſuch petitions as you " ſhall conceive to be good for the common- " wealth, even now before you part, according " as the ſeaſon of the year, and the great affairs " in hand will permit; and what is now omited, " his Majeſty will give you time to perfect towards " winter, when your own leiſure and conveniency " may better attend it, he knowing well that theſe " ſubſidies can be of little uſe, without that more " ample ſupply which his Majeſty expects upon " the happy concluſion of this ſeſſion, and therein " his Majeſty is graciouſly pleaſed (according to " the ancient way of parliaments) to ſtay 'till your " juſt grievances be heard and redreſſed.

" And his Majeſty aſſures you, that he will go " along with you for your advantage, thro' all " the gracious expreſſions of a juſt, a pious, and " gracious King, to the end there may be ſuch " a happy concluſion of this parliament, that it " may be a cauſe of many more meetings with " you. I have now delivered what I have in com- " mand from his Majeſty ".

When the lord-keeper had ended his ſpeech, the King ſaid,

My lords,

" YOU ſhall ſee he had ſpoken nothing hyper- " bolically, or nothing but what I ſhall make " good, one way or other. The King's ſpeech.

" And becauſe he did mention a letter by my " ſubjects in Scotland, who did ſeek to draw in " foreign power for aid, here is the original letter, " which I ſhall command him to read unto you.

" And becauſe it may touch a neighbor of " mine, whom I will ſay nothing of but that which " is juſt (God forbid I ſhould) for my part, I " think it was never accepted of by him. Indeed " it was a letter to the French King, but I know " not that ever he had it; for by chance I inter- " cepted it as it was going unto him; and therefore " I hope you will underſtand me right in that".

His Majeſty delivering the letter to the lord keeper, his lordſhip began to read it, and obſerved as follows.

" The ſuperſcription of the letter is this, AU " ROY. For the nature of which ſuperſcription, " it is well known to all who know the ſtile of " France, that it is never written by any French- " man to any, but to their own King; and there- " fore The lord-keeper goes on.

CHARLES I AN' 1640.

" fore being directed (AU ROY) it is to their " own King, for ſo in effect they do by that ſu- " perſcription acknowledge.

Then his lordſhip having read the letter both in French and Engliſh, the King added as follows.

" Of theſe gentlemen who have ſet their hands " to this letter, here is one, and I believe you " would think it very ſtrange if I ſhould not lay " him faſt; and therefore I have ſigned a warrant " to lay him cloſe priſoner in the Tower.

Charles concludes the diſcourſe.

" My lords, I think (but that I will not ſay " poſitively, becauſe I will not ſay any thing here, " but what I am ſure of) I think I have the gen- " tleman who ſhould have carried the letter, faſt " enough; but I know not, I may be miſtaken".

Glanvile choſen ſpeaker. Ruſhworth, Vol, III. p. 1121.

His Majeſty being withdrawn, the commons returned to their houſes, and choſe ſerjeant Glanville for their ſpeaker.

The parliament meddles not with the Scotiſh affairs. Whitelock, p. 33. Annals. p. 822.

Charles imagined the parliament would have taken fire at hearing the letter written by the Scotiſh lords to the King of France: and therefore immediately after the commons had preſented their ſpeaker, and appointed their commitees, lord Cottington reported to the upper-houſe, that, by his Majeſty's command, he and ſecretary Windebank, with the attorney-general, had examined lord Loudon in the Tower, and that Loudon owned the letter to be his hand-writing, but alledged, it was penned before the pacification and never ſent (1). However, neither the lords nor commons would interpoſe in this affair. Some days after, Charles ſent a meſſage to the commons by ſecretary Windebank, repreſenting to them the affronts and indignities he had received from the Scots: but the ſecretary's ſpeech was heard with great coldneſs, without producing any apparent effect. Inſtead of concerning themſelves with the affairs of Scotland, the commons eagerly received a petition from the county of Hertford, complaining of ſundry grievances, as ſhip-money, monopolies, ſtar-chamber, high-commiſſion, &c. Sundry ſpeeches, not very favorable to his Majeſty, were made on this occaſion. Next day were read petitions from diverſe counties on the ſame ſubject; after which Mr. Pym roſe up and, reducing the peoples grievances to three heads, the privileges of parliament, innovations in religion, propriety of goods and eſtates, made a long ſpeech to ſhew, that in all theſe things the nation rights had been violated.

On the eighteenth, it was moved to ſend for the ſtar-chamber rolls, to examine the proceſs againſt ſir John Elliot and others. Then, it was ordered that the court-rolls, containing Mr. Hampden's trial for refuſing to pay ſhip-money, ſhould be laid before the houſe. On the twentieth, the ſpeaker being examined, anſwered, that he had refuſed to put the queſtion by his Majeſty's expreſs command; whereupon it was immediately voted to be a breach of privilege. On the twenty firſt, both houſes were ordered to attend the King at Whitehall, where, in his Majeſty's preſenſe, the lord-keeper addreſſed them in this manner.

p. 1137. Annals.

The houſes ſent for to Whitehall.

My lords and gentlemen,

The lord keeper's ſpeech to both houſes. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1137. Nalſon, p. 324.

" YOU may well remember, upon the begining " of this parliament, his Majeſty commanded " me to deliver unto you the cauſes of calling it, " which was for the aſſiſtance and ſupply of his " Majeſty in ſo great, weigthy and important " affairs as ever King of England had to require " at his ſubjects hands. CHARLES I AN' 1640.

" I am now to put you in mind what I then " ſaid unto you, and withal to let you know that " ſuch and ſo great are his Majeſty's occaſions at " this time, that if the ſupply be not ſpeedy, it " will be of no uſe at all: for the army is now " marching, and doth ſtand his Majeſty in at " leaſt one hundred thouſand pounds a month, and " if there be not means uſed to go on with this " as is fiting, his Majeſty's deſign will be loſt, " and the charge all caſt away. It is not a great " and ample ſupply, for perfecting the work, " which his Majeſty doth now expect, but it is " ſuch a ſupply, as without which the charge " will be loſt, and the deſign fruſtrated, being " builded upon thoſe weighty reaſons which tend " to the infinite good of the kingdom, and preſer- " vation of you all.

" This done, his Majeſty will give you ſcope " and liberty to preſent your juſt grievances unto " him, and he will hear them with a gracious ear, " and give them ſuch anſwer, as you and all the " kingdom ſhall have reaſon to joy therein.

" His Majeſty taketh notice of one particular, " and that is concerning ſhip-money, wherein his " Majeſty hath commanded me to declare thus " much unto you; firſt, his Majeſty never had it " in his royal heart to make an annual revenue " of it, nor ever had a thought to make the leaſt " benefit or profit of it; but whatſoever he did " or intended in it was for the common good of " you all; for the honor, glory and ſplendor of " this nation, and that every one of us are made " ſharers and partakers in the benefits, fruits, and " ſucceſſes of it, which otherwiſe you would have " felt the woes of. He hath been ſo far from " making the leaſt benefit of it, that he hath " expended great ſums of mony out of his own " coffers to work with, to thoſe neceſſary ends I " have named unto you.

" The accompts of ſuch monies ſo received have " been brought to the council-table, the monies " delivered to ſir William Ruſſel, treaſurer of the " navy, and by them all it may appear, whether " there hath been a fulneſs and clearneſs of truth " in the diſburſements thereof, for the good and " ſafety of the kingdom.

" It is true, his Majeſty had once intended this " year not to have taken that courſe, but an " army, which his Majeſty, ſo juſt a King, for " the preſervation of the kingdom, hath now taken " into conſideration; and I muſt tell you, that " his Majeſty prizeth nothing more than his honor, " and he will not loſe for any earthly thing his " honor in the leaſt; they cannot make thoſe ex- " preſſions of love, duty and affection to him, " which the graciouſneſs of his nature will not " exceed in.

" Of all his kingdoms, this ought to be the " neareſt and deareſt unto him; yet for his king- " dom of Ireland, the laſt parliament before this, " the very ſecond day of the parliament they gave " him ſix ſubſidies: they relied upon his gracious " words, the ſucceſs was that before the end of " the parliament they had all they deſired granted, " and had it with advantage. This laſt parliament " there, it is well known unto you all, what a " chearful ſupply they have given unto his Ma- " jeſty, for their hearts went with it; and let " it not be apprehended, that ſubſidies there are of

(1) There were (ſays Burnet) ſome ill-inſtruments about the King, who adviſed him to proceed capitally againſt Loudon, which is believed went very far. However, marquis Hamilton, with the King's permiſſion, tried to gain Loudon to the King, and finding him pliant, they came to a private agreement, and Loudon was inlarged and permited to go down to Scotland, having promiſed to do the King ſervice. See Burnet's Memoirs, p. 170, 171.

Charles I An' 1640.

" a ſmall value; there is not a ſubſidy granted " but it is worth fifty or ſixty thouſand pounds, at " the leaſt: conſider that kingdom, what propor- " tion it holdeth with this of England, and you " will find that it is as conſiderable a gift as hath " been given in many years. It hath wrought this " effect, that certainly his Majeſty will make it " apparent to all the world, what a good con- " ſtruction, and how graciouſly he doth eſteem " and interpret this act of theirs. I have directed " hitherto my ſpeech to you who are of the houſe " of commons; now I ſhall addreſs myſelf to " your lordſhips.

" It is true, the proper and natural ſupply pro- " ceeds from the houſe of commons, yet in aid at " this time his Majeſty hath called you hither, " and hopeth he ſhall not find the houſe of com- " mons backward to his deſires, nor your lord- " ſhips to concur with them.

" To you of the houſe of commons, I did for- " get one thing of an objection which might per- " haps be made, that tonage and poundage is " given towards the maintenance of a fleet at ſea; " let me tell you that tonage and poundage was " never intended but for ordinary preſervation of " the ſea, not that it ſhould be to defend the do- " minion of the narrow ſeas, when the navies of " all the Princes of Chriſtendom are ſo increaſed " as they are. It is fit for his Majeſty (as things " now ſtand) to have ſuch a ſtrength at ſea, as " may be a terror to others abroad.

" His Majeſty was once reſolved, that no ſhip- " ing writs ſhould be iſſued out this year; but he " was inforced for your good, and the good of " the kingdom, and for his honor, upon neceſſary " and weighty reaſons, to ſend forth writs, and " thoſe reaſons were theſe.

" It was of neceſſity for his Majeſty to prepare " an army to reduce his diſaffected ſubjects of " Scotland to their due obedience. This very year " all the neighboring Princes are preparing with " great fleets of ſhips, ſo as it is time for his Ma- " jeſty to put himſelf into a ſtrength that he may " be able to preſerve the dominion of the narrow " ſeas, without which this kingdom will be loſt, " he not able to maintain his right of being the " moderator of the ſea, whereby there may be " freedom and commerce of trade, which adds " exceedingly to the flouriſhing of this kingdom. " Another reaſon for ſhiping-writs this year is, " that thoſe of Algiers are grown to that inſolence, " that they are provided of a fleet of ſixty ſail of " ſhips, and have taken diverſe ſhips, and one " called the Rebecca of London (well known to " the merchants upon the Exchange) taken upon " the coaſt of Spain, worth at leaſt two hundred " and ſixty thouſand pounds. And therefore the " writs having gone out upon thoſe weighty reaſons, " before it was poſſible the parliament could give " any ſupply to provide for thoſe things, his Ma- " jeſty cannot this year forbear it, but he doth ex- " pect your concurrence in the levying it for the " future. I ſhall ſpeak that unto you, by his Ma- " jeſty's command, which may comfort any Eng- " liſh heart: his Majeſty hath no thoughts of in- " riching himſelf by the monies coming in upon " theſe writs; he doth deſire but to live as it be- " hoveth a King of England, able to defend you " and this nation in honor and in luſter, which " is famous abroad, and glorious at home, and to " live but like ſuch a King as every true Engliſh " heart deſireth their King ſhould be. Charles I An' 1640.

" Be maſters of your own way, ſettle it ſo ſecure " and ſo ſafe, that it may never come to the leaſt " benefit and advantage to himſelf, but for the " common good and thoſe neceſſary ends wherein " you ſhall all ſhare in your plenty, peace, honor, " and whatſoever any Engliſhman can glory in. " His Majeſty commands me to tell you, you " ſhall propound nothing wherein you may receive " all ſecurity for the property of your goods, and " nothing for ſecuring your own liberties, wherein " he will not moſt readily liſten unto you; and " be as willing to grant, as you to aſk. His Ma- " jeſty doth now offer unto you the reaſons, occa- " ſions, and the way to make this the moſt bleſſed " and moſt happy parliament ever was, and which " may produce ſuch effects, that the King may " delight in his people, and the people in their " King. And he layeth before you not only the " counſel to do ſo; but he will tell you the way, " and that is, by puting an obligation of truſt and " confidence upon him, which ſhall more ſecure " you than all you can invent, or fears or jealouſies " can imagine to be provided for; it is a courſe " that good manners, duty, and reaſon ſhould " require of you to take into conſideration."

This ſpeech was not capable of hindering the commons from proceeding in the examination of grievances, and thereby they perverted the order preſcribed them by his Majeſty. He was extremely troubled to ſee the time paſs away to no purpoſe, and that the commons ſhould ſo little regard him, as not to rely on his promiſe, of hearkening to their grievances when the affair of ſupply ſhould be ended. In ſhort, perceiving the commons were not much moved by whatever he could repreſent to them, he ſo managed, that the lords demanded a conference, where they indeavored to ſhew, that the affair of ſupply ought to precede that of grie- vances. This conference ſerved only to retard Charles's affairs. The commons taking offenſe, that the lords ſhould meddle with what did not be- long to them, voted it a breach of privilege (1). Several days were imployed in this conteſt, and many conferences held, wherein, contrary to the King's expectation, much time was loſt. Where- fore, on the ſecond of May, the King ſent a meſ- ſage to the commons for a poſitive anſwer concern- ing the ſupply he expected. But as they made no haſte to anſwer, on the fourth of May his Majeſty ſent ſir Henry Vane, ſecretary of ſtate, with the following meſſage:

Charles offended at the commons procedure.

He cauſes the lords to demand a conference. Clarendon, p. 106. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1144, 1147. April 27.

p. 1153.

" His Majeſty (the better to facilitate your re- " ſolutions) this day has thought fit to let you " know, that of his grace and favor he is pleaſed, " upon your granting twelve ſubſidies to be pre- " ſently paſſed, and to be paid in three years, with " a proviſo that it ſhall not determine the ſeſſions, " his Majeſty will not only, for the preſent, for- " bear the levying any ſhip-money, but will give " way to the utter aboliſhing it, by any courſe " which your ſelves ſhall like beſt." The King's meſſage. May 14. Nalſon, p. 341. Clarendon, p. 133. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1154.

The commons having taken this offer into con- ſideration, great debates inſued, many thinking the King's demand exorbitant (2). However, lord Clarendon, who was then a member of the houſe, affirms that, notwithſtanding the clamors of thoſe who oppoſed the court, the houſe was inclined by degrees to give the King ſome ſatisfaction. But as p. 107, 108.

(1) So high a breach (ſays lord Clarendon, p. 106.) that they could not proceed upon any other matter, until they firſt received ſatisfaction from the houſe of peers.

(2) Whitlock (Mem. p. 34.) ſays, ſir Henry Vane eſcaped not without cenſures. " That his commiſſion from the King was " but to demand ſix ſubſidies, and that his miſtake in requiring twelve ſubſidies, was on purpoſe to raiſe the houſe to animoſity." Which (adds he) took effect, but whether intended ſo or not, is hard to judge. See Nalſon, Vol. I. p. 353.

they could not come to a reſolution the firſt day, ſir Henry Vane was deſired to acquaint his Majeſty, that they hoped to return him a reply on the morrow. Mean while, it was maliciouſly told Charles, that the commons ſought only to gain time, in order to vote next day againſt the war with Scotland (1). Unfortunately, Charles gave intire credit to this information, the falſhood whereof he perceived not 'till it was too late to repair his error. So, next day, going to the houſe of lords, and ſending for the commons, he made the following ſpeech, addreſſing himſelf to the lords only:

King Charles wrongly informed. Nalſon, p. 343. Annals.

May 5.

Charles's ſpeech at diſſolving the parliament. Ruſhworth. Nalſon.

My lords,

"THERE can no occaſion of my coming to this houſe be ſo unpleaſing to me as this, at this time. The fear of doing that which I am to do this day, made me not long ſince come into this houſe, where I expreſſed as well my fears, as the remedy which I thought neceſſary for the eſchewing of what is to follow.

"I muſt confeſs and acknowledge that you, my lords of the higher houſe, did give me ſo willing an ear, and with ſuch affection did ſhew yourſelves, that certainly I may ſay, that if there had been any means to have given a happy end to this parliament, you took it; ſo that it was neither your lordſhips fault nor mine, that it is not ſo. Therefore, in the firſt place, I muſt thank you, my lords, for your good indeavors.

"My lords, I hope you remember what, the firſt day of the parliament, my lord-keeper ſaid to you in my name, and what likewiſe he ſaid in the Banqueting-houſe in Whitehall, and what lately I ſaid unto you in this place myſelf. I name all this unto you, not doubting that you do not well remember it, but to ſhew you, that I never ſaid any thing in way of favor to my people, but (by the grace of God) I will punctually and really perform it.

"I know that they have inſiſted very much on grievances; I will not ſay but there may be ſome, tho' I will confidently affirm, that there are not by many degrees ſo many as the public voice doth make them. Wherefore I deſire you to take notice, now eſpecially at this time, that out of parliament I ſhall be as ready (if not more willing) to hear and redreſs any juſt grievances, as in parliament.

"There is one thing much ſpoken of, I mean as to matters of religion; concerning which, albeit I expreſſed my ſelf fully the laſt day in this place, yet I think it fit again, on this occaſion, to tell you, that as I am concerned, ſo I ſhall be moſt careful to preſerve that purity of religion, which, I thank God, is ſo well eſtabliſhed in the church of England, and that, as well out of as in parliament.

"My lords, I ſhall not trouble you long with words, it being not my faſhion; wherefore to conclude, what I offered the laſt day to the houſe of commons, I think it is very well known to you all; as likewiſe how they accepted it, which I deſire not to remember, but wiſh they had remembered, how at firſt they were told by my lord-keeper, that delay was the worſt kind of denial; yet I will not lay this fault on the whole houſe of commons; I will not judge ſo uncharitably of thoſe, whom, for the moſt part, I take to be loyal and well-affected ſubjects, but it hath been the malicious cunning of ſome few ſeditiouſly affected men, which hath been the cauſe of this miſunderſtanding. CHARLES I AN' 1640.

"I ſhall now and as I have begun, in giving you thanks for your affections ſhewn unto me at this time, deſiring you to go on and aſſiſt me in the maintaining of that regal power which is truly mine. As for the liberty of the people, that they now ſo much ſtartle at; know, my lords, that no King in the world ſhall be more careful in the propriety of their goods, liberty of their perſons, and true religion, than I ſhall.

"And now, my lord-keeper, do as I have commanded you."

The lord-keeper then added,

"My lords, and you the gentlemen of the houſe of commons, the King's Majeſty doth diſſolve this parliament."

Next day, officers were ſent by the council to ſearch lord Brook's pockets and ſtudy for papers, he being ſuſpected of holding intelligence with the Scots. Henry Bellaſis, eſq; and ſir John Hotham, were examined in council, and commited to the Fleet, for refuſing to anſwer to queſtions concerning things done in parliament. John Crew, eſq; who had been chairman of the commitee for the affairs of religion, refuſing to deliver to the houſe of commons clerk ſuch petitions and papers as he had received, was ſent to the Tower.

Some members of the houſe of commons impriſoned. May 6. Nalſon, p. 344. Ruſhworth.

Lord Clarendon acknowledges that Charles had no ſooner diſſolved the parliament, but he was heartily ſorry for it (2). Nevertheleſs, he publiſhed the following declaration to juſtify his conduct. p. 111.

His Majeſty's declaration to all his loving ſubjects, of the cauſes which moved him to diſſolve the laſt parliament.

"THE King's moſt excellent Majeſty well knoweth, that the calling, adjourning, proroguing and diſſolving of parliaments, are undoubted prerogatives inſeparably annexed to his Imperial crown; of which he is not bound to render any account, but to God alone, no more than of his other regal actions. Nalſon, p. 345. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1160.

"Nevertheleſs, his Majeſty (whoſe piety and goodneſs have made him ever ſo order and govern all things, that the clearneſs and candor of his royal heart may appear to all his ſubjects, eſpecially in thoſe great and public matters of ſtate which have relation to the weal and ſafety of his people, and the honor of his royal perſon and government) hath thought fit (for avoiding and preventing all ſiniſter conſtructions and miſinterpretation, which the malice of ſome ill-affected perſons to his crown and ſovereignty, hath or may practiſe, to infuſe into the minds and ears of his good and faithful ſubjects) to ſet down by way of declaration, the true cauſes, as well of his aſſembling, as of his diſſolving the late parliament.

"It is not unknown to moſt of his Majeſty's loving ſubjects, what diſcouragements he hath formerly had, by the undutiful and ſeditious carriage of diverſe of the lower houſe, in preceding aſſemblies of parliaments, enough to have made him averſe to thoſe ancient and accuſtomed ways of calling his people together; when

(1) Lord Clarendon (ubi ſupra) ſays, ſir Henry Vane, and the ſollicitor general made a worſe repreſentation of the humor and affection of the houſe than it deſerved, and undertook to know, that if they came together again, they would paſs ſuch a vote againſt ſhip-money, as would blaſt that revenue, and other branches of the receipt.

(2) The ſame noble hiſtorian ſays; He conſulted, the ſame day, or the next, whether he might, by his proclamation, recal them to ſit again. Tho' lord Clarendon lays the blame upon ſir Henry Vane, yet Whitlock (ubi ſupra) ſays, it was chiefly by Laud's, and the ſecret council's advice, that the parliament was diſſolved. Dugdale ſays, the Queen was the cauſe of it. View of the Troubles, p. 61.

Charles I An' 1640.

" when, inſtead of dutiful expreſſions towards his " perſon and government, they vented their own " malice and diſaffections to the ſtate, and, by their " ſubtil and malignant courſes, indeavored nothing " more than to bring into contempt and diſorder all " government and magiſtracy.

" Yet his Majeſty, well conſidering that but few " were guilty of that ſeditious and undutiful beha- " vior, and hoping that time and experience had " made his loving ſubjects ſenſible of the diſtemper " the whole kingdom was like to be put into, by " the ill-governed actions of thoſe men; and his " Majeſty being over-deſirous to tread in the ſteps " of his moſt noble progenitors, was pleaſed to iſſue " forth his writs under the great ſeal of England " for a parliament, to be holden the thirteenth day " of April laſt. At which day his Majeſty, by " the lord-keeper of his great ſeal, was graciouſly " pleaſed to let both houſes of parliament know " how deſirous he was, that all his people would " unite their hearts and affections in the execution " of thoſe counſels which might tend to the honor " of his Majeſty, the ſafety of his kingdoms, and " the good and preſervation of all his people: and " withal, how confident he was, that they would " not be failing in their duties and affections to him, " and to the public.

" He had laid open to them the manifeſt and " apparent miſchiefs threatened to this and all his " other kingdoms, by the mutinous and rebellious " behavior of diverſe of the Scotiſh nation, who " had by their examples drawn many of his ſub- " jects there into a courſe of diſloyalty and diſobe- " dience, not fit for his Majeſty, in honor, ſafety, " or wiſdom to indure.

" How (to ſtrengthen themſelves in their diſloyal " courſes) they had addreſſed themſelves to foreign " ſtates, and treated with them to deliver them- " ſelves up to their protection and defenſe, as was " made apparent under the hands of the prime ring- " leaders of that rebellious faction.

" Theſe courſes of theirs, tending ſo much to " the ruin and and overthrow of this famous monar- " chy, united by the deſcent of the crown of Eng- " land upon his Majeſty and his father, of bleſſed " memory, his Majeſty (in his great wiſdom, and " in diſcharge of the truſt repoſed in him by God, " and by the fundamental laws of both kingdoms, " for the protection and government of them) re- " ſolved to ſuppreſs, and thereby to vindicate that " ſovereign power intruſted to him,

" He had by the laſt ſummer's trial found, that " his grace and goodneſs was abuſed, and that, con- " trary to his expectation, and their faithful pro- " miſes, they had (ſince his being at Berwick, and " the pacification there made) purſued their former " rebellious deſigns; and therefore it was neceſſary " now for his Majeſty, by power, to reduce them " to the juſt and modeſt condition of their obedi- " ence and ſubjection, which whenever they ſhould " be brought unto, or ſeeing their own errors " ſhould put themſelves into a way of humility and " obedience becoming them, his Majeſty ſhould " need no other mediator for clemency and mercy " to them, than his own piety and goodneſs, and " the tender affection he hath ever borne to that his " native kingdom.

" This being of ſo great weight and conſequence " to the whole kingdom, and the charge of an " army, fit to maſter ſuch a buſineſs, amounting to " ſuch a ſum as his Majeſty hath no means to raiſe, " having not only emptied his own coffers, but " iſſued between three and four hundred thouſand " pounds, which he borrowed of his ſervants upon " ſecurity out of his own eſtate, to provide ſuch " things as were neceſſary to begin ſuch an action " with; his Majeſty, after the example of his pre- " deceſſors, reſorted to his people in their repre- " ſentative body, the parliament, whom he deſired " (with all the expreſſions of grace and goodneſs " which could poſſibly come from him) that, taking " into ſerious and dutiful conſideration the nature " of theſe bleeding evils, and how dangerous it " was to loſe the leaſt minute of time, leſt there- " by thoſe of Scotland ſhould gain the opportunity " to frame their parties with foreign ſtates; that " they would for a while lay aſide all other debates, " and paſs an act for the ſpeedy payment of ſo " many ſubſidies as might inable his Majeſty to " put in readineſs, for this ſummer's expedition, thoſe " things which were to be prepared, before ſo great " an army could be brought into the field.

Charles I An' 1640.

" For farther ſupply, neceſſary for ſo great an " undertaking, his Majeſty declared, that he ex- " pected it not 'till there might be a happy con- " cluſion of that ſeſſion, and 'till their juſt griev- " ances might be firſt graciouſly heard and re- " lieved.

" Wherein as his Majeſty would moſt willingly " have given them the precedence before matter of " ſupply, if the great neceſſity of his occaſions " could have permited; ſo he was graciouſly pleaſ- " ed, for their full aſſurance and ſatisfaction " therein, to give them his royal word, that (with- " out determining the ſeſſion upon granting the " ſubſidies) he would give them, before they part- " ed, as much time as the ſeaſon of the year, and " the great affairs in hand would permit, for con- " ſidering all ſuch petitions as they conceived to " be good for the common-wealth, and what they " would not now finiſh, they ſhould have full time " to perfect towards winter: his Majeſty graciouſly " aſſuring them, that he would go along with them " for their advantage thro' all the expreſſions of a " gracious and pious King, to the end there might " be ſuch a happy concluſion of that, as might be " the cauſe of many more meetings with them in " parliament.

" From their firſt aſſembling, until the twenty- " firſt of April, the houſe of commons did nothing " could give his Majeſty any content or confidence " in their ſpeedy ſupplying him; whereupon he " commanded both the houſes to attend him in " the Banqueting-houſe at Whitehall, in the after- " noon of that twenty-firſt of April, where (by the " lord keeper) his Majeſty put them in mind of " the end for which they were aſſembled, which " was for his Majeſty's ſupplies: that if it were " not ſpeedy it would be of no uſe unto him, part " of the army then marching at the charge of " above a hundred thouſand pounds a month; which " would be all loſt if his Majeſty was not preſent- " ly ſupplied, ſo that it was impoſſible to be longer " forborne.

" Yet his Majeſty then expreſſed, that the ſup- " ply he for the preſent deſired was only to inable " him to go on with his deſign for three or four " months, and that he expected no farther ſupply " 'till all their juſt grievances were relieved.

" And becauſe his Majeſty had taken notice of " ſome miſ-apprehenſions about the levying " ſhip-money, his Majeſty commanded the lord " keeper to let them know, that he never had any " intention to make a revenue of it, nor had " ever made any, but that all the money collected " had been paid to the treaſurer of the navy, and " by him expended, beſide great ſums of money " every year out of his Majeſty's own purſe.

" That his Majeſty had once reſolved, this year, " to have levied none, but that he was forced to " alter his reſolution, in regard he was of neceſſity " to ſend an army for reducing thoſe of Scotland, " during which time it was requiſite the ſeas ſhould " be well guarded.

" And

CHARLES I AN' 1640.

" And beſide, his Majeſty had knowledge of the " great fleets prepared by all neighboring Princes " this year, and of the inſolencies commited by " thoſe of Algiers, with the ſtore of ſhips they had " in readineſs.

" And therefore, tho' his Majeſty, for this pre- " ſent year, could not forbear it, but expected their " concurrence in the levying it, yet for the future, " to give all his ſubjects aſſurance, how juſt and " royal his intentions were, and that all his aim " was but to live like their King, able to defend " himſelf and them; to be uſeful to his friends, " and conſiderable to his enemies; to maintain the " ſovereignty of the ſeas, and ſo make the king- " dom flouriſh in trade and commerce: he was " graciouſly pleaſed to let them know, that the " ordinary revenue, now taken by the crown, could " not ſerve the turn: and therefore that it muſt be " by ſhip-money, or ſome other way, wherein he " was willing to leave it to their conſiderations, " what better courſe to find out, and to ſettle it " how they would (ſo the thing was done) which " ſo much imported the honor and ſafety of the " kingdom.

" And his Majeſty, for his part, would moſt " readily and chearfully grant any thing they could " deſire, for ſecuring them in the propriety of their " goods and eſtates, and in the liberty of their " perſons: his Majeſty telling them, it was in " their power to make this as happy a parliament " as ever was, and to be the cauſe of the King's " delighting to meet with his people, and his peo- " ple with him.

" That there was no ſuch way to effect this, as " by puting obligations of truſt and confidence upon " him, which as it was the way of good manners " with a King, ſo it was a ſafer and ſurer courſe " for themſelves, than any their own jealouſies and " fears could invent; his Majeſty being a Prince " who deſerved their truſt, and could not loſe the " honor of it; and a Prince of ſuch a gracious na- " ture as diſdained his people ſhould overcome him " by kindneſs.

" He had made this good to ſome other ſubjects " of his, and, if they followed his counſel, they " ſhould be ſure not to repent it, being the peo- " ple who were neareſt and deareſt unto him, " and ſubjects whom he did and had reaſon to " value more than the ſubjects of any his other king- " doms.

" His Majeſty having thus graciouſly expreſſed " himſelf unto them, he expected the houſe of com- " mons would have, next day, taken into conſi- " deration the matter of ſupply, and laid aſide all " other debates 'till that was reſolved on, according " to his deſire.

" But, inſtead of giving any anſwer therein, ſuch " as the preſſing and urgent occaſions required, " they fell into diſcourſes and debates about their " pretended grievances, and raiſed up ſo many and " of ſo ſeveral natures, that in a parliamentary " way they could not but ſpend more time than his " Majeſty's great and weighty affairs could poſſibly " afford.

" His Majeſty foreſeeing, in his great wiſdom, " that they were not in the way to make this a " happy parliament (which he ſo much deſired " and hoped) that nothing might be wanting on " his part to bring them into the right way, for " his honor, the ſafety of the kingdom, and their " own good, he reſolved to deſire the aſſiſtance of " the lords of the higher houſe, as perſons in rank " and degree neareſt to the royal throne; and who, " having received honor from him and his royal " progenitors, he doubted not would, for thoſe " and many other reaſons, be moved in honor and " dutiful affection to his perſon and crown, to diſ- " poſe the houſe of commons to expreſs their du- " ties to his Majeſty, in expediting the matter of " ſupply for which they were called together, and " which required ſo preſent a diſpatch. CHARLES I AN' 1640.

" For this purpoſe, his Majeſty, in his royal " perſon, came again to the lords houſe, on Wed- " neſday the twenty-fourth day of April, where " himſelf declared to the lords the cauſe of his " coming, which was to put them in mind of what " had been by the lord-keeper, in his name, de- " livered to both houſes the firſt day of the parlia- " ment, and after at Whitehall; how, contrary " to his expectation, the houſe of commons, hav- " ing held conſultation in matter of religion, pro- " perty of goods, and liberty of parliament, and " voted ſome things concerning thoſe three heads, " had thereby given them the precedence before the " matter of his ſupply. That his neceſſities were " ſuch, they could not bear delay; that whatever " he had, by the lord-keeper, promiſed he would " perform, if the houſe of commons would truſt " him.

" For religion, that his heart and conſcience went " together with the religion eſtabliſhed in the church " of England: and he would give order to his arch- " biſhops and biſhops, that no innovation in matter " of religion ſhould creep in.

" For the ſhip-money, that he never made, nor " intended to make any profit to himſelf of it, " but only to preſerve the dominion of the ſeas; " which was ſo neceſſary that, without it, the " kingdom could not ſubſiſt: but for the way and " means, by ſhip-money or otherwiſe, he left it to " them.

" For property of goods and liberty of parlia- " ment, he ever intended his people ſhould injoy " them; holding no King ſo great as he who was " King of a rich and free people; and if they had " not property of goods and liberty of perſons, " they would be neither rich nor free.

" That, if the houſe of commons would not " firſt truſt him, all his affairs would be diſordered, " and his buſineſs loſt. That tho' they truſted " him in part at firſt yet, before the parliament " ended, he muſt totally truſt them; and in con- " cluſion, they muſt, for execution of all things, " wholly truſt him.

" Therefore, ſince the matter was no more than, " who ſhould be firſt truſted; and that the truſt of " him firſt, was but a truſt in part, his Majeſty " deſired the lords to take into their conſiderations " his and their own honor, the ſafety and welfare of " this kingdom, with the great danger it was in, " and that they would by their advice diſpoſe the " houſe of commons, to give his ſupply the prece- " dence before the grievances.

" His Majeſty being departed, the lords took " into ſerious conſideration what his Majeſty had " commended to their care, and forthwith laying " aſide all other debates, their lordſhips delivered " their votes in theſe words: 'We are of opinion, " that the matter of his Majeſty's ſupply ſhould " have precedence, and be reſolved of, before any " other matter whatſoever. And we think fit, " there ſhall be a conference deſired with the " houſe of commons, to diſpoſe them there- " unto."

" Accordingly, the next day, being Saturday " the twenty-fifth of April, a conference was had " in the Painted-chamber by a commitee of both " houſes, where the lord-keeper (by the lords com- " mand) told the houſe of commons of his Majeſty's " being the day before in perſon in the higher- " houſe; how graciouſly he had expreſſed himſelf " in matter of religion, property of goods, and " liberty of parliament; and that he would therein " graciouſly hear and relieve them, and give them

" what

Charles I An' 1640.

" what in reaſon could be deſired, with the effect " of what elſe had been graciouſly delivered unto " them by his Majeſty; as well touching his con- " ſtant zeal and affection to the religion eſtabliſhed " in the church of England, as touching the ſhip- " money.

" By all the proceedings herein declared, it is " evident to all men, how willing and deſirous " his Majeſty hath been to make uſe of the ancient " and noble way of parliaments, uſed and inſtituted " by his royal predeceſſors for the preſervation " and honor of this famous monarchy; and that, " on his Majeſty's part, nothing was wanting " that could be expected from a King, whereby " this parliament might have had a happy conclu- " ſion, for the comfort and content of his Ma- " jeſty's ſubjects, and for the good and ſafety of " this kingdom.

" On the contrary, it is apparent, how thoſe of " the houſe of commons (whoſe ſiniſter and mali- " cious courſes inforced his Majeſty to diſſolve this " parliament) have vitiated and abuſed that ancient " and noble way of parliament, perverting the " fame to their own unworthy ends, and forgeting " the true uſe and inſtitution of parliaments.

" For whereas theſe meetings and aſſemblies of " his Majeſty with the peers and commons of this " realm were, in their firſt original, and in the " practiſe of all ſucceeding ages, ordained and held " as pledges and teſtimonies of affection between " the King and his people; the King for his part " graciouſly hearing and redreſſing ſuch grievances " as his people, in humble and dutiful manner, " ſhould repreſent unto him; and the ſubjects " on their part (as teſtimonies of their duty) ſup- " plying his Majeſty upon all extraordinary occa- " ſions, for ſupport of his honor and ſovereignty, " and for preſerving the kingdom in glory and " ſafety.

" Thoſe ill-affected members of the houſe of " commons, inſtead of an humble and dutiful way " of preſenting their grievances to his Majeſty, " have taken upon them to be the guiders and di- " rectors in all matters which concern his Ma- " jeſty's government, both temporal and eccleſia- " ſtical: and (as if Kings were bound to give ac- " count of their regal actions, and of their manner " of government to their ſubjects aſſembled in par- " liament) they have, in a very audacious and in- " ſolent way, entered into examination and cenſur- " ing of the preſent government, traduced his Ma- " jeſty's adminiſtration of juſtice, rendered, as " much as in them lay, odious to the reſt of his " Majeſty's ſubjects, not only the officers and mi- " niſters of ſtate, but even his Majeſty's very govern- " ment, which hath been ſo juſt and gracious, that " never did this or any other nation injoy more " bleſſings and happineſs than hath been, by all his " Majeſty's ſubjects, injoyed ever ſince his Ma- " jeſty's acceſs to the crown: nor did this kingdom " ever ſo flouriſh in trade and commerce as at this " preſent, or partake of more peace and plenty in " all kinds whatſoever.

" And whereas, the ordinary revenues of the " crown not ſufficing to defray extraordinary charges, " it hath ever been the uſage in all parliaments, to " aid and aſſiſt the Kings of this realm with free " and fiting ſupply, towards the maintenance of " their wars, and for making good their royal un- " dertakings; whereby the kingdom intruſted to " their protection, might be held up in ſplendor " and greatneſs.

" Theſe ill-affected perſons of the houſe of com- " mons, have been ſo far from treading in the ſteps " of their anceſtors, by their dutiful expreſſions in " this kind, that contrarily they have introduced a " way of bargaining and contracting with the King; " as if nothing ought to be given him by them, " but what he ſhould buy or purchaſe of them, " either by quiting ſomewhat of his royal preroga- " tive, or by diminiſhing and leſſening his reve- " nues; which courſes of theirs, how repugnant " they are to the duty of ſubjects, how unfit for his " Majeſty in honor to permit and ſuffer, and what " hazard and diſhonor they ſubject this kingdom " to, all men may eaſily judge who will but equal- " ly and impartially weigh them. Charles I An' 1640.

" His Majeſty hath been, by this means, re- " duced to ſuch ſtraits and extremities that, was " not his care of the public good and ſafety the " greater, theſe men (as much as in them lies) " would quickly bring ruin and confuſion to the " ſtate, and render contemptible this glorious mo- " narchy.

" But this frowardneſs and undutiful behavior of " theirs, cannot leſſen his Majeſty's care of pre- " ſerving the kingdoms intruſted to his protection " and government, nor his gracious and tender af- " fection to his people, for whoſe good and com- " fort his Majeſty, by God's gracious aſſiſtance, " will ſo provide, that all his loving ſubjects may " ſtill injoy the happineſs of living under the bleſſed " ſhade and protection of his royal ſcepter.

" In the mean time, to the end all his Majeſty's " loving ſubjects may know how graciouſly his Ma- " jeſty is inclined to hear and redreſs all the juſt " grievances of his people, as well out of parlia- " ment as in parliament, his Majeſty doth hereby " farther declare his royal will and pleaſure, that " all his loving ſubjects, who have any juſt cauſe " to preſent, or complain of any grievances or op- " preſſions, may freely addreſs themſelves by their " humble petitions to his ſacred Majeſty, who will " graciouſly hear their complaints, and give ſuch " fiting redreſs therein, that all his people ſhall " have juſt cauſe to acknowledge his grace and " goodneſs towards them; and to be fully ſatisfied, " that no perſons or aſſemblies can more prevail " with his Majeſty than the piety and juſtice of his " own royal nature, and the tender affection he doth " and ſhall ever bear to all his people and loving " ſubjects."

After reading this declaration, the inſerting it here at length will perhaps be thought needleſs, ſince it contains nothing but what was related before. However, it is of uſe to ſhew, that King Charles and his adverſaries agreed as to facts, and diſputed only on the right and conſequences.

Charles continues the convocation. Clarendon, p. 116. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1172. Nalſon, p. 364.

Tho' the parliament was diſſolved, King Charles continued the convocation, under the title of ſynod. Since the Reformation, it had been always cuſtomary to aſſemble the clergy at the ſame time with parliaments, and this aſſembly of the clergy was ſtiled convocation, and ever commenced and cloſed with the parliament. Charles, not thinking himſelf bound to a ſtrict obſervance of this cuſtom, diſſolved the parliament, and continued the convocation, contrary to the opinion of ſeveral (1), who believed that he thereby exceeded his power. But the national judges determined that, notwithſtanding the parliament's diſſolution, the convocation ſubſiſted, except diſſolved by the royal writ. The convocation therefore continued a month longer, and in that time did two things which gave occaſion to great complaints in the inſuing parliament. Firſt, they made certain canons, whereby all eccleſiaſtics and graduates, graduates, in the univerſities, were injoined to take the following oath (1).

Oath injoined by the convocation. Id. p. 374. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1186. Annals, p. 845.

"I A. B. do ſwear, that I approve the doctrine and diſcipline, or government eſtabliſhed in the church of England, as containing all things neceſſary to ſalvation: and that I will not indeavor, by my ſelf or any other, directly or indirectly, to bring in any Popiſh doctrine, contrary to that which is ſo eſtabliſhed: nor will I ever give my conſent to alter the government of this church, by archbiſhops, biſhops, deans, and archdeacons, &c. as it now ſtands eſtabliſhed, and as by right it ought to ſtand; nor yet ever to ſubject it to the uſurpations and ſuperſtitions of the See of Rome. And all theſe things I do plainly and ſincerely acknowledge and ſwear, according to the plain and common ſenſe and underſtanding of the ſame words, without any equivocation, or mental evaſion, or ſecret reſervation whatſoever. And this I do heartily, willingly, and truly upon the faith of a Chriſtian. So help me God in Jeſus Chriſt."

Objections againſt this oath. Nalſon, p. 396, 398. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1205, &c. Annals.

This oath was thought very ſtrange, for ſeveral reaſons. 1. It was not liked that the clergy ſhould take upon them to injoin oaths, which, according to the general opinion, belonged to the parliament only. The et cætera after the word archdeacons, offended many, becauſe thoſe who ſwore could not tell what they were to underſtand by this abbreviation. 3. The preſcribing ſuch an oath was affirmed to be a confinement, and tying-down of the civil legiſlature, ſince thereby the government was deprived of the liberty of making any alteration in church-diſcipline, which nevertheleſs might be altered without any danger to ſalvation. 4. It was objected, that the perſon was to declare, "he "took the oath moſt willingly," tho' he was conſtrained thereto under very ſevere penalties.

The clergy give his Majeſty a ſubſidy. Nalſon. Whitelock.

The ſecond thing the convocation did before they brake up, was granting his Majeſty, for the Scotiſh war, a ſubſidy of four ſhillings in the pound, for ſix years. This proceeding, which tended to diminiſh the parliament's power, was no leſs diſliked than the former. It is true that, to juſtify it, a precedent was alledged; for it muſt be obſerved that, in this reign, examples or precedents, in favor of the crown, were regarded as ſo many ſtatutes. The clergy, it ſeems, in the year 1585, after having granted Queen Elizabeth a ſubſidy approved in parliament, made a voluntary addition of two ſhillings in the pound, which her ſaid Majeſty accepted without conſulting the parliament. But, beſide that this was a ſingle precedent, the difference between Elizabeth's and Charles I's times was very great. In that Queen's days, every one was pleaſed with the government. It was almoſt generally believed that her Majeſty was not capable of making any ill uſe of theſe unuſual favors, but imployed the money given her ſolely for the kingdom's benefit. In Charles I's time, the caſe was widely different. This Prince was not at all confided in. It was experimentally known, that he would draw from the leaſt precedent conſequences deſtructive of parliamentary liberties, and in a word, the number of male-contents was infinite: nay, King Charles ſeemed to do whatever lay in his power to increaſe it, or at leaſt ſhewed no regard: and what ſtill more inflamed the peoples diſcontent, was their ſeeing the Popiſh recuſants not only tolerated, but moreover protected, countenanced, and conſidered as the beſt ſubjects. They reſorted publicly to maſs at Somerſet-houſe, and returned thence in great multitudes, as if their churches had been allowed by authority. At London was reſident a public agent from Rome, viz. count Rozetti, who openly went to court in great ſtate, and whoſe houſe was the grand rendezvous for Catholics. The Queen had prevailed with her conſort to receive this agent as a ſort of nuncio, and by that, as well as by the avowed protection ſhe afforded thoſe of her creed, ſhe ſo drew upon herſelf the peoples hatred, that they were even wanting in that outward reſpect they ought to have paid her.

The people diſcontented.

Papiſts countenanced. Clarendon, p. 116, 117.

The Scots incite the Engliſh againſt their King. Nalſon, p. 395.

Theſe flames of diſcontent were fomented by the Scots, who, ſeeing themſelves on the point of being attacked, were extremely diligent, by means of their emiſſaries, to inſenſe the people againſt King Charles. In juſtifying their own conduct, they forgot not inſinuating to the Engliſh, that the tyranny which was intended to be eſtabliſhed in Scotland, was in order to introduce the like into England: and that if the King labored to ſupport the hierarchy, erected in the kirk of Scotland by his father and himſelf, it was not ſo much for the ſake of epiſcopal government, as in order to eſtabliſh in that kingdom a deſpotiſm, which would be one day fatal to the Engliſh; nay, that there was great danger, that after the accompliſhment of his deſigns, he would reſtore Popery in his kingdoms, ſince he could refuſe nothing to his Queen, Laud, and the other enemies of reformation. Charles himſelf, by his conduct, rendered theſe inſinuations ſo plauſible, that beſide the Preſbyterians, who were very numerous, many church of England men could not but be under a dread that his Majeſty's zeal for the church was only to ingage them to be ſubſervient to his more hidden deſigns. Howſoever this be, the kingdom was full of ſuſpicions, fears, jealouſies and diviſions, ſo that if the King had been well-informed, he might eaſily have perceived that very few ſerved him willingly and chearfully, in the war he was undertaking againſt Scotland. This he was fully convinced of ſoon after.

Charles uſes ſundry ways to raiſe money. Nalſon, p. 377, 389.

Charles, thus ingaged in a war with Scotland without having received any ſupply from the parliament, was greatly ſtraitened. He even foreſaw, that it would not be poſſible for him to ſupport his army, except he had recourſe to extraordinary methods to raiſe money. Accordingly, he made uſe of the following expedients, to ſupply in part what he had expected from the parliament. 1. He ordered, that the counties ſhould advance coat and conduct money for their reſpective troops (2). 2. He bought upon credit of the Eaſt-India merchants all their pepper, and ſold it again for ready money. 3. He took forty thouſand pounds worth of bullion the merchants had brought into the mint to be coined, which ſum was afterwards punctually repaid repaid (1). 4. He would have borrowed two hundred thouſand pounds of the city of London, but had the mortification to meet with a denial. He was thereat ſo nettled that he reſolved on this revenge. The city, having ſome time before ſettled a colony at Londonderry in Ireland, had obtained from him a patent for certain lands in that country. On the Londoners refuſing to lend him money, the lord mayor and ſheriffs were cited before the ſtar-chamber, to anſwer to the charge of having abuſed the patent, by uſurping more lands than his Majeſty had granted to the city. Upon this charge, whether well or ill-grounded, the Londoners were condemned to forfeit their rights, and grievouſly fined; but upon payment of the fine, their patent was reſtored (2) They had afterwards, in their turn, but too many opportunities of retaliating. On the other hand, the writ to levy ſhip-money having been ſent to the city of London, as well as to all the other towns in England, it appeared that the lord mayor and city-council had neglected levying this tax, or at leaſt they had not diſtrained any one perſon for non-payment, according to the tenor of the writ. For this reaſon, the council ſent this order to the attorney-general, viz.

Order from the council againſt London. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1203.

"WHereas the lord mayor of London, and the two ſheriffs, did this day appear before his Majeſty and the board, to give account of their proceedings upon the writ for the ſhip-buſineſs this preſent year: foraſmuch as it did appear that, beſide all former neglects in the execution of that writ, his Majeſty having reſpited the information againſt them for the ſame; yet they have not ſince diſtrained any one perſon according to the ſaid writ. It was this day ordered by his Majeſty, with the advice of the board, that his Majeſty's attorney-general ſhall forthwith prefer an information in the ſtar-chamber againſt the lord mayor, and ſheriffs of London and Middleſex, for their contempt and default in the execution of the ſaid writ; and ſhall forthwith proceed againſt them, 'de die in diem,' until the cauſe be ready for hearing: and if upon examination of the ſaid cauſe, his Majeſty's attorney-general ſhall find ſufficient cauſe againſt any of the aldermen, that then he do prefer one other information againſt the ſaid aldermen; and in like manner do proceed againſt them apart."

Thus did King Charles, inſtead of relinquiſhing this deteſted impoſt, continue exacting it with great rigor, tho' his affairs were then at a criſis which ſhould have inſpired him with a dread that, in caſe the ſucceſs of the Scotiſh war anſwered not his expectations, he ſhould be little able to ſupport himſelf: but, very ſeemingly, he thought he was quite ſure of victory.

The Engliſh routed in defending the paſs of the Tine. Auguſt 28. Nalſon, p. 400, 425.

Part of the army deſigned againſt Scotland was now upon the frontiers, under conduct of lord Conway, general of the horſe, while the reſt lay incamped near York. The earl of Northumberland, who was to command in chief under his Majeſty, remained ſick at London, and the earl of Strafford, lieutenant-general, had not been able to ſet out early enough, he being a moſt neceſſary member of the King's ſecret council. Lord Conway, being advanced as far as Newcaſtle, with three thouſand foot and fifteen hundred horſe, was informed that Leſley, general of the Scots (3), was preparing to march at the head of twenty-two thouſand men, in order to enter England. And, in effect, he paſſed the Tweed the twentieth of Auguſt, the very day King Charles ſet out from London for York, where he arrived on the twenty-third. Leſley, purſuing his march, came the twenty-ſeventh to Newburn, on the north-ſide of the Tine, four miles from Newcaſtle. At his arrival, he found lord Conway poſted with his troops on the ſouth-ſide of the river, where he had raiſed breaſt-works over againſt the two fords, to oppoſe his paſſage. It is needleſs to enter on a detail of this action. It ſuffices to ſay, the Scots forced the paſſage of the Tine, after a fight very faintly maintained by the Engliſh. Lord Conway was ſeized with ſuch a panic that he next day evacuated Newcaſtle and retreated to Durham, where not deeming himſelf yet ſecure, he haſted to join the King's army, which was advanced to Northampton. Charles's troops had no ſooner quited Newcaſtle, but the Scots entered, and found there the artillery and ſtores ordered thither by the King, who deſigned that place for the magazine of his army.

Newcaſtle taken by the Scots. Nalſon, p. 427.

The Scots entrance into England, and the loſs of Newcaſtle, diſconcerted all Charles's meaſures. Tho' this firſt action had not coſt him above three or four hundred men, yet did this inconſiderable check produce great effects, all to that Prince's diſadvantage. 1. The earl of Strafford's having been ſomewhat too harſh in his expreſſions to the officers and ſoldiers, who were returned from the rout at Newburn, diſguſted the whole army, and thereby put the vanquiſhed, in their own vindication, upon magnifying the reſolution and number of the Scotiſh troops. This could not but produce a very ill effect in the King's army, which before was not too well diſpoſed. 2. The Engliſh malecontents were more at eaſe, and ſpake more boldly againſt the government, knowing it was no proper ſeaſon to ſilence them. 3. The Scots miſſed not this opportunity to ſhew the Engliſh, by as moderate a conduct as the juncture could allow, that their deſign in entering England, was not to injure the inhabitants, but only to procure acceſs to his Majeſty, in order to lay their grievances before him. By this means they ſeparated, as far as poſſible, the King's cauſe from that of the people of England, which did King Charles unſpeakable prejudice. 4. The conſternation cauſed by the Newburn defeat, and contrariwiſe the moderation of the Scots, who, notwithſtanding the ſucceſs of their arms, affected to deſire only ſome good accommodation, inclined the whole nation to a peace. None but the court-party imployed their utmoſt efforts, tho' in vain, to inſpire the Engliſh with a deſire of revenge. 5. As in King Charles's then circumſtances, with an army of enemies before him, and numberleſs male-contents every where elſe throughout the kingdom, as well as in his own army, it was not poſſible for him to raiſe money by the ſame methods he had thitherto practiſed, there reſulted a general opinion, that a parliament was abſolutely neceſſary. To this it was that the Scots and Engliſh male-contents deſired to lead him, tho' againſt his will, knowing it was ſcarce poſſible that a new parliament ſhould be diſpoſed in his favor.

The Scots had in England more correſpondents than the King had 'till now imagined, but he perceived it not before his affairs were on the decline. They had diſperſed two manifeſtoes, of which one was intitled, "Six Conſiderations of the Lawfulneſs "of their Expedition into England," and the other, "Intentions of the Scots and their Army manifeſted "to their Brethren in England." In theſe two papers, they were extremely careful to ſhew, that the motive of their armament and entry into England, was not to invade that kingdom, but only to defend themſelves againſt ſome particular perſons, their ſworn enemies, among whom they named, as the principal, the earl of Strafford, and archbiſhop of Canterbury. They ſaid, in their preſent ſituation, their country being blocked up by ſea and land, and their trade interrupted, it was not poſſible to expect any longer the coming of their enemies to attack them, without being expoſed to certain ruin. They compared themſelves to a man who, when his houſe is beſet, and his enemies ready to aſſault it, ſallies out himſelf and attacks them in hopes of averting, by a vigorous effort, the impending ruin. They maintained, it was the King who had violated the peace, and, having granted that the general-aſſembly ſhould regulate the kirk's affairs, and its regulations be ratified in parliament, had, without any lawful cauſe, prorogued the parliament, before what the general aſſembly had judged neceſſary was confirmed: nay, he had denied audience to the parliament's deputies, and tho' he had agreed that other deputies might be ſent him, it was only to amuſe them, ſince the war with Scotland had been already determined in council, and the parliaments of Ireland and England convened in order for ſupplies. They carefully repreſented the juſtice and equity of the late parliament of England, in denying King Charles money for a war ſo notoriouſly unjuſt. In ſhort, for it would be endleſs to enumerate all the particulars contained in theſe two papers, their aim was to demonſtrate to the people of England, 1. The juſtice of their cauſe. 2. The artifices of their enemies to ſurpriſe them. 3. The neceſſity they were under of taking arms in their own lawful defenſe, and to prevent their ruin. 4. They ſaid, notwithſtanding their entry into England, the war was defenſive on their part. 5. That they intended not to offer any injury or violence, or inrich themſelves with ſpoils of the Engliſh, but only to procure acceſs to his Majeſty, to preſent their grievances, which was denied them, except they would abſolutely ſurrender themſelves up to the mercy of their adverſaries. 6. They called God to witneſs, this was their intention, and the better to gain belief they made uſe of the ſtrongeſt expreſſions and moſt ſolemn oaths. 7. Finally, they did not forget inſinuating to the Engliſh, that they had the ſame cauſe to maintain, ſince the liberties of England were equally in danger with thoſe of Scotland.

Theſe manifeſtoes, which were doubtleſs owing to the counſels of ſome of the Engliſh male-contents, produced ſuch effect upon the people, the army, and even on ſuch of the lords as were not wholly devoted to the court, that Charles might very eaſily ſee how difficult it would be to ſupport the war, and to what danger he would be expoſed, if he hazarded a battle at ſuch a juncture. Nothing was more diſadvantageous to this Prince than the extreme deſire expreſſed by the Scots to terminate the diſpute by ſome wholeſome agreement, which ſhewed their aim was not to make war upon the Engliſh; whereas it was Charles's intereſt to ingage them both in a national quarrel. Wherefore the Scots failed not to improve the advantage of their moderate conduct. As ſoon as they were maſters of Newcaſtle, they ſent a very humble petition to the King, beſeeching him to give ear to their complaints, and cure their evils, by advice of the Engliſh parliament. Charles, who was preſſed on all ſides, had already ſummoned the nobility to meet him at York, the twenty-fourth of September, to tender their advice upon the preſent ſituation of his affairs. He therefore told the Scots, that their petition was expreſſed in ſuch general terms, that he could not give them a poſitive anſwer: but if they would ſpeak more plainly, and declare the particulars of their demands, he would give ſuch anſwers as the peers, who were to meet at York, ſhould think proper. Thereupon they ſent him their demands, the eighth of September, viz.

"2. That the caſtles of Edinburg and other "ſtrengths of the kingdom of Scotland may, "according to the firſt foundation, be furniſhed "and uſed for our defenſe and ſecurity.

"3. That our countrymen in his Majeſty's do- "minions of England and Ireland may be freed "from cenſure for ſubſcribing the covenant, and "be no more preſſed with oaths and ſubſcriptions, "unwarrantable by your laws, and contrary to "their national oath and covenant, approved by "his Majeſty.

"4. That the common incendiaries, who have "been the authors of this combuſtion, may receive "their juſt cenſure.

"5. That all our ſhips and goods, with all the "damage thereof, may be reſtored.

"6. That the wrongs, loſſes and charges, which "all this time we have ſuſtained, may be re- "paired.

"7. That the declarations made againſt us, as "traitors, may be recalled in the end, by the "advice and counſel of the ſtates of England "convened in parliament. His Majeſty may be "pleaſed to remove all gariſons from the bor- "ders, and any impediments which may ſtop free "trade."

By this latter article it appears, how careful the Scots were to loſe no opportunity of gaining to their intereſt the people of England. Of this they gave the following inſtance. As the Londoners had all their coals from Newcaſtle, and could not any how be without that trade, the Scots were no ſooner maſters of Newcaſtle, but they wrote to the lord mayor and aldermen of London, "That knowing "how neceſſary the free traffic of coals was for "their city, and other places of England, they "had, as a teſtimony of greateſt reſpect and good- "will to the city of London, ſent two noblemen "to aſſure the maſters of ſhips, who, poſſeſſed "with needleſs fears, were haſtening out of the "river, that their purpoſe was not to ſtop, but "to uſe their beſt means to continue that trade."

They gain the Londoners affection. Sept. 9. Nalſon, p. 435. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1259.

This letter anſwered the Scots expectations. Preſently after, it was openly diſcourſed about London of petitioning his Majeſty that he would pleaſe to ſummon a parliament. The privy-council, left by Charles at London, having ſome notice of this deſign, indeavored to obſtruct it, by a letter directed to the lord mayor and aldermen: but they could not ſucceed. So a petition was reſolved on, and ſent to the King at York by ſome of the aldermen and common-council. It runs thus:

Charles having, preſently after, convened the Yorkſhire gentry, propoſed to them payment of the trained-bands for two months. This propoſition being accepted, the gentlemen prepared a ſuitable addreſs to inform his Majeſty of their conſent: but withal they intreated he would indeavor to compoſe differences with the Scots, and to ſummon a parliament. The earl of Strafford, being deſired to preſent the addreſs, denied, except the clauſe about calling a parliament was expunged; alledging, he knew the King fully deſigned it. But the gentlemen were unwilling to omit theſe words, and delivered their addreſs themſelves.

King Charles perceiving, by the petitions preſented him, that it was the nation's fervent deſire a parliament ſhould be convened, doubted not it would be the firſt advice the peers, when aſſembled, would give him. He reſolved therefore to prevent ſuch advice, by ſummoning a parliament to meet on the third of November, for fear, if he delayed it any longer, he might be thought to have done it by compulſion. The great council of the peers being aſſembled at York, the twenty-fourth of September, his Majeſty addreſſed them as follows:

King Charles's ſpeech to his great council of peers. Annals. Nalſon, p. 442. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1275.

My lords,

"UPON ſudden innovations, where the dangers are near and inſtant, it hath been the "cuſtom of my predeceſſors to aſſemble the great "council of the peers, and by their advice and "aſſiſtance to give a timely remedy to ſuch evils, "which could not admit a delay ſo long as muſt "of neceſſity be allowed for the aſſembling of the "parliament.

"This being our condition at this time, and an "army of rebels lodged within this kingdom, I "thought it moſt fit to conform myſelf to the prac-"tiſe of my predeceſſors in like caſes; that, with "your advice and aſſiſtance, we might juſtly pro-"ceed to the chaſtiſement of theſe inſolencies, and "ſecuring of my good ſubjects.

"In the firſt place, I muſt let you know, that "I deſire nothing more than to be rightly under-"ſtood of my people. And to that end, I have "of myſelf reſolved to call a parliament; having "already given order to my lord-keeper to iſſue "the writs inſtantly, ſo that the parliament may "be aſſembled by the third of November next: "whither if my ſubjects bring thoſe good affections "which become them towards me, I ſhall not fail "on my part to make it a happy meeting. In "the mean time, there are two points wherein I "ſhall deſire your advice, which indeed were the "chief cauſe of your meeting.

"Firſt, What anſwer to give to the petition of "the rebels, and in what manner to treat with "them. Of which, that you may give a ſure judg-"ment, I have ordered that your lordſhips ſhall "be clearly and truly informed of the ſtate of the "whole buſineſs, and upon what reaſons the ad-"vices which my privy-council unanimouſly gave "me, were grounded.

"The ſecond is, How my army ſhall be kept "on foot and maintained, until the ſupplies of a "parliament may be had. For ſo long as the "Scotiſh army remains in England, I think no "man will counſel me to diſband mine: for that "would be an unſpeakable loſs to all this part of "the kingdom, by ſubjecting them to the greedy "appetite of the rebels, beſide the unſpeakable "diſhonor which would thereby fall upon this "nation."

It is reſolved to treat with the Scots. p. 1276. Annals.

When King Charles had thus ſpoken to their lordſhips, he commanded to be read the reaſons which had induced his council to adviſe the levying an army againſt the Scots, and the Scots petition preſented him ſince their taking Newcaſtle, as alſo the royal anſwer, and their particular demands. Then, the earl of Traquair, by his Majeſty's order, explained theſe demands to the peers, and labored to ſhew, how ſome of them ſubverted the fundamental laws of Scotland, others the King's juſt prerogative and dignity, and of which many were to the detriment of his Majeſty's profit, and prejudice of diverſe good ſubjects there. The reſult of their lordſhips deliberations was, that certain of themſelves ſhould be ſent as commiſſioners, to treat with the Scots, and indeavor to conclude a pacification. Purſuant to this reſolution, ſixteen peers were choſen for commiſſioners (1), to whom Charles added as aſſiſtants, the earls of Traquair, Morton, and Lanerick ſecretary of Scotland,* ſir Lewis Steward, and ſir John Burroughs. It was farther agreed, that the treaty ſhould begin at Rippon (2) the firſt of October, and that the earl of Lanerick ſhould ſignify to the Scots this reſolution.

Commiſſioners appointed. Idem. Nalſon, p. 443.

* Mr. Rapin forgets ſir Henry Vane.

This article being diſpatched, King Charles deſired the lords to conſider of means to ſupport his army during the treaty. It is ſomewhat unaccountable his Majeſty ſhould undertake this war without having any ſupply from the parliament, and ſhould be ſo ill-provided for the payment of his army, that within a month after opening the campain, he was unable to furniſh its maintenance. For my part, I cannot deviſe any other reaſon of this conduct, except that, for the ſupport of this war, he had depended upon ſuch means as were no longer in his power to imploy. However this be, the earl of Strafford having informed their lordſhips of the number of troops his Majeſty had on foot, namely, about twenty four thouſand men, declared that the payment of this army amounted to ſixty thouſand pounds per month, and that to keep the army together for three months, no leſs would ſerve than the ſum of two hundred thouſand pounds. He added, if the army ſhould diſband, all Yorkſhire would be loſt in two days, and the whole kingdom indangered. Whereupon it was reſolved that, a letter ſubſcribed by all the peers preſent, ſhould be ſent to the city of London for lending the two hundred thouſand pounds, upon ſuch ſecurity as ſhould be agreed on, each of the peers offering to become bound.

The Scots having appointed their commiſſioners to treat with the Engliſh, the negociation commenced, at Rippon, the firſt of October (3). But before the chief point of the treaty was conſidered, certain preliminary articles were to be ſettled, which the Scots propoſed, as abſolutely neceſſary to a happy concluſion. They repreſented therefore, that their army had ſtoped at Newcaſtle and Durham, and as the negociation might hold ſome time, it was neceſſary, before all things, to provide for the ſubſiſtence of their troops during the treaty. This was the principal article on which they inſiſted, as a preliminary to the treaty. There were likewiſe other articles, the mention whereof I deem not very needful, ſince it will preſently appear what was the main point by the preliminaries agreed on. I ſhall only add, that the Scots would never ſuffer the earl of Traquair to aſſiſt at the treaty, becauſe he was one of thoſe they termed incendiaries, againſt whom they demanded ſevere juſtice. Finally, after many debates, the commiſſioners of both nations agreed the ſixteenth of October, on the following preliminaries.

Preliminary articles touching the Scotiſh army. Nalſon, p. 457. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1293.

" 1. That the Scotiſh army ſhall have for a " competent maintenance, the ſum of eight hun- " dred and fifty pound per diem; and that the " payment thereof ſhall continue for two months, " in caſe the treaty ſhall ſo long laſt; which pay- " ment to be made weekly upon the Friday of " every week.

" 2. The days of the army's returning to " be numbered within the days of the allowed " maintenance.

" 3. That the Scotiſh army ſhall content them- " ſelves with the aforeſaid maintenance, and ſhall " neither moleſt Papiſts, prelates, nor their adhe- " rents, nor any other perſons of whatſoever qua- " lity.

" 4. That the inhabitants of the ſaid counties " ſhall alſo have liberty to return peaceably to " their own dwelings, and ſhall be refuſed no cour- " teſy, it being always preſuppoſed, that the fit " lodging of their army ſhall be allowed.

" 5. That the army be furniſhed with coals in " a regular way, and not at the pleaſure of the " ſoldiers.

" 6. That there be a proviſion of forage, at the " prices to be ſet down in a table, which muſt alſo " contain the particular prices of all ſorts of vic- " tuals, and other neceſſaries for the army, to be " indifferently agreed upon by perſons nominated " on both ſides.

" 7. That free trade and commerce between " both nations be reſtored, and not to be inter- " rupted, but upon the warning of three months: " but no victuals, arms, nor ammunition to be im- " ported into Newcaſtle, &c.

" 8. That victuals and other neceſſaries for the " army be free of cuſtom; and that his Majeſty's " cuſtom of coals and other ware be left free to be " levied by his own officers.

" 9. That there be a freedom to furniſh neceſ- " ſaries for both armies, and liberty to be granted " for milling, brewing, &c.

" 10. That the arrears of the contributions due " to the Scotiſh army, be completely paid to the " ſixteenth of October.

" 11. That there be a ceſſation of arms, ac- " cording to the particulars to be agreed upon.

" 12. As for ſecuring the ſum of eight hundred " and fifty pounds per diem, above ſpecified, there " is a commitee appointed, who have power to " treat with Northumberland, the biſhoprick of " Durham, Newcaſtle, and (if need require) with " Cumberland and Weſtmoreland, about the pay- " ment of it.

" 13. The lords will, before their going from " York, ſettle a commitee, who ſhall have charge " to ſee the contribution orderly raiſed and paid; " and that there ſhall likewiſe be a commitee no- " minated, to whom either the Scotiſh commiſſi- " oners, or the commitees of the country, may " weekly give account of the carriage of the bu- " ſineſs."

The treaty removed to London. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1303, 1305. Nalſon, p. 461.

The Scots had the addreſs to prolong ſigning theſe preliminaries 'till the ſixteenth of October, after which, it ſtill remained to agree on the conditions of truce. It was therefore almoſt impoſſible to enter into a diſcuſſion of the articles, which were to be the chief ſubject of the treaty, before the third of November, the day appointed for the parliament's meeting. The peers, as well thoſe at Rippon as thoſe at York, being indiſpenſibly obliged to repair to London, it would have been needleſs to begin the negociation at Rippon. Wherefore the Engliſh commiſſioners, whether of themſelves, or by the Scots ſuggeſtion, propoſed to his Majeſty the treaty's removal from Rippon to London; and King Charles was under a neceſſity of conſenting to it, tho' he plainly perceived the Scots expected to find many friends in London, and even in the parliament, as was actually the caſe. One may venture to ſay that, on occaſion of this treaty, this Prince commited three capital errors. Firſt, The King's errors. in ſummoning the parliament to meet at Weſtminſter, ſince he could not be ignorant how much the city of London was diſſatisfied with his adminiſtration, and conſequently ready to countenance ſuch reſolutions as the parliament might take againſt it; whereas, had he ſummoned the parliament to meet Nalſon, p. 461. at York, or in any other place at a diſtance from London, he would thereby have in part diſconcerted the Scots and Engliſh male-contents meaſures: of this error, he had afterwards but too much Clarendon, p. 129. cauſe to be ſenſible. Secondly, removing the treaty to London, where the Scots had their principal correſpondents. Thirdly, in taking ſo ſhort a time for the parliament's convention, ſo that he had only the month of October to conclude a peace with the Scots; a ſpace ſcarcely ſufficient to agree with them on the preliminaries and terms of the ceſſation, before the King and peers would be obliged to depart York and repair to London. Had he not been in ſuch haſte to fix the parliament's meeting to the third of November, he might have either concluded his treaty with the Scots, by granting what he could not have helped, or at leaſt left them without excuſe, had they obſtinately perſiſted in any unreaſonable demands. Whereas, not being able to finiſh the negociation at Rippon, he was forced to remove the conferences to London, a city well-affected to the Scots, and where they could, better than any where elſe, take juſt meaſures, whether with the chief inhabitants, or with their friends in the parliament. King Charles was ſufficiently convinced of theſe errors, when it was too late to retrieve them.

Not to omit in this hiſtory any thing which to me ſeems material, I thought proper to add here the earl of Briſtol's proceſs at the entrance of King Charles's reign; not being foreign to the purpoſe. Contrariwiſe, this proceſs, with the earl's anſwers, may be of great ſervice towards illuſtrating the cloſe of James I's reign, touching the negociation of Prince Charles's marriage with the Spaniſh Infanta, and reſtitution of the Palatinate. It may furniſh ſome conſiderable idea of Charles I's and the duke of Buckingham's characters. It could not be inſerted in any other place, without a too great interruption of the thread of our hiſtory.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

THE earl of Briſtol *, who had been embaſſador in Spain, to negociate Prince Charles's marriage with the Spaniſh Infanta, was put under confinement, at his return to England, without being once admited to approach the King's preſenſe. However, while King James lived, the duke of Buckingham, who was the cauſe of Briſtol's diſgrace, feigned a willingneſs to adjuſt his affair, if he would but anſwer ſome queſtions or objections, before commiſſioners appointed by his Majeſty.

Majeſty. The earl anſwered thoſe queſtions, but his reconciliation was not thereby at all advanced. On the contrary, he found himſelf much farther from it by the death of King James, and Charles I's acceſſion to the crown. Briſtol, perceiving himſelf in a very indifferent ſituation, wiſhed to come off, if poſſible, without wounding or impairing his honor. To this purpoſe, he applied to lord Conway, ſecretary of ſtate, deſiring his interceſſion for him with his Majeſty. Diverſe letters paſſed between thoſe two noblemen upon that ſubject, and finally, during King Charles's ſecond parliament, in 1626, the earl received from lord Conway what follows: viz.

My lord,

Ruſhworth, Vol. I. p. 234, &c.

"I Received a letter from your lordſhip, dated "the fourth of this month, written in anſwer "to a former letter, which I directed to your "lordſhip, by his Majeſty's commandment. This "laſt letter, according to my duty, I have ſhewed "unto his Majeſty, who hath peruſed it, and hath "commanded me to write back to you again, that "he finds himſelf nothing ſatisfied therewith. The "queſtions propounded to your lordſhip from his "Majeſty, were plain and clear; Whether you did "rather chuſe to ſit ſtill, without being queſtioned "for any errors paſſed in your negociation in Spain, "and injoy the benefit of the late gracious pardon "granted in parliament, whereof you may have "the benefit? or whether, for the clearing of your "innocency (whereof your ſelf, and your friends "and followers are ſo confident) you will be con-"tent to wave the advantage of that pardon, and "put your ſelf into a legal way of examination for "the trial thereof? His Majeſty's purpoſe thereby, "is not to prevent you of any favors the law hath "given you: but if your aſſurance be ſuch as your "words and letters import, he conceives it ſtands "not with that public and reſolute profeſſion of "your integrity to decline your trial. His Majeſty "leaves the choice to your ſelf, and requires from "you a direct anſwer, without circumlocution, or "bargaining with him for future favors before-"hand; but if you have a deſire to make uſe of "that pardon, which cannot be denied you, nor "is any way deſired to be taken from you, his Ma-"jeſty expects you ſhould at the leaſt forbear to "magnify your ſervice, and out of an opinion of "your innocency, caſt an aſperſion upon his Ma-"jeſty's juſtice, in not affording you that preſent "fulneſs of liberty and favor, which cannot be "drawn from him, but in his good time, and ac-"cording to his good pleaſure.

"Thus much I have in commandment to write "to your lordſhip, and to require your anſwer "clearly and plainly, by this meſſenger ſent on "purpoſe for it, and ſo remain,

Your lordſhips humble ſervant,

Whitehall, 24, March, 1626. Edw. Conway.

The earl of Briſtol's anſwer.

My lord,

"I Have received your letter of the twenty-"fourth of March, the twenty-eighth, and I "am infinitely grieved to underſtand, that my "former anſwer to yours of the fourth of March, "hath not ſatisfied his Majeſty, which I will in-"deavor to do in this, to the beſt of my under-"ſtanding; and, to that end, ſhall anſwer to the "particular points of your preſent letter, with the "greateſt clearneſs I am able.

"Firſt, Whereas you ſay in your letter, that the "queſtion propounded to me was plain and clear, "viz. Whether I would chuſe to ſit ſtill, without "being queſtioned for any errors paſſed in my ne-"gociation with Spain, and injoy the benefit of "the late gracious pardon, whereof I may take "the benefit? Or whether, being content to wave "the advantage of that pardon, I ſhall put my "ſelf into a legal way of examination for the trial "thereof, &c.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

"Firſt, Your lordſhip may be pleaſed to re-"member, your laſt propoſition was, whether I "deſired to reſt in the ſecurity I was in, which you "now expreſs, whether I will chuſe to ſit ſtill?

"Secondly, Your propoſition was, whether I "would acknowledge the gracious favor of his "Majeſty who now is, who had been pleaſed not "to queſtion my actions, when it is beſt known to "your lordſhip that, by a commiſſion of the lords, "I was queſtioned upon twenty articles, diverſe "involving felony and treaſon. Altho' it be true, "that when I had ſo anſwered, as I am confident "their lordſhips would have cleared me, I was ſo "unhappy, as their lordſhips never met more about "that buſineſs.

"But now your propoſition is, whether I will "now chuſe to ſit ſtill without being farther que-"ſtioned for errors paſſed, whereas before it was "required I ſhould acknowledge that I have not "been queſtioned at all, which is a different thing. "But confering both your letters together, and "gathering the ſenſe and meaning, by making the "latter an explanation of the former, which I "could have wiſhed your lordſhip would have more "clearly explained, I returned unto your lordſhip "this plain and direct anſwer.

"That, underſtanding by the ſecurity I am in, "and ſiting ſtill, and not being farther queſtioned, "I am reſtored to the bare freedom and liberty "of a ſubject and peer: for a man being called in "queſtion by his Majeſty, if after his Majeſty ſhall "be pleaſed, out of his goodneſs, that he reſt "quiet and ſecure, and that he ſhall not be farther "queſtioned, I conceive it is not apparent that his "liberty naturally revolveth unto him when, by "his Majeſty's grace, he is pleaſed to declare, he "ſhall not be farther queſtioned, but may live in "farther ſecurity. So that underſtanding your "letter in this ſort (for no direct anſwer can be "made, until the ſenſe of the queſtion be truly "ſtated) I do moſt humbly acknowledge and ac-"cept his Majeſty's grace and favor, and ſhall not "wave any thing that ſhall come to me by the "pardon of the 21 Jac. Regis, nor by the pardon "of his Majeſty's coronation; and am ſo far from "bargaining, as you are pleaſed to expreſs it, for "future favor (tho' I hope my humble and ſub-"miſſive courſes of petitioning his Majeſty, nei-"ther hath, nor ſhall deſerve ſo harſh an expreſ-"ſion) that I ſhall not preſume ſo much as to preſs "for any favor, until my dutiful and loyal behavior "may move his Majeſty's royal and gracious heart "thereunto, but receive with all humbleneſs this "my freedom and liberty; the which I ſhall only "make uſe of in ſuch ſort as I ſhall judge may be "moſt agreeable to his Majeſty's pleaſure.

"As for the ſecond part of your letter, wherein "you ſay, that if I deſire to make uſe of that "pardon, his Majeſty expects that I ſhould at leaſt "forbear to magnify my ſervices; or out of an "opinion of my own innocency caſt an aſperſion "upon his Majeſty's juſtice. To this point I an-"ſwer, that as I hope I ſhall never err in that ſort "of immodeſty of valuing my ſervices, which I "acknowledge to have been accompanied with in-"finite weakneſs and diſabilities; ſo I truſt it ſhall "not diſpleaſe, that I make uſe, to my own com-"fort, and the honor of my poſterity, of thoſe "many written teſtimonies which my late moſt "bleſſed maſter hath left me of his gracious ac-

"ceptance

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

" ceptance of my ſervices for the ſpace of twenty " years. So likewiſe I hope the modeſt avowing " of my innocency will not be thought to caſt any " aſperſion upon his Majeſty's honor or juſtice. I " muſt freely confeſs unto your lordſhip, I am " much afflicted to ſee inferences of this nature " made, both in your lordſhip's laſt letter and in " this. For if it ſhall be infered as a thing re- " flecting upon the King's honor, that a man " queſtioned, ſhall not indeavor to defend his own " innocency before he be convicted; it will be im- " poſſible for any man to be ſafe; for the honor of " his Majeſty is too ſacred a thing for any ſubject, " how innocent ſoever, to conteſt againſt. So like- " wiſe, God forbid that it ſhould be brought into " conſequences (as in your former letter) as a tax " upon the government and juſtice of his late Ma- " jeſty, and his Majeſty who now is, that I ſhould " have ſuffered ſo long time, not being guilty. " For as I never have been heard ſo much as to " repine of injuſtice in their Majeſties in all my " ſufferings, ſo I well know, that the long con- " tinuance of my troubles may well be attributed " unto other cauſes, as to my own errors of paſſion, " or other accidents; for your lordſhip may well " remember, that my affairs were almoſt two years " ſince upon the point of a happy accommodation, " had it not been interrupted by the unfortunate " miſtaking of the ſpeeches I uſed to Mr. Clark.

" I ſhall conclude by intreating your lordſhip's " favor, that I may underſtand from you, as I " hope for my comfort, that this letter hath given " his Majeſty ſatisfaction; or if there ſhould yet " remain any ſcruple, that I may have a clear and " plain ſignification of the King's pleaſure, which " I ſhall obey with all humility,

Your lordſhip's humble ſervant,
BRISTOL.

Some fews days after, the earl of Briſtol, being informed that the houſe of commons were ill-affected to the duke of Buckingham, was of opinion it imported him to improve that juncture. To this end, he petitioned the upper houſe, that he, being a peer of this realm, had not received a ſummons to parliament, and deſired their lordſhips to mediate with his Majeſty, that he might injoy the liberty of a ſubject, and the privilege of his peerage, after near two years reſtraint, without being brought to a trial: and if any charge be brought in againſt him, he prayed that he might be tried by parliament.

On this petition, it was reſolved in a commitee of the peers, that a writ of ſummons might be ſent to the earl of Briſtol.

His grace of Buckingham thereupon ſignified to the houſe, that, on the earl of Briſtol's petition to the King, his Majeſty had ſent him his writ of ſummons: and withal, ſhewed their lordſhips the copy of a letter from his Majeſty to the ſaid earl, viz.

" We have received your letter addreſſed unto " us by Buckingham, and cannot but wonder that " you ſhould, thro' forgetfulneſs, make requeſt to " us of favor, as if you ſtood evenly capable of it, " when you know what your behavior in Spain de- " ſerved of us, which you are to examine by the " obſervations we made, and know you well re- " member; how, at our firſt coming into Spain, " taking upon you to be ſo wiſe as to foreſee our " intention to change our religion, you were ſo far " from diſſuading us, that you offered your advice " and ſecreſy to concur in it; and in many other " conferences preſſing to ſhew how convenient it " was to be a Roman Catholic; it being impoſſible " in your opinion, to do any great action otherwiſe: " and how much wrong, diſadvantage, and diſ- " ſervice you did to the treaty, and to the right " and intereſt of our dear brother and ſiſter, and " their children; what diſadvantage, inconvenience, " and hazard you intangled us in by your artifices, " puting off and delaying our return home; the " great eſtimation you made of that ſtate, and the " low price you ſet this kingdom at; ſtill main- " taining that we, under color of friendſhip to " Spain, did what was in our power againſt them, " which they ſaid, you very well know: and laſt " of all, your approving of thoſe conditions, that " our nephew ſhould be brought up in the Em- " peror's court, to which ſir Walter Aſhton then " ſaid, that he durſt not give his conſent for fear of " his head: you replying unto him, that, without " ſome ſuch great action, neither marriage nor " peace could be had."

The lord-keeper to the earl of Briſtol.

My very good lord,

" BY his Majeſty's commandment, I herewith " ſend unto your lordſhip your writ of ſum- " mons for the parliament; but withal to ſignify " his Majeſty's pleaſure herein farther, that how- " ſoever he gives way to the awarding of the writ, " yet his meaning is thereby, not to diſcharge any " former directions for reſtraint of your lordſhip's " coming hither, but that you continue under the " ſame reſtriction as you did before; ſo as your " lordſhip's perſonal attendance is to be forborne, " and therein I doubt not but your lordſhip will " readily give his Majeſty ſatisfaction. And ſo I " commend my ſervice very heartily unto your " lordſhip, and remain,

Your lordſhip's aſſured friend and ſervant,

Dorſet Court, March 31, 1626. Tho. Coventry, C. S.

The earl of Briſtol's anſwer to the lord-keeper.

May it pleaſe your lordſhip,

" I Have received your lordſhip's letter, of the " thirty-firſt of March, and with it his Ma- " jeſty's writ of ſummons for the parliament. In " the one his Majeſty commandeth me that, all " excuſes ſet aſide, upon my faith and allegiance, " I fail not to come and attend his Majeſty; and " this under the great ſeal of England. In the other, " as in a letter miſſive, his Majeſty's pleaſure is in- " timated by your lordſhip, that my perſonal at- " tendance ſhould be forborne: I muſt crave leave " ingenuouſly to confeſs unto your lordſhip, that I " want judgment rightly to direct myſelf in this " caſe; as likewiſe that I am ignorant how far this " may trench upon the privileges of the peers of " this land, and upon mine and their ſafety here- " after: for if the writ be not obeyed, the law " calleth it a miſpriſion, and highly fineable, " whereof we have had late examples; and a " miſſive letter, being avowed or not, is to be " doubted would not be adjudged a ſufficient diſ- " charge againſt the great ſeal of England. On " the other ſide, if the letter be not obeyed, a " peer may, 'de facto,' be commited upon a " contempt, in the interim, and the queſtion cleared " afterwards; ſo that in this caſe it is above my " abilities. I can only anſwer your lordſhip, that " I will moſt exactly obey; and to the end I may " underſtand which obedience will be, in all kinds, " moſt ſuitable to my duty, I will preſently re- " pair to my private lodging at London, and " there remain until in this, and other cauſes, I " ſhall have petitioned his Majeſty, and underſtand " his farther pleaſure. For the ſecond part of your " lordſhip's letter, where your lordſhip ſaith, 'That " his Majeſty's meaning is not thereby to diſcharge " any former directions, for reſtraint of your lord- " ſhip's coming hither, but that you continue under " the ſame reſtriction as before ; ſo that your lord-

" ſhip's perſonal attendance here is to be forborne :'
" I conceive your lordſhip intendeth this touching
" my coming to parliament only , for as touching
" my coming to London, I never had at any time
" one word of prohibition, or colorable pretenſe
" of reſtraint ; but, on the contrary, having his " late Majeſty's expreſs leave to come to London,
" to follow my affairs, out of my reſpect to his
" Majeſty, then Prince, and to the duke of Buck-

" unto them. Whereunto his Majeſty was pleaſed
" to anſwer, both under the hand of the duke, and
" Mr. ſecretary Conway, that he took my reſpect
" unto him herein in very good part, and would
" wiſh me to make uſe of the leave the King had

" your lordſhip, becauſe I would not, thro' miſ-
" underſtanding, fall into diſpleaſure by my coming
" up, and to intreat your lordſhip to inform his
" Majeſty thereof : and that my lord Conway, by
" whoſe warrant I was only reſtrained in the late
" King's time, of famous memory, may produce
" any one word which may have ſo much as any
" colorable pretenſe of debaring my coming up to " London. I beſeech your lordſhip to pardon my
" deſire to have things clearly underſtood ; for the " want of that formerly hath cauſed all my troubles ;
" and when any thing is miſinformed concerning
" me, I have little or no means to clear it ; ſo that " my chief labor is to avoid miſunderſtanding. I
" ſhall conclude with beſeeching your lordſhip to
" do me this favor, to let his Majeſty underſtand,
" that my coming up is only rightly to underſtand
" his pleaſure, whereunto I ſhall in all things moſt
" dutifully and humbly conform myſelf. And ſo,
" with my humble ſervice to your lordſhip, I
" recommend you to God's holy protection, and
" remain,

Your lordſhip's moſt humble ſervant,

Sherborn, April 12, 1626. BRISTOL.

The earl of Briſtol's ſecond petition preſented to the houſe of lords, April 19, 1626.

The humble petition of John earl of Briſtol,

Humbly ſhewing unto your lordſhips,

" THAT he hath lately received his writ of " parliament, for which he returneth unto
" your lordſhips moſt humble thanks, but jointly " with it a letter from my lord-keeper, com" manding him, in his Majeſty's name, to forbear
" his perſonal attendance ; and altho' he ſhall ever
" obey the leaſt intimation of his Majeſty's pleaſure,
" yet he moſt humbly offereth unto your lordſhips
" wiſe conſiderations, as too high a point for him,
" how far this may trench upon the liberty and
" ſafety of the peers, and the authority of their " letters patent, to be in this ſort diſcharged by a
" letter miſſive of any ſubject, without the King's
" hand ; and, for your lordſhips due information,
" he hath annexed a copy of the ſaid lord-keeper's
" letter, and his anſwer thereunto.

" He farther humbly petitioneth your lordſhips,
" that having been, for the ſpace of two years,
" highly wronged in point of his liberty, and of " his honor, by many ſiniſter aſperſions which have " been caſt upon him, without being permited to
" anſwer for himſelf ; which hath been done by
" the power and induſtry of the duke of Bucking-
" ham, to keep him from the preſenſe of his
" Majeſty and the parliament, leſt he ſhould diſ-
" cover many crimes concerning the ſaid duke.

" He therefore moſt humbly beſeecheth, that he " may be heard both in the point of his wrong,
" and of his accuſation of the ſaid duke ; wherein
" he will make it appear, how infinitely the ſaid
" duke hath both abuſed their Majeſties, the ſtate,
" and both houſes of parliament. And this he is
" moſt confident will not be denied, ſince the court
" of parliament never refuſeth to hear the pooreſt
" ſubject ſeeking for redreſs of wrongs, nor the " accuſation againſt any, be he ever ſo powerful :
" and herein he beſeecheth your lordſhips to me-
" diate to his Majeſty, for the ſuppliant's coming " to the houſe, in ſuch ſort as you ſhall think fiting ;
" aſſuring his Majeſty, that all he ſhall ſay, ſhall
" not only tend to the ſervice of his Majeſty and
" the ſtate, but highly to the honor of his Ma-
" jeſty's royal perſon, and of his princely virtues :
" and your ſuppliant ſhall ever pray for your lord-
" ſhips proſperity."

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

The lord-keeper thereupon delivered to the houſe of peers this meſſage from his Majeſty.

" That his Majeſty hath heard of a petition,
" preſered unto this houſe by the earl of Briſtol, ſo
" void of duty and reſpects to his Majeſty, that
" he hath great cauſe to puniſh him : that he hath
" alſo heard with what duty and reſpectfulneſs to " his Majeſty their lordſhips have proceeded there-
" in, which his Majeſty conceiveth to have been " upon the knowledge they have, that he hath
" been reſtrained for matters of ſtate ; and his
" Majeſty doth therefore give their lordſhips thanks
" for the ſame, and is reſolved to put the cauſe
" upon the honor and juſtice of their lordſhips
" and this houſe. And thereupon his Majeſty
" commanded him (the lord-keeper) to ſignify to " their lordſhips his royal pleaſure, that the earl
" of Briſtol be ſent for as a delinquent, to anſwer
" in this houſe his offenſes, commited in his nego-
" ciations before his Majeſty's being in Spain, and " his offenſes ſince his Majeſty's coming from Spain,
" and his ſcandaliſing the duke of Buckingham im" mediately, and by reflection his Majeſty, with
" whoſe privity, and by whoſe directions the duke
" did guide his actions, and without which he did " nothing. All which his Majeſty will cauſe to " be charged againſt him before their lordſhips in
" this houſe.

Their lordſhips appointed a commitee to attend his Majeſty, and to tender him their humble thanks for the truſt and confidence he had placed in the honor and juſtice of their houſe.

Monday, May the firſt, the gentleman-uſher brought the earl of Briſtol to the bar, according to their lordſhips order ; and the lord-keeper acquainted him, that the King had commanded his attorney-general to charge the earl of Briſtol, before their lordſhips, with high-treaſon, and other offenſes and miſdemeanors of a very high nature, that they might proceed in a legal courſe againſt him, according to the juſtice and uſual proceedings of parliament.

Articles of accuſation againſt the earl of Briſtol, preſented to the upper-houſe by the King's attorney-general.

I. Offenſes done and commited by the earl of Briſtol, before his Majeſty's going into Spain, when he was Prince.

I. THAT the ſaid earl, being truſted and im-
ployed by the ſaid late King, as his embaſſador to Ferdinando, then and now Emperor of Germany,

Proceedings against the earl of Briſtol.

Germany, and to Philip IV, then and now King of Spain, in Annis 1621, 22, 23: and having commiſſion, and particular and ſpecial direction, to treat with the ſaid Emperor and King of Spain, for the plenary reſtoring ſuch parts of the dominions, territories and poſſeſſions of the count Palatine of Rhine, who married with the moſt excellent lady Elizabeth, his now royal conſort, the only daughter of the ſaid late King James; which were then wrongfully and in hoſtile manner taken, and poſſeſſed with and by the armies of the ſaid Emperor and King of Spain, or any other; and for the preſerving and keeping ſuch other parts thereof as were not yet loſt, but were then in the protection of the ſaid late King James, and to the uſe of the ſaid count Palatine and his children: and alſo to treat with the ſaid King of Spain for a marriage to be had between the moſt high and excellent Prince Charles, then Prince of Wales, the only ſon and heir-apparent of the ſaid King James, and now our moſt Sovereign Lord, and the moſt illuſtrious lady Dona Maria, Infanta of Spain, ſiſter to the now King of Spain: he the ſaid earl, contrary to his duty and allegiance, and contrary to the truſt and duty of an embaſſador, at Madrid in the kingdom of Spain, to advance and farther the deſigns of the ſaid King of Spain againſt our ſaid Sovereign Lord, his children, friends and allies, falſely, willingly and traiterouſly, and as a traitor to our late Sovereign Lord the King, by ſundry letters and other meſſages ſent by the ſaid earl from Madrid, in the year aforeſaid, to King James and his miniſters of ſtate of England, did confidently and reſolutely inform, adviſe and aſſure the ſaid late King, that the ſaid Emperor and King of Spain would really, fully and effectually make reſtitution and plenary reſtoration to the ſaid count Palatine, and his children, of the ſaid dominions, territories and poſſeſſions of the ſaid count Palatine, and of the ſaid electoral dignity: and that the ſaid King of Spain did really, fully and effectually intend the ſaid marriage between the ſaid lady his ſiſter and the ſaid Prince, our now Sovereign Lord, according to articles formerly propounded between the ſaid Kings; whereas, in truth, the ſaid Emperor and King of Spain, or either of them, never really intended ſuch reſtitution as aforeſaid: and whereas the ſaid King of Spain never really intended the marriage according to thoſe articles propounded, but the ſaid Emperor and King of Spain intended only, by thoſe treaties, to gain time to compaſs their own ends and purpoſes, to the detriment of this kingdom (of all which the ſaid earl of Briſtol neither was nor could be ignorant) the ſaid late King James, by entertaining thoſe treaties, and continuing them upon thoſe falſe aſſurances given him by the ſaid earl, as aforeſaid, was made ſecure, and loſt the opportunity of time, and thereby the ſaid dominions, territories and poſſeſſions of the ſaid count Palatine, and the electoral dignity become utterly loſt; and ſome parts thereof were taken out of the actual poſſeſſion of the ſaid King James, unto whoſe protection and ſafe-keeping they were put, and commited to the ſaid count Palatine; and the moſt excellent lady Elizabeth his wife, and their children, are now utterly diſpoſſeſſed and bereaved thereof, to the high diſhonor of our ſaid late Sovereign Lord King James, to the diſheriſon of the ſaid late King's children, and their poſterity, of their ancient patrimony, and to the diſadvantage and diſcouraging of the other Princes of Germany, and other Kings and Princes in amity and league with his Majeſty.

II. That the ſaid earl of Briſtol, being embaſſador for his late Majeſty King James, as aforeſaid, 'in Annis ſupradictis,' and having received perfect, plain and particular inſtructions and directions from his ſaid late Majeſty, that he ſhould put the King of Spain to a ſpeedy and punctual anſwer, touching the treaties aforeſaid: and the ſaid earl, well underſtanding the effect of thoſe inſtructions and directions ſo given unto him, and taking preciſe knowledge thereof, and alſo knowing how much it concerned his late Majeſty in honor and ſafety (as his great affairs then ſtood) to put theſe treaties to a ſpeedy concluſion, yet nevertheleſs, he, the ſaid earl, falſely, willingly and traiterouſly, contrary to his allegiance, and contrary to the truſt and duty of an embaſſador, continued thoſe treaties upon generalities, without effectual preſſing the ſaid King of Spain to particular concluſions, according to his Majeſty's directions as aforeſaid; and ſo the ſaid earl intended to have continued the ſaid treaties upon generalities, and without reducing them to certainties and to direct concluſions, to the high diſhonor of his ſaid late Majeſty, and to the extreme danger and detriment of his Majeſty's perſon, his crown and dominions, confederates and allies.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

III. That the ſaid earl of Briſtol, being embaſſador for his ſaid late Majeſty as aforeſaid, in the years aforeſaid, to the intent to diſcourage the ſaid late King James for the taking up arms, entering into hoſtility with the ſaid King of Spain, and for reſiſting him and his forces from attempting the invaſion of his ſaid late Majeſty's dominions, and the dominions of his ſaid late Majeſty's confederates, friends and allies, the ſaid King of Spain, having long thirſted after univerſal monarchy in theſe weſtern parts of the world, hath many times, both by words and letters to the ſaid late King and his miniſters, extolled and magnified the greatneſs and power of the ſaid King of Spain, and repreſented to his ſaid late Majeſty the ſuppoſed dangers which would inſue unto him, if a war ſhould happen between them; and affirmed, and inſinuated unto his ſaid late Majeſty, that if ſuch a war ſhould inſue, his ſaid late Majeſty, during the reſt of his life, muſt expect neither to hunt, nor hawk, nor eat his meat in quiet: whereby the ſaid earl of Briſtol did cunningly and traiterouſly ſtrive to retard the reſolutions of the ſaid late King to declare himſelf an enemy to the ſaid King of Spain, (who, under color of treaties and alliances, had ſo much abuſed him) and to reſiſt his arms and forces, to the loſs of opportunity of time, which cannot be recalled, or regained, and to the extreme danger, diſhonor and detriment of this kingdom.

IV. The ſaid earl of Briſtol, upon his diſpatch out of this realm of England, in his embaſſage aforeſaid, having communicated with diverſe perſons of London, within this realm of England, before his going into Spain, in and about his embaſſage concerning the ſaid treaty, for the negociation whereof the ſaid earl purpoſely was ſent; and he the ſaid earl being then told, there was little probability, that theſe treaties would or could have any good ſucceſs, he the ſaid earl acknowledged as much; and yet nevertheleſs, contrary to his duty and allegiance, and to the faith and truth of an embaſſador, he the ſaid earl ſaid and affirmed, that he cared not what the ſucceſs thereof would be, for he would take care to have his inſtructions, and purſue them punctually; and howſoever the buſineſs went, he would make his fortune thereby; or uſed words at that time to ſuch effect; whereby it plainly appeareth, that the ſaid earl, from the begining herein, intended not the ſervice or honor of his late Majeſty, but his own corrupt and ſiniſter ends, and for his own advancement.

V. That, from the begining of his negociation, and throughout the whole management thereof by the ſaid earl of Briſtol, and during his ſaid embaſſage, he the ſaid earl, contrary to his faith and duty to God, the true religion profeſſed by the church church of England, and the peace of this church and ſtate, did intend and reſolve, that if the ſaid marriage ſo treated of as aforeſaid ſhould, by his miniſtry, be effected, that thereby the Romiſh religion and profeſſors thereof ſhould be advanced within this realm, and other his Majeſty's realms and dominions, and the true religion and profeſſors thereof diſcouraged and diſcountenanced. And, to that end and purpoſe, the ſaid earl, during the time aforeſaid, by letters unto his late Majeſty, and otherwiſe, often counſelled and perſuaded his ſaid late Majeſty to ſet at liberty the Jeſuits and Prieſts of the Romiſh religion, who, according to the good, religious and public laws of this kingdom, were impriſoned or reſtrained, and to grant and allow to the Papiſts and profeſſors of the Romiſh religion free toleration, and ſilencing all the laws made, and ſtanding in force againſt them.

VI. That, by the falſe informations and intelligence of the ſaid earl of Briſtol, during the time aforeſaid, unto his ſaid late Majeſty, and to his Majeſty who now is (being then Prince) concerning the ſaid treaties, and by the aſſurances aforeſaid given by the ſaid earl, his ſaid late Majeſty, and the Prince, his now Majeſty, being put in hopes, and by the ſaid long delay uſed, without producing any effect, their Majeſties being put into jealouſies, and juſt ſuſpicion, that there was no ſuch ſincerity uſed towards them as they expected, and, with ſo many anſwers from the earl, had on their part been undertaken, the ſaid Prince, our now gracious Sovereign, was inforced, out of his love to his country, to his allies, friends and confederates, and to the peace of Chriſtendom, who all ſuffered by thoſe intolerable delays, in his own perſon to undertake his long and dangerous journey into Spain, that thereby he might either ſpeedily conclude thoſe treaties, or perfectly diſcover that, on the Emperor's and King of Spain's part, there was no true and real intention to bring the ſame to concluſion, upon any fit and honorable terms and conditions, and did abſolutely and ſpeedily break them off: by which journey, the perſon of the ſaid Prince, being then heir-apparent to the crown of this realm, and in his perſon the peace and ſafety of this kingdom, did undergo ſuch apparent and ſuch inevitable danger, as at the very remembrance thereof the hearts of all good ſubjects do even tremble.

II. Offenſes done and commited by the ſaid earl, during the time of the Prince's being in Spain.

VII. THAT, at the Prince's coming into Spain, during the time aforeſaid, the earl of Briſtol, cunningly, falſely and traiterouſly moved and perſuaded the Prince, being then in the power of a foreign King of the Romiſh faith, to change his religion, which was done in this manner. At the Prince's firſt coming to the ſaid earl, he aſked the Prince, for what he came thither? The Prince at firſt, not conceiving the earl's meaning, anſwered, you know as well as I. The earl replied, Sir, ſervants can never ſerve their maſters induſtriouſly, altho' they may do it faithfully, unleſs they know their meanings fully: give me leave therefore to tell you, what they ſay, in the town, is the cauſe of your coming; that you mean to change your religion, and to declare it here, and yet cunningly to diſguiſe it. The earl added farther; Sir, I do not ſpeak this, that I will perſuade you to do it, or that I will promiſe you to follow your example, tho' you will do it; but, as your faithful ſervant, if you will truſt me with ſo great a ſecret, I will indeavor to carry it the diſcreeteſt way I can. The Prince, being moved at this unexpected motion, again ſaid unto him; I wonder what you have ever found in me, that you ſhould conceive I would be ſo baſe and unworthy as, for a wife, to change my religion. The ſaid earl replying, he deſired the Prince to pardon him, if he had offended it was but out of his deſire to ſerve him. Which perſuaſions of the ſaid earl were the more dangerous, becauſe the more ſubtil; whereas it had been the duty of a faithful ſervant to God and his maſter, if he had found the Prince ſtaggering in his religion, to have prevented ſo great an error, and to have perſuaded againſt it, ſo to have avoided the dangerous conſequence thereof to the true religion, and to the ſtate, if ſuch a thing ſhould have happened.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

VIII. That afterwards, during the Prince's being in Spain, the ſaid earl, having conference with the ſaid Prince about the Romiſh religion, he indeavored falſely and traiterouſly to perſuade the Prince to change his religion, and to become a Roman Catholic, and to become obedient to the uſurped authority of the Pope of Rome: and, to that end and purpoſe, the ſaid earl traiterouſly uſed theſe words unto the ſaid Prince, that the ſtate of England never did any great thing but when they were under the obedience of the Pope of Rome: and that it was impoſſible they could do any thing of note otherwiſe.

IX. That, during the time of the Prince's being in Spain, the Prince conſulting and adviſing with the ſaid earl, and others, about a new offer made by the King of Spain, touching the Palatine's eldeſt ſon, to marry with the Emperor's daughter, but then he muſt be bred up in the Emperor's court; the ſaid earl delivered his opinion, that the propoſition was reaſonable; whereat when ſir Walter Aſton, then preſent, falling into ſome paſſion, ſaid, that he durſt not for his head conſent to it; the earl of Briſtol replied, that he ſaw no ſuch great inconvenience in it; for that he might be bred up in the Emperor's court in our religion. But when the extreme danger, and, in a manner, the impoſſibility thereof was preſſed unto the ſaid earl, he ſaid again, that, without ſome great action, the peace of Chriſtendom would never be had; which was ſo dangerous and ſo deſperate a counſel, that one near the crown of England ſhould be poiſoned in his religion, and become an unfriend to our ſtate, that the conſequences thereof, both for the preſent and future times, were infinitely dangerous; and yet hereunto did his diſaffection to our religion, the blindneſs in his judgment, miſled by his ſiniſter reſpects, and the too much regard he had to the houſe of Auſtria lead him.

III. Offenſes done and commited by the ſaid earl, after the Prince's coming from Spain.

X. THAT when the Prince had clearly found himſelf and his father deluded in theſe treaties, and hereupon reſolved to return from the court of Spain; yet becauſe it behoved him to part freely, he left the powers of the deſponſories with the earl of Briſtol, to be delivered upon the return of the diſpenſation from Rome, which the King of Spain inſiſted upon; and without which, as he pretended, he would not conclude the marriage. The Prince, foreſeeing and fearing leſt, after the deſponſories, the Infanta, who ſhould then be his wife, might be put into a monaſtery, wrote a letter back to the ſaid earl from Segovia, thereby commanding him not to make uſe of the ſaid powers, until he could give him aſſurance, that a monaſtery ſhould not rob him of his wife; which letter the ſaid earl received, and with ſpeed returned anſwer thereto in England, perſuading againſt this direction, yet promiſing obedience thereunto. Shortly after which the Prince ſent another letter to the ſaid earl into Spain, diſcharging him of his father's command. But his late Majeſty, by the ſame meſſenger, ſent him him a more expreſs direction, not to diſpatch the deſponſories, until a full concluſion was had of the other treaty of the Palatinate with this of the marriage; for his Majeſty ſaid, That he would not have one daughter to laugh, and leave the other daughter weeping. In which diſpatch, altho' there were ſome miſtaking, yet in the next following the ſame was corrected, and the earl of Briſtol tied to the ſame reſtriction, which himſelf confeſſed in one of his diſpatches afterwards, and promiſed to obey punctually the King's command therein; yet nevertheleſs, contrary to his duty and allegiance, in another letter ſent immediately after, he declared, That he had ſet a day for the deſponſories, without any aſſurance, or ſo much as treating of thoſe things which were commanded to him as reſtrictions; and that ſo ſhort a day, that if extraordinary diligence, with good ſucceſs in the journey, had not concurred, the Prince's hands might have been bound up; and yet he neither ſure of a wife, nor any aſſurance given of the temporal articles. All which, in his high preſumption, he adventured to do, being an expreſs breach of his inſtructions; and, if the ſame had not been prevented by his late Majeſty's vigilancy, it might have turned to the infinite diſhonor and prejudice of his Majeſty.

XI. Laſtly, That he hath offended in a high and contemptuous manner, in prefering a ſcandalous petition to this honorable houſe, to the diſhonor of his Majeſty of bleſſed memory deceaſed, and of his ſacred Majeſty who now is, which are no way ſufferable in a ſubject towards his Sovereign; and in one article of that petition ſpecially, wherein he gives his now Majeſty the lie, in denying and offering to falſify that relation which his Majeſty affirmed, and thereunto added many things of his own remembrance to both houſes of parliament.

* Robert Heath.

* The King's attorney-general.

The earl of Briſtol, on the attorney-general's accuſing him of high-treaſon, returned this anſwer: viz.

"That he had exhibited his petition to the "houſe, April nineteen, that he might come up "and be heard in his accuſation of the duke of "Buckingham, and that thereupon he, being a "peer of this realm, is now charged with treaſon: "that he had heretofore informed the late King "of the duke's unfaithful ſervice, and thereupon "the duke labored that he might be ſhut up in "the Tower, preſently upon his return out of "Spain: that he importuned the late King, that "he might be heard before himſelf, and his Ma"jeſty promiſed it, "I pray God (ſaid he) that "the promiſe did him no hurt, for he died ſhortly "after." And for the King's promiſe, he vouched "the lord-chamberlain for a witneſs; and he de"ſired the lords to take notice, that their houſe "was poſſeſſed already of his ſaid petition, and of "his accuſation of the ſaid duke; and therefore "deſired firſt, that they would receive his charge "againſt the duke and lord Conway, and not to "invalidate his teſtimony againſt him by the King's "charge againſt him; and that he might not be "impeached 'till his charge, of ſo high a nature, "be firſt heard.

So he tendered to the houſe the articles againſt Buckingham, which the clerk received, and he withdrew: his petition, exhibited the nineteenth of April, was read; and the lords reſolved upon the queſtion, that the ſaid earl's charge againſt the duke of Buckingham and lord Conway ſhould be read inſtantly.

Briſtol being ſoon after again called in to the bar of the lords houſe, concerning his articles againſt Buckingham, expreſſed himſelf to the following purport: Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

Firſt, He craved pardon of their lordſhips for his earneſt ſpeeches the other day, confeſſing them to have been in paſſion, ſaying, unexpected accuſation of treaſon would warm any honeſt heart, but would hereafter amend it. Then he returned their lordſhips humble thanks for their manner of proceeding againſt him; and deſired to know, from Mr. Attorney, whether that was his whole charge or not. Mr. Attorney replied; he had commandment to open no more againſt him; peradventure, upon opening the charge, ſome particulars might ariſe, and be urged, but no new matter ſhould.

Then the earl deſired to know of Mr. Attorney, who was the relator to his charge, and that he might underſtand who was his accuſer. Mr. Attorney ſaid, That the King himſelf, out of his own mouth, had given him directions for his own relation againſt him, and corrected many things which were added. Hereunto the earl ſaid, he would not conteſt with his Majeſty, neither did it beſeem him ſo to do; neither eſteemed he his life or his fortunes ſo much as to ſave them by conteſting with his Sovereign; and therefore would make no reply, were it not that his religion and honor were jointly queſtioned with his life; but that being to deſcend to his poſterity, for their ſakes he was a moſt humble ſuitor to his Majeſty, that he would not take indignation at his own juſt defenſe, yet would he be ready to make any humble ſubmiſſion to his Majeſty; and heartily deſired ſome means might be made, that he might make it perſonally to himſelf, wherein he would ſubmit himſelf moſt willingly to ſome ſuch act of humiliation and ſubmiſſion (not wronging his innocency) as never ſubject did towards his Sovereign: and alſo that his Majeſty would be pleaſed to ſet himſelf in his throne of juſtice, and declare out of his royal juſtice, that he would have the duke and him upon equal terms, and that neither of their cauſes ſhould be advanced before the other's.

Theſe were his humble petitions, which he beſought their lordſhips to preſent unto his Majeſty, and to take it into their conſiderations, of how dangerous a conſequence it would be, if the King ſhould be accuſer, judge, witneſs, and ſhould have the confiſcation. As touching the charge againſt him, he ſaid, He had once anſwered it all, except that of his petition; and he doubted not but to clear himſelf, before their lordſhips, of every particular thereof: that he expected not to have heard of this again, having once anſwered it: he rather expected to have been charged with ſome practiſe with Spain againſt the ſtate; or the receipt of ten or twenty thouſand pounds, for the perſuading and procuring of the delivery up of ſome town, of which the crown was in poſſeſſion, as might be the town of Fluſhing, the Brill, or the like; or for being the means of lending the King's ſhips to a foreign nation, and that againſt thoſe of our own religion; or for revealing his Majeſty's higheſt ſecrets, which none above two or three dares know; or for treating the greateſt affairs (1), as it were by his own authority, without formal inſtructions in the points; for having taken rewards, or been corrupted by a foreign Prince; or to have broken his inſtructions in any eccleſiaſtical point; or, as the law calleth it, to have commited an overt-act of diſloyalty; and not to be charged, after ſeven embaſſages, with diſcourſes and inferences.

(1) Of all this the public voice loudly accuſed Buckingham. Rapin.

Then

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

Then he deſired their lordſhips he might have a copy of his charge in writing, time allowed him for his anſwer, and counſel aſſigned him to plead his cauſe; and ſaid, there was a great difference between the duke of Buckingham and him; for the duke was accuſed of treaſon only, and yet at large, and in the King's favor, and he, being accuſed but of that which he had long ſince anſwered, was a priſoner: and therefore he moved, that they might be put in equal condition.

And as touching lord Conway, inaſmuch as he had given in articles againſt him, he deſired his lordſhip, he might not meddle in that particular buſineſs, or uſe the King's name againſt him, ex officio: he alſo beſought their lordſhips to be ſuitors to his Majeſty on his behalf, that all the particular diſpatches of his own embaſſages, and ſir Walter Aſton's, might be brought thither, and that he might make uſe of them for his defenſe, as his evidence. Then he requeſted their lordſhips, not to think it tedious for him to proceed, and lay open his caſe unto them; which being granted, he ſaid thus.

That he had the honor to ſerve the late King his maſter, of happy memory, for the ſpace of twenty years, and a long time as a counſellor, and in ſeven foreign embaſſages; in all which time, in point of his negociation, he had never received one check or rebuke, 'till the duke of Buckingham's return from Spain; and therefore he would thence begin his preſent narration.

The very day his Majeſty departed from Spain, he was pleaſed to tell him, that he had no ways offended him, but did him the honor to truſt him with the cuſtody of the powers for his marriage; and, after his return into England, wrote unto him ſome letters, which did in no kind expreſs any diſtruſt or diſpleaſure againſt him. About the ſame time, he wrote to his Majeſty ſeveral letters, as in duty he was bound, not for any earthly reſpect whatſoever, to conceal from him the true eſtate of his affairs; in which letters he ſet down, truly and honeſtly, that he conceived the diſtaſtes grown there between the King of Spain and his miniſters, and the duke of Buckingham, would diſorder and utterly overthrow all his affairs, if his wiſdom prevented it not; 'hinc illæ lachrymæ:' the duke of Buckingham got a ſight and knowledge of thoſe letters; and fearing leſt the earl, at his return, ſhould diſcover to his ſaid late Majeſty his practiſes and miſdemeanors in Spain, he reſolved, that his acceſs to the King was no ways to be admited, and therefore labored and indeavored, that he might be commited to the Tower preſently upon his arrival; and conceiving that the lord marquis Hamilton, in regard of his friendſhip with the earl, and the alliance which was then intended between them, might oppoſe his courſe, he earneſtly preſſed him therein, and moved him to deal with my lord chamberlain to the ſame purpoſe, vowing, that there was no hurt intended the earl, but only he feared that, if he ſhould be admited to the King, he would croſs and diſturb the courſe of affairs. But they were ſo honorable, that neither of them would condeſcend thereunto; and ſo that intention of his took no effect.

This deſign of the duke not taking, he fell upon other things, indeed to have frightened the earl out of his country and honor; and thereupon laid ſome great and ſiniſter aſperſions upon him in both houſes of parliament, thinking thereby to have terrified him, that he ſhould not return, ſaying, that if he kept not himſelf where he was, and laid hold on thoſe great offers which he heard were made him in Spain, it would be worſe with him.

" Here Briſtol requeſted the lord chamberlain, " that he would be pleaſed, upon his honor, to " deliver what he knew of the matter. Where- Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.
" upon the lord chamberlain atteſted the truth of " what the earl had ſaid concerning the duke of " Buckingham, marquis Hamilton, and himſelf.

Then the earl of Briſtol proceeded and ſaid, that the knowledge of theſe aſperſions, caſt upon him in the parliament, came firſt to him at Bourdeaux in France, where he was coming home at leiſure, in the company of his wife and family, having formerly ſent a poſt on purpoſe to lord Conway, to know if his ſpeedy return would be any way uſeful to his Majeſty's ſervice: who anſwered him, that he might very well return at leiſure with his family. And in the mean time, he was fallen upon by the duke of Buckingham in parliament, in ſuch ſort as your lordſhips well remember, of whoſe declaration, he ſaid, he would boldly affirm to their lordſhips, that there was ſcarce any one thing concerning him in it which was not contrary to, or different from the truth.

From Bourdeaux the earl took poſt, making haſte, for that he hoped to clear his honor in parliament before it ſhould break up; and being arrived at Calais, he ſent over to have one of the King's ſhips, for which there was public order given: but altho' both wind and weather were as fair as could be, and the King's ſhips lay at Boulogne, having carried over count Mansfield, and might every day within three hours have been with him, yet the ſhip came not in eight days expectance; ſo that the earl, fearing the parliament would be diſſolved, was inforced to paſs the ſea in a boat with ſix oars, as he did, having with him thirty or forty thouſand pounds-worth of the King's jewels.

Upon his landing at Dover, hoping that if his arreſt ſhould have been defered 'till his coming to London, he might have got directly to the King's preſenſe, which the duke reſolved was by no means to be admited; the earl was there, by a letter of lord Conway's, delivered him by a ſervant of his, in his Majeſty's name, commanded to retire himſelf to his houſe, and not to come to the court, or the King's preſenſe, until he ſhould have anſwered to certain queſtions, which his Majeſty would appoint ſome of the lords of the council to aſk him. Hereupon he ſent preſently to his Majeſty, who ſent him word, that his reſtraint was neither for any ill meaning to him, nor that it ſhould laſt long, but was intended for his good, to keep the parliament from falling violently upon him. And the ſame reaſon the duke alledged to ſome of his friends; and all thoſe his troubles, which have followed upon his firſt reſtraint, have been procured by the duke's art, under color of favor. But the earl, having received his meſſage from the King, became a moſt humble ſuitor to his Majeſty, that he would expoſe him to the parliament; for that if he had not ſerved him honeſtly in all things, he deſerved no favor, but to be proceeded againſt with all ſeverity. And in this particular he preſſed the King, as far as could ſtand with duty and good manners; but received anſwer from his Majeſty, that there ſhould but few more days paſs, before he would put an end to his affairs. And about this time the parliament was diſſolved.

He ſtill continued his ſollicitation to be admited to the King's preſenſe, who ſent him word, and confirmed it by oath, that as ſoon as he ſhould have anſwered the queſtions which the commiſſioners were to propound to him, he would both ſee him and hear him, and wondered that he ſhould ſo much doubt thereof. He then ſollicited with all earneſtneſs to have the queſtions ſent him, which was promiſed ſhould be within few days. In the interim, his Majeſty, being deſirous that the buſineſs ſhould have been accommodated, ſent ſecretly to him, by a gentleman (who is ready to depoſe it) this meſſage;

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

"That he ſhould write a fair letter to the duke, "and leave the reſt to him." Hereupon the duke ſent a gentleman (one Mr. Clark) with fair propoſitions, offering to procure him whatſoever he could reaſonably pretend; only he muſt not be admited to the King's preſenſe for ſome time; and that the duke would have the diſpoſing of his vice-chamberlain's place, having been therein formerly ingaged. The earl told the gentleman, that to condeſcend to any ſuch courſe, was jointly to confeſs himſelf faulty in ſome kind, which he would not do for any reſpect in the world; and let him know the great wrong which the duke had already done him; and therefore it would be more honorable for him to procure him ſome reparation, than to preſs him farther. Moreover, not by way of meſſage, but by way of information of the ſaid Mr. Clark, he let him know, how fit it were for the duke not to preſs theſe things, who could not but be conſcious of his own faults, and know his innocency; and withal ſhewed him a paper which he had made ready for the King, containing the particulars wherein the duke had diſparaged him.

Mr. Clark making the duke herewith acquainted, the duke wrote a letter next day to the earl, bearing date 7 Julii, telling him, that he had willingly intended the accommodation of his affairs; but by what he had now ſaid to Mr. Clark, he was diſobliged, unleſs he ſhould be pleaſed to relent it. Whereupon the earl anſwered with that directneſs he thought befiting him in point of honor. The courſe of mediation was interrupted, and the duke ſo far inſenſed, that he ſwore he would have him queſtioned for his life. In the interim (which the earl deſired might be known to the lords) his late Majeſty was ſo far from thinking him a delinquent, or any way diſhoneſt, that he was often heard to ſay and ſwear, that he held him an honeſt man, and he would anſwer for him, that he had neither commited felony nor treaſon: and this diverſe are ready to depoſe. The which he well confirmed, for that he gave general leave to all gentlemen of the court, privy counſellors, and to his ſecretary of ſtate, to have free acceſs unto him; yea, even ſo far as to admit of viſits and intercourſes with Spaniſh embaſſadors, and Padre Maeſtre, as is beſt known to lord Conway, by whoſe letter he received his Majeſty's leave in that particular.

Then he reſumed the ſtate of his buſineſs where he left it, which was in the hands of the commiſſioners, and they were to frame interrogatories for him; the which, altho' they had promiſed ſhould be ſent within a few days, yet ſuch art was uſed, that ſix or ſeven weeks paſſed in the framing them, to the end that his Majeſty's progreſs beginning, there might be no means for farther clearing the buſineſs: and ſo ſuppoſing that, for the anſwering the twenty interrogatories of ſo high a nature, the earl would take ſome time, they cauſed the ſaid interrogatories to be delivered to him within a few days before the progreſs began; but he uſed ſo much diligence, that he made ready to anſwer in Perſonâ, tho' it were in the nature of a delinquent. To which his Majeſty anſwered moſt graciouſly, that out of his favor, and for that he would not do him wrong, he would not admit it, but that he would ſend his anſwer, and he would inſtantly put an end to his buſineſſes; as will appear by letters. Hereupon the duke was put into a great ſtrait how to keep him any longer from his Majeſty, but deſired that only a few queſtions more might be aſked of him; which the King, upon great urging and inſtance, condeſcended to, ſo that the queſtions might be preſently ſent him: but herein were ſuch artifices uſed, that the bringing any was delayed until the King had begun his progreſs; and then within a day or two, lord Conway ſent him word, that he had order indeed for ſending him ſome more queſtions, but, out of his affection to him, he forbore ſending them, unleſs he ſhould preſs for them. Whereupon the earl inſtantly wrote to him, that they might be ſent him. Lord Conway made him anſwer by his letter, that he wiſhed rather the courſe of mediation might be purſued, for that would but farther exaſperate; but if he would needs have the queſtions they ſhould be ſent him. Whereupon he ſent to ſollicit his lordſhip for them with all earneſtneſs, inſomuch as to petition his late Majeſty twice, that the ſaid queſtions might be ſent: but when the turn was ſerved of keeping him from the King's preſenſe, the ſaid queſtions were never more heard of to this day.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

So likewiſe the earl having ſent his anſwer to all the commiſſioners, who moſt of them made it not nice to declare, that they were fully ſatisfied; and when it was perceived that the commiſſioners would certainly clear him, and that he thereby ſhould be reſtored to his Majeſty's favor, they were never more permited to meet: a proceeding which, as he conceived, their lordſhips would think hardly to be paralleled, that a commiſſion ſhould be appointed to condemn, if there had been cauſe, but not to clear.

After the progreſs was ended, he began again to ſollicit his Majeſty, and wrote particularly to the duke of Buckingham. Whereupon the duke was pleaſed to ſend four or five propoſitions, which he deſired he ſhould acknowledge; the which propoſitions contained nothing but what had been already propounded and ſatisfied in the former interrogatories: and if he would make his acknowledgment, he then promiſed to imploy his force and power with the King and Prince, that he ſhould be admited to kiſs their hands, and be received into their gracious favor; but otherwiſe, in a menacing ſort, that he ſhould lay his hands upon his breaſt, and ſo that would be beſt for him. And in the preface of the ſaid propoſitions, he writeth theſe words which follow, "It is an aſſertion not granted, "that the earl of Briſtol, by his anſwer hath ſatiſ"fied either the King, the Prince, or me, of his "innocency." A preſumptuous commination for any ſubject.

But theſe propoſitions were ſo unjuſt, that he wrote to the duke, that inſtead of an acknowledgment, he had ſent him an anſwer to them; to which, if either himſelf, or any man living was able to reply, he would ſubmit himſelf to any thing ſhould be demanded. But this no way ſatisfied the duke, altho' it did his late Majeſty, who, in the duke's preſenſe, ſaid, "I were to be accounted a "tyrant, to injoin an innocent man to confeſs faults "of which he was not guilty." And thereupon ſent him word, that he ſhould make his anſwer, but acknowledge nothing wherein he was not faulty. And altho' he had received this meſſage from the King's own mouth, as will be depoſed, yet the duke, at the ſame time, wrote to him, that the concluſion of all had been treated with his Majeſty, was, that he ſhould make the acknowledgment in ſuch manner, as was ſet down in this paper. And it was likewiſe at this time his Majeſty ſent him word, that he would hear him concerning the duke of Buckingham, as well as he had heard the duke concerning him. This was not long before his Majeſty's ſickneſs; and in the interim, as he had heard by ſeveral ways, the King ſuffered much, and was infinitely preſſed by the duke concerning the ſaid earl and his affairs; and this he ſaid, was the ſuffering he had ſpoken of to their lordſhips the other day.

The earl craved leave of their lordſhips, to ſpecify ſome other particulars, whereby it ſhould appear, that his Majeſty was in no kind ill-opinioned

of him to his dying day, viz. that ſeveral perſons will depoſe, they have heard his Majeſty ſay, that he eſteemed him an honeſt man; and that he was pleaſed to accept of toys, by way of preſent, from him, graciouſly, and in good part; and at laſt was likewiſe pleaſed to permit his coming to London, and to follow his own affairs; and that his pleaſure was ſignified to him by the duke's own letter. Whereupon he determined to come to London, intimating to the duke his intention of going to his lodgings in Whitehall; but the duke was therewith inſenſed again, and ſaid, he miſtook the King's meaning, which was, that he might privately follow his own buſineſs. And this, he ſaid, was the true ſtate and conditions when it pleaſed God to take unto his mercy his late moſt gracious Majeſty.

On King Charles's coming to the crown, he ſaid, he wrote a moſt humble letter to his Majeſty, imploring his grace and goodneſs, and deſiring the duke's mediation. But he was pleaſed to anſwer, by his letter of 7 May 1625; that the reſolution was to proceed againſt him, without a plain and direct confeſſion of the point which he had formerly required him to acknowledge; and in a courtly manner of menace told him, that he would take the freedom to adviſe him, to bethink himſelf in time what would be moſt for his good. But in the interim, his Majeſty was graciouſly pleaſed that his writ of parliament ſhould be ſent him; and thereupon he wrote to the duke of the receipt of the ſaid writ, but that he ſhould do nothing but what he ſhould underſtand to be moſt agreeable to his Majeſty's pleaſure. Whereunto the duke anſwered, in his letter of May, in this manner: "I have acquainted his Majeſty with your requeſt towards "him, touching your ſummons to the parliament, "which he taketh very well, and would rather have "you make excuſe for your abſenſe, notwithſtanding "your writ, than to come yourſelf in perſon." Whereupon he ſent humbly to deſire a letter of leave, under his Majeſty's hand, for his warrant; but, inſtead thereof, he received from lord Conway an abſolute prohibition, and to reſtrain and confine him in ſuch ſort as he had been in the late King's time: and altho' indeed he was abſolutely ſet free, he could never get cleared by lord Conway, tho' he ſent him all the papers to examine; and when he could make no farther reply, he ſaid, he conceived he was under reſtraint, and that his liberty expired with the late King's death; when indeed reſtraint may expire, but liberty is natural. After this, he continued for the ſpace of three quarters of a year in the country without moving, in which time he was removed from thoſe places and offices he held during his late Majeſty's life; and the greateſt part of his eſtate being laid out in their Majeſty's ſervice, by their particular appointment, he could never be admited ſo much as to the clearing of accounts. Yet hereof he never made the leaſt complaint: but, againſt the time of his Majeſty's coronation, he thought it fit to lay hold on that occaſion, when Princes do acts of grace and favor, to be a moſt humble ſuitor to his Majeſty for his grace and goodneſs; and addreſſed his letters to the duke of Buckingham, from whom he received a letter, all written in his own hand, and therein a letter incloſed from his Majeſty, ſo different from ſome gracious meſſages which he had received from his Majeſty, ſince the ſaid earl returned into England, upon the occaſion of a great ſickneſs, and likewiſe from his ſpeeches ſeveral times delivered to his wife, to wit, that he had never offended him, and that for his faults he no ways held them criminal, but to be expiated by any eaſy acknowledgment; that he confeſſed he knew not what judgment to make of the ſaid letter, neither hath preſumed hitherto to make any anſwer thereto; altho', by reducing the occaſion of ſpeeches and circumſtances to his Majeſty's memory, he no way doubteth but he ſhall be able to give his Majeſty ſuch ſatisfaction to every particular, that his Majeſty would not remain with the leaſt ſcruple in any one point.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

After this, he ſaid, that his writ of parliament was detained; whereupon he addreſſed himſelf to the lord-keeper, that he would be a ſuitor to his Majeſty for him in that behalf: which diligence not taking effect, by petition he became a ſuitor to their lordſhips for their honorable mediation to his Majeſty, and thereupon his writ of parliament was awarded: but the duke of Buckingham upon that took occaſion, as he had publiſhed copies of the ſaid letter over all the kingdom, to read it likewiſe to that honorable houſe, as was beſt known to their lordſhips, and the writ was accompanied with a prohibition from the lord-keeper; whereupon he addreſſed himſelf for juſtice to that honorable houſe (being poſſeſſed of his cauſe by his petition) for both redreſs of his own wrongs, and likewiſe of complaints againſt the duke for many crimes. And that honorable houſe being poſſeſſed of his cauſe by his petition, there is prefered againſt him a ſucceeding complaint, amounting as high as treaſon (as it is pretended) altho' he for diverſe years hath not been queſtioned; yet ſince his complaint againſt the duke he hath been fetched up like a priſoner, and brought into the houſe as a delinquent; and the duke, of whom he hath complained for his great crimes, is admited ſtill to ſit in the houſe as one of his judges. The which, with all he hath formerly ſaid, together with his life, fortunes and honor, he did with all willingneſs, humility and duty, ſubmit to the juſtice and honor of that houſe.

Then the lords aſked him, when he would bring in his anſwer? He promiſed to anſwer as ſoon as might be, but knew not how far he ſhould have occaſion to uſe his ancient diſpatches. The lord-keeper told him, that mr. attorney might help him by leting him know it. mr. attorney ſaid, that his charge ſhould in nothing look farther back than to the year 1621, which he deſired might be recorded.

Whereupon the earl thanking their lordſhips for their patience, he was carried away by mr. Maxwell, the gentleman-uſher, in whoſe houſe and cuſtody he remained.

Then were read the earl's articles againſt the duke and lord Conway: viz.

Articles of the earl of Briſtol, whereby he chargeth the duke of Buckingham, bearing date the firſt day of May, 1626.

I. THAT the duke of Buckingham did ſecretly combine with count Gondomar, embaſſador for the King of Spain, before his, the ſaid embaſſador's, laſt return into Spain, in the ſummer, anno 1622, to carry his Majeſty (then Prince) into Spain, to the end he might be informed in the Roman religion, and thereby have perverted the Prince, and ſubverted the true religion eſtabliſhed in England: from which miſery this kingdom (next under God's mercy) hath by the wiſe, religious and conſtant carriage of his Majeſty been almoſt miraculouſly delivered, conſidering the many bold and ſubtil attempts of the ſaid duke in that kind.

II. That mr. Porter was made acquainted therewith, and ſent into Spain; and ſuch meſſages at his return framed as might ſerve for a good ground to ſet on foot this conſpiracy: the which was done accordingly, and thereby the King and Prince highly abuſed, and their conſents thereby firſt got to the the ſaid journey, that is to ſay, after the return of the ſaid mr. Porter, which was about the end of December, or begining of January 1622, whereas the ſaid duke had ploted it many months before.

III. That the ſaid duke, at his arrival in Spain, nouriſhed the Spaniſh miniſters, not only in the belief of his own being Popiſhly affected, but did (both by abſenting himſelf from all exerciſes of religion, conſtantly uſed in the earl of Briſtol's houſe, and frequented by all other Proteſtant Engliſh, and by conforming himſelf to pleaſe the Spaniards in diverſe rites of their religion, even ſo far as to kneel and adore their ſacrament) from time to time give the Spaniards hope of the Prince's converſion: the which converſion, he indeavored to procure by all means poſſible, and thereby cauſe the Spaniſh miniſters to propound far worſe conditions for religion than had been formerly, by the earl of Briſtol and ſir Walter Aſton, ſettled and ſigned under their Majeſties hands, with a clauſe in the King of Spain's anſwer of December 12, 1622, that they held the articles agreed upon ſufficient, and ſuch as ought to induce the Pope to grant the diſpenſation.

IV. That the duke of Buckingham having ſeveral times, in preſenſe of the earl of Briſtol, moved and preſſed his late Majeſty, at the inſtance of Conde Gondomar, to write a letter to the Pope; and to that purpoſe having once brought a letter ready drawn, wherewith the earl of Briſtol, by his Majeſty, being made acquainted, did ſo ſtrongly oppoſe the writing any ſuch letter, that, during the abode of the ſaid earl of Briſtol in England, the ſaid duke could not obtain it; yet not long after the earl was gone, he procured ſuch a letter to be written from his ſaid late Majeſty to the Pope, and to have him ſtiled Sanctiſſime Pater.

V. That the Pope being informed of the duke of Buckingham's inclination and intention in point of religion, ſent the ſaid duke a particular bull in parchment, to perſuade and incourage him in the perverſion of his Majeſty, then Prince.

VI. That the ſaid duke's behavior in Spain was ſuch, that he thereby ſo inſenſed the King of Spain, and his miniſters, as they would admit of no reconciliation, nor farther dealing with him. Whereupon the ſaid duke, ſeeing that the match would be now to his diſadvantage, indeavored to break it, not for any ſervice to the kingdom, nor diſlike of the match in itſelf, nor for that he found (as ſince he had pretended) that the Spaniards did not really intend the ſaid match, but out of his particular ends, and his indignation.

VII. That after he intended to croſs the marriage, he put in practiſe diverſe undue courſes; as namely, making uſe of the letters of his Majeſty (then Prince) to his own ends, and not to what they were intended; as likewiſe concealing diverſe things of high importance from his late Majeſty, and thereby overthrew his Majeſty's purpoſes, and advanced his own ends.

VIII. That the ſaid duke, as he had with his ſkill and artifices formerly abuſed their Majeſties, ſo to the ſame end he afterwards abuſed both houſes of parliament, by his ſiniſter relation of the carriage of affairs, as ſhall be made appear almoſt in every particular which he ſpake to the ſaid houſes.

IX. As for ſcandal given by his perſonal behavior, as alſo the imploying his power with the King of Spain for procuring favors and offices, which he beſtowed upon baſe and unworthy perſons for the recompenſe and hire of his luſt. Theſe things, as neither fit for the earl of Briſtol to ſpeak, nor indeed for the houſe to hear, he leaveth to your lordſhips wiſdom, how far you will be pleaſed to have them examined; it having been indeed a great infamy and diſhonor to this nation, that a perſon of the duke's great quality and imployments, a privy-counſellor, and embaſſador, eminent in his maſter's favor, and ſolely truſted with the perſon of the Prince, ſhould leave behind him, in a foreign court, ſo much ſcandal as he did by his ill behavior.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

X. That the duke had been in great part the cauſe of the ruin and misfortune of the Prince Palatine, and his eſtates, inaſmuch as thoſe affairs had relation to this kingdom.

XI. That the duke of Buckingham hath, in his relations to both houſes of parliament, wronged the earl of Briſtol in point of his honor, by many ſiniſter afperſions which he hath laid upon him, and in point of his liberty by many undue courſes, thro' his power and practiſes.

XII. That the earl of Briſtol did reveal to his late Majeſty, both by word and letter, in what ſort the ſaid duke had diſſerved him, and abuſed his truſt: and that the King, by ſeveral ways, ſent him word, that he ſhould reſt aſſured he would hear the ſaid earl, but that he ſhould leave it to him to take his own time. And thereupon, few days before his ſickneſs, he ſent the earl word, that he would hear him againſt the ſaid duke, as well as he had heard the ſaid duke againſt him. Which the duke himſelf heard; and not long after his bleſſed Majeſty ſickened and died, having been in the interim much vexed and preſſed by the ſaid duke.

Articles of the earl of Briſtol againſt lord Conway, bearing date 1 May 1626.

I. THAT lord Conway is ſo great a ſervant of the duke of Buckingham's, that he hath not ſtuck to ſend the earl of Briſtol plain word, that if buſineſſes could not be accommodated between him and the duke, he muſt then adhere and declare himſelf for the ſaid duke; and therefore unfit to be a judge in any thing which concerneth the duke or earl.

II. That the ſaid lord Conway profeſſeth himſelf to be a ſecretary of the duke of Buckingham's creation, and ſo acknowledgeth it under his own hand: and altho' that he be the King's ſecretary of ſtate, and a privy-counſellor, he uſually begineth his letters to the duke, Moſt gracious patron.

III. That as a creature of the ſaid duke's, the ſaid lord Conway hath been made the inſtrument of keeping the earl of Briſtol from the King's preſenſe, and of impriſoning him by warrants only under his own hand; for which he cannot (as the earl conceiveth) produce any ſufficient warrant.

IV. That, by the ſpace of twelve months laſt paſſed, the ſaid lord Conway hath been the cauſe of the earl's reſtraint, only by miſinforming his Majeſty, and procuring a letter of reſtraint upon undue grounds: and when it was made apparent to him, that the ſaid earl was reſtored to his liberty, freely to follow his own affairs, by his late Majeſty of bleſſed memory, he replied, that the liberty given him by his Majeſty expired with the King's death.

V. That the earl of Briſtol's mother lying ſick upon her death-bed, deſired for her comfort to ſee her ſon, and to give him her laſt bleſſing: whereupon the earl wrote to lord Conway, deſiring him to move the King for his leave; which he, puting off from day to day, told the perſon imployed that, by reaſon of the duke's ſickneſs, he could not find opportunity to get the duke's leave to move the King: and having ſpoken with the duke, he made a negative anſwer in the King's name: whereupon, when the earl acquainted the King by ſome of his bed-chamber, his Majeſty was in a very great anger, ſwearing the ſecretary had never moved moved him, and that to deny the ſaid earl leave was a barbarous part; and thereupon ſent him preſently leave, which the ſecretary hearing, ſent afterwards a letter of leave, but with diverſe clauſes and limitations, differing from the leave ſent him from the King's own mouth.

VI. That having the buſineſſes of the earl of Briſtol in his own hands, and the earl being commanded by the King to addreſs himſelf, in his occaſions, to his lordſhip, he would never deliver any meſſage from the ſaid earl, without acquainting the ſaid duke, and receiving his directions, and, in a noble manner of freeneſs, ſtuck not to ſend him word.

VII. That the earl of Briſtol having received, from lord Conway, twenty interrogatories in his late Majeſty's name, drawn up by a commiſſion of the lords appointed to ſearch into the proceedings and imployments of the ſaid earl, in which ſearch more than two months were expended, diverſe of the ſaid interrogatories involving felony and treaſon; and his Majeſty having been pleaſed to aſſure the ſaid earl, both by meſſage and letters, that, upon ſatisfaction given to himſelf and the commiſſioners by his anſwers, he would preſently put an end to the earl of Briſtol's buſineſs. The earl of Briſtol having ſo fully anſwered, as would admit of no reply; and that many of the commiſſioners declared themſelves to be fully ſatisfied; the ſaid lord Conway (being ſecretary in the commiſſion, to whom it properly belonged to call the lords to aſſemble) perceiving the earl of Briſtol was like to be cleared, never moved for any farther meeting, neither have they ever been permited to meet until this day, whereby the troubles of the earl of Briſtol have been kept on foot until this preſent, and the ſaid earl's impriſonment hath been inlarged twenty months. And by the aritfices of the ſaid duke of Buckingham, and the ſaid lord Conway (as ſhall be made appear) the ſaid earl hath been inſenſibly involved and ſtaulked into the troubles he is now in, which he doubteth not but your lordſhips will judge to be a very conſiderable caſe.

VIII. That for a color of keeping the earl from his late Majeſty's preſenſe, it being pretended, after the anſwer to the twenty interrogatories, that there were ſome few queſtions more to be added, whereunto when he ſhould have anſwered, his Majeſty ſwore ſolemnly, that without any delay he ſhould be admited to his preſenſe, and that within two or three days he ſhould have the ſaid queſtions ſent him; lord Conway, notwithſtanding he acknowledged under his hand, that he had received his Majeſty's directions for ſending the ſaid articles, and was often thereunto ſollicited on behalf of the ſaid earl, would never ſend the ſaid queſtions, and at laſt anſwered, That he had no more to do with the earl's buſineſſes.

IX. That the earl of Briſtol, being ſet free by his late Majeſty to come to London, to follow his own affairs as he pleaſed, had thereupon his writ of parliament ſent him, without any letter of prohibition; but the earl of Briſtol, out of his great deſire to conform all his actions to that which he ſhould underſtand would beſt pleaſe his Majeſty, ſent to know, whether his going or ſtay would be moſt agreeable to his Majeſty? Who was pleaſed to anſwer, by a letter from my lord duke of Buckingham, That he took in very good part the ſaid earl's reſpect to him; but wiſhed him to make ſome excuſe for the preſent: the which accordingly he did, and moved, That he might have a letter, under the King's hand, to warrant his abſenſe; but under color of this letter of leave, upon the earl of Briſtol's own motion and deſire, lord Conway ſent a letter from his Majeſty, abſolutely forbiding his coming to parliament, and therein likewiſe was inſerted a clauſe "That the "earl ſhould remain reſtrained as he was in the "time of his late Majeſty"; and ſo thereby a color of reſtraint under his Majeſty's hand was got, which could never be procured in his late Majeſty's time; whereby the earl of Briſtol hath been unduly reſtrained ever ſince, without being able to procure any redreſs, or to make lord Conway willing to underſtand his caſe, altho' he ſent him all the papers, whereby he might clearly ſee that the earl was not under reſtraint in his late Majeſty's time; but never other anſwer could be procured from him, but that he judged the ſaid earl to be under reſtraint, and that his liberty was expired by the late King's death, as is aforeſaid.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

X. That lord Conway, knowing the match for marrying the King of Bohemia's eldeſt ſon with the Emperor's daughter, and his being bred in the Emperor's court, was allowed and propounded by his late Majeſty: and that his Majeſty, by his letters to his ſon-in-law, declareth, That he thinketh it the faireſt and cleareſt way for the accommodation of his affairs, and that he will take ſufficient care for his breeding in true religion: and notwithſtanding that the ſaid earl received a copy of the ſaid letter by the ſaid late King's order, with other papers, ſeting down all had been done in the ſaid buſineſs, and his Majeſty's aſſent thereunto from lord Conway himſelf; yet hath he ſuffered all to be charged, as a crime, againſt the earl of Briſtol, both in the twentieth interrogatory, and in his Majeſty's laſt letter, that he ſhould conſent to breeding the young Prince in the Emperor's court. And farther, in the interrogatory he allegeth, it is an agravation againſt the ſaid earl, That breeding the ſaid Prince in the Emperor's court infered to the perverſion of his religion, when he knew that the ſaid breeding was never thought nor ſpoken of by the King, nor any other, but with that expreſs clauſe and condition, That he ſhould be bred in his own religion, and have ſuch tutors and ſervants as his father ſhould appoint.

XI. That lord Conway had been the cauſe of all the earl of Briſtol's troubles, by his dubious and intraping diſpatches, and infering, that the ſaid earl hath failed in his directions, when it ſhall be made appear, that his diſpatches contained no ſuch directions as he hath alleged were given.

The houſe, not being diſpoſed to commit the earl to the Tower, let him remain where he was before, with the gentleman-uſher; and farther ordered, That the King's charge againſt the earl of Briſtol be firſt heard, and then the charge of the ſaid earl againſt the duke; yet ſo, that the earl's teſtimony againſt the duke be not prevented, prejudiced, or impeached.

Next day, the lord-keeper delivered a meſſage from his Majeſty to the houſe of peers: viz.

Meſſage from the King to the houſe of lords.

"THAT his Majeſty taketh notice of the "articles exhibited againſt the duke of Buck-"ingham by the earl of Briſtol; and he ob-"ſerveth, that many of them are ſuch as him-"ſelf is able to ſay more, of his own know-"ledge, than any man, for the duke's ſincere "carriage in them: that one of them, touching "the narrative made in parliament in the "twenty-firſt of King James, trencheth as far "upon himſelf as the duke; for that his Ma-"jeſty went as far as the duke in that declara-"ration; and that all of them have been cloſed "in the earl's own breaſt now for theſe two years, "contrary to his duty, if he had known any crime "of that nature by the duke; and now he vents "it by way of recrimination againſt the duke, whom

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

" whom he knows to be a principal witneſs to " prove his Majeſty's charge.

" And therefore, that his Majeſty gave them " thanks, that they gave no way to the earl of " Briſtol's unreaſonable motion, of puting the " duke under the ſame reſtraint they had put the " earl, thereby ecſhewing what the earl aimeth at, " to alter their dutiful proceeding towards his Ma- " jeſty: that thereby they had made his Majeſty " confident that, as they have, ſo they will put " a difference between his Majeſty's charge againſt " one who appeareth as a delinquent, and the recri- " mination of the earl of Briſtol againſt his Ma- " jeſty's witneſs; and they will not equal them by " a proceeding pari paſſu."

Mean time, King Charles, not being very ſure of the lords, indeavored to take the earl's cauſe out of the upper-houſe, and to proceed by way of indictment in the King's-Bench; but to this their lordſhips would not conſent, for which they alleged ſeveral reaſons, which were confirmed by the judges, who declared, "That a peer of the realm, " impeached for treaſon, was to be tried in par- " liament."

The upper-houſe being willing to ſecure the earl of Briſtol from being over-powered by the duke of Buckingham's exorbitant authority, aſked the judges opinion upon the two following queſtions:

" 1. Whether the King could be a witneſs in " caſe of treaſon?

" 2. Admiting that he could, yet, whether he " might be ſo in the preſent caſe, i. e. when the " King is the informer?

Before the judges brought in their anſwer, this meſſage and command came from the King to them, that in this general queſtion they ſhould not deliver any opinion, but if any particular point occurred, they, upon mature deliberation, might give their advice.

About mid-May, the earl of Briſtol gave in his anſwer to the articles brought againſt him: at delivering which he made this ſpeech.

The earl of Briſtol's ſpeech, by way of introduction, before he gave in his anſwer.

" I AM not inſenſible upon what diſadvantages " I come to trial in this caſe. For, firſt; I " am fallen into his Majeſty's heavy diſpleaſure, and " am to incounter with a potent adverſary, highly " in favor, and am accuſed for treaſon; for which " all counſel and friends abandon me, as a man " infected with the plague: I am become bound " and under reſtraint; whereas a man who is to " incounter for his life and honor, and with a " ſtrong adverſary, had need to come upon equal " terms.

" But as to the matter, I find myſelf charged with " diverſe articles of high-treaſon; but looking into " them with the eyes of my beſt underſtanding, " with the opinion alſo of my counſel lately aſ- " ſigned me, and taking them apart one article " from another, I find not any thing in them " like treaſon, or which hath ſo much as the ſhew " or countenance of a fault, either in act or words; " only by laying all things together, and by wreſt- " ing the wreſts with a ſtrained conſtruction, di- " rectly contrary to the true ſenſe and meaning of " them, and the occaſion whereupon they were " ſpoken, it is informed, and that by way of in- " ference only, that the intent was evil, and the " matter to prove the intent to be evil depends " upon two props, viz. ill-affection to religion, " and too much affection to Spain; which if I " ſhall clear, the inference grounded upon theſe " props, will fall of itſelf.

" Therefore I crave leave of your lordſhips, before " I give my anſwer to the charge, that I may give " you an account of theſe two particulars; and " I humbly beſeech you that what I ſhall ſpeak " in my juſt defenſe may not be conceived to " proceed of vain oſtentation. Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

" And firſt for religion: I was in my childhood " bred in the Proteſtant religion, and rather after " the ſtricter manner than otherwiſe. When I " grew in years fit, I traveled into France, Italy, " and Rome itſelf: in all which travels, I can " produce ſome whom I conforted withal, who " will witneſs with me, that I ever conſtantly uſed " the religion I profeſſed, without the leaſt preva- " rication, no man being able to charge me that ſo " much as out of curioſity I ever was preſent at " any of the exerciſes belonging to the Roman " religion, or did the leaſt act of conformity to " any of their rites or ceremonies.

" Secondly, after my return home, I was received " into the ſervice of his late Majeſty, of bleſſed " memory, whom I ſerved ſome years as a gentle- " man of his privy-chamber, and carver, in which " time none of his Majeſty's ſervants received the " holy ſacrament, frequented ſermons, and other " exerciſes of our religion, more than I.

" Thirdly, in that time of my youth, not to " avoid idleneſs, but out of affection to religion, " I tranſlated that excellent book of our faith, and " great points of our religion, written by Monſieur " Moulins; which his late Majeſty, having ſome- " times after ſeen, approved ſo well, that he would " needs have it printed; which accordingly was " printed in the name of Mr. Sampford, my " chaplain, to whom I gave the honor: but it " was my own act, as Mr. Sampford will not " deny, tho' to this hour I never had before " ſpoken it.

" Fourthly, about ſeven or eight and twenty " years of my age, I was imployed embaſſador " into Spain, in that great buſineſs of the treaty " of the marriage; and whereas others before me " carried with them but one chaplain, I had two, " viz. Mr. Sampford and Mr. Boſwel; and at " my arrival at the court of Spain, I cauſed it to " be publiſhed, that ſuch a day (God willing) I " propoſed to have a communion, to the end " that ſuch Engliſh as were in the town might " reſort thither: whereat the duke de Lerma, and " other the great miniſters of Spain, took offenſe, " and told me, they might well perceive I brought " no good affection to the buſineſs I came about, " who would ſo publicly and avowedly in that " court, where never the like was done, proclaim " there a communion; and with high expreſſions " perſuaded me to decline it. Whereunto I an- " ſwered, I came to do my maſter's ſervice, which " I would heartily and effectually indeavor, but " would not omit my ſervice to God, no tho' by " my maſter commanded. At the communion " were preſent one hundred perſons, ſome of them " brothers, kinſmen, and near dependants upon " ſome of their lordſhips, whom I ſee there in my " eye. This I did in Spain; the like I did in " Germany, in the Emperor's court, in my em- " baſſage thither.

" Fifthly, I had in my ſeveral imployments, into " Spain and Germany, above five hundred perſons " of all qualities attending upon me, and never " one perverted in religion; my children carefully " inſtructed and bred in the ſame religion. I had " conſtantly every Sabbath a ſermon in my houſe, " ſacrament and other exerciſes of our religion fre- " quented.

" Sixthly, a foul-mouthed Shimei railed againſt " our late King and religion in Spain. How I " cauſed that to be revenged by a near kinſman " of my own, is well known.

" Seventhly

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

" Seventhly, one of the Engliſh dying in the " town of Madrid, of whoſe religion there was " ſome queſtion made; and the King's chaplains " telling me, that they at the day of his death " had been with him, and taken account of his " faith, and that he died a Proteſtant: I cauſed " him to be brought home to my houſe, and " there buried according to our rites; whereat " much ado was made, and it was threatened, " that the inquiſitors and other officers would " come and fetch him out, and bury him after " their manner: I ſtood upon it, and that it " was the King of England's houſe, and openly " proteſted, that whoſoever ſhould come thither " with ſuch intent, I would ſhoot at him with a " piece; and exhorted all my people, that if ſuch " attempts ſhould be, they ſhould rather, than " ſuffer ſuch a diſhonor to our religion, die with " me in that quarrel, and hoped ſuch Engliſh as " were in the town would do the like.

" Eighthly, there having been a monaſtery for " Engliſh Jeſuits founded and ſettled at Madrid, " before my coming thither, and the Engliſh arms " ſet up, I labored to ſuppreſs it, and having " written thereof to the late King, his Majeſty " adviſed me not to run my head againſt the rock, " for it was an impoſſible thing for me to do. " Yet I undertook it, and it pleaſed God ſo to " bleſs my indeavors, that I abſolutely diſſolved " and overthrew it. For which the biſhop of " Wincheſter, Montague (now with God) wrote " to me, by his Majeſty's direction, a letter of " his Majeſty's gracious acceptance of ſo great a " ſervice; telling me, beſide the ſervice I had " done to the church and commonwealth, it ſhould " remain a trophy of honor to me and my poſterity " for ever: and the King himſelf, with his own " hand, wrote to me, begining his letter, 'Good-" fortune Digby; your good luck in our ſervice " well deſerves that ſtile.'

" Ninthly, in all negociations in Spain, in point " of religion, I ever ſtraitened my inſtructions.

" Tenthly, the match with Spain was not moved " by me; I ever adviſed a Proteſtant match, and " ſhewed many reaſons, both of conſcience and " ſtate; but if with a Catholic, then rather with " Spain than France, ſo as good conditions might " be made for religion, as appears by a letter I " wrote, and delivered to the Prince, at his firſt " going upon the imployment; for which I had " like then to have been ruined for being a Puritan, " as I am now for being a Papiſt, and all by one " and the ſame hand.

" Eleventhly, and I appeal to the teſtimony of " Dr. Maſon and Dr. Wren, the King's chaplains " with me in Spain; and to Mr. Sampford, " Mr. Boſwel, and Mr. Frewin my own chaplains " there: and that ſuch Papiſts as have been my " ancient acquaintance and friends, being men of " worth, well known to many of their lordſhips, " may be examined upon oath, whether I have not " in all places, as well in Spain as in England, and " at all times upon fit occaſions, avowed myſelf " a Proteſtant, without the leaſt prevarication? " Or whether I did ever any the leaſt act which " was not ſuitable to the ſame profeſſion? And " that Mr. Frewin and Mr. Wake, my own chap-" lains, may give their teſtimonies, whether in the " time of ſeveral dangerous ſickneſſes, which I " had of late years fallen into, I have not in the " time of ſuch my ſickneſſes (when no man can be " ſuppoſed to diſſemble with the world, being ready " to leave it) made before them a confeſſion of my " faith, and made my peace with God, reſolving " to die as befited a Proteſtant, and good Chriſtian. " This I tell your lordſhips, was my religion I was " bred in, have ever profeſſed and lived in, and " was reſolved by God's grace to die in; and yet " was ſo unhappy, by reaſon of imployment, to " be diſtaſteful to many good men, that I have " been ſuſpected even by them, not well knowing " me: and this hath been the riſe the duke hath " now taken againſt me. Then for my love to " Spain, I wonder from whence that opinion ſhould " grow, ſince I was there hated and ſhamed, as " the man whom, of all others, they deſired to " have the leaſt to do withal, having ſtood ever " ſtricter in point of religion than, by my in-" ſtructions, I might have done; as after the ca-" pitulation concluded on, they underſtood by ſome " intelligence, which cauſed their hatred towards " me.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

" Sure I am, I ſhewed it not by the ſervice I did " them; for diverſe years together there was not " a letter ſent by that King to any other ſtate " whereof the King my maſter had not a copy " before, or by that time it came to the place " whither it was directed. There was not any " great action on foot, whereof I had not the " private inſtructions, and ſent them hither; nor " any expedition by ſea or land, wherein I had " not ſome miniſters, or intelligencers, who gave " me, for ſome time, advertiſements of their " actions, and moſt private intentions, whereof I " advertiſed his Majeſty. I uſed ſuch induſtry, as " to get all the papers of that King's private " cabinet into my hands; took copies and notes of " ſuch of them as I thought uſeful; and upon every " of them ſet my private mark before they were " conveyed back again, to the end, that if I ſhould " have had occaſion to have charged him with any " thing mentioned in the ſame papers, I might " have let him ſee I knew it, by telling him in " what paper it was, and mark'd with ſuch a " mark.

" There was not a port in Spain whoſe depth I " cauſed not to be ſounded, not a fort whereof I " knew not the ſtrength, both for the gariſon, " munition, and other matters of advantage and " diſadvantage; inſomuch as if it ſhould pleaſe " the King to appoint a commitee of the lords to " take account of me, I ſhould, by the ſtores I " gathered there, and brought with me, make it " appear, I was as uſeful a ſervant to his Majeſty " in a war, as in a peace. Whereas, at his Ma-" jeſty's coming out of Spain, the powers of the " deſponſories were to be depoſited in ſome man's " hands: and the duke, upon pretenſe of doing " me honor, but intending to break my neck by " it, moved they might be left with me, and the " King of Spain was contented; and ſo they were " put into my hands; not as an attorney only for " the Prince, but the King of Spain having taken " the ſubſtitution of them by his ſecretary of ſtate, " entered in legal form; whereby that King was " then become intereſted in them by their occupa-" tion, as well as the Prince by granting them; " and becoming the Inſtrumentum ſtipulatum, " wherein they were both intereſted, they were " depoſited in my hands, as an indifferent perſon, " truſted between the King of Spain and the Prince, " with a declaration of the truſt. And now the " duke was returned out of Spain, he ploted my " ruin, and put it in execution in this manner. " He concealed that the powers were to expire at " Chriſtmaſs, and procured his Majeſty to write a " letter (not a direct command) but expreſſing a " deſire, that the deſponſories ſhould not be 'till " one of the days in Chriſtmaſs, intending thereby " to draw me into a dilemma, that if I proceeded " in the match, this letter ſhould, as now it is, " have been inforced againſt me, as a breach of in-" ſtructions: if I had not proceeded, then I had " broken my truſt between the Prince and King of " Spain,

" Spain, overthrown the marriage ſo long ſought " and labored, it being the main ſcope of my em- " baſſage, contrary to expreſs warrant, and that " upon a letter I muſt needs know to be a miſtake. " And when I had written into England, to have " a direct warrant in the point, the duke then ſee- " ing that plot would not take, he dealed with di- " verſe great lords, as was well known to ſome of " their lordſhips, there preſent, to have me, on " my arrival in England, commited to the Tower, " before I ſhould ever come to ſpeak with the " King; which the Spaniſh embaſſador, here in " England, having got private notice of, gave ad- " vertiſement thereof to that King; who thereupon " foreſeeing my danger, and conſulting with his " council and divines, what was fit for him in ho- " nor and conſcience to do in that caſe, they re- " ſolved, that, ſeeing my ſufferings grew by being " an honeſt man, and indeavoring to perform the " truſt repoſed in me by that King as well as the " Prince; that King was bound, both in honor " and conſcience, not only to preſerve me from " ruin, but to make me a reparation for any loſs " I ſhould ſuſtain by occaſion of the truſt. Where- " upon, at his departure going to court to take his " leave, Conde Olivares told me what was ploted " againſt me in England; and in reſpect of the " danger, by reaſon of the greatneſs of my adver- " ſary, perſuaded me to ſtay there, and in his ma- " ſter's name made an offer, not in ſecret, but in " preſenſe of ſir Walter Aſton."

Ruſhworth, Vol. I. p. 113.

Here the earl of Briſtol explained wherein thoſe offers conſiſted; viz. in a blank ſigned by his Catholic Majeſty, wherein the earl might ſet down his own conditions, both in point of title and fortune. But all this he refuſed, as well as a large ſum of money offered by the ſaid King Philip. Briſtol concluded thus.

" Upon what grounds and hope came I to in- " counter with thoſe dangers? Not upon hope of " my greatneſs in court, and ſtrength of friends " there to bolſter out a bad cauſe; no ſure, my " ſtrength was too weak, and my adverſaries too " powerful. But I knew my conſcience was clear, " and my cauſe good, and truſt in God Almighty. " And to him now, and to their lordſhips judg- " ments, recommend myſelf and my cauſe."

Anſwer of the earl of Briſtol, to the articles of accuſation brought againſt him by his Majeſty's attorney-general.

I. THE firſt article he denieth; and becauſe the matters contained in the ſaid article conſiſt of ſeveral parts; viz. the loſs of the ſaid Palatinate, and the match with the lady of Spain, and of the ſeveral imployments, as of one extraordinary embaſſage to the Emperor, and another to the King of Spain, in the years 1621, 22, and 23; he humbly craveth leave of this moſt honorable court to ſeparate the buſineſſes, and diſtinguiſh the times.

And begining with the Palatinate firſt, to give account of his embaſſage to the Emperor, and ſo to make as brief a deduction as he could of the whole carriage in that buſineſs, from the begining of his imployment, to the time he left it. In his embaſſage to the Emperor, he propounded all things faithfully according to his inſtructions, and the anſwers which he returned to his late Majeſty, of bleſſed memory, were the very ſame, and no other, than ſuch as were given by the Emperor under his hand and imperial ſeal; the which, according to his duty, he faithfully ſent to his ſaid Majeſty, and withal did honeſtly and truly advertiſe his ſaid Majeſty, what he underſtood and thought then upon the place; but was ſo far from giving to his Majeſty any ill-grounded hopes in that behalf, that he wrote to the lords of the council here in England, from Vienna, 26 July 1624, in ſuch ſort as followeth.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

" I Am farther to move your lordſhips, that there " may be a diſpatch made preſently into Spain, " to his Majeſty's embaſſador, Mr. Cottington, " that they deal effectually for the repairing and " ripening of the buſineſs againſt my coming; that " they uſe ſome plain and direct language, leting " the miniſters there know, that the late letter ſent " by the King of Spain to the Emperor, was colder " and more reſerved than his maſter had reaſon to " expect. I ſhall conclude with telling your lord- " ſhips, that altho' I deſpair not of good ſucceſs in " that knotty buſineſs, yet I hope his Majeſty and " your lordſhips lay not aſide the care of all fiting " preparations for a war, in caſe a peace cannot be " honorably had. And, among other things, I " moſt earneſtly commend to your lordſhips, by " your lordſhips to his Majeſty, the continuing yet " abroad, for ſome ſmall time, of ſir Robert Man- " ſel's fleet upon the coaſts of Spain; which, in " caſe his Majeſty ſhould be ill uſed, will prove " the beſt argument we can uſe for reſtitution of the " Palatinate."

And this his advice, he ſaith, was wholly intended by his actions, by being the cauſe, as he returned homeward out of Germany, to bring down count Mansfield, whereby the town of Frankendale was relieved, by ſupplying his Majeſty's army, when in great diſtreſs, with monies and plate, to the value of ten thouſand pounds, merely out of his zeal and affection to the good of the King and his children, having no warrant or order, but that his heart was ever really bent in effects more than in ſhews, to ſerve the King's ſon-in-law and his cauſe, as by the diſcourſe of this buſineſs will appear. And how acceptable theſe ſervices were, will more appear, by the letters of the Queen of Bohemia, in theſe words following:

My lord,

" HAving underſtood from Heidelburgh, how " you have ſhewed your affection to the King " and me in all things, and in the help of money " you have lent our ſoldiers; I cannot let ſo great " obligations paſs, without giving many thanks " for it by theſe lines, ſince I have no other means " to ſhew my gratefulneſs unto you. Howſoever, " aſſure your ſelf, that I will never be forgetful of " the teſtimonies you give me of your love, which " I intreat you to continue, in doing the King and " me all good offices you can to his Majeſty. You " have been an eye-witneſs of the miſerable eſtate " our countries are in; I intreat you therefore to " ſollicit his Majeſty for our help. You having " given me an aſſurance of your affection: I in- " treat you now to ſhew it, in helping of us by " your good indeavors to his Majeſty, and you " ſhall ever bind me to continue, as I am al- " ready,

Your very affectionate friend,

ELIZABETH.

Which letters were ſeconded with others about the ſame time, both from the King of Bohemia and council of Heidelburgh, to the ſame effect, and how much ſatisfaction his late Majeſty received in that behalf, and touching that buſineſs, will plainly appear ſeveral ways, and particularly by his ſpeech in parliament. And the ſaid earl likewiſe appealeth to both houſes of parliament, to whom, by his late Majeſty's order, he gave a juſt and true account of that imployment, with what true zeal he proceeded; and how he preſſed that ſingle treaty, and promiſes no longer to be relied on, but that a fiting preparation for war might go along hand in hand with any treaty of accommodation. And, for a concluſion, among many of his late Majeſty's approbations of his carriage in this imployment, he humbly deſired that a letter of the duke of Buckingham's, under his own hand, bearing date the eleventh of October 1621, may be produced, being as followeth:

My lord,

" I Am exceeding glad that your lordſhip hath " carried yourſelf ſo well in this imployment, " that his Majeſty is infinitely pleaſed with your " ſervice you have done, for which he command- " ed me to give your lordſhip thanks in his name, " until he ſee you himſelf. You, of all men, have " cauſe to commend his Majeſty's choice of ſuch a " man, that unleſs your heart had gone with the " buſineſs, you could never have brought it to ſo " good a paſs. Among other things, his Majeſty " liketh very well the care of clearing his honor, " whereof he will adviſe farther with your lord- " ſhip, at your next coming over. I hope you " will not find your negociation with the Infanta " of ſuch difficulty as you ſeem to fear in your " letter, ſeeing my brother Edward hath brought " with him a letter from his Majeſty's ſon-in-law, " whereby he puteth himſelf ſolely to his Majeſty's " advice and pleaſure for his ſubmiſſion, as you " will perceive by the copy of the letter itſelf, " which I here ſend your lordſhip; wherein, tho' " there be many things impertinent, yet of that " point you may make good uſe for the accom- " pliſhment of the buſineſs, wherein I have writ- " ten to the Spaniſh embaſſador to uſe his means " and credit likewiſe; which I aſſure myſelf he " will effectually do, eſpecially ſeeing the impedi- " ments are taken away by count Mansfield's com- " poſition, and the conformity of his Majeſty's " ſon-in-law to this ſubmiſſion. For the money " your lordſhip hath ſo ſeaſonably laid forth, his " Majeſty will ſee you ſhall ſuſtain no loſs, hold- " ing it very unconſcionable you ſhould ſuffer by " the care of his ſervice; which you have ſhewed " ſo much to his contentment, to the great joy of " your lordſhip's faithful ſervant,

Geo. Buckingham.

Having given this account of his imployment with the Emperor, he humbly craveth leave to make known in what ſort, before this his imployment, he indeavored to ſerve the Prince Palatine, and his cauſe, which will beſt appear by his Majeſty's own teſtimony, upon ſir Francis Netherſole's going to the Prince Palatine; at which time his Majeſty being, out of his royal and juſt heart, deſirous to do a faithful ſervant right, commanded ſir Francis Netherſole to let the Prince Palatine underſtand, how good a ſervant the ſaid earl had been to him, and how active in his affairs, as will beſt appear by a diſpatch of ſir Francis Netherſole written all with his own hand to ſir George Calvert, dated in Prague, Aug. 11. 1620, and ſent by his late Majeſty to the ſaid earl for his comfort, being as followeth:

Right honorable,

" THAT you may be the better aſſured I " have neither forgot nor neglected the com- " mandment received from his Majeſty by your " honor; you will be pleaſed to have the patience " to hear me report what I ſaid to this King upon " the delivery of my lord deputy's letters to his " Majeſty; which was, that the King my maſter, " whoſe juſtice is ſo renowned over the world, did " uſe to ſhew it in nothing more, than in vindi- " cating his ſervants from wrongful opinions where- " of he knew noble hearts more ſenſible, than of " injuries done to their perſons or fortunes: that, " out of his royal diſpoſition, his Majeſty having " found my lord Digby miſtaken by ſome of his " own people at home, by occaſion of his being " by him imployed in the affairs with Spain, hav- " ing thereupon received a jealouſy, that the ſame " noble lord might be alſo miſ-reported; hitherto " his Majeſty's hands in that reſpect gave me a " particular commandment, to aſſure his Majeſty, " he had not a more truly affectionate ſervant in " England: and for proof thereof, to let his Ma- " jeſty underſtand, that whereas the baron of Don- " caſter, now his Majeſty's embaſſador for Eng- " land, had, ſince his coming hither, obtained but " three great boons for his Majeſty's ſervice; viz. " the loan of money from the King of Denmark, " the contribution in England of the city and coun- " tries, and the ſending embaſſadors to the con- " trary parties; that my lord Digby had been the " firſt propounder of all thoſe to the King my " maſter, before his Majeſty's embaſſador, or any " other of his Majeſty's ſervants in England; altho' " his lordſhip was contented, that others who " were but ſet on, ſhould carry away the thanks " and prayers, becauſe his lordſhip, being known " to be the firſt mover therein, might poſſibly " weaken the credit he hath in Spain, and to ren- " der himſelf the more valuable to ſerve both " his own maſter and his Majeſty; in which reſpect " I humbly prayed his late Majeſty to keep this " to himſelf."

By which teſtimony it may appear, as the ſaid earl conceiveth, how he the ſaid earl beſtowed himſelf before his embaſſage, and in his ſaid embaſſage with his ſaid late Majeſty's approbation thereof. Now he humbly craveth leave to give your lordſhips account how he proceeded after his return from the Emperor's court.

As ſoon as he came into England, he diſcovered to his Majeſty, and the lords of the council, in what great want he had left the forces in the Palatinate, and ſollicited the preſent ſending away of money; thereupon thirty thouſand pounds was borrowed of ſir Peter Vanlore, ſir Baptiſt Hicks, and ſir William Cortine, and preſently ſent to the Palatinate, beſide the ten thouſand pounds which he lent, for which he paid the intereſt out of his purſe for ſix months, having alſo given, not long before, five hundred pounds, by way of benevolence, to the ſervice of the ſaid Palatinate.

Now in the interim between his return from the Engliſh coaſts, which was in November 1621, and his going into Spain in May 1622, he firſt gave his account as aforeſaid of his embaſſage to both houſes of parliament, and moved them effectually, as was poſſible, for the ſupplying his Majeſty, and that the money might wholly be imployed for the ſuccor of the Palatinate.

The parliament being diſſolved, he ſollicited with great care and induſtry the ſetling ſome courſe for ſupplying the Palatinate, and his Majeſty was perſuaded to maintain eight thouſand foot, and ſixteen hundred horſe, under his own ſtandard, and at his own purſe, in the Palatinate, to eſtabliſh a certain courſe for due payment of the ſaid army: lord Chicheſter was, upon the ſaid earl's motion, ſent for out of Ireland, and the ſaid earl, by his Majeſty's command, took order for his diſpatch. In this eſtate the ſaid earl left his affairs at his departure towards Spain, in May 1622, nothing doubting but that all things would have effectually and conſtantly been purſued, according to the order which was ſettled and reſolved on at his departure.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

On his arrival at the court of Spain, he inſtantly proceeded according to his inſtructions, preſſing the buſineſs of the Palatinate as effectually as he could, and faithfully labored and effected, from time to time (as far as to the point of negociation) all particulars which were given him in charge, as it will appear by his late Majeſty's letter upon every particular occaſion; and if, by the accidents of war for that ſummer, the marquis of Baden, count Mansfield and the duke of Brunſwic, received each of them an overthrow (the ordering of whoſe affairs his Majeſty ſo far complained of to his ſon-in-law, as to give order for the withdrawing of his forces, as will appear by his Majeſty's letters, on the third of June 1622, and alſo by his letters to ſir Horace Vere, and lord Chicheſter, of the ſame date, if there was not a ſpeedy redreſs) if by any of thoſe accidents thoſe buſineſſes have miſcarried, the ſaid earl hopes he ſhall not be liable to the blame, it having no relation to him, or to his imployment, having ſo far and ſo honeſtly, with his beſt affections, imployed his care and utmoſt ſervices in the buſineſſes, as his Majeſty was pleaſed, by many ſeveral letters upon ſundry occaſions, to ſignify his gracious receptance of his ſervice, as in his letters of November 24, 1622, written as followeth, viz.

" Your diſpatches are in all points ſo full, and " and in them we receive ſo good ſatisfaction, as " in this we ſhall not need to inlarge any farther, " but only to tell you, we are well pleaſed with " this diligent and diſcreet imployment of your " indeavors, and all that concerneth our ſervice; " ſo we are likewiſe with the whole proceedings of " our embaſſador, ſir Walter Aſton.

New-Market, Nov. 24, 1622. Thus we bid you heartily farewel.

And afterwards his Majeſty was likewiſe pleaſed, in his letters of January 8, 1622, a little before our gracious Sovereign Lord the King's (then Prince) coming into Spain, viz.

" Concerning that knotty and unfortunate affair " of the Palatinate, to ſay the truth, as things " ſtand, I know not what you could have done " more than you have done already."

And whereas it is objected, the Palatinate ſhould be loſt by the hopes he the ſaid earl gave, by his letters out of Spain, it is an objection of impoſſibility: there was nothing left but Manheim and Frankendale, when his firſt letters out of Spain could poſſibly come to his late Majeſty's hands; for he did not begin to negociate that buſineſs until Auguſt 1622, and about that time Heidelburgh, and all but Manheim and Frankendale, was loſt; and Manheim he had ſaved by his induſtry, had it not been ſo ſuddenly delivered, as is by his Majeſty acknowledged by a letter of November 24, 1622, written thus, viz.

" And howſoever the order, given to the Infanta, " for the relief of Manheim, arrived too late, and " after the town was yielded to Tilly; yet muſt we " acknowledge it to be a good effect of your nego- " ciation, and an argument of that King's ſincere " and ſound intention."

And Frankendale being, by the ſaid earl's means, once ſaved, was again the ſecond time ſaved merely by the ſaid earl's induſtry; and procuring a letter from the King of Spain, dated the ſecond of February 1623. Whereupon followed the treaty of ſequeſtration, which hath ſince continued. And he the ſaid earl was ſo far from hindering ſuccors by any letter or counſel of his, that he was the ſollicitor, and in great part the procurer of moſt of the ſuccors which had been ſent thither, as is formerly ſet down. And when his royal Majeſty who now is, and the duke of Buckingham, arrived at the court of Spain, they found the buſineſs of the Palatinate in ſo fair a way, that the Spaniſh miniſters told them, the King ſhould give his late Majeſty a blank, in which we might frame our own conditions; and the ſame he confirmeth unto us now; and the like touching this blank was likewiſe acknowledged by the duke of Buckingham, in his ſpeech in parliament, after the return of his Majeſty out of Spain. And it will appear, by the teſtimony of ſir Walter Aſton, and by his and the ſaid earl's diſpatches, that the ſaid earl wanted not induſtry and zeal in the buſineſs: inſomuch as the laſt anſwer the ſaid earl procured herein, from the King of Spain, was fuller than he the ſaid earl was ordered by his late Majeſty's lateſt letters to inſiſt upon. So, as by that which hath been alleged, the ſaid earl hopeth your lordſhips will be ſatisfied, not only that he wanted neither will nor induſtry, but that he hath, with all true zeal and affection, and with his own means, faithfully ſerved their Majeſties, and the Prince Palatine in this cauſe: and, for aſſurance in that affair, he had all that could be between Chriſtian Princes; and if in the ſaid aſſurances there hath been any deceit, as by the ſaid articles is intimated, which he never knew nor believed, he refered it to God to puniſh their wickedneſs; for between Princes there can be no greater tie than their words, their hands and ſeals, all which he procured in that behalf; and both the ſaid earl, and ſir Walter Aſton were ſo confident that the buſineſs would be ended to his late Majeſty's ſatisfaction, that, in a joint diſpatch to his late Majeſty of 24 November 1623, after his now Majeſty's return into England, they wrote as followeth, viz.

" We hope that your Majeſty may, according " to your deſire ſignified to me the earl of Briſtol, " by leters of October 8, give to your Majeſty's " royal daughter, this Chriſtmaſs, the comfortable " news of the near expiring of her great troubles " and ſufferings, as unto the Prince your ſon, in " the congratulation of being arrived to a moſt ex- " cellent Princeſs."

And having thus given your lordſhips an account of his proceedings touching the Palatinate, he will, by your lordſhips good favors, proceed to the other part of that charge concerning the marriage.

And firſt, touching the hopes and aſſurances, which he is charged to have given to his late Majeſty, and his miniſters of ſtate here in England, of the Spaniards real proceedings in the ſaid match, when he ſaid, he knew he never intended it: he ſaith, he never gave any hopes of their real proceedings, but ſuch, and the very ſame which were firſt given to him, without adding or diminiſhing; neither could he have done otherwiſe, either with honeſty or ſafety. And he farther ſaith, that the hopes he gave were not upon any intelligence; but, as well in that of the match, as the other of the Palatinate, his advertiſements were grounded upon all the aſſurances both of word and writing, could poſſibly paſs between Chriſtians, as will be made evidently appear by his diſpatch of September 9, 1623, which he humbly deſireth may be read, if the length of it may not diſpleaſe: the ſubſtance being to ſhew, by all the ingagements and promiſes of the King of Spain, that he really intended the match. And the cauſes why Conde Olivares pretended to the duke of Buckingham, that the match was not formerly deſigned, was only thereby to free himſelf from treating any longer with the ſaid earl, to the end that he might treat for larger conditions, in point of religion, with the ſaid duke: the ſaid Conde Olivares taking advantage of having the perſon of his Majeſty, then Prince, in his hands: and with this diſpatch the ſaid earl acquainted his Majeſty, who now is, in Spain, before he ſent it.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

And

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

And by this diſpatch the earl doubted not, but that it will appear to this honorable court, that while the treating of this buſineſs was in hand, he proceded in that, not only with care and induſtry, but with ſome meaſure of vigilancy. And for clearing an objection which hath been alleged, that the match was never intended before the duke's coming into Spain, nor after; the earl craveth leave to ſet down ſome few reaſons, of many, which cauſed him to believe that the ſaid match was, and hath been really deſigned, and that it was ſo conceived by both their Majeſties, and the King of Spain, and their miniſters on both ſides.

For, firſt, the duke of Buckingham certified his late Majeſty, that the buſineſs of the marriage was brought to a happy concluſion; whereupon his late Majeſty was pleaſed to give the duke and earl orders to proceed in the buſineſs; which his ſaid Majeſty would not have treated 'till the ſaid marriage was concluded, as will appear by a letter of his ſaid late Majeſty, jointly to the duke of Buckingham and the ſaid earl, of the twenty third July 1623.

Secondly, it will appear, by letters of the ſaid lord Conway to the duke of Buckingham, bearing date September the fourth, 1623, that the ſaid duke had good aſſurance of the concluſion of the ſaid match; and upon this confidence were all things put in due execution in England, as had been capitulated; and lord Conway with others faithfully agreed and ſettled all the points of immunity and liberty for the Roman Catholics, and for the uſe of their religion, as was ſet down in their declaration, Auguſt the ninth, 1623, hereafter mentioned in the anſwer to the fifth article of this charge.

Thirdly, the very day his now Majeſty and the duke of Buckingham departed from the Eſcurial, in Spain, towards England, the ſaid duke ſolemnly ſwore to the treaty of the ſaid marriage, and the fartherance of it to the utmoſt of his power, upon the holy evangeliſts, in preſenſe of the ſaid earl and ſir Walter Aſton.

Fourthly, the treaty of the ſaid marriage had been formerly ſigned, ſealed and ſolemnly ſworn by the King of Spain: and when his Majeſty and that King took their leaves, he did ſolemnly, in the words of a King, faithfully and punctually proteſt to perform whatſoever had been capitulated in the treaty of marriage; and thereupon imbraced his Majeſty at his departure, and ſent the very next day a letter, written all with his own hand, to his Majeſty, vowing and proteſting to make good all he had capitulated or promiſed unto his Majeſty at his departure the day before. So that if there were no true meaning on the part of Spain to make the marriage, as by mr. attorney is pretended, yet certainly the earl hath not been ſlightly deceived; neither can it be, as he conceiveth, any fault in him, ſince not only his late Majeſty, but alſo his Majeſty who now is, and the duke of Buckingham, being then both upon the place, did confidently believe, and that upon other grounds than miſ-informations, ſuggeſtions and perſuaſions of the ſaid earl, that the marriage was really intended: and to that effect, both his late Majeſty of bleſſed memory, and his moſt excellent Majeſty who now is, after his return into England, wrote unto him the ſaid earl ſeveral letters, aſſuring him, that their intents and pleaſures were to have the ſaid match proceeded in, and thereupon the proxies of his Majeſty, then Prince, were again inrolled and ſent to the ſaid earl. So that the earl having ſo many and ſo great cauſes to be aſſured that the match was really intended on both ſides, he conceiveth it will be hard for mr. attorney to make good that part of his charge, wherein he affirmeth, that the earl ſhould know the contrary, or the aſſurance to be upon falſe grounds, as in the ſaid article is alleged.

II. To the ſecond article, he directly denieth all the ſuppoſed offenſes wherewith he ſtandeth charged by the ſaid article. And for a clear declaration and manifeſtation of the truth and manner of his proceedings, he ſaith, Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

Firſt, as to continuing the treaties upon generalities, that the temporal articles were by agreements on both ſides not to be treated or ſettled until ſuch time as the articles of religion were fully agreed on; for that it was held moſt proper and honorable for both ſides, firſt, to ſee if the difficulty of religion might be removed, before they paſſed to any farther ingagements. And the ſaid articles of religion, by reaſon of the Pope's new demands ſent into England by mr. Gage, were not ſigned nor condeſcended to by his late Majeſty, nor his Majeſty who now is, then Prince, 'till January 5, 1612, and were then ſent away poſt from England to the ſaid earl by mr. Simon Digby, who arrived with them at Madrid, in Spain, about the twenty fifth of the ſame month. But the earl's care was ſuch, to have no time laviſhed in ſettling the temporal articles, that before he would condeſcend ſo much as "de bene eſſe" to the articles of religion, that they ſhould be ſent back to Rome, he procured the King of Spain to promiſe that, within the time limited for procuring the deſponſories, which was by March or April following at fartheſt, all temporal articles ſhould be ſettled and agreed, to the end that the Infanta might be delivered at ſpring, as by the King of Spain's anſwer in writing was declared to be the King's intention; and accordingly ſir Walter Aſton and the ſaid earl did not deal in general, but did moſt induſtriouſly labor to ſettle all in particular, viz. That the portion ſhould be two millions, it appearing, that it was ſo agreed by the late King of Spain *; that the dipenſation coming, the deſponſories ſhould be within forty days after; and that Don Duarte of Portugal ſhould be the man who ſhould attend the Infanta in her journey. And all other particulars neceſſary for concluſion of the ſaid treaties, were, by ſir Walter Aſton, the ſaid earl, and the Spaniſh commiſſioners, drawn up into heads, in writing, and after many debates they were conſulted with that King; and the ſecond of March, 1623, ſtilo vet. Conde Gondomar, and the ſecratary Don Andreas de Prada, were appointed to come home to the houſe of the ſaid earl, to ſignify unto ſir Walter Aſton and himſelf, as they did, that the King of Spain had declared his reſolution in all the particulars, and given them order to come to a ſpeedy concluſion with them in all things: and that King's anſwer to that concluſion, the earl ſaw, and read, all written with the King of Spain's own hand.

* Philip III.

On the ſeventh day of the ſaid month of March, 1623, the King's Majeſty, then Prince, and the duke of Buckingham, arrived at Madrid; and the Spaniards took new laws, and the negociation was put into a new form. So that whereas it is objected againſt the earl, that he entertained and continued the treaties ſo long upon generalities, he conceiveth it is not underſtood of the ſpiritual articles; they being ſuch as were ſent from Rome into England, from thence they came to the earl: and for the temporal articles, they were not to be ſettled and treated 'till the articles of religion were concluded. He conceiveth it cannot be alleged, with any color, that his Majeſty was entertained with generalities, ſince when thoſe articles touching religion were brought to the ſaid earl by mr. Simon Digby, being about the twenty fifth of January, there were but ſix weeks until the ſeventh of March following, when his Majeſty, then Prince, arrived at Madrid; and in the interim, all the above-mentioned particulars were ſettled: and the time which hath been expended in this treaty, hath not been thro' his the ſaid earl's default, in continuing upon generalities, without preſſing preſſing to particulars, but hath been cauſed as well by difficulties which the buſineſs brought with it, as alſo with exterior accidents, viz. The wars of Bohemia, the death of two Popes, and the late King of Spain*, without the leaſt fault of the ſaid earl, as is acknowledged by the late King of bleſſed memory, in the ſaid earl's inſtructions, on the fourteenth of March, 1621.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

* Philip III.

Neither could any delay therein be attributed to him the ſaid earl; for he was imployed in thoſe times into Germany and Flanders, and ſir Walter Aſton and ſir Francis Cottington, for the ſpace of three or four years, were reſident in Spain; from whence the hopes they gave were upon all the diſcreet grounds miniſters can expect from a ſtate: but the earl re-aſſumed his buſineſs ſix months before his Majeſty's coming into Spain; and he was ſo deſirous to ſee his Majeſty then Prince, beſtowed, that he preſſed nothing ſo much, both to the King and Prince, as that the Prince might loſe no more time, and rather to break the match with Spain, than ſuffer any farther delays; as will appear by his diſpatches from his firſt arrival at the court of Spain, until the coming of his Majeſty, then Prince. For, in his letters of June 20, 1622, being the firſt he wrote after his firſt audience, he was ſo deſirous that no time might be loſt, that in them he craved leave of his Majeſty that, in caſe he ſhould find any delays in Spain, he might, without expecting any order, take his leave, and come home.

Upon the return of ſir Francis Cottington, in September then following, he wrote both to the King, and his Majeſty, then Prince. To the King, as followeth:

"I ſhall preſume to add to that which mr. Cottington ſhall deliver unto your Majeſty by word of mouth, of the preſent eſtate of the match, what I conceive to be the right way to bring it to a ſpeedy iſſue: that your Majeſty will be pleaſed poſitively to declare, what you will do in point of religion, and that you will appoint me a certain limited time, by which this King ſhould procure the diſpenſation, or conclude the match without it; and in caſe there ſhall be any farther delay therein, that I may then declare your Majeſty to be free, and diſingaged to beſtow the Prince in ſuch ſort as you ſhall judge moſt convenient."

And to the Prince, at the ſame time, he wrote in theſe ſubſequent words, viz.

"That which will be neceſſary for his Majeſty preſently to do, on his Majeſty's part, is to declare himſelf, how far he will be pleaſed to yield in point of religion, as mr. Cottington will approve unto your Highneſs: and that he ſet a prefixed time to break or conclude the match, either with the diſpenſation, or without the ſame; and for the reſt, it may be left to my negociation: but your Highneſs may be pleaſed to haſten his Majeſty's reſolution, with all poſſible ſpeed."

And the ſaid earl ſaith, that having received from his ſaid late Majeſty his reſolution in point of religion, and a limited time according to his deſire, he was ſo preciſe and punctual therein, that altho' the making or breaking of the marriage depended upon it, he would not give one month's reſpite longer time for procuring the diſpenſation, until he had firſt acquainted his late Majeſty therein, and received his directions under his own hand; as will appear by his Majeſty's letters of October 25, 1622, as followeth:

"Right truſty and well-beloved couſin and counſellor, we greet you heartily well. Whereas by your laſt letter, written to our ſecretary, dated September 29, you are deſirous to have our pleaſure ſignified unto you under our own hand; whether we will be content or not to grant a month's time longer, for the coming of the diſpenſation from Rome, than we have already limited unto you, in caſe they ſhall there conclude all things elſe for our contentment, with a reſolution to ſend the Infanta hither next ſpring: we do hereby declare unto you, that in that caſe you ſhall not break with them for a month's longer delay. We alſo wiſh you not to trouble yourſelf with the raſh cenſure of other men, in caſe your buſineſs ſhould not ſucceed; reſting in that full aſſurance of our juſtice and wiſdom, that we will never judge a good and faithful ſervant by the effect of things ſo contingent and variable. And with this aſſurance we bid you heartily farewel."

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

And he farther ſaith, that when he had agreed to the articles of religion, and that a certain time was ſet for the coming of the diſpenſation, and a concluſion of the match, altho' he would bind himſelf to nothing without his Majeſty's approbation, yet for that no time might be loſt, he agreed to the propoſitions, 'de bene eſſe,' ſent by mr. Porter, December the 10th, 1622, to the end the articles might be immediately ſent to Rome, without loſing ſo much time as to hear firſt from England: and humbly moved that, in caſe his Majeſty ſhould like of the ſaid articles, he would ſend his approbation directly to Rome for the gaining of time: which his Majeſty was pleaſed to do: and, at the ſame time, he wrote both to his ſaid late Majeſty, and his now Majeſty, then Prince, as followeth: viz. to his Majeſty.

"This is the true ſtate of the buſineſs as it now ſtandeth. If your Majeſty approve of what is done, I hope it will be a happy and a ſhort concluſion. If your Majeſty think it not fit to allow and condeſcend to the ſaid articles, I have done the uttermoſt of my indeavors, and ſhall humbly perſuade your Majeſty not to loſe a day longer in the treaty; ſo much it importeth your Majeſty and your kingdoms that the Prince were beſtowed."

And to the Prince, in letters of the like date, in this ſort.

"I have preſumed to write to his Majeſty that which I think my duty to ſay to your Highneſs, that in caſe you ſhall not approve of what is now conditionally agreed, you permit not a day more to be loſt in this treaty: for it is of ſo great conſequence that your Highneſs were beſtowed, that it importeth almoſt as much that you were ſpeedily, as fitly matched. But I hope his Majeſty, and your Highneſs, will in ſuch ſort approve of this laſt agreement, as you will ſpeedily bring this long treaty to a happy concluſion. I am out of hope of bringing things to any better terms; therefore I deal clearly with your Highneſs, and do not only moſt humbly perſuade but on my knees beg it of you, that you either reſolve to conclude this match as you may, or ſpeedily to break it, and beſtow yourſelf elſewhere; for no leſs than the happineſs of your kingdom, and the ſecurity of the King your father, and yourſelf, depend upon it.

All which things being conſidered, the earl moſt humbly ſubmiteth himſelf to the judgment of that moſt high and honorable court, whether the delays, which accidents have brought forth in this buſineſs, can be attributed to his fault; ſince on the one ſide it will evidently appear to your lordſhips, that he never moved his Majeſty and the Prince to admit of delays, but rather to think of ſome other courſe; and it will, on the other ſide, appear by all the diſpatches, that he preſſed things with the miniſters of Spain to as ſpeedy a concluſion as the uttermoſt terms of fair negociation and good manners would bear. And whereas it is pretended, that the Spaniards niards ſhould take occaſion, by entertaining the ſaid treaties, to abuſe his ſaid late Majeſty (which he knoweth not) yet, he ſaith, he uſed all the vigilancy and induſtry a careful miniſter could do, and had from the Spaniards all the aſſurances, by oaths, words and writings, which could be expected from Chriſtians: the which, without adding or diminiſhing, he faithfully preſented unto his ſaid late Majeſty; and his ſaid late Majeſty was pleaſed in thoſe times, to conceive upon thoſe aſſurances, that they dealed really with him: and he conceiveth that his Majeſty who now is, then Prince, and the duke of Buckingham, were pleaſed to write as much to the late King's Majeſty, at their firſt coming into Spain, and that all which the earl had written, touching that imployment, was there avowed by Conde Olivares and Conde Gondomar, to the ſaid Prince and duke, on their arrival at Madrid; and he hopeth, that if that diſpatch may be peruſed, it will as well appear and be adjudged, that he ſerved his Majeſty with ſome meaſure of vigilancy, as well as fulneſs of fidelity.

III. To the third article the earl ſaith, that he did not, either by words or by letters to his late Majeſty, or his miniſters, extol or magnify the greatneſs and power of the King of Spain; nor repreſented to his late Majeſty the ſuppoſed danger which might inſue unto him if a war ſhould happen between him and the King of Spain; nor affirmed, nor inſinuated the ſame, as in the ſaid article is mentioned; but if he did at any time ſpeak or write of the power and greatneſs of the King of Spain, or repreſent any danger to his ſaid late Majeſty which might inſue by entering into hoſtility with the ſaid King of Spain, it was as a faithful counſellor and ſervant to his Majeſty, by way of his advice and opinion, which he ever delivered ſincerely, faithfully and truly, according to the preſent occaſion, and in no wiſe with ſuch intent as in the ſaid articles is mentioned, nor to any other evil intent or purpoſe whatſoever.

But he hath been ſo far from diſſuading his late Majeſty to take arms, that he hath upon all juſt occaſions adviſed, that all fiting preparations for war might be made, as begining with the year 1621, from which time he is only charged, will appear by his ſpeech in parliament preſently after his return out of Germany; and that he hoped his Majeſty would no longer rely upon ſingle treaties, but make all fiting preparations for war; and that the parliament would inable his Majeſty thereunto; and by the care he took before his going again upon his embaſſage into Spain, that the eſtabliſhment of an army under his Majeſty's own ſtandard of horſe and foot, and under his own pay, might be ſettled and provided for; as likewiſe his advice to the lords of the council, that his Majeſty might have a curb upon the King of Spain upon all occaſions, by continuing ſir Robert Manſel's fleet on the coaſts of Spain, as will appear by his letter written from Vienna, 26 July 1621, mentioned in the anſwer to the firſt article. By all which it appeareth, that he labored and indeavored as much as in him lay, that his Majeſty might be well prepared for any occaſions of war which ſhould happen. And he no way remembereth to have diſcouraged, or to have ſpoken or written any thing which might have been underſtood to have tended to the diſcouraging of his ſaid late Majeſty from taking arms, and entering into hoſtility with Spain, or for reſiſting of him and his forces from attempting the invaſions of his late Majeſty's dominions, or the dominions of his late Majeſty's confederates, friends or allies, as by the ſaid articles is charged againſt him; neither remembereth that he had any cauſe ſo to do. But if he have in any kind ſpoken or written of Spain, or the power thereof, it may have been to his late Majeſty, or to his now Majeſty, by way of diſcourſe, ſpeaking of the ſolidneſs of the Spaniſh proceeding, of their ſerious and deliberate debating of buſineſſes before they reſolve on them, of the conſtant purſuing of them when they are once reſolved, wiſhed that England and other nations would therein imitate them: for he ſuppoſeth the right way to impeach their greatneſs was to grow as wiſe as they, and to beat them at their own weapons. But otherwiſe he is confident never to have been heard to ſpeak or write what might be any terror or diſcouragement to his late Majeſty, or his chief miniſters, knowing that England, well ordered, need to take little terror at the power of Spain, having almoſt in all attempts and enterpriſes won honor upon them. And as for the preventing ſuch dangers as might inſue upon a war, tho' he knew not what is aimed at in that particular: yet he is moſt confident, out of the integrity of his own conſcience, that he neither ſaid, nor adviſed any thing but what befited a faithful counſellor and embaſſador, which was truly to deliver his opinion, as he underſtood it upon the preſent occaſion: and as for affirming his Majeſty's quiet ſhould be diſturbed, and he not be permited to hawk or to hunt, he remembereth not what diſcourſe he may have had, or written to any perſon, how fit it might be, on the being imbroiled in a great war, ſeriouſly to intend it, and make it our whole work. But as he is confident it will appear, that what diſcourſe ſoever it might have been, it wanted not true zeal and affection which he hath ever borne to the King's ſervice, and hopeth it will not be found to want the due reſpect and reverence on his part, which he ought to ſhew to ſo gracious a maſter. Neither can it be conceived, that the conſiderations of hunting and fowling ſhould be conſiderations worthy ſo great and prudent a King, to with-hold from a war for the good of Chriſtendom, and his kingdom, if he ſhould have been juſtly provoked thereunto.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

IV. To the fourth article the ſaid earl ſaith, that he did not any thing contrary to his duty or allegiance, or contrary to the faith and duty of an embaſſador, as by this article is alleged; but did intend the ſervice and honor of his late Majeſty; and no corrupt and ſiniſter ends of his own advancement, as by this article is ſo alleged. And as for the conference, which is pretended he ſhould hold concerning the treaty, that being told there was little probability the ſaid treaties would or could have good ſucceſs, he ſhould acknowledge as much; and yet ſaid, he cared not what the ſucceſs thereof might be, but that he would take care to have his inſtructions perfect, and to purſue them punctually, and would make his fortune thereby, or words to that effect; he doth not ever remember to have held ſuch diſcourſe. Tho' it be true, the time hath been, many years ſince, when he thought the match very unlike to be effected, in regard unequal anſwers were given in Prince Henry's days, and of the unlikelihood of accommodating the differences of religion; and ſaith farther, that reviving the treaty of the ſaid match for his Majeſty who now is, was not by his means, for he ever declared his opinion clearly, both to his late Majeſty, and to his Majeſty who now is, that, in the firſt place, he wiſhed and adviſed a Proteſtant match, but in the duty of a ſervant, underſtanding that both their Majeſties deſired the match really with Spain, he did really and faithfully intend the ſervice and honor of their Majeſties, and effectually indeavored to procure their ends. And it is very likely he might ſay, he would get his inſtructions perfect, and purſue them punctually, as he conceiveth was lawful and fit for him; but the latter part of this conference, that he ſhould ſay he would make his fortune by it, or any other words to that effect, he was in the year 1621, and ever ſince, of that rank and quality, both in regard of his imployments, fortunes, and his Majeſty's favor, that he aſſureth himſelf he did not, and dareth anſwer ſo far for his diſcretion, that it was impoſſible for him to hold ſuch mean and unworthy diſcourſe.

V. To the fifth article he ſaith, that what is therein alleged, is ſo far from being ſo, that contrarily, upon all occaſions, to the uttermoſt of his power, he did labor to prevent all the inconveniencies, in point of religion, which might come by matching with a Princeſs of a different religion, as well appeareth by the paper of his opinion, that his Majeſty ſhould marry with a lady of his own religion, hereafter mentioned in his anſwer to the ſeventh article: and for farther proof thereof, he ſaith that, in the whole treaty with Spain, he ſtood more ſtrict in points of religion than, by his inſtructions, he needed to have done, as will appear by the teſtimony of ſir Walter Aſton, and his diſpatches of the twelfth of December 1622, and other diſpatches, which he deſireth may be read. And as for concealing or perſuading to ſet at liberty the prieſts or Jeſuits, he utterly denieth to have done any ſuch thing, as before he hath anſwered. Altho' it be true, that the embaſſage in Spain be far different from the imployment of other places, where there is a body of our reformed religion, and where his Majeſty hath kindred and allies: whereby his Majeſty's miniſters may be informed of the neceſſary occurrences of ſtate, without the helps of prieſts or Jeſuits: but in Spain there being none but Roman Catholics, nor any manner of correſpondency or intelligence but by them, the embaſſadors muſt make uſe of all ſorts of people, eſpecially of Jeſuits and prieſts, and to that end embaſſadors ſent thither have a large and particular warrant, under the King's hand, to treat and make uſe of prieſts and Jeſuits, and all other ſorts of men, unleſs it be ſuch as are proclaimed rebels; and diverſe times the miniſters, imployed in Spain, to gratify ſome whom there they imployed for the King's ſervice, have, as he believeth, at their particular ſuit, moved his Majeſty to extend grace and favor to ſome particular friend and kinſman of his, being a Roman Catholic, and impriſoned in England; and that he remembereth to have happened to others, but doth not remember himſelf to have written to his late Majeſty in that kind: and as concerning his advice and counſel, to ſet at liberty Jeſuits and prieſts, and the granting to Papiſts a toleration, or ſilencing the laws againſt them, he ſaid, that his late Majeſty was ingaged, by the treaty of Madrid, 1617, in diverſe matters concerning religion; likewiſe by promiſe to Conde Gondomar, and his letters to the King of Spain, April 1620, wherein he is pleaſed to promiſe ſome particulars in favor of Roman Catholics, as by the ſaid letters will appear: and underſtanding the ſaid earl had ſufficient warrant, under the King's own hand, to aſſure the King of Spain, whatſoever was agreed in the ſaid article, or in the ſaid letters, his Majeſty would ſincerely perform; yet the ſaid earl was ſo cautious in that point, that when, for concluſion of the match, the other articles of religion being allowed, it was preſſed by the Spaniſh miniſters, that a clauſe of convenience might be inſerted, with proteſtation, that the form and way thereof ſhould be wholly left to his Majeſty's wiſdom and clemency, and that his Majeſty's Roman Catholic ſubjects ſhould acknowledge this grace to have come from the King's Majeſty's mercy and goodneſs; yet the ſaid earl would not condeſcend hereunto, 'de bene eſſe,' as by his letters to maſter ſecretary Calvert, 8 October 1622, will appear, hereby to give his Majeſty time to have recourſe unto his ſecond conſultation, and to take it into conſideration before he would ingage or bind himſelf in this point. But his late Majeſty, and his Majeſty who now is, were pleaſed to condeſcend hereunto, by ſigning the ſaid articles with their own hands, and likewiſe by writing their private letters, of the 8th of January 1622, to that effect to the King of Spain, as by the ſaid letters will appear. Neither did the ſaid earl, by letters or otherwiſe, ever counſel or perſuade his late Majeſty, to grant or allow unto the Papiſts, or profeſſors of the Romiſh religion, a free toleration, and ſilencing the laws made and ſtanding in force againſt them, but ever proteſted againſt any ſuch toleration; and when any ſuch proviſion hath been offered to be made in Spain, he ever refuſed ſo much as to give ear to it, or ſuffer it to be propounded; altho' it be true, that he hath ſince ſeen a paper touching pardons, ſuſpenſions, and diſpenſations for Roman Catholics, bearing date the ſeventh of Auguſt 1623, ſigned by lord Conway and others, which in effect is little leſs than a toleration.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

This declaration being to be ſeen in the reign of King James I, under the year 1623, inſerting it here would be ſuperfluous.

But this declaration, the ſaid earl ſaith and affirmeth, was the effect of the duke of Buckingham's negociation, and treated and concluded by lord Conway with the Spaniſh embaſſador here, while the Prince was in Spain; neither was his privity or advice in it: for if he had known it, he ſhould have proteſted againſt it. All which, together with the difference between the conditions of religion agreed at the treaty of Madrid, 12 Dec. 1622, by the ſaid earl and ſir Walter Aſton, being by their lordſhips conſidered, the ſaid earl doubteth not but that it will manifeſtly appear, whoſe indeavor it was to advance the Romiſh religion, and the profeſſors thereof; and judgeth the ſaid earl moſt unfortunate to be charged with an article of this kind.

VI. To the ſixth article the earl ſaith, that the aſſurances which he gave his late Majeſty, and his Majeſty who now is, concerning the treaties were ſuch that it had been diſhoneſty and breach of his duty and truſt for him to have held them back, being the ſame which were given him by the Emperor, the King of Spain, and their miniſters, upon as great aſſurances as can paſs between miniſters of Princes in the like caſe. And for the delays of Spain, they could never be ſo ill, and with ſo little color complained of, as at the time of his Majeſty's coming thither; for that a certain time was before then prefixed for the diſpenſation's coming, viz. in April 1623, at the fartheſt, which was next month after the Prince's arrival at Madrid; the deſponſories were to be within four days following, and the Infanta begin her journey into England twenty days after: ſo as three months patience longer would have ſhewed the iſſue of the buſineſs without puting the perſon of the Prince, being heir-apparent to the crown, in ſo imminent a hazard for the trying an experiment. And it is an argument of great ſuſpicion, becauſe the Spaniards were ſuſpected to have dealed falſely, and ſo the leſs to be truſted with the Prince's perſon to be put into their hands to try concluſions: but the truth is, tho' that were made the pretended ground and occaſion of the journey, it was neither the aſſurances of the ſaid earl, nor the jealouſies of Spain, but other motives which were the original cauſe of his Majeſty's ſaid journey, as ſhall be ſufficiently made apparent in due time. And the ſaid earl having got an inkling of it, by ſomething let fall from Conde Gondomar to that purpoſe, inſtantly diſpatched away by Mr. Griſly to his late Majeſty, to have his journey prevented; who, upon the confines of France,

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

France, met with his Majeſty and the duke of Buckingham on his journey towards Spain, and told them as much. So that, altho' he confeſſeth what is laid in the charge to be true, viz. that, by the ſaid journey, the perſon of the prince, the peace and ſafety of the kingdom did undergo farther danger (at the remembrance whereof the hearts of all good ſubjects do tremble) yet the blame is due to the authors and adviſers of the ſame journey, and not to the ſaid earl; and altho' it pleaſed God, to the exceeding great joy and comfort of the ſaid earl, and of all good men, to ſend his gracious Majeſty home with ſafety, yet never was the perſon of any Prince, upon ſuch grounds, expoſed to ſo great a hazard; and in ſuch caſes, not the ſucceſs, but the counſellors are conſiderable.

VII. To the ſeventh article the ſaid earl ſaith, that he did not move or perſuade his Majeſty, then Prince, to change his religion, neither in the manner in the ſaid article mentioned, nor in any other manner whatſoever: neither doth he conceive, that the charge in itſelf as it is laid, will, in any reaſonable conſtruction, bear any ſuch inference as is made therein; ſo as he conceiveth he needeth not make any farther or other anſwer thereunto: yet that it may appear, that the manner he uſed to the ſame Prince was not traiterouſly, falſely, or cunningly, nor without ground, or to any ſuch intent as, in the ſaid article, is ſuppoſed, and to manifeſt unto this moſt high and honorable court, how far he was from all ſuch intention, he ſaith, he doth acknowledge that, within few days after his Majeſty's coming into Spain, while he had the great honor to have his Majeſty lodged at his houſe, and to have ſo royal a gueſt, finding by the Spaniſh miniſters there was a general opinion, that his Majeſty's coming thither was with intention to become a Roman Catholic; and Conde Gondomar having, that very morning, preſſed the earl not to hinder ſo pious a work (as he termed it) of his Majeſty's converſion, and ſeeming to be aſſured of the duke of Buckingham's aſſiſtance therein, his Majeſty, being all alone in a withdrawing room in the ſaid earl's houſe, the ſaid earl kneeled unto him, and told him, that he had a buſineſs to impart unto him which highly imported his Majeſty to know, ſo that he might be aſſured his boldneſs therein might be pardoned; which his Mrjeſty graciouſly promiſed. Thereupon the ſaid earl told his Majeſty, that the general opinion of the court was, that his Majeſty's coming into Spain was with intention to be a Roman Catholic, and there to declare it. And he confeſſeth, that at the ſame time, in regard of thoſe things he had heard, he humbly beſought his Majeſty to deal freely with him, as a ſervant of whoſe fidelity he might be confident, or words to that effect: but he was ſo far from perſuading his Majeſty to be a Roman Catholic that, without reſpecting his Majeſty's anſwer, he declared himſelf to be a Proteſtant, and ſo ſhould always continue; yet he ſaid, he ſhould always ſerve his Majeſty, and labor to advance his and the King his father's affairs, with as much fidelity and honeſty as any Catholic whatſoever; and his Majeſty was then pleaſed to make unto the ſaid earl a full and clear declaration of his religion, and of his conſtant reſolution therein; and ſeemed to be much diſpleaſed, that any ſhould have ſuch unworthy opinion of him, as to think he would, for a wife, or any other earthly reſpect whatſoever, ſo much as waver in his religion. Whereupon the ſaid earl beſought his Majeſty to pardon his boldneſs, and then intreated him not to ſuffer his buſineſs to be overthrown, by permiting that conceit of his converſion any longer to remain in the Spaniards, nor to any thing which might give them hope therein, alleging, that it was impoſſible the marriage could be without a diſpenſation; and ſo long as the Spaniards, who were to procure the diſpenſation, ſhould have hope of his Majeſty's converſion, they would never content themſelves with a part, to which they were tied by the articles agreed upon with the ſaid earl and ſir Walter Aſton. At which time his Majeſty was pleaſed to approve of his opinion, and ſaid, he would expect the diſpenſation, and did thereupon afterwards ſend Mr. Andrews to Rome to haſten it; and next day the ſaid earl dealed very roundly with Conde Olivares, and Gondomar, telling them it was a diſcourteous manner of proceeding, to preſs his Majeſty to farther conditions than were formerly agreed upon in point of religion, and to make his conditions the worſe for the great obligations he had put upon them, by puting himſelf into their hands; whereat they took ſuch great offenſe, that they eſtranged themſelves from him for a long time after. And that the ſaid earl did thus proceed with the ſaid Conde, and that it was not a new-framed anſwer to ſatisfy preſent objections, but what really and indeed paſſed, will really appear by his diſpatches unto his late Majeſty of bleſſed memory; and before his Majeſty, who now is, came out of Spain, they were there ſhewed unto his Majeſty, bearing date the ninth of September 1623. So that, altho' it be true that he the ſaid earl did not diſſuade his Majeſty, for that there was no cauſe for it; yet, without expecting his Majeſty's anſwer, he firſt made a clear and true profeſſion of his own religion; and when his Majeſty had declared to him his zeal and conſtancy, he humbly beſought him, that the Spaniards might not for any reſpect be longer held in hopes of that point. And becauſe point of religion is that which all men of honor and honeſty would chiefly deſire to clear, eſpecially having an imputation of that nature laid upon them, as the ſaid earl hath in the ſaid article; he humbly beſeecheth your lordſhips, that he may not ſeem to digreſs from his charge; intending your lordſhips ſatisfaction in that particular, not by the aforeſaid verbal diſcourſe only, which he profeſſeth was in much zeal to religion and dutiful care to the Prince in that kind, but by ſome written teſtimony of his former opinion both of the match and religion. When he was firſt imployed into Spain for the treaty of marriage, in 1617, his late Majeſty having commanded him to give account thereof to his Majeſty who now is, he at his departure towards Spain preſumed to give unto his Majeſty who now is his opinion in writing, ſigned with his own hand, to be kept as a teſtimony of future action, the copy whereof here followeth:

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

SIR,

" THE opinion which I have ever preſumed
" humbly to offer unto his Majeſty, concerning
" your Highneſs's marriage, hath been that, both
" in regard of conſcience and ſatisfaction unto his
" Majeſty's people and allies, likewiſe for the ſecu-
" rity and quiet of his Majeſty's eſtates, your
" Highneſs might take for wife ſome Proteſtant
" Princeſs, altho' ſhe neither were daughter to a
" King, nor had ſo ample a portion as might relieve
" the King's preſent neceſſities and wants; for then
" there might be many ways found to help the " King's wants, either by ſome few years provi-
" dence and frugality, or by wining the affections
" of the people, to the ſupplying of his Majeſty
" by way of ſubſidies in parliament; whereas con-
" trariwiſe, if the number and power of Papiſts
" ſhall be increaſed, as undoubtedly they will be by
" your Highneſs's matching with any Catholic

" and thereby by degrees theſe two different reli" gions ſhall grow to an equality of power; it will " be great hazard and diſquiet to the ſtate, and " not to be redreſſed without great danger, and
" courſes of more violence than is uſual for this
" ſtate to put in practiſe. But in caſe his Majeſty,
" out of his wiſdom and conſideration beſt known
" to himſelf, hold it fiteſt that your Highneſs
" match with France, or Spain, or any other Ca" tholic, either for that the preſent time affordeth
" no Proteſtant Princeſs, who is for years or blood

" Thus much I thought fit humbly to preſent
" unto your Highneſs, for that I ſee my imploy-
" ment liable to the cenſure of many worthy perſons,
" with whom tho' I concur in my opinion, yet I
" ſeem much to differ from them many ways; for
" that it is more proper for me to be true to my

" Highneſs I thought fit to make this declaration,
" and ſhall be a ſuitor to you for your favor, as
" you ſhall ſee me really labor to put this in effect.
" And if his Majeſty ſhall, either upon motion of " parliament, or any other propoſition which can " be made unto him, think fit to proceed with a
" Proteſtant match, as I ſhall wiſh as well unto
" it as any man living, ſo I hope in ſuch ſort to " manage the preſent buſineſs which I have in " hand, that it ſhall rather much farther, than any " way croſs or hinder it. But in caſe his Majeſty
" ſhall not be drawn to any propoſition for a Pro-
" teſtant match, I then conceived, that your High-
" neſs both doth and will approve, that I really
" and effectually labor to procure a match for your
" Highneſs in Spain, upon ſuch conditions, in " point of religion and portion, as to his Majeſty
" ſhall ſeem fit.

Beſide which declaration of his opinion, he hath all the days of his life, and in all places, lived and allowed himſelf to be a Proteſtant, never having done any the leaſt act which was not ſuitable to that profeſſion: and in all his former imployments, for the ſpace of fourteen years, of more than five hundred perſons of all qualities who attended on him, there was never one perverted in his religion, ſaving two Iriſh footmen, who in Ireland had been bred Papiſts. And he humbly deſired the teſtimony of doctor Maſon and doctor Wren, his Majeſty's chaplains, who were with his Majeſty in Spain; and of mr. Sampford, one of the prebends of Canterbury, mr. Boſwell, parſon of St. Laurence in London, and mr. Frewen, divinity-reader in Magdalen College in Oxford, and now one of his Majeſty's chaplains, who were his Majeſty's chaplains in Spain; as well for the frequent uſe of the ſacrament, as conſtant profeſſion and exerciſes of religion, and the teſtimony of ſuch Catholics as are known to have been his ancient acquaintance and friends, to examine them upon oath, whether publicly or privately, in Spain or in England, they had known him in any kind to make ſhew, or ſo much as to forbear, upon all occaſions, to declare the religion he profeſſeth. And that the ſaid mr. Frewen and mr. Wake may be alſo examined, whether in extremity of ſeveral ſickneſſes, whereinto he hath of late years fallen, he hath not ever ſettled his conſcience with them towards God, and made a confeſſion of his faith; reſolving, as was befiting a Proteſtant or good Chriſtian.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

VIII. To the eighth article the earl ſaith, That he did not at any time, or in any place, indeavor to perſuade the Prince, touching his religion to become a Roman Catholic, and to be obedient to the uſurped authority of Rome; neither did the ſaid earl, to that end and purpoſe, or otherwiſe, uſe unto his Majeſty, then Prince, the words in the article mentioned. But the ſaid earl acknowledgeth, that, upon occaſion of a letter which came to his Majeſty, then Prince, puting his Majeſty in mind of the great actions of his royal progenitors in the holy war, that the great Kings of thoſe times did not only imploy their forces, but in their perſons went into the holy land. The earl believeth that, by way of diſcourſe only, and not otherwiſe, he may have ſaid, that, in regard of the difference in religion, it was of more difficulty to undertake ſuch great actions now, than in former ages; and it might well be inſtanced in the preſent treaty of marriage, wherein the Pope's conſent was to be obtained. And to this effect, and upon the like grounds, he is confident there were very many who have, nay few of nearneſs about his late Majeſty who have not heard his Majeſty often ſay, that he was the true martyr, who ſuffered more for his religion than all the Princes of Chriſtendom beſide; inſtancing in diverſe particulars, but eſpecially in this, that he could not match his children with Kings of his own rank, without the Pope's leave.

But the ſaid earl ſaith, He never alleged any ſuch thing to any other purpoſe, than to ſhew, that only conſcience and love to truth (in which regard Proteſtants ſuffered much) not any temporal reſpects, made men conſtant and zealous to the profeſſion of our religion. By which diſcourſe he ever attributed much to the honor and ſecurity of the Proteſtant religion; but never uſed it as an argument to perſuade to the contrary, as in the accuſation is inſinuated.

Beſide he conceiveth, by way of anſwer thereunto, the ſaid queſtion may be aſked, which his Majeſty was pleaſed to aſk of the earl in the ſeventh article, viz. " What the ſaid earl ſaw in his Majeſty, that " he ſhould think him ſo unworthy, as to change " his religion for a wife, or any earthly reſpect " whatſoever?" So why ſhould it be thought, that being more fit to undertake great actions in the world (being a mere moral and temporal reſpect) ſhould be an argument to perſuade in conſcience ſo religious and wiſe a Prince, and ſo well inſtructed as his Majeſty is, as tho' the ſoul of a Chriſtian Prince was to be wrought upon, in point of truth and belief, by temporal and wordly reſpects of conveniencies and greatneſs? It were neceſſary for the proving that the ſaid earl perſuaded his Majeſty touching religion, to produce ſome arguments which he uſed out of ſcripture, to ſatisfy him in point of conſcience in ſome tenets of the Roman church, or that he produced any conference with learned men for his ſatisfaction in point of religion: otherwiſe, the articles uſed in this againſt the ſaid earl, do (as he conceiveth) carry little ſtrength to prove the charge of perſuading his Majeſty, either in regard of itſelf, or in regard of his Majeſty's piety.

IX. To the ninth article, the ſaid earl ſaith, that there was a diſcourſe in Spain of the way of accommodating the Prince Palatine's affairs; and by way of diſcourſe it was moved, That the marriage of his eldeſt ſon with a daughter of the Emperor, and his ſon to be bred in the Emperor's court, would be the faireſt way for the pacifying and accommodating thoſe buſineſſes. And the earl, by way of diſcourſe, and not otherwiſe, did ſay, That he thought his late Majeſty could not be adverſe either to.

to the ſaid match, or to breeding the Prince Palatine's ſon with the Emperor; ſo as thereby the whole patrimonial eſtate of the Prince Palatine, and the Electoral dignity might be fully reſtored, and that his ſon might be bred in his own religion, and have ſuch preceptors, and ſuch a family, as his late Majeſty and his father, meaning the Prince Palatine, ſhould appoint; and they to have free exerciſe of religion: for ſo his late Majeſty hath often declared himſelf to the ſaid earl, and wiſhed him to lay hold on any occaſion for the entertaining any ſuch propoſition. And otherwiſe than ſo, and upon the terms aforeſaid, and by that way of conference and diſcourſe only, he delivered not any opinion to his Majeſty, at his Majeſty's being in Spain: for the ſaid earl is very confident, that his Majeſty was returned out of Spain before any propoſition was made for the ſaid marriage, other than by way of diſcourſe, as aforeſaid; the ſame, as the ſaid earl believeth, being firſt moved and debated on, by way of propoſition, between mr. ſecretary Calvert, and the embaſſador of the King of Spain, October 2, 1623. His late Majeſty, upon a relation made unto him by a letter of mr. ſecretary Calvert, approved of the ſaid propoſition, and declared the ſame to be the only way, as he conceived, to accommodate with honor thoſe great buſineſſes: and wrote to that purpoſe to his ſon-in-law, the Prince Palatine, by his letter dated November 9, 1623, a copy of which he, together with mr. ſecretary Calvert's relation, and lord Conway, by his late Majeſty's commandment, ſent unto the ſaid earl, the tenor of which, tranſlated out of French, is as followeth.

"We have thought good, that we may provide "beſt and moſt ſoundly for your affairs, not only "to procure, but alſo to aſſure your peace, were "to cut up, by the very roots, that evil, which hath "been ſettled in the heart of the Emperor by the "great diſpleaſure and enmity he hath conceived "againſt you. For the removing and quite extinguiſhing of which, it ſeemeth to us no better or "more powerful means can be uſed, than a good "alliance, which may be propoſed by us, between "your eldeſt ſon, and the daughter of the ſaid Emperor, upon the aſſurance we have, we ſhall not "be refuſed in this matter, if you on your part "will give your conſent. And for the more ſurety "of the good ſucceſs thereof, we are determined, "before any ſuch propoſition be made to the Emperor, to intereſt the King of Spain with us in "the buſineſs, who, we truſt, will lend us his "helping hand, as well for the effecting it, and "bringing it to a good concluſion, as in procuring "likewiſe that the condition be duly obſerved. "Among which conditions, if it happen that "the Emperor ſhould demand, that your ſon, "during his minority, ſhould be brought up in his "court, we ſhall tell you, that we, for our own "part, ſee no reaſon why you ſhould ſtick at it, "upon ſuch conditions as he might be tied unto, "to wit, That the young Prince ſhould have with "him ſuch governor as you ſhall pleaſe to appoint "him, altho' he be no Roman Catholic; and that "neither he, nor any of his, ſhould be any way "forced in matter of their conſcience. And our "meaning is, ſo to order our proceeding in this "treaty that, before your ſaid ſon be put into the "Emperor's hands, we will have a clear and certain "aſſurance of an honorable, intire, and punctual "reſtitution of all whatſoever belonging to you: "as alſo we will take care to provide accordingly, "as fully and exactly for the aſſurances requiſite for "the liberty of conſcience, for him and his do-"meſtics, as they have done here with us, touching "thoſe which have been granted them for the Infanta. "And therefore, ſeeing there is no inconveniency "at all, which may cauſe your averſeneſs or back-"wardneſs in this buſineſs, which we for our parts "think to be the beſt, ſhorteſt, and moſt hono-"rable way you can take for compaſſing the intire "reſtitution, and making your peace ſure with the "Emperor, we hope your opinion will concur with "us therein, and ſhall intreat you, by the firſt, to "ſend us your anſwer."

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

By which letters, after his Majeſty's return from Spain, it appeareth to your lordſhips, that there was no propoſition of the marriage between the Prince Palatine's ſon and the Emperor's daughter, when that letter was written; for therein his Majeſty ſaith, he was determined to intereſt the King of Spain in the buſineſs, before any ſuch propoſition ſhould be made to the Emperor. And it will alſo thereby appear, that his late Majeſty's inclination was of the conveniency thereof, which the ſaid earl hopeth will acquit him, if by way of diſcourſe only he declared what his Majeſty's opinion was, which with honeſty he could not have concealed. And the ſaid earl ſaith, he doth not remember what anſwer ſir Walter Aſton made upon that diſcourſe which he then delivered, nor what replies the ſaid earl made; but ſure he is, whatſoever the ſaid earl ſaid, or what anſwer or reply ſoever was made, as it was by way of diſcourſe, and not otherwiſe, ſo it was according to that which he truly conceived to be the beſt and eaſieſt way to accommodate the buſineſs, and to be his Majeſty's pleaſure (which the ſaid ſir Walter Aſton may be ignorant of, as he is confident that he was) and not out of any diſaffection to our religion, or for any ſiniſter reſpect or regard to the houſe of Auſtria, as by the ſaid article is intimated: for he did conceive breeding the Prince Palatine's ſon with the Emperor, having a governor appointed by his late Majeſty and his father, and he and his domeſtics to have free uſe of their own religion, to be a matter of impoſſibility, or ſuch dangerous conſequence in point of religion, as to imply his converſion, as by the article it is intimated; well knowing that, in the Emperor's court, all Princes there, tho' his priſoners, and others his counſellors and ſervants about his perſon, and ſo great command in his armies, being avowed Proteſtants, have the free uſe of their religion: and it is not to be ſuppoſed, the ſon of the Prince Palatine, grandchild to the King of Great-Britain, ſhould be matched, and no care taken to capitulate for the uſe of his religion, being ever granted to the meaneſt Prince beſtowed. And his Majeſty's ſpecial care in this point is fully ſeen in the ſaid letter.

X. To the tenth article he ſaith, That, by comparing this article of his too much forwardneſs with the ſecond article, whereby he is charged with continuing the treaty upon generalities, without reducing them to certainties and direct concluſions, your lordſhips will perceive how impoſſible it was for him to avoid an exception. But for direct anſwer to the preſent charge, he ſaith, he did not preſumptuouſly, nor yet to his knowledge, break his inſtructions, nor ſet a day at all for the deſponſories, but was therein merely paſſive, in admiting the day nominated by the King of Spain according to the capitulation before made: nor did he preſumptuouſly, willfully, or willingly diſobey any commandment or direction of his now Majeſty, then Prince, which he could underſtand not to be countermanded, either by preſent or future inſtructions otherwiſe explained.

And for the better manifeſtation of the truth of his proceedings in and concerning the ſame, he ſaith, That on the day of the departure of his Majeſty, then Prince, from the Eſcurial in Spain, his Highneſs delivered unto him, in preſenſe of the comcommiſſioners, his proxies powers, with public declaration, taken in writing by the ſecretary, to the King of Spain, of the Prince's pleaſure, and how the ſaid earl ſhould uſe them, viz. That he ſhould deliver them to the King of Spain, upon the coming of the diſpenſation cleared from Rome, according to that which hath been agreed, which was to be within ten days after the diſpenſation arrived. And he farther ſaith, it is true, that the Prince afterwards by his letters, ſent by one mr. Clark, commanded him the ſaid earl not to deliver the ſaid proxies 'till he ſhould have received ſecurity that the Infanta, after her being betrothed, ſhould not enter into any religious order, and that before he proceeded, he ſhould ſend to his Majeſty, then Prince, ſuch ſecurities as ſhould be offered, that he might judge whether it were ſufficient or not.

Whereupon the ſaid earl, as became a faithful ſervant, preſented unto his Majeſty who now is, then Prince, ſuch aſſurances as were offered him, for ſecuring that point, together with ſuch reaſons as he conceived were fit to be offered to their conſiderations; which gave unto his late Majeſty, and his Majeſty who now is, then Prince, ſuch ſatisfaction, as they were pleaſed to diſpatch a poſt preſently unto him, abſolutely diſcharging him of that commandment, as by their ſeveral letters, dated October 8, 1623, will appear, as followeth:

"We have received your letters by Griſley, "and the copy of them to our dear ſon; and we "cannot forbear to let you know how well we "eſteem that dutiful, diſcreet and judicial relation, "and humble advice to our ſon: whereupon, "having fully deliberated with ourſelf, and com-"municated with our dear ſon, we have reſolved, "with the good liking of our ſon, to reſt upon "that ſecurity in point of doubt, for the Infanta's "taking a religious order, which you in your judg-"ment ſhall think meet."

And by that other letter of his preſent Majeſty, then Prince, as followeth, viz.

"Your letter to the King and me, concerning "that doubt I made after I came from St. Lau-"rence, hath ſo ſatisfied us both, that we think "it fit no longer to ſtick upon it, but leave it to "your diſcretion to take what ſecurity you ſhall "think fiting.

Whereby he was abſolutely freed of that command; and being ſo freed thereof, he then remained under the order which his Majeſty, then Prince, had left with him at his departure, which was to proceed according to the capitulations, and his Highneſs's declaration, when he delivered him the ſaid proxies: and ſo he intended to have done, 'till, by his Highneſs's letters, November 13, 1623, he was directly commanded the contrary, which commandment he directly and punctually obeyed.

And for ſuch his intentions, 'till he was countermanded, he conceived he had not only ſufficient warrant, but had highly offended if he had done otherwiſe. Firſt, for his proceedings to conſummate the match, he had warrant and inſtruction under his late Majeſty's hand. Secondly, it was the main ſcope of his embaſſage. Thirdly, he was injoined by the King's and Prince's commiſſions, under the great-ſeal. Fourthly, he had poſitive order under his Majeſty's hand, by letters ſince. Fifthly, it was agreed by capitulation, that it ſhould be within ſo many days after the diſpenſation's coming. Sixthly, his late Majeſty, and his Majeſty who now is, then Prince, ſignified by their letters to him, at the ſame time when they diſcharged him of his commandment touching the Infanta's entering into religion, that they intended to proceed in the marriage, as by his Majeſty's letters, October 8, 1623, will appear. Seventhly, the proxies were to that end left in his hands, and again renewed after his Majeſty's return to England. Eighthly, he had overthrown the marriage without order: for altho' ſir Walter Aſton and himſelf uſed all poſſible means for gaining time, and defering the deſponſories, yet the King of Spain cauſed it to be proteſted; that, in caſe he the ſaid earl ſhould inſiſt upon defering the deſponſories, he would free himſelf from the treaty by the ſaid earl's infringing the capitulations: and in truth, altho' the King of Spain ſhould have condeſcended to have prolonged the deſponſories, 'till one of the days of Chriſtmaſs, as by the letter was required; yet the Prince's proxies had been before that time expired, and he durſt not, without a preciſe warrant, put ſuch a ſcorn upon ſo noble a lady, whom he then conceived was likely to have been the Prince's wife, as to nominate a day of marriage when the proxies were out of date, and he was himſelf ſworn to the treaty. And laſtly, he could not, in honor and honeſty, but indeavor to perform that public truſt repoſed in him, when the proxies were depoſited in his hands with a public and legal declaration, with an inſtrument by a ſecretary of ſtate to the King of Spain, leading and directing the uſe of them, and the ſame being then "inſtrumentum ſtipulatum," wherein as well the King of Spain was intereſted by the acceptation of the ſubſtitution, as the Prince by granting the proxies, he could not in honeſty fail the public truſt, without clear and undoubted warrant; which as ſoon as he had, he obeyed. So as, the caſe ſtanding thus, the ſaid earl is very confident the ſuppoſed countermands, directions and reſtrictions, when they ſhould be peruſed and conſidered of, will appear to have been very ſlender and inſufficient warrant againſt the aforeſaid orders and reaſons before ſpecified: and is alſo as confident, that what is aſſured out of his the ſaid earl's diſpatches, will alſo appear to be miſunderſtood; and that if he had proceeded to the execution of the deſponſories, before he received direct and expreſs commandment to the contrary by the aforeſaid letters, November 13, 1623, which he readily and punctually obeyed, he had not, under favor, broken his inſtructions, or deſerved any blame for lack of aſſurance of reſtitution of the Palatinate, and temporal articles.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

And firſt, of the Palatinate, his ſaid Majeſty did not ſend to the ſaid earl expreſs directions not to diſpatch the deſponſories, 'till a full concluſion was had of the other treaty of the Palatinate, together with that of the marriage, as by the ſaid article is alleged; only his late Majeſty, by the aforeſaid letters of October 8, required the ſaid earl ſo to indeavor, that his Majeſty might have the joy of both at Chriſtmaſs. Whereas his inſtructions of May 14, 1621, were expreſs, that he ſhould not make the buſineſs of the Palatinate a condition of the marriage; and his late Majeſty's letters of December 30, 1623, were fully to the ſame effect. Yet did the ſaid earl, according to what was intimated by the ſaid letter of October 8, ſo carefully provide therein, as that before the proxies were to be executed, he had abſolute anſwer in the Palatinate buſineſs, the ſame ſhould be really reſtored, according to his late Majeſty's deſire: and Conde Olivares, both in his Majeſty's name and in his own, deſired the ſaid earl and ſir Walter Aſton, that they would aſſure his Majeſty of the real performance of the ſame, and intreated, if need were, they ſhould ingage their honor and life for it, as by their joint diſpatches of November 23, 1623, will appear; and ſo much the ſaid ſir Walter Aſton and the ſaid earl agreed ſhould be delivered to them in writing, before they would have delivered their proxies, and ſo the ſaid earl declared it; the which anſwer in writing ſhould have been the ſame which ſince was given them of

January

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

January 8, 1623: and both ſir Walter Aſton, and the ſaid earl were confident therein, as they, by their ſaid letters of November 23, wrote to his late Majeſty; viz.

"That his Majeſty might, according to his de-
"ſire, ſignify to the ſaid earl, by his letters of "October 8, give, as well to his Majeſty's daugh"ter, that Chriſtmaſs, the comfortable news of the "expiring of her great troubles and ſufferings, as "to his ſon the Prince, the congratulation of "being married to a moſt worthy and excellent
"Princeſs."

By which it will evidently appear, he meaned not to leave looſe the Palatinate buſineſs, when he intended to proceed to the marriage; but he confeſſed he was ever of opinion, that the beſt pawn and aſſurance his late Majeſty could have of the real proceeding of the Palatinate, was, that they proceeded really to effecting the match; and of the ſame opinion was his late Majeſty alſo, and the lord commiſſioners here in England, as appeareth by his inſtructions, dated March 14, 1621, which opinion ſtill continued in them, as appeareth by his late Majeſty letters of January 7, 1622. And as for the temporal articles, the ſaid earl ſaith, when the deſponſories were formerly appointed to have been, as he remembereth on Friday, Auguſt 29, before the departure of his Majeſty, then Prince, from Spain, which was only hindered by the not coming of the diſpenſation, the Prince appointed him and ſir walter Aſton to meet with the Spaniſh commiſſioners, and they drew up the heads of the temporal articles, wherewith the Prince and duke of Buckingham were acquainted; and in caſe the diſpenſation had come, and the deſponſories being performed on that day, there had been no other proviſion made for them before the marriage; but preſently, on the Prince's departure, he the ſaid earl cauſed them to be drawn into form, and ſent them to his late Majeſty, September 27, 1623, deſiring to underſtand his Majeſty's pleaſure with all ſpeed, eſpecially if he diſapproved any thing in them; but never received notice of any diſlike thereof, 'till the aforeſaid letters of November 13, 1623, which put off the deſponſories. So, as it appeareth, the ſaid earl was ſo far from breaking his inſtructions, or from having any intention to have proceeded to the execution of the deſponſories, before his Majeſty and the Prince were ſatisfied of this point of the Infanta's entering into religion, or before convenient aſſurance, as well for reſtitution of the Palatinate, as performance of the temporal articles, that he deſerveth, as he conceiveth under favor, no blame, ſo much as in intention; but if he had erred in intention only (as he did not) the ſame being never reduced into act, the fault (as he conceiveth) was removed by his obedience before the intention was put in execution: for ſo it is in caſes towards God. And as to the matter of agravation againſt him, that he appointed ſo ſhort a time for the deſponſories, as that without extraordinary diligence the Prince had been bound, he thereto ſaith, as he ſaid before, that he ſet no day at all thereunto, nor could defer it after the diſpenſation came from Rome, without a direct breach of the match ſo long labored in, and ſo much deſired; yet he and ſir Walter Aſton having uſed all poſſible induſtry to diſcover how the notion of defering the match would be taken; and finding an abſolute reſolution in the King of Spain to proceed punctually, and to require the proxies according to the capitulation, within ten days after the diſpenſation's coming; and that time alſo, geting advertiſement from Rome, that the diſpenſation was granted and would preſently be there, he the ſaid earl, to the end, in ſo great a cauſe, he might have a clear and undoubted understanding of his late Majeſty's pleaſure, ſent a diſpatch, of November 1, with all diligence to his Majeſty, leting his Majeſty know, that it could not be poſſible for him to protract the marriage above four days, unleſs he ſhould hazard the breaking, for which he had no warrant.

Proceedings againſt the earl of Briſtol.

But that this was now no new reſolution, nor the King ſo ſtraitened in time as, by the ſaid article, is pretended, will appear by the ſaid earl's diſpatch of September 28, 1623. In which, upon ſcruple that was then made of the Infanta's entering into religion, he wrote to the ſame effect, viz. "That if the "diſpenſation ſhould come, he knew no means "how to detain the proxies above twenty or twenty "four days." So that altho' no difficulty happened until the midſt of November 1623, yet it was foreſeen, that it muſt of neceſſity happen whenſoever the diſpentation ſhould come; and then was warning of two months given thereof; viz. from September 24, until November 29, which was the time appointed for the deſponſories.

So, as he moſt humbly ſubmiteth himſelf unto your lordſhips, which of the two ways was the ſafer or dutifuller for him to take; whether, upon inferences and conjectures, to have overthrown ſo great a buſineſs; or, on the other ſide, firſt to have preſented to his Majeſty, the truth and ſincerity as he did, the true eſtate of his affairs, with his humble opinion therein, alſo an intimation that, if his Majeſty ſhould reſolve to break the match, for the ſaid earl's honeſt diſcharge of the public truſt repoſed in him, when the proxies were depoſited in his hands, and for his ſufficient warrant in ſo great a cauſe, his Majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to give clear and expreſs order (which he had not) and in the interim, while his Majeſty might take into conſideration the great inconveniencies which might inſue, the ſaid inconveniences might be ſuſpended, and the buſineſs kept upon fair terms, that his Majeſty might have his way and choice clear and unſoiled before him.

And as to the evil conſequences which are pretended would have followed, if the ſaid earl had proceeded to the conſummation of the match, before he had expreſs order and warrant to the contrary; he ſuppoſed his Majeſty ſhould ſpeedily have ſeen the marriage, which he ſo long ſought to have effected; that the Prince ſhould have had a worthy lady whom he loved; that the portion was much greater that ever was given in money in Chriſtendom; that the King of Spain had ingaged himſelf for reſtitution of the Palatinate; for which the ſaid earl conceived a daughter of Spain, and two millions, had been no ill pawn; beſide many other additions of advantage to the crown of England: whereas, on the contrary ſide, he foreſaw that the Prince would be kept a year longer unmarried, a thing which ſo highly concerned theſe kingdoms; he doubteth, that the recovery of the Palatinate, from the Emperor and duke of Bavaria, by force, would prove a great difficulty, and that Chriſtendom was like to fall into a general combuſtion; ſo that, deſiring his Majeſty ſhould have obtained his ends, and have had the honor and happineſs, not only to have given peace, plenty and increaſe to his own ſubjects and crowns, but to have compounded the greateſt differences which had been theſe many years in Chriſtendom; and by his piety and wiſdom, to have prevented ſheding ſo much Chriſtian blood, as he feared would inſue if theſe buſineſſes were diſordered. Theſe reaſons, he confeſſed, and the zeal to his Majeſty's ſervice, made him ſo earneſtly deſire the effecting this buſineſs, and cannot but think himſelf a moſt unfortunate man (his Majeſty's affairs being ſo near ſettling to his Majeſty's content, as he conceived they were, and hoping to have been to his Majeſty, not only a faithful but a ſucceſsful ſervant) to ſee the whole eſtate of his affairs turned upſide down, without any the leaſt fault of his; and yet hed the only miniſter, on the Engliſh and Spaniſh ſide, who remained under diſgrace.

XI. To the eleventh article the ſaid earl ſaith, that the article is grounded upon a petition by him prefered to this honorable houſe, ſuppoſed to be ſcandalous; which your lordſhips (as he conceiveth) according to the cuſtoms and privileges of the houſe of peers, would have been pleaſed firſt to have adjudged ſo to have been, either for matter appearing in itſelf, or upon hearing the ſaid earl; for if the matter appearing in the petition itſelf be not to be excepted unto, it cannot, as he conceiveth, by collateral accidents, be taken for a ſcandal, 'till it be examined and found falſe. For a plain and direct anſwer thereunto, he ſaith, that the ſaid petition is ſuch, as will not warrant any ſuch inference, as by the ſaid article is inforced: and that he hoped to juſtify the contents of the ſaid petition, in ſuch ſort as ſhall not diſpleaſe his Majeſty, nor deſerve that expreſſion which is uſed in the charge; but contrarily, what he hath ſaid, or ſhall ſay therein in his defenſe ſhall, in all things, tend to the honor and ſervice of his Majeſty, by reducing into his memory diverſe circumſtances, and laying before him the paſſage of ſundry particulars which, by undue practiſes, have been either concealed from his Majeſty, or miſ-related unto him.

" Having thus offered, to this high and honorable court, ſuch proofs and reaſons as he hoped " ſhall, in your lordſhips wiſdom and juſtice, " clearly acquit him of any capital crime, or wil- " ful offenſe; if it ſhall appear that, out of errors " of judgment, too much ſerventneſs of zeal to his " Majeſty's ſervice, or ignorance of the laws of this " realm (wherewith he hath not been able to be ſo " well acquainted as he ought, by reaſon of foreign " imployments by the ſpace of many years) or by " any other ways or means he hath fallen into " danger of the laws for any thing pardoned in " the general pardon, made in the parliament " holden at Weſtminſter, "Anno Viceſimo Primo " Regni Imp. Jacobi Angliæ, &c. of bleſſed me- " mory, he humbly prayeth allowance of the " pardons, and the benefit thereof (with this clauſe, " that he doth and will aver, he is none of the " perſons excepted out of the ſame) altho' he is " very confident, he ſhall not need the help of any " pardon, having received many ſignifications, as " well from his Majeſty's own mouth, that he had " never offended his Majeſty, as lately, by ſeveral " letters of lord Conway, that he might reſt in " the ſecurity he was in, and ſit ſtill, and ſhould " be no farther queſtioned. But he hopeth your " lordſhips will not only find him ſo far from " blame, but that he hath ſerved his late Majeſty " of bleſſed memory, and his moſt gracious ſon, " the King's Majeſty, who now is, with that fide- " lity, care and induſtry, that your lordſhips will " take courſe as you, in your wiſdoms, ſhall " think fit, not only for upholding the honor and " reputation of a peer in this realm, after ſo many " imployments, but likewiſe become humble and " earneſt ſuitors to his Majeſty on his behalf (which " he humbly prayeth) that he may be reſtored to " his Majeſty's good favor, which above all " worldly things he moſt deſireth."

Remarks on Briſtol's defenſe.

I judged the earl of Briſtol's defenſe worthy being tranſmited to poſterity in a language more generally known than Engliſh. Truth is viſible throughout; the whole is perfectly coherent; nothing appears diſguiſed, and the earl's innocence is ſo clearly ſeen, as to be almoſt beyond doubt. But, on the other hand, there appears a furious perſecution againſt this noble peer, from thoſe who muſt have been convinced of his innocence. In this perſecution is ſeen the exceſſive weakneſs of James I, who, contrary to his own knowledge, not only ſuffered to be oppreſſed the earl of Briſtol, who had ſerved him moſt faithfully, but was likewiſe induced to tell the parliament, in 1624, two particulars alike remote from the truth. The firſt, that when the Prince and duke of Buckingham came to Madrid, they found the affair wherewith the earl of Briſtol was charged as untouched as if it had never been mentioned before: and yet, he had himſelf ſigned the articles of the treaty, and nothing was wanting but the Pope's diſpenſation to celebrate the marriage, as manifeſtly appears in the earl of Briſtol's anſwer. The ſecond, that affair upon which he conſulted the parliament, viz. whether he ſhould break the treaties with Spain, was yet " Res Integra," tho' theſe treaties had been intirely broken two months before. But King Charles's prejudice againſt the earl of Briſtol is ſo ſurpriſing that, after having peruſed the earl's defenſe, one cannot eaſily believe that a Prince, ſo judicious in other reſpects, could be induced to dictate to his attorney-general an accuſation ſo full of calumnies againſt a noble perſonage whom certainly he could not believe guilty, ſince no man knew more of the affair than himſelf. This is a character which redounds not much to his honor. He would have been more excuſable had he made the whole act and deed to be the duke of Buckingham's, whoſe reputation ought not to have been dearer to him than his own. In a word, we ſee in the earl of Briſtol's defenſe a clear and full explication of what paſſed in Spain, in negociating the two treaties for the marriage, and for reſtitution of the Palatinate, which is the main topic of James I's reign. Alſo this the earl's defenſe undeniably ſhews what all the good writers affirm, that the duke of Buckingham's narrative to the parliament, in 1624, was all falſe: wherefore I thought this narrative of the duke's would not be ill placed after Briſtol's defenſe, that a reader, by comparing one with the other, may be ocularly convinced how unworthily King James, the Prince his ſon, and Buckingham, acted with the parliament, in order to induce them to the adviſing a rupture with Spain, on which advice King Charles ſo ſtrenouſly inſiſted afterwards.

cellor of the exchequer, with the archdutchess of Brussels, ministered unto his Majesty the first occasion of jealousy, and made a kind of discovery of the Spaniards indirect dealing with this state.

"The duke having uttered these few words, "there was read a letter, dated the third of October 1622, from the King to the earl of Bristol, "wherein Bristol was required to let the King of "Spain know, how sensible King James was of "the Emperor's proceeding towards him; and "that he should demand of the King of Spain a "promise, under hand and seal, that Heidelburgh "should be delivered within seventy days after "audience, and the like for Manheim and Frankendale, if they be taken; and if this be denied, to press for leave to march thro' the King "of Spain's territories with an army, for the recovering of his childrens patrimony; and that the "King of Spain should assist us with his forces."

Then the duke desired the houses to take for truth whatever he should say, granted and attested by the Prince's presense; and shewed, that this letter was not put home to the utmost by the earl of Bristol. Hereupon a dispatch was sent away to lord Bristol, expresly commanding him to press his directions more home than yet he had done, and in case he should be denied or delayed by the King of Spain, then to take his leave and come away: this was not so fully exacted by my lord of Bristol.

Porter, who carried these letters, was commanded not to stay above ten days, who, after he had been there, some four or five days, and saw nothing towards a dispatch, went himself to Conde Olivares (having been his creature) and desired him that he would speed his dispatch. Olivares asked him, what he would have? Porter answered; no more than what had been formerly promised; that in case the Emperor should deny restitution of the Palatinate, the King of Spain should assist our King by arms to recover it, or else give way to our forces to march thither thro' his country. Olivares replied, that this was a prepostrous demand; what, to assist with arms against the King's uncle, and the Catholic league! Porter speaking to him of the marriage of our Prince with the Infanta of Spain, he told him, that he understood not a word of it (1).

Porter acquainted Bristol herewith: he said, he would call Olivares to account, if he held this language with him, and would make him understand, that an earl of England was as good a man as a Conde of Spain. But sending for Porter next morning, he changed his resolution, and concluded to carry the business more calmly, and said, the Conde was so reserved, because he was shy and dainty to report those mysteries with that freedom to him, who was not qualified as a public minister. The Conde was angry with Porter for communicating what he said to Bristol. Porter returned with a dispatch fraught with generalities, and, without any one particular or certainty at all, made his relation to the Prince's Highness; who thereupon took his resolution to go in person to Spain, and gave himself these reasons for the enterprise.

He saw his father's negociation plainly deluded; matters of religion gained upon, and extorted (2); his sister's cause more and more desperate; that this was the way to put things off or on; that, in this particular, delay was worse than a plain denial; and that, according to the usual proverb, "A desperate disease must have a desperate re-"medy (3).

Hereupon King James commanded the duke to accompany his Highness in his journey.

ARTICLE II.

Treaty of the marriage severed, and by it self.

When the Prince had arrived at Madrid, the Conde gave him a visit; magnified exeedingly the Prince's journey; amplified the obligations his Highness had put upon that King; and said, that now, without all peradventure, it must be a match, and we must part and divide the whole world betwixt us.

Next day the Conde, taking the duke into his coach, and mr. Porter for his interpreter, falling into discourse of the match, he said to the duke, let us dispatch this match out of hand, and strike it up without the Pope: the duke answered, he liked the manner very well, but desired to understand the means. The means, said the Conde, is very easy; it is but the conversion of the Prince; which we cannot conceive but his Highness intended upon his resolution for this journey.

The duke answered forthwith, that with freedom they came thither, and with freedom they would return again: they were no juglers, neither came they to Spain to make new bargains (4); that the Prince was settled in his religion; his conscience was troubled with no scruples in that kind: if they struck any more upon that string, they would mar all the harmony. Then said the Conde, there is no way but sending to Rome to hasten the dispensation; to which the duke assented. Hereupon the Conde wrote his letter to cardinal Ludovico, the Pope's nephew; which being shewed the duke, seemed to him very heavy; the duke therefore desired to quicken it with this postscript, "That now the "Prince, being arrived, must not be sent back "without a wife; that delay to a suitor is a kind "of refusal; that cloging instructions would "amount to a denial, and new conditions to an "absolute breach." The Conde fell into choler, and said directly it could not be done. This the Prince affirmed to be acted in his presense: but the earl of Bristol made a more benign construction thereof, the duke a right down conclusion, that this people never intended either match or restitution; and so wished his Highness fairly at home again: however the messenger was dispatched to Rome.

Four or five days after, his Highness was placed to see his mistress in her passage thro' the streets, as she made her visits from church to church: but pressing for access, he was delayed, but at last obtained a visit; but a very strange one. He was not suffered to speak to her, but as they had set it down in words and syllables in writing, saying, they were no astrologers, and could not foresee the event of this marriage; and therefore they resolved to admit him as a Prince only, and not as a suitor. But the Conde salved this up with a compliment, That if the dispensation were once returned, he should lie with her even that very night; nay, have her he should upon any terms. If he could not be qualified to injoy her as a wife, yet he should have her as a mistress.

Soon after, riding in a coach, it was urged by the Conde, That the Infanta was of a tender conscience, and if ſhe ſhould come into England, and find the Prince an enemy to her religion, it would quite diſhearten her. His Highneſs conſented to hear her upon this ſubject, becauſe he was as like to convert her, as ſhe was to pervert him. A conference with divines was preſſed upon his Highneſs, which he refuſed, and ſaid, if, after diſputation with them, they ſhould not prevail againſt a young man, they would remain much diſguſted, and ill-affected to the whole negociation; this kind of importunity was ſtill uſed towards the Prince, 'till the return of the diſpenſation.

Six weeks after the Prince's arrival, came the diſpenſation; but his Highneſs underſtood from Rome, by mr. Gage, that the diſpenſation was returned much cloged in matter and manner, eſpecially with the annexed new condition. The King of Spain, before receiving the diſpenſation, was to take an oath to ſee all the articles, whereupon faculty was iſſued, really performed; or elſe to make war, in caſe of any failure, upon the King of England.

His Highneſs ſignified to them his reſolution, that he neither could nor would add or alter any thing of the firſt articles ſent to England.

A Junto of divines are appointed to meet and conſider, whether the King might ſafely take the oath. By this time the Prince had gone thro' all the articles, ſiting in perſon with the commitee; only leaving three undecided, That of the church; that of the nurſe, and that of the childrens education; which his Heighneſs reſerved 'till he ſhould ſpeak with the King. Then ſaid the Conde, Now buſineſs is in a better way than ever it was; a match: and without more ado, ſhe was his wife.

But next day came Gondomar, and ſpake to the Prince of the ſame match, as of a new thing, and told him plainly, That unleſs his Highneſs came to all the conditions of the diſpenſation as they were ſent from Rome, clearly and intirely, nothing would be done; for they had no power to remove or alter a word of falſe Latin. Whereupon his Highneſs was juſtly diſtaſted, and offered to break. Then they preſſed the Prince, that he would be pleaſed to ſtay twenty days, 'till the King of Spain might receive an anſwer from England. The Prince reſolved to ſtay, on condition that ſir Francis Cottington might be diſpatched away within two days, and ſome meſſenger who might overtake him, with the articles which ſhould be ſent after, as ſoon as ever they could be made ready: but the two days of their hammering ſpun out to twenty; at the end whereof they brought them, with new additions.

The articles being at laſt ſent to England, the Junto of divines delivered their opinions, that the Infanta could not be ſent over before ſpring; at which his Highneſs was offended: but the Conde prevailed with him to ſtay 'till their embaſſador ſhould certify, from England, that the articles were aſſented to by King James, and put in execution, and then the lady ſhould go with his Highneſs.

The biſhop of Segovia was pleaſed to ſay to the duke, That he had heard ſomething of the eſtate of our kingdom, and had received it from good hands; that our King could not make a toleration without a rebellion, and he eaſily believed it; becauſe the King of Spain is not able, in his dominions, to effect the like enterpriſe, without incurring the like danger; therefore he concluded, it was unſafe to ſend the lady thither at this time, becauſe we having granted as much in effect as a toleration, it was very probable ſhe ſhould be welcomed with a riſing and rebellion. To which the duke replied, That if the favors which the King his maſter had exhibited to his Catholics, at the mediation of that King, and the advice of that very commitee whereof that biſhop was one, be of ſo dangerous a conſequence, it ſeems their lordſhips, who gave the advice for that article, tho' they pretended religion, intended plain and open rebellion. But you muſt know, ſaid the duke, if his Highneſs had been of my lord biſhop's opinion, That theſe connivances had amounted to a toleration, he had never accepted of theſe articles to have gained any alliance: for what was agreed to, was but a temporary ſuſpenſion of penal laws, but no toleration; for that could not be done but by conſent of parliament. Then Gondomar ſaid, that, for his part, he did not hold it fit to ſend the Infanta thither, before the articles be perfectly put in execution. And Gondomar privately iufuſed to the Prince's Highneſs, being inſenſed againſt the duke, That the duke was in heart (as he ſaid all his kindred were) a Roman Catholic; and he ſaid to a Jeſuit of great account and zeal in thoſe parts, That the duke was a moſt obſtinate, perverſe, and refractory Puritan.

About this time it was reported, that the Prince intended to ſteal away; upon which they laid wait to intercept him. Hereupon the duke was ſent to tell them, That altho' they had ſtolen thither out of love, they would never ſteal thence out of fear.

About this time the Prince ſent a meſſage to his father, That if he ſhould receive any advertiſement, that he was detained by that ſtate as a priſoner, he would be pleaſed, for his ſake, never to think upon him any longer as a ſon, but reflect upon the good of his ſiſter, and the ſafety of his own kingdoms.

ARTICLE III.

Treaty of the match and reſtitution reciprocally ſubordinated.

It is fit to obſerve this paſſage, which is the hinge whereupon all his Highneſs's ſubſequent actions are turned and moved. He had never ſtayed one week longer in Spain; he had never left any proxy with Briſtol; he had never taken any oath at the Eſcurial; or ſo much as ever written a letter of compliment to the lady; but that he had ſtill before his eyes, as his cynoſure *, the promiſe made by the Conde for reſtitution of the Palatinate. * Polar ſtar.

To haſten the delivery of the lady, the duke repreſented to the Conde, how his Maſter was now in years; the Prince his only ſon; and he would ſuffer in honor and reputation to return home without his wife. The Conde conſented hereunto, and deſired the Prince would name a day for his departure.

This news came to the Infanta, who ſeemed to be apprehenſive of the Prince's going away, and prevailed with his Highneſs to return her this compliment, That rather than he would give her Highneſs any diſguſt, he would ſtay ſeven years.

By this time ſir Francis Cottington is arrived with all things perfected by the King, and letters from the embaſſadors of good ſatisfaction, and a command from the King to his Highneſs, to make his return within one month.

Now began the Conde to enter into the treaty for reſtitution of the Palatinate, ſaying, The lady ſhould by no means go to England before that buſineſs was accommodated. And it was projected, that there ſhould be a reſtitution of the land to the Prince Palatine, upon a condition of marriage with the Emperor's daughter, and that he ſhould be bred in the Emperor's court (1). The Prince demamded of the Conde, whether, in caſe the

Emperor

Emperor proved refractory, the King his maſter would aſſiſt him with arms to reduce him to reaſonable terms? The Conde anſwered negatively (1), becauſe they had a maxim of ſtate, that the King of Spain muſt never fight againſt the Emperor; for they would not imploy their forces againſt the houſe of Auſtria.

Hereupon his Highneſs made his proteſtation to the Conde: "Look to it, ſir, for if you hold "your ſelf to that, there is an end of all; for "without this you may not rely upon either mar-"riage or friendſhip."

By this time the Prince is grown cheap and vulgar in the court of Spain, ſo that they will ſcarce beſtow a viſit upon him, and the Conde came very ſeldom to him: and two letters came to the duke's hands, which ſhewed, that all the Conde did was nothing but flaſhes and lightening; notwithſtanding, he ſeemed at this time to be in a good humor, and told the duke, that now certainly it muſt be a match, and the devil could not break it: the duke replied, he thought ſo, and the match had need be very firm and ſtrong, it had been ſeven years in ſodering. The Conde denied it, and ſaid plainly, it had not been really intended ſeven months; and I will fetch out of my deſk what ſhall aſſure you thereof; and ſo produced two letters; the firſt was written with the King of Spain's own hand, dated the fifth of November 1622; and the other from Conde Olivares, of the eighth of November 1622, being an anſwer to that letter (2).

Theſe letters being inſerted in King James I's reign, repeating them here would be ſuperfluous.

ARTICLE IV.

The Prince's return from Spain.

And now the Prince returning for England, being ingaged to leave his proxy, did depoſit the ſame in the hands of the earl of Briſtol, who was to keep it, and uſe it as his procurator; that is, as he ſhould receive his Highneſs's directions from time to time: his order for the preſent was (ſaid the duke) that if the confirmation came from Rome clear and intire (3) (which it did not) then within ſo many days he ſhould deliver it to the King of Spain.

The ſecond direction ſent him, was by a letter which his Highneſs wrote to him between his departure from the Eſcurial and coming to the ſeaſide, to this effect: "That for fear a monaſtery "ſhould rob him of his wife, he ſhould ſtay the "delivery of the powers until the doubts were "cleared; and that his Highneſs would ſend him "in the premiſſes ſome farther directions." Here, becauſe my lord of Briſtol, in his letter of the firſt of November 1623, doth preſs ſo vehemently the Prince's Highneſs concerning this proxy, and the Prince vowed openly before both houſes (4), that he had never by oath or honor ingaged himſelf not to revoke the Powers more than by the clauſe, 'De non revocandâ procuratione,' inſerted in the inſtrument itſelf, and that he conceived the clauſe to be matter of form; and altho' eſſentially of no binding power, yet uſually thruſt into every ſuch inſtrument; and that the Civilians do hold it lawful, by the civil and canon law, for any man to revoke his proxy of marriage, notwithſtanding it hath the clauſe, 'De non revocandâ procuratione' inſerted: therefore as to this point the duke concluded, that the earl of Briſtol, in charging this matter ſo highly on the Prince, had much forgot himſelf (5).

ARTICLE V.

The ſubſequent proceedings of his Majeſty in both treaties, ſince the return of his Highneſs.

The Prince, by the mercy of God, came to Royſton, and made his relation to the King of all had paſſed. His Majeſty was glad, and told him, that he had acted well the part of a ſon; and now the part of a father muſt come upon the ſtage, which was to provide, with all circumſpection, that his only ſon ſhould not be married with a portion of tears to his only daughter. And therefore his Majeſty commanded, by an expreſs diſpatch, the ſtay of the proxy in the earl of Briſtol's hands, 'till he had ſome better aſſurance of reſtitution of the Palatinate.

Then was read his Majeſty's letter to the earl of Briſtol, dated the eighth of October 1623, wherein the earl of Briſtol was required by the King, "ſo "to indeavor, that he might have the joy of both "treaties at Chriſtmaſs;" viz. thoſe about the marriage, and reſtitution of the Palatinate. This the duke would have had looked on as a poſitive order, not to deliver up the procuration 'till reſtitution of the Palatinate was actually promiſed; concerning which matter, ſee the earl of Briſtol's anſwer to the tenth article of his accuſation.

Then the duke proceeded as follows. You would perceive that, by this diſpatch, Briſtol would lay hold on all hints and emergent occaſions, to put off the deſponſories, without this required aſſurance by arms firſt obtained; but the truth is, he did not ſo.

For firſt, the confirmation came from Rome clogged and mangled; and inſtead of challenging thereupon, he labors, with no ſmall ſtrength of wit, to hide and palliate the ſame (6).

2. In the temporal articles the portion was altered, from ſix hundred thouſand pounds in ready caſh, to ſome eighty thouſand pounds in money, and a few jewels, and a penſion of twenty thouſand pounds per annum. Inſtead of quarreling with this main alteration, he ſeems to approve and applaud the payment (7).

3. For the aſſurance of reſtitution of the Palatinate, the main foundation both of match and friendſhip, he is ſo far from providing for it before (which was the method preſcribed by the King) that he leaves it to be mediated by the Infanta after marriage.

Laſtly, inſtead of puting off the contract, as any man in the world (upon the diſpatch from Royſton) would have done, he comes to prefix a preciſe day for the deſponſories.

(1) Either the earl of Briſtol, or the duke of Buckingham, muſt here have deviated from the truth. Rapin.

(2) The earl of Briſtol pretended, theſe letters were written with no other intent but to get the negociation out of his hands, becauſe the court of Spain was in hopes of obtaining better conditions from the duke of Buckingham. Rapin.

(3) It is very doubtful, whether this condition was inſerted in the Prince's declaration. Rapin.

(4) About five months after. Rapin.

(5) See the earl of Briſtol's defenſe, article X. Rapin.

(6) This could not be true. For the diſpenſation arrived not from Rome 'till the begining of December 1623, and the King's abſolute order not to deliver the diſpenſation was dated November 23. Therefore the earl of Briſtol had not time to write to England, to palliate the defects of the diſpenſation, ſuppoſing it to have had any. Rapin.

(7) This muſt be miſrepreſented. For if the earl of Briſtol had been guilty of ſuch prevarication, the King would not have failed to bring it as an article of accuſation againſt him, which alone would have been ſufficient to condemn him. Rapin.

Laſtly,

Now from this raſh fixing a day for the deſponſories in Spain, which was controled again by an expreſs (1), from hence iſſued an unneceſſary diſcourteſy put upon the King, and in a manner upon the Infanta, by the earl of Briſtol. From that proceeded a greater affront put upon the Prince; taking away the title 'La Princeſſa *' from the Infanta; and debaring our embaſſadors from any farther acceſs to her perſon.

* The Princeſs.

"Then was produced the King of Spain's reply to the Engliſh embaſſador's memorial, implying a refuſal to aſſiſt by arms for recovering the Palatinate, in caſe the Emperor conſented not to a reſtitution."

ARTICLE VI.

The ſtating of the queſtion, 'ſuper totam materiam.'

This queſtion the duke ſtated after this manner: Whether this, being the full effect and product of all the negociation, which I have opened unto you, be ſufficient 'ſuper totam materiam,' for his Majeſty to rely upon with any ſafety; as well for the marriage of his only ſon, as for the relief of his only daughter? Or that, theſe treaties ſet aſide, his Majeſty was beſt to truſt to his own ſtrength, and to ſtand upon his own feet? So the duke ended with this concluſion, that if the bringing us from darkneſs to light did deſerve any thanks, we owe it, and muſt wholly aſcribe it to the Prince's Highneſs.

I deem it needleſs to make upon this narrative reflections which may occur to every reader, after having ſeen the earl of Briſtol's defenſe. I ſhall therefore content myſelf with obſerving, how little proper this narrative was to afford ſufficient information to the two houſes of parliament, to inable them, upon good grounds, to form their reſolutions concerning the queſtion propoſed to them by his Majeſty. Nevertheleſs, upon this alone it was that they reſolved to adviſe the King to break with Spain, and this precipitate advice was the main cauſe of all thoſe differences which aroſe afterwards between Charles I, and his parliament.

(1) It was the Prince himſelf, and the duke, who had agreed with the King of Spain, on the day the marriage ſhould be ſolemniſed, viz. ten days after the diſpenſation was come, which the earl of Briſtol altered not. Rapin.

Conſiderations on the Writers of King CHARLES I's Hiſtory.

THE civil war between Charles I, and the parliament, gave birth to two parties, who contended for victory 'till Naſeby fight. By this battle, the parliament acquired a ſuperiority, which inabled them to hold the King's party, ſtiled Cavaliers, in a ſubjection not far ſhort of ſlavery, from which they were not delivered 'till 1660, by Charles II's reſtoration. After the reſtoration, the royaliſts in their turn became ſo ſuperior, that the adverſe faction durſt no longer ſhew their teeth. This continued to the end of James II's reign, during the ſpace of twenty-ſeven or twenty-eight years. One or other of theſe two intervals produced moſt of the works, wherein the authors undertake to give exact accounts of the troubles of England in the reign of Charles I, with the grounds and cauſes thereof. From the war's concluſion, to the reſtoration of Charles II, the parliament's partiſans had free ſcope to write and publiſh whatever they pleaſed, while the King's friends durſt not own their performances. In this interval were publiſhed numberleſs polemical writings, with ſuch animoſity, ſo many reproaches and invectives, that it is not eaſy for one who is in ſearch for truth to diſcern, in all theſe writings, the proofs which may have ſome ſolidity, and ſeparate them from the preſumptions, falſe conſequences, artful ſuppoſitions and invectives wherewith they abound.

One of the moſt conſiderable writings of thoſe days was Eikon Baſiliké, or the King's portraiture, publiſhed in 1649. King Charles I's being himſelf the author can ſcarcely be doubted (1). He undertakes in this work to vindicate himſelf upon all the articles laid to his charge. It is properly an abſtract of the reaſons he had before publiſhed in ſeveral papers, printed by his order, or addreſſed to both houſes of parliament. I have not quoted this book in the hiſtory of his reign, becauſe it contains nothing, with regard to facts or proofs, but what is more fully expreſſed in that Prince's meſſages, anſwers and declarations. To this book was publiſhed a reply, pretending to ſhew, the King had not uſed ſincerity; and very ſoon after appeared an anſwer to this reply. This treatiſe has been highly eſteemed, becauſe it contains all the principal arguments in King Charles's favor. It may be eaſily preſumed, the King forgot nothing material, ſince no man could know his affairs better than himſelf. Accordingly, this book has ſerved for foundation to whatever has ſince come forth in his behalf.

Another very conſiderable work, publiſhed ſoon after Oliver Cromwel's death, and dedicated to his ſon Richard, while Protector, was Ruſhworth's Collections †. This work may very juſtly be conſidered as a continuation of Rymer's Fœdera, of which I have made great uſe in this hiſtory. It is a collection of whatever paſſed, with reſpect to public affairs, from the year 1618, to the death of Charles I, not by way of narration, but affording materials to compoſe a regular hiſtory. It contains all the tranſactions at court and in the parliament; the King's proclamations upon ſundry matters; his ſpeeches to both houſes, and thoſe which † Eight volumes, Folio.

(1) This is generally allowed to be a yet undecided quere: for whoever reads what doctor Walter and mr. Toland (in his Amyntor) have publiſhed on this ſubject, muſt be inclined to believe, that King Charles could not poſſibly be its author. Nay, ſome are of opinion, it is almoſt demonſtrable, that biſhop Gauden wrote that treatiſe. See on one ſide, doctor Walter and mr. Toland; and alſo Ludlow, and Burnet's Hiſtory of his own Times, and on the other ſide, doctor Hollingworth, mr. Wagſtaffe, &c.

were made by his order; the addreſſes or petitions preſented to his Majeſty by the parliament; his anſwers; the petitions preſented to both houſes; the ſpeeches in the houſe of commons, as well as in the courts of juſtice; the votes or reſolves of the two houſes, and their conferences upon diverſe ſubjects; the King's meſſages to the parliament, with the anſwers; the impeachments of the commons brought before the lords againſt ſeveral illuſtrious perſons; the anſwers of the parties accuſed; the ſentences; the petitions of the commons and both houſes to his Majeſty, concerning religion, tonage and poundage, the affairs of the militia, breaches of privilege, the affair of Hull; the King's anſwers and his ſeveral meſſages upon theſe affairs; his Majeſty's and the parliament's manifeſtoes; all the events of the war, accounts of the ſkirmiſhes, ſieges and battles; the negociations for peace; a great number of papers, which give a perfect inſight into the differences between the King and his Scotiſh ſubjects, and of thoſe between the army and parliament, with the negociations between the King and both houſes, after his Majeſty's impriſonment; the violence exerciſed by the army upon the parliament; the King's condemnation and death. Theſe materials are the more valuable, as the author draws no conſequence from what he relates, and very ſeldom indeavors to prejudice his reader by reaſonings; ſo that every one is free to make what uſe of them he thinks fit, according to his own principles. I ſhall hereafter ſpeak ſomewhat more fully of theſe collections.

From Charles II's reſtoration, to the end of his reign, two other works were publiſhed on the ſame ſubject, I mean on the reign of Charles I, and a third was compoſed at the ſame time, tho' publiſhed later.

The firſt is, The Annals of King James and King Charles I. It is ſaid to be compoſed by dr. Franklin, who has not thought fit to ſet his name to it. He begins his annals at the year 1612, and continues them thro' the reſt of the reign of James I; and from the death of that Prince to the year 1642, during the firſt eighteen years of Charles I's reign.

The ſecond, publiſhed in 1682, was compoſed by John Nalſon, doctor in law. It is intitled, An impartial Collection of the great affairs of State, from the begining of the Scotiſh Rebellion to the Murder of King Charles I. This collection begins only at the year 1639, and tho' probably the author intended to continue it to King Charles's death, as appears by the title, he left it imperfect, and brought it no lower than January 1641-2, in two Folio volumes.

The third is, The Hiſtory of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England; written by the earl of Clarendon. This hiſtory was compiled before Nalſon's, tho' it appeared not 'till Queen Ann's reign. It begins properly with the parliament of November 3, 1640, the whole firſt book being a ſort of introduction, where the author gives a general account of what paſſed from the laſt years of James I, to that parliament. This hiſtory reaches to the reſtoration of Charles II, 1660.

Theſe three laſt works were compoſed in the reign of Charles II, at a time when that Prince had carried the royal authority much higher than the King his father had ever done; at a time when thoſe who had been adherents of the long parliament, or were in the ſame principles, were rigorouſly perſecuted, and when it was more dangerous to be a Preſbyterian than an Atheiſt.

I ſhall not ſpeak here of many leſs conſiderable writings, moſt of which aſcribe to the Sovereign a power unlimited, and conſequently repreſent the parliament's laſt war againſt Charles I, as the blackeſt and moſt glaring rebellion.

Whoever deſigns to write the hiſtory of Charles I's reign, muſt take his materials from ſome one of the works I have mentioned, or from all. For this reaſon I think myſelf obliged to ſpeak thereof ſomewhat more amply, to the end it may not be thought ſtrange that I have not adopted, without examination, whatever they contain. Was there among the Engliſh one intelligent, neutral hiſtorian, he ſhould be taken for guide; but I know not any. He therefore who, in theſe days, undertakes to write the hiſtory of Charles I, muſt indeavor to diſcover the truth in even the moſt partial writers, and be extremely careful to avoid the continual ſnares they lay for their readers, to favor the cauſe they maintain. One muſt know what was their deſign in writing, what ſyſtem they followed, and the artifices they uſed to ingage in their principles ſuch as make but few reflections in reading a hiſtory, and are apt to be eaſily drawn into the prejudices of the hiſtorian. I ſhall begin with the earlieſt, viz. Ruſhworth.

There is no hiſtorian who can appear at firſt ſight more impartial than ſuch as contents himſelf with furniſhing materials for a hiſtory, without drawing any conſequences himſelf, and without reaſoning upon the papers he exhibits, either for or againſt what they contain. It is however certain, that even in this he may ſhew very great partiality: as for inſtance, in giving forged papers; in curtailing or altering thoſe which are genuine; in giving ſuch only as may be advantageous to the party he would favor. Ruſhworth, who was moſt certainly a friend to the parliament, clerk-aſſiſtant to the houſe of commons, and ſecretary to general Fairfax, is by the contrary party, charged with four inſincerities. It is pretended, 1. That he has given falſe papers. 2. That he has curtailed others, under color of abridging them. 3. That he has affected to give all thoſe which are favorable to the parliament, and to omit ſeveral which might ſerve to manifeſt the King's innocence. 4. Laſtly, that not declaring whence he received his materials, we have only his authority for what he relates. This is a general accuſation, which, was it well proved upon any important and deciſive facts, is ſufficient to ſhake the credit of the collector. The reader will judge whether this charge is made good with regard to the particular caſes on which he is accuſed, and whether theſe caſes are of ſuch a nature, that they ought to determine the diſintereſted to neglect the generality of his collections. I ſhall take theſe particular accuſations from Nalſon's Introduction, wherein his chief aim was to diſcredit Ruſhworth, and perſuade his readers, that they ought not to believe any thing he advances. Very ſeemingly, Nalſon has forgot nothing upon this ſubject. I ſhall begin with the forged papers he accuſes Ruſhworth of inſerting in his collections.

The firſt paper forged by Ruſhworth, according to Nalſon, is a ſpeech of King James to his parliament, the thirtieth of January 1620. Inſtead of giving this ſpeech intire, Ruſhworth inſerts only an abſtract: and therefore Nalſon takes care to print the true ſpeech, and Ruſhworth's abſtract in ſeparate columns, that they may be compared more readily. He adds, that the whole ſpeech was communicated by William Sancroft archbiſhop of Canterbury. On comparing Ruſhworth's abſtract with the intire ſpeech, there appears but one material paſſage which could give occaſion to charge Ruſhworth with inſincerity; and that is where it is ſaid in the ſpeech, "A parliament is an aſſembly com-" poſed of a head and a body, the Monarch is the " head, and the three eſtates the body." Whereas it is ſaid in the ſaid abſtract, " the parliament " is a thing compoſed of a head and a body, the " Monarch and the two eſtates." This induces Nalſon to exclaim againſt Ruſhworth, for reducing by his own authority the three eſtates, viz. the lords ſpiritual, the lords temporal, and the commons, to two eſtates, meaning thereby, that the houſe of peers made but one eſtate.

This queſtion was debated with great warmth, when the excluſion of prelates from the upper-houſe was in agitation. For if the biſhops were one of the three eſtates of parliament, it was evident, they could not be excluded without altering the conſtitution. But this opinion was not generally received. The commons pretended, that the biſhops with the peers made but one eſtate. Wherefore Nalſon pretends that Ruſhworth, to countenance the commons opinion, and juſtify the excluſion of prelates, makes King James ſay what he did not. To prove this, beſide the whole ſpeech, communicated by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, he alleges ſeveral things to ſhew there have always been three eſtates acknowledged in the parliament beſide the King. He anſwers the objection drawn from King Charles I's confeſſion, after the excluſion of biſhops, that himſelf was one of the three eſtates of parliament, and concludes that his father King James could not ſpeak in his ſpeech of two, but of three eſtates.

A ſecond inſtance of Ruſhworth's unfaithfulneſs is, that he gives only the abſtract of a letter to his Majeſty from an unknown hand, tending to ſhew, that the parliament, in attacking the duke of Buckingham, ſtruck at the King himſelf. This charge conſiſts wholly in the ſuppoſition that Ruſhworth abridged this letter to prevent his readers perceiving its whole force.

The third inſtance of Ruſhworth's inſincerity is, that he has publiſhed in his appendix a ſcurrilous paper, intitled, A Propoſition for his Majeſty's ſervice to bridle the impertinence of Parliaments. Indeed Ruſhworth ſays, this paper was queſtioned in the ſtar-chamber. But Nalſon pretends, this is not ſufficient to excuſe Ruſhworth, who (ſays he) ought to have ſhewn upon what grounds it was queſtioned, which he himſelf does very diffuſely.

A fourth inſtance of Ruſhworth's unfaithfulneſs, is, that he inſerts in his collections a pretended letter of archbiſhop Abbot to James I, to diſſuade him from granting a toleration to the Papiſts, when he was on the point of concluding the Prince his ſon's marriage with the Spaniſh Infanta. Nalſon hereupon ſays, that the archbiſhop being then out of favor, and having nothing to do with the management of counſels, could have no other foundation but either his own conjecture, or the common rumor, both equally liable to deceive and to be deceived. He does not however poſitively ſay the letter is forged, but contents himſelf with inſinuating it, becauſe Ruſhworth not having declared how he came by the letter, the credit of it reſts ſolely on his fidelity.

But the fifth and moſt crying piece of prevarication in Ruſhworth, according to Nalſon, are the private articles of Prince Charles's marriage with the Infanta of Spain. He pretends they are all forged, purpoſely to blacken the King and Prince, by intimating that their deſign was to reſtore Popery in England, and alleges ſeveral arguments to prove the forgery.

1. It is not probable the King and Prince ſhould promiſe what they knew was not in their power to perform, conſidering the ſtrength and conſtitution of the Engliſh laws againſt Popery, and that the Engliſh nation would never have ſuffered it.——This is not one of the moſt convincing arguments.

2. The parliament never taxed King Charles with theſe private articles, not even in the declaration where they collected whatever reaſons might juſtify their reſolution of not preſenting any more addreſſes to his Majeſty.——This is a much ſtronger argument than the former.

3. In the memoirs of Deageant it is ſaid, the King of France hearing of King James's death, ſaid to the archbiſhop of Ambrun, 'All our hopes 'of England are loſt.' Which ſhews, that Charles had no intention to reſtore the Catholic religion.—— One would think Nalſon ſhould not have alleged this reaſon, which in clearing this Prince, caſts a great blemiſh on James I.

4. He ſays, Ruſhworth, by inſinuating that King Charles deſigned to reſtore the Romiſh creed, contradicts himſelf, ſince he tells us in another place, that the Prince, being in Spain, remained ſtedfaſt in his religion, what indeavors ſoever were uſed to ſeduce him.

5. Ruſhworth produces no other authority for the truth of theſe private articles, but his own, and, in all appearance, the French Mercury is his author.

The ſixth inſtance of unfaithfulneſs Nalſon lays to Ruſhworth's charge is, the Pope's letter to Prince Charles when in Spain, and that Prince's anſwer. 1. Becauſe it was a thing of mere ceremony. 2. In his circumſtances it was no more than what common prudence and policy obliged him to, in order to get out of the King of Spain's hands.——This excuſe ſhews Nalſon was not thoroughly convinced of the forgery of theſe letters. He however inſinuates, that they might be counterfeit, by reaſon Ruſhworth produces only his own authority. It is true, he ſays the copies of theſe letters were preſerved by ſome who were then at Madrid, but names not any. This made Nalſon believe Ruſhworth took thoſe letters from the French Mercury.

I come now to the charge againſt Ruſhworth, of inſerting in his collections only what was advantageous to the parliament, omiting whatever was favorable to the King. Nalſon gives three inſtances, in three particular caſes.

1. That, in the affair of impriſoning the members of parliament, ſeveral of the judges gave their opinions, to ſhew that the King's conduct was not illegal. Nalſon ſays, Ruſhworth is contented to mention the ſpeeches of two judges, viz. Whitelock's and Doderige's, which were in the King's favor, and to ſay that Hide and Jones delivered their opinions to the ſame purpoſe. This charge therefore conſiſts in that Ruſhworth, after giving the ſpeeches of two judges, thought not proper to inſert thoſe of the reſt who were for the King upon the ſame principles. But Nalſon pretends, he ſhould likewiſe have given Hide's and Jones's ſpeeches, and does it himſelf. Indeed Ruſhworth may be guilty of ſome partiality in omiting the two latter, if it be true that they are ſtronger, and better ſupported than the others, of which I cannot judge.

2. That Ruſhworth, ſpeaking of ſerjeant Aſhley's ſpeech in the houſe of lords, ſays, he advanced the following propoſition, for which he was taken into cuſtody, and afterwards recanted: "That the "lords muſt allow the King to govern by acts of "ſtate, otherwiſe he is a King without a council, "or a council without power." Nalſon makes it a crime in Ruſhworth, not to have given Aſhley's whole diſcourſe, which would have ſhewn that the ſerjeant's fault was rather ſteming the popular tide, than any other offenſe; i. e. according to Nalſon, Aſhley very juſtly maintained this maxim, that the King muſt be allowed to govern by acts of ſtate.--- Such a charge can do Ruſhwood no great prejudice.

3. The laſt caſe relates to the famous ſir Edward Coke, who, when judge, aſſerted, that if the privy council commit a man, he is not bailable by any court of juſtice, but afterwards, being turned out of his his office, and choſen member of parliament, he maintained the contrary opinion. Nalſon accuſes Ruſhworth of concealing this change in Coke, by caſtrating and abridging his ſpeeches, leſt his readers ſhould perceive that Coke, who was odious to the court, acted thro' revenge, in maintaining a ſentiment contrary to his aſſertion when judge.

This is all Ruſhworth has been charged with. But I queſtion whether the equitable and diſintereſted will be convinced, that theſe particular accuſations ought to make him forfeit all his credit. His work is in eight Folio volumes, and contains ſo great a number of facts, votes, public ſpeeches and papers of all kinds, that it would be a ſort of miracle to meet with nothing to cenſure. Nevertheleſs, all poſſible indeavors have been uſed to diſcredit him, by general charges of partiality, unfaithfulneſs, and inſincerity. And it was this which induced me to ſay what I have ſaid, in order to ſhew what theſe general accuſations amounted to, when reduced to particular caſes.

However, it is very certain, that Ruſhworth's aim and deſign, in publiſhing his collections, was to diſparage the King's conduct, and favor the parliament's cauſe. But Ruſhworth's intention ſignifies nothing to the knowing, whether a man may ſafely make uſe of his collections. The only queſtion is, whether his papers are true or falſe. If they are true, however injurious they be to the King's cauſe, whoever will write an impartial hiſtory of this reign is not obliged to reject them for that reaſon. This is ſo true, that even the writers moſt devoted to Charles I, have been forced to make uſe of theſe papers (1), and take them for granted, ſince otherwiſe it would be impoſſible to compoſe the hiſtory of this reign, which conſiſts ſolely of the materials furniſhed by Ruſhworth. Had he begun his collections no higher than with the affairs of the parliament, of November 3, 1640, the King's partiſans would doubtleſs have readily forgiven him. But the papers of the twenty foregoing years are too hard of digeſtion, becauſe they ill agree with the hypotheſis of the royal party, of which I ſhall ſpeak preſently, and too clearly diſcover Charles I's aim was to introduce arbitrary power, and conſequently the long parliament had cogent reaſons to prevent the intire execution of ſuch a deſign.

I ſee not therefore any reaſon for rejecting the papers inſerted by Ruſhworth in his collections, eſpecially as both parties have equally made uſe of them, tho' in a very different manner. Some produce them in favor of the parliament, and others to ſupport the King's cauſe: but even in this, both have acknowledged them to be not only uſeful, but abſolutely neceſſary. If there are any paſſages combated as ungenuine, they are very few; and it is ſtrange that, after ſo many exclamations againſt Ruſhworth's concealments and omiſſions, there appear in the writings of King Charles's favorers ſo few material papers, which are not in his collections.

I proceed now to thoſe who wrote in vindication of King Charles's cauſe, as Franklin, Nalſon, and the earl of Clarendon, omiting other writers of leſs note, to avoid prolixity.

Theſe, in compiling this reign, have formed two ſyſtems, directly contrary to thoſe of the parliament's friends, tho' they have made uſe of Ruſhworth's materials. As theſe books were compoſed at a time when the regal authority was higher than ever, they have not ſcrupled to build upon the ſuppoſition of the King's having abſolute power. Tho' they uſe not the word, there is ſcarce a page in their writings where this principle is not maintained or ſuppoſed. Hence it follows that, on the parliament's ſide, the civil war was a manifeſt rebellion. So, the parliament's proceedings, which ſome repreſent as abſolutely neceſſary for the conſtitution's preſervation, are accounted by others as rebellions and treaſons, and tending to the ſtate's utter ſubverſion, without any neceſſity of diſcovering the facts.

The royaliſts ſecond ſyſtem is no leſs contrary to that of thoſe who ſtickled for the parliament. Theſe latter pretend, that the parliament being ſufficiently convinced, by undeniable proofs, of the King's deſign to eſtabliſh arbitrary power, and alter the conſtitution, thought themſelves obliged to exert their utmoſt efforts to prevent the execution of that project. This was their ſyſtem. The King's adherents form another intirely different. They call the King's pretended efforts to eſtabliſh deſpotiſm a chimera, affirming what was ſtiled arbitrary power, was preciſely what England's laws alloted the Sovereign. Indeed this was the principle of James I, Charles I, Charles II, and James II. Conſequently, they pretended that, to hinder the King from exerciſing ſuch a power, was oppoſing the national laws. But, as it evidently appeared, in the reign of Charles I, that the parliament and people were not of this ſentiment, it was neceſſary to give ſome plauſible reaſons of the troubles cauſed by this diſpute in that reign. To this end, they have eſtabliſhed a ſyſtem which, with the principle of the King's abſolute power, is the baſis and foundation of whatever they have compiled: and that is, the oppoſition King Charles met with, proceeded not from the peoples belief that the King had exceeded the bounds of his power, but from a project long ſince formed, to alter the church's conſtitution: that the Preſbyterians, authors of this project, conſcious of his Majeſty's ſtedfaſtneſs in that reſpect, judged there was no other way to execute it, than by ruining the King and depriving him of his prerogatives: that, to arrive at this point, they inſtiled into the reſt of the parliament and nation groundleſs ſuſpicions and jealouſies, which they took care to cheriſh by all imaginable means, 'till they came at length to an abſolute rupture, and to a war which proved ſo fatal to King Charles, and gave them opportunity to eſtabliſh Preſbytery on the church of England's ruins.

The fault in theſe two ſyſtems is, that neither contains the whole truth. The parliament's ſyſtem aſcribes all the proceedings of both houſes ſolely to the deſign of redreſſing paſſed grievances, and preventing arbitrary government. It is however certain, that ſeveral members of both houſes did to that deſign, join the intention of altering church-government, which could not be effected but by the King's deſtruction. The royaliſts ſyſtem has the ſame fault; they impute to the parliament only a ſingle view, viz. to alter church diſcipline, and, counting as nothing the deſign to prevent the eſtabliſhing abſolute power, they pretend it was only a contrivance, or excuſe, to arrive with more eaſe to the principal end, which was to eſtabliſh Preſbyterian government.

After having thus ſhewn theſe two different ſyſtems, I think it needleſs to explain particularly, in what manner Franklin, Nalſon and the earl of Clarendon apply theirs to the facts agreed on by all. I ſhall content myſelf with obſerving, that they miſs no occaſion to combat the principles of the parliament, or to impute to them motives intirely different from thoſe they pretended to act by. Herein their aim was to hinder their readers from being prepoſſeſſed with a belief, that the parliament intended the good of their country, or had any other views than thoſe they aſcribe to them.

By what has been advanced, it is eaſy to perceive,

(1) As particularly Nalſon himſelf, and Franklin; the bulk of whoſe collections is extracted from Ruſhworth.

how

how the writers of Charles I's reign may be different, nay contrary, according as the authors have closely followed one or other of these two systems: and this is what has actually happened. The histories of the two parties, tho' founded on same the facts, are so opposite to each other, that a reader who is not very attentive, or wants leisure to examine what is proposed to him, knows not where he is, when he sees this disagreement.

As to my self, who am not ingaged in either of the parties, and aim only at truth, I cannot think I am obliged blindly to follow one or other of the two systems; but have established a third, composed of both, by supplying their defects. I leave the reader to judge, whether it be sufficiently coherent, to give him a distinct knowledge of the affairs of this reign. If I sometimes seem to incline to one side, it is because I have no reason to swerve from the truth, and am persuaded that both King and parliament were greatly in the wrong, tho' not always, nor on the same occasions.

This has induced me to cite, throughout the history of this reign, scarce any author but Rushworth, tho' no reign has more writers. My reason was, because Rushworth has formed no system, but contented himself with furnishing materials common to both parties, and of which both have made great use. But tho' I have carefully perused and collected the works of Franklin, Nalson, and the earl of Clarendon, I judged not proper to quote them, because they scarce let fact or paper pass without applying it to their system, which is not always agreeable to mine. It would therefore strangely imbaras a reader, to cite, in proof of what I advance facts or papers are always followed with reasonings, often directly contrary to my system. I thought proper to say thus much in justification of the manner wherein I have compiled the history of this reign.

Containing the second Part of King CHARLES I's Reign.

CHARLES I An' 1640.

Nov. 3. State of King Charles's affairs.

AT this parliament's assembling, King Charles's affairs were in a very indifferent situation. Instead of crushing the Scots, as he flattered himself, he had the mortification to behold them enter England, force a passage over the Tine; defeat a considerable body of his army, and render themselves masters of Newcastle. Moreover, he saw his own followers not greatly disposed to serve him. They mostly consisted of soldiers unvoluntarily listed, in the several counties, and prejudiced, like most others, against the government. Beside, the Scots prowess being exagerated by such as they had routed, and by the King's private enemies, inspired the English troops with somewhat of a panic. He also wanted money to pay them. His whole resourse was the two hundred thousand pounds borrowed of the Londoners, 'till it should please the parliament to furnish him with the necessary supplies: but he could scarcely expect to find much complaisance from this parliament. It was universally believed, he had called it against his inclination, and because he could find no other method of extricating himself from his present imbaras. What had passed in the four parliaments held since the begining of his reign; the dissolutions of these parliaments with heat and animosity; the imprisonment of their members; the discontinuance of parliaments for twelve years; the taxes imposed by his Majesty's sole authority during that long interval; the monopolies upon all sorts of commodities; the decay of trade; the open protection Charles granted to the Papists and Arminians; the severities exercised upon the Presbyterians; the innovations in religion; the almost universal suspicion of a design to introduce Popery; the excessive authority usurped by the council and star-chamber; the corruption of the judges; in a word, the principles of arbitrary power asserted by the court, bred a general discontent. Of all this Charles was not ignorant and had 'till now disregarded it. But he began to dread the consequences, when he saw himself on the point of being exposed to the ill humor of a new parliament, who in all appearance would not let slip the opportunity of laboring that redress of grievances which the former parliaments had in vain demanded. Nevertheless, he was so prejudiced and insensed against the Scots, that he still hoped the new parliament would regard their entering England as a formal invasion, as a war made, not upon the King, but the kingdom, and would furnish means to drive them into their country, and chastise their presumption. But it was not long before he perceived his hopes were ill-grounded. CHARLES I An' 1640.

The parliament meets. Clarendon, p. 135. Id. p. 137.

The parliament met the third of November, answerably to the royal writs. There had never been a more numerous assembly, very few members being absent. Every one looked on this as the fairest opportunity could possibly offer to cure the national distempers; and all the members, except such as were intirely devoted to the King, were ready to contribute towards restoring the government to its true and ancient constitution. Accordingly, this was what the people expected. On the first day, his his Majeſty delivered the following ſpeech to both houſes.

Charles's ſpeech at opening the parliament. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1335. IV. p. 11. Nalſon, p. 481. Annals. p. 879.

My lords,

"THE knowledge I had of the deſires of my Scotiſh ſubjects, was the cauſe of my calling the laſt aſſembly of parliament: wherein, had I been believed, I ſincerely think that things had not fallen out as now we ſee: but it is no wonder, that men are ſo ſlow to believe ſo great a ſedition ſhould be raiſed on ſo little ground. But now, my lords and gentlemen, the honor and ſafety of this kingdom lying ſo near at ſtake, I am reſolved to put my ſelf freely and clearly on the love and affection of my Engliſh ſubjects, as theſe of my lords, who did wait on me at York, very well remember I there declared.

"Therefore, my lords, I ſhall not mention my own intereſt, or that ſupport I might juſtly expect from you, 'till the common ſafety be ſecured; tho' I muſt tell you, I am not aſhamed to ſay, thoſe charges I have been at have been merely for the ſecurity and good of this kingdom; tho' the ſucceſs hath not been anſwerable to my deſires: therefore I ſhall only deſire you to conſider the beſt way both for the ſafety and ſecurity of this kingdom; wherein there are two parts chiefly conſiderable. Firſt, the chaſing out of rebels (1). And ſecondly, that other, in ſatisfying your juſt grievances, wherein I promiſe you to concur ſo heartily and clearly with you, that all the world may ſee my intentions have ever been and ſhall be to make this a glorious and flouriſhing kingdom. There are only two things which I ſhall mention to you: the one is to tell you, that the loan of money which I lately had from the city of London, wherein the lords who waited on me at York aſſiſted me, will only maintain my army for two months, from the begining of that time it was granted. Now, my lords and gentlemen, I leave it to your conſiderations, what diſhonor and miſchief it might be, in caſe, for want of money, my army be diſbanded before the rebels be put out of this kingdom. Secondly, the ſecuring againſt thoſe calamities the northern people indure at this time, and ſo long as the treaty is on foot: and in this, I ſay, not only they, but all this kingdom will ſuffer the harm: therefore I leave this alſo to your conſideration, for the ordering of thoſe great affairs, whereof you are to treat at this time. I am ſo confident of your love to me, and that your care is for the honor and ſafety of the kingdom, that I ſhall freely and willingly leave to you where to begin. Only this, that you may better know the ſtate of all the affairs, I have commanded my lord-keeper to give you a ſhort and free account of thoſe things which have happened in this interim, with this proteſtation, that if this account be not ſatisfactory as it ought to be, I ſhall, whenſoever you deſire, give you a full and perfect account of every particular. One thing more I deſire of you, as one of the greateſt means to make this a happy parliament, that you on your parts, as I on mine, lay aſide all ſuſpicion one of another; for, as I promiſed my lords at York, it ſhall not be my fault, if this be not a happy and good parliament."

When his Majeſty had done ſpeaking, the lord-keeper Finch made his ſpeech. He began with encomiums on the King and Queen, and then indeavored to perſuade the two houſes, that calling this parliament was wholly owing to his Majeſty, who had reſolved it, before he received any petition on that ſubject (2). After that, he ſtrove to ſhew, tho' in a very general manner, that the Scots had violated the late treaty, and the King, againſt his will, taken arms by the unanimous advice of his council, to reduce them to obedience. He concluded with informing both houſes of what had paſſed, as well in the begining of the war, as in the conferences at Rippon.

CHARLES I AN' 1640.

The lord-keeper's ſpeech in parliament. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 12. Nalſon, p. 482.

The commons, being returned to their houſe, choſe for ſpeaker William Lenthall, a bencher of Lincolns-Inn, who was propoſed by ſir Henry Vane ſecretary of ſtate (3). This choice being approved by the King, they appointed, according to cuſtom, a commitee to examine all queſtions which might ariſe about elections, returns, or other privileges of the houſe. Then it was reſolved, that a commitee of the whole houſe ſhould meet on certain days of the week, on theſe five principal accounts, viz. religion, grievances, courts of juſtice, trade, and Ireland. Theſe were the articles which chiefly occaſioned the nation's complaints and murmurs, and the commons thereby evidently diſcovered their intentions.

As, from the third of November 1640, to the twenty fifth of Auguſt 1642, the hiſtory of this reign wholly conſiſts of parliamentary tranſactions, I judge it previouſly neceſſary to give a deſcription of this parliament, and of the different parties into which it was divided. It will afterwards be eaſier to perceive the motives of its acts and reſolves, and withal, the true grounds of the civil war which haraſſed England.

Firſt, it is certain there was ſcarcely a member of either houſe not diſpoſed to procure the redreſs of thoſe ſo long complained of grievances. Theſe grievances were ſo manifeſt, that it was in a manner impoſſible, without ſubverting the government's very conſtitution, to deviſe plauſible reaſons to juſtify the King's and his miniſters conduct, during the fifteen preceding years. They were of ſuch a nature, that no perſon was therefrom exempt, not even thoſe who ſerved for inſtruments to impoſe them on the people, tho' they were in great meaſure indemnified ſome other way. In ſhort, they were of ſuch conſequence, that admiting the principles whereon they were founded, the inevitable reſult was a total ſubverſion of the conſtitution, and a deſpotiſm unknown to the Engliſh for many ages. It may therefore be affirmed that, from the very opening of this parliament, the general ſentiment of both houſes was, that the preſent opportunity of applying proper remedies to the nation's evils ſhould not be neglected.

Diſpoſition of the parliament with reſpect to grievances. Clarendon, p. 137. Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1336, &c.

But the members were divided on a principal point, which however flowed from the general diſpoſition. Some were of opinion that, when all the grievances were redreſſed, the government ſhould be reſtored to its natural ſtate, ſuch as it was before the reigns of James and Charles, without any additions or alterations. Others, on the contrary, judged that, after the redreſs of grievances, it would be neceſſary to uſe ſome effectual method, to put it out of a King's power ever to invade the peoples liberties and privileges of parliament: but theſe

(2) And yet lord Clarendon aſcribes calling this parliament to the advice of the great council of peers at York. Rapin.

(3) Lord Clarendon (Vol. I. p. 135.) ſays, the King deſigned ſir Thomas Gardiner, recorder of London, to be ſpeaker. But he could not get himſelf elected for London, nor any other burrough. And no wonder, if it be true as Whitelock ſays, that ſuch a ſpirit of oppoſition to the court proceedings was in the hearts and actions of moſt people, that very few of that party had the favor to be choſen members of this parliament. See p. 37.

Charles I An' 1640.

ſedulouſly concealed their intentions, leſt they ſhould give the others occaſion to ſuſpect a deſign of altering the eſtabliſhed government, and cauſe them to oppoſe even what was moſt reaſonable, thro' fear of the conſequences. They hoped to find, or ſtart in time, opportunities enough to inſpire the whole nation with a diſtruſt of the King, and by that means attain their ends.

Such being this parliament's general diſpoſition, it is evident the Scots entering England was to be deemed a very conſiderable advantage, granted the Engliſh by Providence, to prevent their King's breaking the meaſures which might be taken againſt him. Charles was abſolutely neceſſitated to maintain an army for his defenſe againſt the Scots, without having for that purpoſe other means than the parliament's aſſiſtance: for the times being changed, the impoſing arbitrary taxes could not be practiſed any longer, whereon when the war commenced he had ſeemingly depended, ſince, in a month after taking the field, he was deſtitute of money to pay his troops. So, it was the parliament's intereſt to keep King Charles thus neceſſitous, that he might not be able to oppoſe the two houſes reſolves. It is not therefore to be thought ſtrange, that the parliament gave not much attention to what this Prince moſt wiſhed, i. e. to be inabled to drive the Scots from England, ſince, on the contrary, the Scots gave the two houſes a ſuperiority they were unwilling to forgo.

With reſpect to religion.

This parliament's ſentiments were likewiſe very various touching religion. There were in the houſes rigid epiſcopalians, who believed biſhops eſſential to religion, and that without them there was no lawful ordination, nor conſequently any valid adminiſtration of the ſacraments. Of this number were the biſhops, with almoſt all the King's party. There were moderate epiſcopalians, who, being ſincerely attached to the church of England, had however different ideas of epiſcopacy. They had a veneration for epiſcopal government, as being very ancient in the church, and what they moſt liked: but, tho' they had no deſign to alter it, they did not however deem it ſo abſolutely neceſſary, but that religion might well ſubſiſt under any other kind of regulation. This was the prevailing opinion, and eſpouſed by a majority in both houſes: wherefore it may be ſaid that, in the begining of this parliament, the members in general had no intention to attack the eccleſiaſtical government eſtabliſhed in England ſince the reformation.

But there was in the two houſes another party, more powerful by the ability of their leaders, than by their number: I mean that of the Preſbyterians, who were divided alſo into moderate and rigid. The former had no other view, than to obtain ſome liberty and ſecurity againſt perſecution. The latter were of a different ſtamp. They conſidered epiſcopal government as repugnant to divine writ, and the juriſdiction of prelates as a real tyranny. Theſe were the particular objects of the hatred of King, miniſtry, biſhops, and moſt of the clergy, becauſe their principles tended to the church of England's utter deſtruction. For that reaſon, they believed there was no ſafety for them, but in abſolutely converting Prelatical into Preſbyterian government: but they eaſily perceived that, to attain their ends, the King was to be diſabled to oppoſe them, knowing that, as long as it was in his power, he would never conſent to ſuch alteration. Their number was however ſo inconſiderable, that they would have made no figure in the parliament, had they not been ſupported by the Scots, whoſe aid they could not be without. Moreover, among theſe rigid Preſbyterians lay concealed a certain ſet of men, known afterwards by the name of Independents, who held concerning civil, as well as eccleſiaſtical government, uncommon opinions, which they took care not to divulge, 'till they found occaſion of doing it to ſome purpoſe. They were for ſome years contented to conceal themſelves among the rigid Preſbyterians, in order, at a proper time, to accompliſh their deſigns more effectually. It was the particular intereſt of theſe men ſo to manage, that the government of the ſtate ſhould be changed, or rather overthrown, well knowing their party could never ſubſiſt but in anarchy: and therefore, without diſcovering their intentions, they improved all occaſions to ſow and cheriſh diſcord between King and parliament. The whole Preſbyterian party was directed by the heads of the Rigids and Independents, men of great parts, who, without diſcovering themſelves more than was neceſſary, ſeemed to confine their views to the redreſs of grievances, which was the parliament's general aim, and wherein almoſt all were united. In this conduct they found a double advantage: firſt, they removed all ſuſpicion of their intending to change the government of church or ſtate, and withal prevented the union of the other members, who would not have failed uniting, in order to oppoſe ſuch innovations. The ſecond advantage was that, by being ſolely intent at firſt on the redreſs of grievances, they had frequent occaſions of exclaiming againſt the King's former adminiſtration, and fomenting the parliament's diſtruſt and jealouſy of him: for it was by that chiefly they hoped to be able to execute their projects.

Such being the parliament's diſpoſition, it is eaſy to perceive the reaſon why the commons were at firſt ſo attentive on redreſſing grievances, as well public as private. A great number of petitions on that ſubject were preſented them, within a few days after their meeting. Many members were likewiſe charged with the like petitions from their burroughs and ſhires, and ſeveral very mortifying ſpeeches to the King and his miniſters were made in the houſe. Of all theſe ſpeeches, I ſhall inſert but one, wherein are enumerated all the public grievances, whereof the people thought they had reaſon to complain. It is that of mr. Pym, member of parliament for Taviſtock, in Devonſhire (1). viz.

Ruſhworth, Vol. III. p. 1336. &c. IV. p. 20. Nalſon, p. 491. &c.

Mr. ſpeaker,

Pym's ſpeech about grievances. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 21.

" TO redreſs grievances will not hinder, but farther the ſervice of the King: to take away the weights does as much advantage motion, as to add wings.

" I ſhall, 1, inſtance ſeveral heads of thoſe grievances we labor under. 2. Demonſtrate them to be as hurtful to the King as to the people. 3. That the remedies will prove equally good to both of them.

" The King can do no wrong; the law caſts all miſcarriages upon the miniſters: thus the influence of heaven conveyeth vigor into ſublunary creatures; but the malignity of all epidemical diſeaſes proceedeth from the ill-affected qualities of the earth or air.

" There are a threefold ſort of grievances: 1. Some againſt the privilege of parliament: 2. Others to the prejudice of religion: 3. Some againſt the liberty of the ſubject. For the firſt, the members are free from arreſts; to have liberty of ſpeech; a legiſlative, judiciary and conciliary power; being the ſame to the body politic, as the faculties of the ſoul to a man.

" Theſe privileges have been broken: 1. in re-

" ſtraining

" ſtraining the members from ſpeaking. 2. In " forbiding the ſpeaker to put a queſtion; both of " theſe practiſed in the laſt parliament. 3. By " impriſoning diverſe members for matters done " in parliament. 4. By proceedings againſt them " for the ſame in the inferior courts. 5. Injoining " them to give ſecurity for their good behavior, " and continuing them in priſon, even to the death. " 6. In abrupt diſſolutions of parliament: the great " grievance; like the execution of a man, without " being heard: it receives a being by the ſummons, " and a civil death by diſſolution; not only there- " by to die, but to be made 'inteſtabiles,' unca- " pable of making their wills, the good acts which " they were about.

" The ſecond is, incouragement of Popery: " 1. By ſuſpenſion of laws againſt them; now it " is certain, there can be no ſecurity from Papiſts, " but in their diſability; their principles are in- " compatible with any other religion: laws will " not reſtrain them, nor oaths; for the Pope diſ- " penſeth with both; and his command acteth " them againſt the realm in ſpirituals and tempo- " rals, 'in ordine ad ſpiritualia.' Henry III, and " Henry IV, of France, were no Proteſtants, yet " were murdered becauſe they tolerated reforma- " tion. 2. By allowing them places of truſt and " honor in the common-wealth. 3. Their free re- " ſort to London, and to the court; to communi- " cate their counſels and deſigns, diving into the " ſecrets of ſtate. 4. That as they have a congre- " gation of cardinals at Rome, for advancing the " Pope's authority in England; ſo have they a " nuncio here, for the execution thereof.

" Then as to innovations of religion intro- " duced: 1. Maintenance of Popiſh tenets, in " books, ſermons and diſputations. 2. Practiſe of " Popiſh ceremonies countenanced and injoined, as " altars, images, crucifixes, bowings, &c. Theſe " I may in ſome reſpect compare to the dry bones " in Ezekiel which firſt came together, then ſi- " news and fleſh came upon them, afterwards the " ſkin covered them, and then breath and life was " put into them; ſo firſt the form, then the ſpirit " and life of Popery was to come among us. " 3. Preferment of perſons Popiſhly affected. " 4. The diſcouragements of Proteſtants, by over- " rigid proſecutions of the ſcrupulous for things in- " different: no vice made ſo great as inconformi- " ty; by puniſhing without law, for not reading " the book for Sunday-recreations; for not remov- " ing the communion-table alter-wiſe; for not " coming to the rails to receive the communion; " for preaching on the Lord's-day in the after- " noon; for catechiſing otherwiſe than as in the " ſhort catechiſm in the common-prayer-book. " 5. By incroachment of eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction; " particularly, 1. In fining and impriſoning with- " out law. 2. Challenging their juriſdiction to be " appropriated to their order, 'Jure divino.' 3. Con- " triving and publiſhing new articles of viſitation, " new canons; and the boldneſs of biſhops, and " their ſubordinate officers and officials.

" As to the third ſort of grievances, I ſhall ob- " ſerve rather the order of time when they were " acted, than the conſequence; but when we " come to the cure, it will be beſt to begin with " the moſt important.

" There is firſt, tonage and poundage, and the " late new book of rates taken by prerogative, " without grant of parliament; from whence theſe " inconveniencies follow: 1. Mens goods are ſeiz- " ed, their ſuits ſtoped. 2. Miſimployment of " the ſums of money impoſed; for tho' intended " for the guard of the ſeas, they are diſpoſed " to other uſes, and a new tax raiſed for the ſame " purpoſe. 3. The burden exceſſive, trade hin- " dered, home-commodities abaſed, and foreign " inhanſed; by which means the ſtock of the king- " dom is diminiſhed, eſpecially inſupportable to " to the poor planters in America, by the tax upon " tobacco.

CHARLES I AN' 1640.

" There is a compoſition for knighthood; which " tho' it refers to a former cuſtom, yet upon the " ſame grounds the King may renew it by a new " fine, immoderate multiplication of diſtreſs and " iſſues, and inforce them to compound with the " commiſſioners. An innundation of monopolies un- " dertaken by Papiſts, and full of miſchief. 1ſt, " By impairing the goodneſs, and inhanſing the " price of ſalt, ſoap, beer, coals, &c. 2dly, Un- " der color of which trade was reſtrained to a few " hands. 3dly, Many perſons thereupon illegally " impriſoned.

" But the great and unparalleled grievance is " the ſhip-money, being agravated not ſupported " by the judgment, which is not grounded upon " law, cuſtom, precedent or authority: it being " improper for a caſe of neceſſity, and abounding " in variety of miſchief. As 1ſt, the general ex- " tent to all perſons, all times, and the ſubject left " remedileſs. 2dly, The arbitrary proportion " without limits. 3dly, Impoſed by writ, and " diſpoſed by inſtructions. Improper, for the of- " fice of a ſheriff in the inland counties, and in- " convenient for the inhabitants; without rule or " ſuitable means for the levying or managing " of it.

" The inlargements of foreſts, beyond the bounds " of the ſtatutes, 27 and 28 Edw. I. which per- " ambulations then were the cauſe of that famous " Charta de Foreſta; and now reviving theſe old " queſtions, new diſtempers may follow, and par- " ticular obliquities we may already obſerve, and " ſurreptitious proceedings, as in Eſſex; yet that " verdict was inforced in other counties, and a " judgment upon the matter after three or four hun- " dred years quiet poſſeſſion of the ſubject, who " thereupon is forced to compound for great fines.

" The ſelling of nuſance. The King, as a fa- " ther of the commonwealth, is to take care of " the public commodities and advantages of the " ſubjects, as rivers, highways, and common- " ſewers, by ordinary writs, 'Ad quod damnum:' " but now by a courſe extrajudicial, by inforcing " compoſitions; ſo then, if really it be a nuſance " which is compounded for, it is a hurt to the " people; if no nuſance, then it is a grand preju- " dice to the party.

" The commiſſion for buildings, about London, " was preſented as a grievance in the time of King " James; now much more increaſed, and much " more prejudicial.

" The commiſſion for depopulations began ſome " few years ſince; by both theſe commiſſions, the " the ſubject is reſtrained from diſpoſing of his " own; demoliſhing their houſes, puniſhing and " fining their perſons for what they are ſtill liable " to by law; for the King cannot licenſe a nuſance; " and altho' theſe are nuſances, yet it is of ill " conſequence to be compounded for, and make a " precedent for Kings to licenſe ſuch things as are " nuſances indeed.

" Military charges ought not to be laid upon " the people by warrant of the King's hand; nor " by letters of the council-table; nor by order of " the lords lieutenants of counties, nor their de- " puties. It began to be practiſed, as a loan, for " ſupply of coat and conduct-money, in Queen " Elizabeth's time, with promiſe to be re-paid it, " as appears by a Conſtat-warrant in the exchequer, " and certain payments; but now a-days never re- " paid. The firſt particular brought into a tax " was, the muſter-maſter's wages; which being

but

Charles I An' 1640.

" but for a ſmall ſum, was generally digeſted: " yet in the laſt parliament, it was deſigned to be " remedied. But now there follows; 1ſt, preſſing " of men againſt their wills, or to find others " 2dly, Proviſions for public magazines for pow- " der, ſpades and pickaxes. 3dly, Salary of offi- " cers, cart-horſes, carts, and ſuch like.

" The extrajudicial declarations of judges with- " out hearing of counſel or argument: a teeming " grievance, productive of many others.

" Monopolies countenanced by the council-table, " and the clauſe in their patents of monopolies, " commanding the juſtices of peace to aſſiſt them; " whereby the great abilities of that honorable " board receive a ſtain by ſuch matters of ſo mean " a report in the eſtimation of the law, ſo ill in " the apprehenſion of the people.

" The high court of ſtar-chamber, called in the " parliament rolls 'Magnum Concilium,' to which " the parliaments were wont to refer ſuch matters " as they had not time to determine: a court " erected againſt oppreſſion, a court of councils, " and a court of juſtice, now an inſtrument of erect- " ing and defending monopolies, to ſet a face of " public good on things pernicious.

" That great and moſt eminent power of the " King in edicts and proclamations, called 'Leges " Temporis,' uſed heretofore to incounter with " ſudden and unexpected danger, 'till the great " council of the King could be called, hath of late " been exerciſed for injoining and maintaining mo- " nopolies. But the laſt and greateſt grievance leads " us a ſtep higher, even as high as heaven, as the " throne of God, his word and truth. The am- " bitious and corrupt clergy, preaching down the " laws of God, and liberties of the kingdom; " pretending divine authority and abſolute power " in the King, to do what he will with us; and " this preaching is the highway to preferment; as " one Manwaring, ſentenced in the former parlia- " ment for this doctrine, then a doctor, is now " become a biſhop. The intermiſſion of parlia- " ments contrary to the ſtatute, whereby they are " to be called once a year, is the main cauſe of all " theſe and other miſchiefs, to which parliaments " give remedy.

" Theſe grievances are as well hurtful to the " King as to the ſubjects, by interrupting their " communion; they have need of his general par- " don, and to be ſecured from projectors and in- " formers; to be freed from obſolete laws, and " from the ſubtil deviſes of thoſe who ſeek to ſtrain " the prerogative to their own private advantage, " and the public hurt; and the King hath need of " them for counſel, for ſupport. Queen Eliza- " beth's victorious attempts were, for the moſt " part, carried on upon the ſubjects purſes, and " not upon her own; tho' the honor and profit " were hers. Theſe diſcontents at home diminiſh " the King's reputation abroad, diſadvantage " his treaties, and weaken his party beyond ſea; " by incouraging Popery; by forcing the ſubjects " to leave the kingdom, to the prejudice of the " King's cuſtoms and ſubſidies. As for inſtance, " diverſe clothiers forced away, who ſet up their " manufacture abroad, to the hurt of this king- " dom.

" The King hath received, upon the monopoly " of wines, thirty thouſand pounds per annum. The " vintner pays forty ſhillings per tun, which comes " to ninety thouſand pounds; the price upon the " ſubject by retail is increaſed two-pence a quart, " which comes to eight pounds a tun, and ſo " forty five thouſand tun brought in yearly, " amounts to three hundred ſixty thouſand pounds; " which is three hundred and thirty thouſand " pounds loſt to the kingdom, above the King's " receipt.

" Now the remedies, and removing theſe griev- " ances, conſiſt of two main branches; in declaring " the law where it is doubtful, and in providing " for the execution of the law where it is clear. " But theſe I refer to a farther time, and for " the preſent adviſe ſpeedily to deſire a con- " ference with the lords touching grievances; " and always to humble our ſelves for God's aſ- " ſiſtance."

Charles I An' 1640.

As mr. Pym, who delivered this ſpeech, was one of the leading men in the houſe of commons, he was extremely applauded, and the more that, in giving a ſummary of all the public grievances, he had not uſed any diſreſpectful terms againſt the King or his miniſters. This ſpeech was followed with another by ſir Benjamin Rudyard, who, to intimate that there was a ſettled deſign to introduce Popery and arbitrary power into England, expreſſed himſelf after this manner:

" They have ſo brought it to paſs, that under " the name of Puritans, all our religion is brand- " ed; and under a few hard words againſt Jeſuits, " all Popery is countenanced. Whoſoever ſquares " his actions by any rule either divine or human, " he is a Puritan; whoſoever would be governed " by the King's laws, he is a Puritan; he who " will not do whatſoever other men would have him " do, he is a Puritan: their great work, their " maſter-piece now is, to make all thoſe of the " religion to be the ſuſpected party of the king- " dom."

Expreſſions of a member about perſe- cuting the Puritans. Nov. 7. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 24. Nalſon, p. 491.

Theſe ſpeeches were ſeconded with ſo great a number of complaints and petitions concerning grievances, both public and private, that the houſe was divided into more than forty commitees, upon this ſingle article, according to the different nature of the complaints. But before the particular exa- mination of theſe grievances commenced, the com- mons thought fit to deſire their lordſhips concurrence to move his Majeſty, that he would be pleaſed to appoint a faſt; which met with no oppoſition either from lords or King. Then they appointed a com- mitee to examine what number of Papiſts were in and about London, and how they were armed. As Charles had acquainted them with his deſign to pub- liſh a proclamation againſt recuſants, this commitee was impowered to examine it after the publication, and attend to its execution.

Commitee to examine the proclamation againſt recu- ſants.

Two days after, on the ninth of November, the houſe going upon grievances, lord Digby, the earl of Briſtol's ſon, made on that ſubject a ſpeech, which he concluded with this motion, " That a " ſelect commitee may be appointed to draw, out " of all has been complained of, ſuch a remon- " ſtrance as may be a faithful and lively repreſen- " tation to his Majeſty of the deplorable eſtate of " the kingdom." Very probably, this motion had been reſolved among the leaders, becauſe they were apprehenſive of Charles's oppoſing the redreſs of grievances, and becauſe in that caſe it was requiſite to ſhew the people the neceſſity of ſuch redreſs, by informing them wherein conſiſted the nation's griev- ances. Lord Digby's motion being approved, the houſe appointed a commitee of twenty-four to pre- pare the remonſtrance: but becauſe the King ſhewed greater condeſcenſion than was expected, this re- monſtrance was not drawn 'till above a year after, and on another occaſion.

During the four or five firſt days, the houſe of commons was in a manner wholly imployed in receiving petitions and complaints, as well from private perſons, as from burroughs and ſhires. Among the private petitions, the moſt remarkable were thoſe of Baſtwick, Burton, Pryn, Lilburn, Leighton, Jennings, Smart. Theſe men complained of the exorbitant pains and penalties inflicted on them by the ſtar-chamber and high-commiſſion. As I intend not to dwell on the affairs of private perſons, I ſhall only ſay, that within the ſpace of about a year, the commons found time to examine all theſe ſentences one after another, and to puniſh the members of the ſtar-chamber, who had given their votes, by condemning them to pay all coſts and damages to the parties. The reparations to Baſtwick, Pryn, and Burton, were fixed to above four thouſand pounds each (2). All the other complaints of private perſons, whether againſt the courts of juſtice, or the ſtar-chamber and high-commiſſion, or certain biſhops and deans who labored more than the reſt to introduce innovations in religion, were heard. The commons took a pleaſure to mortify, in their turn, thoſe who had ſtretched the prerogative royal in perſecuting the Puritans, or rather ſuch as did not bear the yoke patiently, and were, under that denomination, confounded with the Preſbyterians.

Grievances of private perſons redreſſed.

The public grievances redreſſed alſo.

If the commons indeavored to do juſtice to private perſons, who had ſuffered any injury during the firſt fifteen years of this reign, it may well be imagined, they neglected not redreſſing the whole nation's grievances. This was their principal buſineſs during the firſt year of their ſeſſion. Tho' the parliament was compoſed of ſeveral parties, who had not all the ſame views, they were however united with reſpect to the redreſs of grievances. Even thoſe members who were moſt devoted to King Charles durſt not oppoſe the general ſentiment, ſome becauſe they thought the thing juſt; others not to loſe their labor, and for fear of rendering themſelves too ſuſpected.

Principal authors of the grievances. Laud.

Among thoſe who had moſt contributed to the public miſchiefs, the archbiſhop of Caterbury was conſidered as one of the chief and moſt worthy of puniſhment, as being author of the innovations in the church; promoter of the war with Scotland; perſecutor of the Preſbyterians, and head of the Arminians.

Strafford.

The earl of Strafford was likewiſe of this number, becauſe he had ſo intirely devoted himſelf to the King that, in his two great offices of preſident of the court of York, and lord-lieutenant of Ireland, he had no other view than to ſtretch the prerogative royal, and augment his Majeſty's revenues. His arrogant and haughty deportment had no leſs offended the public than his actions, whereby he ſtrove to eſtabliſh deſpotiſm. He was charged with counſeling Charles to tranſport his Iriſh army into England, to ſubdue the oppoſers of his will. Tho' he was highly in the King's favor, he had nevertheleſs made himſelf many enemies at court, and in the kingdom, who earneſtly ſought occaſions to work his deſtruction.

Finch.

The lord-keeper Finch was alſo looked on as a pernicious counſellor, wholly devoted to the King, and ready for any attempt to eſtabliſh arbitrary government: it was not doubted but he was the man who had corrupted the judges in the buſineſs of ſhip-money.

Windebank. Clarendon. p. 142.

Sir Francis Windebank, ſecretary of ſtate, was reckoned the patron of Papiſts, and it was by his means that the condemned prieſts and Jeſuits eſcaped one way or other the ſentence paſſed upon them. Finally, the bench of judges had rendered themſelves extremely odious to the people, as well by the judgment they had given in mr. Hampden's affair, as by numberleſs other acts of injuſtice to private perſons. Theſe were the principal authors of the grievances, whom the commons would abſolutely bring to condign and exemplary puniſhment.

CHARLES I AN' 1640.

The judges.

Strafford was the firſt on whom the ſtorm brake. The eleventh of November, eight days after opening the parliament, mr. Pym, having deſired and obtained his deſire of the commons, that the doors might be locked, and the outward room cleared of ſtrangers, informed them, that there were ſeveral complaints againſt the earl of Strafford, which afforded good ground to accuſe him of high-treaſon. Upon this information, the houſe immediately appointed a commitee of ſeven (3), who withdrawing into another room, and confering, preſently reported it to be their opinion, that there was juſt ground to impeach the earl of Strafford. Then mr. Pym was ordered to go to the houſe of lords, and accuſe the earl of high-treaſon, in the name of all the commons: he had likewiſe orders to tell the lords, that in due time the commons would produce the articles of accuſation, and in the interim deſired the accuſed might be put into ſafe cuſtody. The earl of Strafford was that very day * come from the army, and had taken his place in the houſe of lords. Before his departure from the army, he had received notice that there was a deſign to attack him: but whether thro' pride, or a belief that, having done nothing without the King's warrant, he was ſecure, he ſlighted the counſel, and would be preſent in the parliament. Indeed, ſome months before, the King's protection was more than ſufficient to ſcreen him from all danger: but the face of affairs was changed, and it is ſtrange a perſon of ſo great a genius, and ſo good ſenſe, could imagine the King was able to protect him in ſuch a juncture. However this be, on the commons impeachment, their lordſhips commited him to the cuſtody of the black-rod, and ſome days after ſent him to the Tower. As this affair was prolonged 'till May, next year, I ſhall not ſpeak of it, before I come to the time of this famous trial, and ſhall continue to relate, without interruption, what concerns the redreſs of grievances, and the puniſhment or accuſation of their authors.

Secretary Windebank was attacked next. Several petitions were preſented againſt him to the houſe, whereof he was member, complaining that, as ſecretary of ſtate, he had iſſued warrants under his own hand for the diſcharge of proſecutions againſt prieſts, and for their releaſe from priſon. All theſe petitions tended to ſhew, that he miſſed no opportunity of countenancing Papiſts, and gloried in being reckoned their patron. I know not whether he profeſſed the Romiſh creed; but howſoever it be, he was ſeveral times ſummoned to the houſe, there to anſwer what was laid to his charge. But he judged it properer to avoid the impending ſtorm, and withdraw into France. When he was out of danger, he ſent the earl of Pembroke, lord-chamberlain, a letter, lamenting his misfortune, and intimating, that if he was culpable, it was only for having ſerved the King faithfully, and obeyed his orders (4).

Debates upon the convocation. Ibid. p. 58, 62, 89. 100. Nalſon, p. 533, &c. 666. &c. Diurn. Occur. Clarendon, p. 162.

The convocation, their canons, oath, and the tax they had laid upon the clergy to aid the King in his war with Scotland, were by the houſe next taken into conſideration. This affair was debated with great warmth. On this occaſion, diverſe members made ſpeeches, tending to ſhew that the King could not, by his authority, turn the convocation into a ſynod. They alleged for reaſons, That the clergy who compoſed it could act but as members of the convocation, becauſe, to act as members of a ſynod, they ought to have been elected by the people, and it did not belong to the King to make this election as he pleaſed: that the convocation or ſynod had not power to make canons for the whole nation, without conſent of the people themſelves, nor conſequently without the parliament's intervention: that moſt of the canons were unjuſt in themſelves, and tended to augment the clergy's power, to the prejudice of the King's authority, and the peoples liberties: that, by theſe canons, the convocation aſſumed a power above the parliament: that the oath they had impoſed was ſtrange, doubtful, contrary to the privileges of parliament, and rights of the people, and obliged men to ſwear, as neceſſary, things which were alterable, without any danger to religion; for inſtance, ſuppoſing it true that biſhops are "Jure divino," which the church of England never acknowledged, it could not be affirmed, that archbiſhops, deans and archdeacons are of divine or apoſtolical inſtitution, and yet people were made to ſwear, they would never conſent to altering the government of the church by archbiſhops, biſhops, deans, archdeacons, &c: that by this oath, the church repreſentatives would be ſo tied up, that tho' the parliament ſhould have power to alter church diſcipline, they could not, by reaſon of their oath, even debate upon that ſubject. On theſe, and many other reaſons which not to be prolix I omit, the commons unanimouſly voted. 1. That the clergy of England, convened in a convocation or ſynod, or otherwiſe, have no power to make any conſtitutions, canons, or acts whatſoever, in matters of doctrine or diſcipline, or otherwiſe to bind the clergy or laity of the land, without common conſent in parliament. 2. That the canons, treated upon by the late convocation, do contain matters contrary to the King's prerogative, to the fundamental laws and ſtatutes of the realm, to the rights of parliament, to the property and liberty of the ſubject, tending to ſedition, and of dangerous conſequence (1).

Votes concerning the Convocation Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 112. Nalſon, p. 678. Diurn. Occur.

On theſe reſolutions, the houſe inſtantly appointed a commitee of thirty ſix; to examine who were the chief promoters of theſe canons, and how they had been executed: to conſider how far, in particular, the archbiſhop of Canterbury had been concerned in the grand ſcheme of ſubverting the laws of the land and religion; and to draw up a charge againſt him, and ſuch others as ſhould appear guilty of the ſame crime. The Scotiſh commiſſioners who were ſent to London to continue the treaty begun at Rippon, held, as I obſerved, good intelligence with the leading members of the commons, and had, very ſeemingly, been informed of the deſign to proſecute the archbiſhop: and therefore, to make the blow fall heavier on this prelate, by joining their complaints with thoſe of the commons, they next day preſented to the lords a charge againſt him, to this effect:

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 113. Nalſon, p. 680.

"That he was the cauſe of all the troubles in Scot- "land, and author and urger of introducing into "Scotland the book of canons, and the liturgy, as "appeared by fourteen letters, which they offered "to produce: that the Scotiſh prelates having ſent "to him a book of canons, written upon the one "ſide only, with the other ſide blank, he had "made ſeveral interlinings, and filled up the blank "pages with ſeveral directions; which changes and "ſupplements were taken from the Romiſh rituals, "which varied from the book of England: that "they were contrary to the King's intentions, who "in his large declarations had profeſſed, That all "the variations in the Scotiſh ſervice from that of "England ſhould be only in ſuch things as the "Scotiſh humors would better comply with; but "that the archbiſhop had no regard to this. On "the contrary, the Scotiſh prelates having petitioned the ſuppreſſion of ſome of the Engliſh "ceremonies, as the croſs in baptiſm, the ring in "marriage, and ſome other things, he was ſo far "from conſenting, that he had added ſeveral "others: that in the order of adminiſtering the "communion in the book of England, he had made "ſeveral alterations, which plainly ſhewed his deſign of introducing Popery into Scotland: that "he had kindled war between the King and the "Scots, and been one of the chief cauſes of breaking the laſt pacification, and renewing the war: "that he had inſerted into the divine ſervice a "prayer againſt their nation, by name of 'traiterous "ſubjects, having caſt off all obedience to their "anointed Sovereign, and coming in a rebellious "manner to invade England; that ſhame might "cover their faces as enemies to God and the King."

Articles of accuſation againſt Laud. Id. p. 681. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 113.

I have greatly abridged theſe articles, which are very particular: but what is here ſaid, ſuffices to ſhew their deſign.

On the morrow, ſir Harbottle Grimſton made in the houſe a ſpeech againſt the archbiſhop, pretending to evidence, that all thoſe who were concerned in the evils of the ſtate, as the earl of Strafford, the biſhops of Cheſter, Oxford, Ely, Bath and Wells, had been raiſed by his means, and that there was not a ſingle grievance but what flowed from him. Whereupon the commons impeached his ſaid grace of high-treaſon, and the lords commited him to cuſtody of the gentleman-uſher. Some time after he was ſent to the Tower.

Grimſton's ſpeech againſt him. Ib. p. 122.

This done, the commons ſent their lordſhips a meſſage to let them know, they had received informations of a very high nature againſt Matthew Wren Biſhop of Ely; and having heard that he intended to eſcape out of the kingdom, they deſired them to think of ſome way to prevent it: whereupon the lords ordered that prelate to give ten thouſand pounds bail for his forth-coming; which order he obeyed.

Laud accuſed and ſent to the Tower. Id. p. 123. Nalſon, p. 691, 692. Clarendon, p. 141.

Of thoſe whom the commons conſidered as principal authors of the public grievances, only the lord-keeper Finch, and the judges remained. The firſt was declared a traitor by a vote of the houſe, nothwithſtanding the ſpeech he was permited to make at the commons bar in his juſtification: but before he was accuſed in form, he got away to Holland. However, he was impeached afterwards, tho' abſent. Immediately on his flight, King Charles made ſir Edward Littleton lord-keeper.

CHARLES I AN' 1640.

The commons acquainted their lordſhips, that they had received information againſt three judges, ſir John Bramſton, lord chief-juſtice of the King's-bench; ſir Humphrey Davenport, lord chief-baron; and juſtice Crawley; and deſired that they might put in good ſecurity for their appearance. Hereupon the lords obliged each of theſe judges to give ten thouſand pounds bail. The other judges were alſo accuſed afterwards.

Three judges obliged to give bail. Ib. p. 130. Nalſon, p. 699. Diurn. Occurr.

Thus, they who were conſidered, by the commons, as chief authors of the public grievances, were diſabled not only from continuing to adviſe the King, but alſo from eſcaping puniſhment, except lord Finch and ſir Francis Windebank, who ſaved their perſons by quiting their eſtates in England. I ſhall not waſte time in giving account of many others, of inferior rank, who were variouſly puniſhed; whether for exerciſing monopolies, or contriving means to raiſe the King money; whether for introducing or countenancing innovations in religion, or finally for prevaricating in the execution of their offices.

Method of the commons to redreſs grievances.

While the commons were buſied in making ſure of thoſe they deſigned to chaſtiſe, they alſo prepared whatever was neceſſary to free the nation from all their grievances. To this end, the ſame method was uſed as had been imployed againſt the perſons: i. e. petitions from all quarters were preſented to both houſes upon grievances. Theſe petitions being read, ſeveral ſpeeches were made in the houſe, to ſhew how prejudicial theſe grievances were to the public; and the principles which gave them birth were particularly inſiſted on, as being directly repugnant to the conſtitution, and tending to the government's utter ſubverſion. Whereupon, it was voted that ſuch a thing was illegal, and ordered that a bill ſhould be prepared to aboliſh it. This was the ſubject of diverſe acts, which were preſented to his Majeſty for the royal aſſent, from the third of November 1640, to the tenth of Auguſt 1641. Theſe were the moſt momentous: viz.

Acts paſſed in 1640 and 1641 for that purpoſe. Stat. Clarendon, p. 221. Coke.

Act for a triennial parliament: i. e. to ordain that a parliament ſhould be held at leaſt every three years, tho' the King ſhould neglect calling it, in order to prevent the inconveniencies ariſing from a too long intermiſſion of parliaments.

Act to aboliſh the ſtar-chamber and high-commiſſion.

Act to reduce the foreſts to the ſame ſtate as under Edward I.

Act to repeal the ſtatutes, made in the reign of Edward II, concerning knighthood.

Act to permit any ſubject to make ſalt-petre and gun-powder, throughout the kingdom.

Act to aboliſh ſhip-money (1).

The neceſſity of theſe acts was ſo manifeſt, that Charles muſt have either conſented to them, or plainly declared he would rule deſpotically: but he was not ſo imprudent as to oppoſe them in his then circumſtances. A certain illuſtrious hiſtorian makes no ſcruple to ſay, that "theſe acts will be acknowledged by an incorrupted poſterity, to be everlaſting monuments of the King's fatherly affection to his people; and ſuch an obligation of repoſe and truſt from his Majeſty in the hearts of his ſubjects, that no expreſſions of duty and confidence from them could have been more than a ſufficient return on their parts." King Charles himſelf afterwards would frequently have had theſe conceſſions to be conſidered as acts of pure grace, for which the public ought to have been thankful: but, unhappily for him, neither parliament nor people believed them to be the effect of his juſtice or affection to them, but rather of the neceſſity he was under of giving his aſſent.

Clarendon, p. 225.

CHARLES I AN' 1640.

Beſide theſe acts, the commons paſſed many general votes upon ſeveral other articles. Indeed, theſe votes are not conſidered as laws, neither do the judges proceed by them in their determinations: nevertheleſs, ſuch is their effect, that few are ſo daring as to act contrary to theſe deciſions of the commons, ſince it is in ſome meaſure to oppoſe the ſentiment of the people whom they repreſent: beſide, any action directly contrary to a vote of the houſe is liable to be queſtioned, when leaſt expected, and draws on the actor the indignation of that repreſentative body, who have but too many opportunities to make him feel the ſmart of their reſentment.

Proceedings of the commons by votes.

The commons intention was not only to ſtop the evil by means of theſe votes, but alſo to terrify all thoſe who had been concerned in the grievances, in order to take from the King all hopes of ſupport in his people: for after the houſe had voted, for inſtance, that ſuch a monopoly was illegal, if any perſon concerned in that monopoly behaved in a manner diſagreeable to the commons, or appeared too much attached to the King, an accuſation againſt him was the certain conſequence of ſuch deportment. By that means, the King's moſt devoted friends choſe rather to relinquiſh his intereſt than be liable to a charge, from which they evidently perceived it was not in their royal patron's power to ſecure them. This had very clearly appeared by glaring inſtances in the earl of Strafford, archbiſhop Laud, lord keeper Finch, and ſecretary Windebank, after whom no private perſon could hope for any protection from his Majeſty. Thus did the commons render themſelves ſo formidable at the parliament's opening, that Charles was ſuddenly deſerted by all, without having other refuge than conſenting to whatever was propoſed by the parliament. He hoped however that, when all the grievances were redreſſed, he ſhould be, if not in the ſame ſtate he had been for fifteen years, at leaſt in the natural ſtate of a King of England, according to the laws and conſtitution of the government: but we ſhall find in the ſequel how widely he erred in his conjecture. His former adminiſtration had made in the minds of his ſubjects too deep impreſſions for the majority ever to believe he would be thenceforth ſatisfied with the power allowed him by law. This diffidence was the immediate cauſe of a war between him and the parliament: but it is not yet time to deſcend to theſe particulars.

The commons render themſelves formidable.

Charles forced to conſent to whatever is demanded.

The commons uſed alſo another expedient to make themſelves feared. As there were many who, in conformity to the court's intentions, had been concerned in the monopolies, or countenanced innovations, or been ſubſervient to introduce and ſupport the occaſion of any grievance, the commons, on the petitions preſented them againſt thoſe perſons, ſent for them to London, and, examining them by a commitee, declared them delinquents; implying that, according to the houſe's ſentiment, they were guilty of faults or offenſes for which they merited being legally proſecuted and puniſhed: this word Delinquent, was greatly in uſe during this parliament. Thus, a great number of thoſe who had been moſt noted for their adherence to court maxims, or the archbiſhop's principles, were voted delinquents, and thereby kept in awe by the commons, who, according as they behaved well or ill to them, could proſecute or leave them unmoleſted.

Another method to declare people delinquents. Ruſhworth, Vol, IV. p. 58, &c. Clarendon, p. 141, 144. Coke.

(1) At the ſame time tonage and poundage, and other duties upon merchandiſes imported and exported, were granted to the King. See Statute Book.

But

CHARLES I AN' 1640.

But the number of thoſe who were declared delinquents was nothing in compariſon of ſuch as had reaſon to fear the like declaration, upon the leaſt petition againſt them. Hence followed a general approbation of whatever was done in the houſe; ſome conſenting becauſe they thought the things juſt, and others thro' dread of puniſhment. This is what rendered the redreſs of grievances very eaſy to the commons, and would have made it impracticable for King Charles to oppoſe it, had he harbored any ſuch intention. His ſaid Majeſty reaped at leaſt this advantage from his conſent to the redreſs of grievances, that he gave occaſion to many to believe he ſincerely concured in that work: but his adverſaries thence drew a very different conſequence. They ſaid, as the parliament's meaſures were ſo well laid that it would have been in vain for the King to oppoſe them, he was not to be thanked for a conſent to which neceſſity forced him, ſince, while it was in his power to hinder the redreſs of grievances, he had always refuſed to hearken to the inſtant deſires of his parliaments.

Warning with regard to the partiality of hiſtorians.

I am now to warn my readers, that we are arrived at a period wherein they muſt be very much on their guard with reſpect to the partiality of hiſtorians, each of whom does his utmoſt to prejudice his readers in favor either of King or parliament. This partiality conſiſts not ſo much in diſguiſing the facts (wherein both parties are agreed) as in the principles they eſtabliſh. Thoſe for the King exalt, as high as poſſible, the prerogative royal; nay, ſome ſtretch it to a kind of deſpotiſm, as we have ſeen inſtances in the writings and ſermons of Sibthorp, Montague and Manwaring, mentioned in the firſt part of this reign. Anſwerably to this principle, they think and maintain; That the parliament's aim was not to reſtore the government to its natural ſtate, as was pretended, but rather to overturn the conſtitution both of church and ſtate: that therefore the objects were ſo much magnified, by agravating ſome acts of authority done by the King, as tending to ſubvert the government, tho' they might have been juſtified by the prerogative royal, had any but the commons been judges; but tho' they manifeſtly declared themſelves parties againſt the King, they however made themſelves judges, voting ſuch and ſuch of his Majeſty's actions quite repugnant to the laws. Nothing more plainly manifeſts, according to theſe men, the parliament's ſecret deſign to overthrow the government, nor can a ſtronger proof of it be deſired than the experience of what afterwards occurred, when the government of both ſtate and church was actually changed.

The parliament's favorers urge, that, without examining the extent of the prerogative royal, it may at leaſt be affirmed, that it cannot be contrary to the laws: that if the King has his prerogatives, parliaments have their privileges, and the people their liberties, which the prerogative cannot invade without deſtroying the conſtitution of the government, which conſiſts in a happy mixture of the rights of King and people: that, before this parliament, the King had manifeſtly ſtretched his prerogative to the prejudice of the nation's rights, which the moſt attached to his intereſts durſt not deny: that this being the caſe, nothing was more juſt, nothing more neceſſary, than to reſtore the government to its natural ſtate: that it is therefore prepoſterous to have recourſe to a ſecret deſign of ſubverting church and ſtate, ſince the neceſſity of redreſſing grievances is undeniably evident: that ſuppoſing it true, that the commons uſed ſundry artifices to render themſelves formidable, and more eaſily accompliſh their main views, viz. of redreſſing grievances, theſe artifices were not blameable, conſidering how impracticable the former parliaments had found it to execute the ſame deſign.

CHARLES I AN' 1640.

Proceedings in parliament touching ſhip-money.

I am perſuaded, that moſt of the readers for whom I write this hiſtory, ſuch I mean as are not Engliſhmen, would not require of me a particular account of whatever paſſed in the houſe of commons, concerning the redreſs of grievances. It would be too tedious a work, which after all would not inform them of any thing more material than what has been already advanced. Nevertheleſs, for the ſatisfaction of thoſe who are unacquainted with the manner of parliamentary proceedings, I ſhall give here a brief relation of what was tranſacted with regard to ſhip-money, the grievance moſt complained of, and by that will be ſeen the method taken about others.

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 21, 58, 85, &c. Diurn. Occurr.

During the firſt whole month of this ſeſſion, ſcarce a day paſſed but the houſe received petitions from diverſe counties concerning grievances, among which that of ſhip-money was never forgot. Finally, on the ſeventh of December, the day appointed to debate on that affair, lord Falkland (1), afterwards ſecretary of ſtate, delivered this ſpeech in parliament:

Mr. ſpeaker,

Lord Falkland's ſpeech. Decem. 7. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 86. Nalſon, p. 654.

" I Rejoice very much to ſee this day; and the " want hath not lain in my affection but my " lungs, if to all that hath been paſſed, I have " not been as loud with my voice as any man " in the houſe; yet truly my opinion is, we have " yet done nothing, if we do no more; I ſhall " add what I humbly conceive ought to be added, " as ſoon as I have ſaid ſomething with reference " to him who ſays it.

" I will firſt deſire the forgiveneſs of the houſe, " if ought I ſay ſeem to intrench upon another's " profeſſion, and enter upon the work of another " robe. " In this judgment they contradicted both many
" and learned acts, and declarations of parliament;
" and thoſe in this very caſe, in this very reign;
" ſo that for them they needed to have conſulted
" with no other record, but with their memories.

" 2. They have contradicted apperant evidences,
" by ſuppoſing mighty and imminent dangers in
" the moſt ſerene, quiet, and halcyon days which " could poſſibly be imagined, a few contemptible
" pyrates being our moſt formidable enemies, and
" there being neither Prince nor ſtate with whom
" we had not either alliance, or amity, or both.

" 3. They contradict the writ itſelf, by ſuppoſ-
" ing that ſuppoſed danger to be ſo ſudden that it " would not ſtay for a parliament, which required
" but forty days ſtay; and the writ being in no
" ſuch haſte, but being content to ſtay forty days
" ſeven times over.

" Mr. ſpeaker; it ſeemed generally ſtrange, that
" they ſaw not the law, which all men elſe ſaw
" but themſelves; yet tho' this begot the more ge" neral wonder, three other particulars begot the " more general indignation. Firſt of all, the rea-
" ſons for this judgment were ſuch, that there
" needed not any from the adverſe party to help
" them to convert thoſe few who, before, had not
" the leaſt ſuſpicion of the legality of that moſt il" legal writ, there being fewer who approved the " judgment than there were who judged it legal,
" for I am confident they did not that themſelves.

" Secondly, when they had allowed to the King
" the ſole power in neceſſity, the ſole judgment of " neceſſity, and by that inabled him to take both

" of villains, they diſable us by legal and volun-
" tary ſupplies to expreſs our affections to his Ma-
" jeſty, and by that to cheriſh his to us, that is,
" by parliaments. Mr. ſpeaker, the cauſe of all
" the miſeries we have ſuffered, and the cauſe of " all our jealouſies we have had that we ſhould yet
" ſuffer, is, that a moſt excellent Prince hath been
" moſt infinitely abuſed by his judges, telling him
" that, by policy, he might do what he pleaſed;
" with the firſt of theſe we are now to deal, which " may be a leading to the reſt. And ſince in pro" viding of theſe laws, upon which theſe men have

" trampled, our anceſtors have ſhewn their utmoſt

" words having done nothing, and yet they have " done all that words can do, we muſt now be " forced to think of aboliſhing our grievances, and
" of taking away this judgment, and theſe judges
" together, and of regulating their ſucceſſors by " their exemplary puniſhment.

" I will not ſpeak much; I will only ſay we " have accuſed a great perſon of high-treaſon, for " intending to ſubvert our fundamental laws, and

" and how partial to their fellow malefactors, the " advice of ſuch judges is like to be; how undoubt-
" edly, for their own ſakes, they will think it may " conduce to their power, that every action be " judged to be a leſs fault, and every perſon to be
" leſs faulty, than in juſtice they ought to do:
" among theſe, mr. ſpeaker, there is one I muſt

After this ſpeech, the affair of ſhip-money having been debated, it was reſolved upon the queſtion, 'nemine contradicente.'

2. That the extrajudicial opinions of the judges, publiſhed in the ſtar-chamber, and inrolled in the courts of Weſtminſter in theſe words, —— in the whole, and in every part of them, are againſt the laws of this realm, the ſubjects right of property, and contrary to former reſolutions in parliament, and to the petition of right.

Commitee to examine the judges. Id. Ib.

Theſe reſolutions taken, the houſe appointed a commitee of ſixteen, at whoſe head was lord Falkland, to repair inſtantly to the ſeveral judges, and learn in what manner, and by whom they were ſollicited or threatened to give their extrajudicial opinion concerning ſhip-money. It was ordered, that every one of the judges ſhould be examined at the ſame time by two of the commitee, and be told what had been voted in the houſe concerning ſhip-money, and that the commitee ſhould aſk ſuch queſtions as they judged material to the execution of this order.

Precaution concerning the King's arbitrary acts. Ib. p. 89.

Next day, the houſe ordered that the commitee, appointed to conſider of the ſubjects property in their goods, ſhould take into conſideration ſome way of ſeeing the entering upon record the King's ſeveral commiſſions for loans and exciſe, and the reſolutions of former parliaments thereon, and the addition which was offered by the lords to the petition of right, with the houſe's reſolution; and alſo the reſolutions of the queſtions propoſed in the houſe concerning ſhip-money, that they might remain fair to poſterity. It was alſo refered to the ſame commitee to make a preparation of the vote paſſed about ſhip-money, to be ſent to the lords; to draw up a charge againſt lord Finch, and the other judges who gave their opinion upon that impoſt: and likewiſe to take into conſideration their extrajudicial opinions and the judgments in the caſe of ſhip-money; to inquire of the ſeveral denials of Habeas Corpus, and prohibitions, their extrajudicial proceedings and opinions concerning eccleſiaſtical juriſdictions, and the court of admiralty; their denial of legal and ordinary proceedings in caſes of juſtice, and the binding the whole kingdom by any one man's particular caſe. The ſame commitee had power to ſend for parties, witneſſes, papers, records, or any thing elſe which might conduce to this buſineſs, and were to lay before this houſe the true ſtate of the whole matter.

Order to prepare a charge againſt lord Finch.

The lords cancel the judgment in mr. Hampden's caſe. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 194.

On the other hand, the twenty-ſixth of February 1640-1, the peers ordered to be brought to their houſe the record in the exchequer of the judgment in mr. Hampden's caſe, and alſo the rolls in the ſtar-chamber and other courts, wherein the extrajudicial opinions of the judges were entered, and cauſed them to be annulled in their preſenſe. They ordered moreover, that a copy of what they had done ſhould be delivered to the judges to be publiſhed at the aſſizes in every county within their circuits, and that an act of parliament ſhould be prepared concerning this matter.

Bill againſt ſhip-money has the royal aſſent. Id. p. 130, 136. Nalſon, p. 699.

All this produced at length charges againſt the lord-keeper, and each of the judges, with an act to aboliſh ſhip-money, to which the King gave the royal aſſent the ſeventh of Auguſt 1641.

Much the ſame method was taken with regard to the other grievances, and in the end, there was not one, public or private, but what was redreſſed within the nine firſt months of this ſeſſion.

I intend not to include in theſe grievances thoſe concerning religion. Beſide, theſe were not generally acknowledged for grievances; this matter requires a more particular explication of what paſſed in the parliament. I ſhall therefore previouſly ſhew the parliament's diſpoſition, with reſpect to religion, and then ſpecify the tranſaction on this ſubject.

Diſpoſition of the two houſes touching religion.

Since James I's reign commenced, the biſhops had rendered themſelves abundantly more powerful than before. The oppoſition of the Preſbyterians, who never ceaſed exclaiming againſt the hierarchy, tho' they were not in condition to overthrow it, had greatly contributed towards augmenting the prelatical domination. Their impetuous zeal cauſed the King to think it proper to humble them, leaſt in the end they ſhould occaſion ſome diſturbance in the church, and the biſhops were charged with the care of executing this reſolution. The efforts to reduce them to obedience ſerved only to inflame the evil. Inſtead of trying to convince them by arguments, they were treated without moderation, and, if I may ſo ſay, without charity. It was reſolved at any rate to compel them to a conformity with the church of England, not only in things conſidered as neceſſary, but alſo in others regarded by moſt people as indifferent: moreover, diverſe ceremonies were added to the divine ſervice, which many perſons well affected to the church thought too near allied to Popery. William Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was the principal author of theſe ceremonies, as well before as after he was archbiſhop. His chief aim was to mortify the Puritans: but in proceeding too vigorouſly,

CHARLES I AN' 1640.

vigorouſly, or rather too rigorouſly, he gave them room to accuſe him that his deſign was to favor Popery, on pretenſe of conſtraining the Puritans to conform to the church of England's rituals. None was ever more bigoted to ceremonies, and the more he was reproached with it, the more he urged them as neceſſary. This chiefly gave occaſion to the Puritans, and even to ſome church of England men, to ſuſpect he had a deſign to introduce the Romiſh creed; ſuch exceſſive attachment to ceremonies ſeeming to them as a means whereby he intended to compaſs his views. As for Arminianiſm, all agree that Laud was not only an Arminian, but alſo head of that party in England, from the time he was received into favor by King James I, thro' the duke of Buckingham's mediation. As the knowledge of what paſſed in James I's reign may be of great ſervice towards underſtanding the affairs of religion which I have undertaken to explain, I ſhall briefly touch on what I judge moſt neceſſary, tho' mentioned before in that Prince's hiſtory.

Progreſs of Laud's credit.

When the diſputes concerning grace aroſe in Holland, King James eſpouſed the oppoſite party to Arminius, and uſed even threats to oblige the ſtates of Holland to condemn Vorſtius his ſucceſſor. After that, he ſent biſhops and divines to the ſynod of Dort, to ſtrengthen the contra-remonſtrants. Mean while the Arminians in England were forced to lie dormant, becauſe diſcountenanced by the court. Laud, then only a private doctor in the univerſity of Oxford, had yet no credit, tho' not long after the duke of Buckingham procured him the biſhoprick of St. David's in Wales. At the ſame time King James was vigorouſly puſhing his deſign to ſtretch the prerogative royal, to which he met with great oppoſition, chiefly from the Puritans, who on the article of grace were the Arminians direct oppoſites. On this account, King James and Buckingham thought fit to careſs and ſupport the Arminians, in order to oppoſe them to the Puritans, his ſaid Majeſty's grand aim being to weaken that party, ever ready to obſtruct the execution of his deſigns. From that time the Arminian faction became powerful. The heads were Neile biſhop of Wincheſter, and Laud biſhop of St. David's, who found means to gain the King's confidence, and to have the diſpoſal of church-preferments. They improved this advantage to ſtrengthen their party, by promoting to benefices ſuch as were moſt averſe to the Calviniſts, for ſo now began to be ſtiled thoſe who imbraced Calvin's opinion concerning grace, whether Preſbyterians or church of England men. There were three principal cauſes of the court's and its friends animoſity againſt the Preſbyterians.

The Calviniſts and Preſbyterians hated by the court.

The firſt was, that they rejected the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy.

The ſecond, that they were utterly averſe to the King's deſign of extending his prerogative, knowing the more power he had, the more violently they ſhould be perſecuted.

The third, that they were all Calviniſts as to the notions of grace. Tho' King James had not, perhaps, altered his opinion touching that point, yet he deſerted the Calviniſts, becauſe in other reſpects they were, generally ſpeaking, Preſbyterians and Puritans. From that time, the court and their agents reckoned among the Puritans, thoſe who refuſed conforming to the church of England; all the Calviniſts, Preſbyterians, &c; all who oppoſed his Majeſty's deſign with regard to the prerogative; and they were all, under the denomination of Puritans, equally obnoxious to the King's and his miniſters hatered. So, by this policy, many people who had no inclination for Preſbytery, were made to become Puritans; at leaſt, they were forced to join with the Puritan party, to hinder the court, on pretenſe of deſtroying Puritaniſm, from eſtabliſhing by degrees a deſpotiſm which would have been fatal to the whole nation: for James pretended, his will could be oppoſed only on Puritanical principles.

CHARLES I AN' 1640.

The Preſbyterian party perſecuted.

Charles I's reign was, in this reſpect, ſtill more violent than that of James, as in the firſt part of it has been already evidenced. Laud, being made biſhop of London, and afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury and one of the King's prime miniſters, imployed all his induſtry and credit to humble the Puritan party, that is, not only the Preſbyterians, but alſo the Calviniſts, and ſuch who would not bear the yoke of ſervitude patiently. Matthew Wren biſhop of Norwich, and afterwards of Ely, the biſhop of Bath and Wells, Coſins prebendary of Durham (1), being all of the ſame principles, ſeconded him in this deſign: and, as if the difference between the church of England and Preſbytery had not been ſufficiently diſtinguiſhed, they added to the worſhip ſundry innovations, and repreſented, as abſolutely neceſſary, things indifferent, and wherewith religion might very well have diſpenſed. Hence pretenſes were found to perſecute the Puritans, by counting among that party all on whom the court was pleaſed to beſtow that denomination.

Perſecuting the Puritans looked on as Charles's artifice to arrive at deſpotiſm.

The wiſeſt part of the nation had long ſince perceived Charles's and his court's policy, and their artifices to pave the way for arbitrary power: but it had not been poſſible to avoid the effects of it, becauſe that Prince had diſſolved his parliaments the moment they went about examining grievances. Thus the regal authority had gained ground by degrees, none being in a capacity to obſtruct its progreſs. But no ſooner had King Charles's affairs taken a new turn, by the Scots entering England, and reducing Newcaſtle, when his Majeſty found himſelf abſolutely obliged to call a parliament, moſt of the members reſolved not to omit ſuch a fair opportunity of aboliſhing the perſecution introduced under the ſpecious pretenſe of ſtoping the progreſs of Puritaniſm, but in reality for the better advancement of arbitrary power. Above all, the houſe of commons conſidered the innovations, and the rigor wherewith people were made to obſerve them, as ſo many artifices of the court-party for the readier attaining their ends. It muſt not therefore ſeem ſurpriſing, that the generality of members being united with regard to grievances, were ſo likewiſe for aboliſhing innovations, and puniſhing the authors, as having ſerved for inſtruments to the King in the execution of deſigns wherein religion was not ſolely concerned. This is what produced the charges againſt the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhops of Ely, Bath and Wells, and againſt Coſins, beſide the brand of delinquents given by the commons to a great number of miniſters, and others, who had countenanced thoſe innovations.

View of the true Preſbyterians.

The majority of members were, as I ſaid, united as to this point, becauſe there was not one who did not conſider it as a branch of that deſign to ſubject the realm to his Majeſty's will and pleaſure. But among this great number, there were real Preſbyterians, who had views more extenſive, and undoubtedly thought of altering church-government on pretenſe of the ill uſe prelates had made of their power. Theſe, tho' not very numerous in the parliament, were ſupported by a great party in the kingdom, and particularly by the Scots, whoſe aſſiſtance was then abſolutely neceſſary: but they took care not to discover their intentions. They were satisfied at first with joining those who only intended the redress of grievances, and to restore the government to its natural state. They hoped, as in effect it happened, that a strict examination of grievances and innovations would convince most of the members of a necessity to abolish the hierarchy, of which the court had made so great use in the execution of their designs. They proposed to shew, on all occasions, that it was in a manner impossible to restore the civil government, while the King had, in the church of England, clergy's a support capable of raising insuperable obstacles to the government's reformation. For this reason, at every opportunity, the Presbyterian leaders were the forwardest in exclaiming against grievances. They agravated chiefly those which related to innovations in religion, which they openly ascribed to a design of introducing Popery. All this was done with a view to load the hierarchy, and prelates in general, with the faults and ill conduct of some particular persons.

The other members who were of the church of England, tho' very opposite to the King, perceived what was the Presbyterians intention: but they were kept in awe by the fear of losing the assistance of the Scots, who supported this party, and rendered it very considerable; wherefore they durst nor displease the Presbyterian party, for fear of causing in the parliament a division, which must be fatal to the common cause, and consequently very much to the King's advantage. Beside, those I am speaking of, believed not the hierarchy to be absolutely necessary in the church, or that religion could not subsist without bishops: only the rigid episcopalians, and the King's party were of this opinion; but they made not a majority. Those therefore who had only in view the state's reformation, and not that of the church, could not however, without great inconveniencies, avoid shewing some condescension for the Presbyterians, for the above-hinted reasons. Perhaps they had not in their policy any other view than to gain time, 'till the civil grievances were redressed, without any design to go farther: but they had to deal with very able heads, who artfully led them beyond their original resolves.

The bishops attachment to the King increases.

On the other hand, the bishops perfectly well comprehended the Presbyterians drift, and that, in diminishing King Charles's power, their design was to render him unable to oppose the change they were meditating. They therefore adhered more firmly to the King's interest, and frequently, by the number of their suffrages, so managed that the upper-house voted directly contrary to the commons resolutions. But thereby they procured the Presbyterians a considerable advantage: for the latter thence took occasion to represent how advantageous it was for the King to have at his devotion so great a number of voices among the peers, and consequently, how impossible it would be to succeed in the intended reformation, so long as prelates had votes in the upper-house. This finally induced them to bring in a bill for the exclusion of all ecclesiastics from civil imployments, and the bishops in particular from a right of siting in the house of lords.

Views of the politicians.

Those who had in view only restoring the civil government, without interfering with the hierarchy, and whom I shall term the Politicians, tho' I know not whether they were ever so stiled, were greatly imbarassed. They evidently saw, that sundry abuses had creeped into the church, and would have readily agreed to their abolition, provided nothing more had been required: but it was proposed to advance a step farther, and exclude bishops from the upper-house, wherein they foresaw diverse inconveniencies, with regard to the interest of the church of England, to which they were attached. Tho' the Presbyterian party did not intirely discover themselves, and seemed to have no other view than to facilitate the redress of all abuses after the exclusion of bishops, it was easy to perceive their projects reached farther, and that their aim was to undermine the hierarchy. It is certain, there were no fewer inconveniencies in rejecting than consenting to the bill. By leaving the bishops in the upper-house, the King would be always secure of so many votes. As the peers were not then so numerous as at present, or otherwise imployed, and some also were Papists, the bishops, and Charles's other partisans greatly influenced the resolutions of the upper-house, as was daily experienced; and consequently the work of the government's reformation could not but meet with great obstacles. Contrariwise, rejecting the bill proposed would have disgusted the Presbyterian party, which was very considerable in the kingdom, chiefly by the support of the Scots, of whom there was great occasion, since it was by their means that the parliament was inabled effectually to labor a redress of grievances.

Question, by what title bishops sit in parliament.

Then began to be debated the famous question; By what title do bishops sit in parliament? It was not denied they had injoyed this privilege from the begining of the monarchy; but some pretended, they sat in parliament as barons only, on account of the crown-lands granted them by the Anglo Saxon Kings, for which they did homage to the King like all other barons. Others maintained, they had a seat there as representatives of the clergy, who could not be bound by the laws made in parliament, without giving thereto their consent, answerably to the nation's constant maxim, and the undeniable privilege which all English subjects had ever injoyed: that the lords gave their consent to the laws, for themselves, and the commons for all the commons of the kingdom, and therefore it was necessary, there should be in parliament representatives of the church and clergy, otherwise the maxim would be false, that no man can be bound by the laws to which he has not consented. They added farther, that the parliament had ever been deemed to consist of three estates, whereof the clergy had been always considered as one, whence they infered, that excluding from the parliament one of its three estates would be subverting the government's constitution.

Reasons for the bishops.

Reply to these reasons.

To these arguments it was answered: tho' it should be true that the clergy were one estate of parliament distinct from the rest of the people, which was contested, it followed not, that the bishops represented the whole church: that there were in the parliament two houses, one of lords, and the other of commons; and two houses in the convocation, the upper of the bishops, and the lower of the inferior clergy; and therefore, according to this rule, the inferior clergy should likewise have representatives in parliament, that they might be deemed to give their consent to the laws, which however was never pretended. Hence it was infered, the bishops did not represent the clergy, and urged, that this supposed representation was a new thing, unheard of before; and that, a few months since, the bishops would have been very angry to be counted only bare representatives: that tho' it was necessary the clergy should be represented in parliament, it would not follow that they ought to be represented by the bishops, as all the people of England were not represented by the lords: that the abbots had formerly a seat in parliament, not as representatives, but as being 'Tenants in chief,' and when they were excluded, it was not said, that a breach was made in the parliament's constitution, either by the exclusion of abbots, or dissolution of monasteries.

These, if I mistake not, are the main arguments alleged for and against prelates, with regard to their seat in parliament. This question was the more more difficult, as it had been never determined by what right the biſhops ſat in parliament. Very ſeemingly, from the monarchy's origin, 'till about the cloſe of Henry III's reign, the parliaments conſiſted ſolely of barons, who were in poſſeſſion of all the lands in England, for which they did the King homage: and in effect it appears, that the barons before then granted the King what monies were requiſite for the government's ſupport, without any mention of the commons. It may therefore be ſaid, that the lords ſat in parliament by a double title, viz. for themſelves, and as the nation's repreſentatives. But after the commons were introduced into parliament, and had a ſeparate houſe, the peers loſt the latter of theſe titles, and ſat only for themſelves, the people in general having other repreſentatives. The biſhops and abbots, who belonged to the body of peers, had probably their ſeat by a double title likewiſe, as poſſeſſors of baronies, and as repreſentatives of the clergy, ſecular and regular. But, as at introducing repreſentatives of the commons into parliament repreſentatives of the inferior clergy were not alſo introduced, the biſhops and abbots may be ſaid to preſerve their double title to ſit there, as poſſeſſors of baronies, and as repreſentatives of the clergy. The diſſolution of monaſteries in the reign of Henry VIII, rendered needleſs the repreſentation of the regulars, who no longer ſubſiſted; but it made no alteration in the right of biſhops, who, according to this ſuppoſition, repreſented the ſecular clergy, and continued to ſit in parliament, tho' the abbots were aboliſhed. But after all it muſt be acknowledged, that this repreſentation of the ſecular clergy by biſhops is only a ſuppoſition, which, tho' probable, cannot be ſaid to be ſo evident as not to be diſputed: but it rarely occurs that, in diſputes of this nature, juſtice and right alone are regarded. Tho' the reaſons which may be drawn from the thing itſelf are not neglected, yet thoſe are much more ſtrenuouſly urged, which are founded in intereſt and policy.

Repreſentations of the Preſbyterians to the politicians:

The leading Preſbyterians never ceaſed repreſenting to the politicians, the impoſſibility of reſtoring the government to its natural ſtate while prelates ſat in the houſe of peers; that the King had found means to gain the clergy to his intereſt, by expreſſing a fervent zeal for the church of England, and a great averſion to the Preſbyterians; that the clergy, and eſpecially the biſhops, were intirely devoted to the King, in the belief that he was their protector and only ſupport; that therefore they were perſuaded he could not be too powerful, ſince this power would be ſo advantageous to the clergy; that there were convincing proofs of this truth in the conduct of Laud, Wren, and other eccleſiaſtics, particularly Sibthorp, Montague and Manwaring, who had imployed their utmoſt indeavors to procure the King unlimited power; that the clergy in general were ſtill in the ſame diſpoſitions, and could do for the future as much miſchief as formerly, if care was not taken to humble their pride and power, by confining them within the bounds of their function.

who agree to the excluſion of biſhops.

All this the politicians granted, and beſide were not very well pleaſed with the biſhops and others of their cloth: but they were loth to yield, for fear the alteration propoſed might produce in church and ſtate others wherewith they did not care to meddle. Mean while, after long weighing the inconveniencies which might flow from their compliance or refuſal, they finally reſolved to ſacrifice the biſhops right, rather than hazard the ſeeing all their projects fall to the ground by ſuch obſtacles as might be raiſed by the prelates. Whether this reſolution was taken by the leaders at the begining of the parliament, which I think not unlikely, or whether it was neceſſary to uſe ſome time to prevail with the politicians, thoſe who ſollicited the thing judged that, before it came to be publicly debated, it was convenient to fill peoples minds with prejudices againſt the biſhops, and to cheriſh thoſe already entertained. The houſe wanted not opportunities to execute this deſign. The bill to take from the biſhops their ſeat in parliament was not voted in the houſe of commons 'till the eleventh of March 1640-1, and paſſed not the houſe of peers 'till the twenty-ſeventh of May following: but before the moving this bill, the lower houſe had taken ſeveral ſteps tending to inſenſe the people againſt prelates. The great number of petitions againſt biſhops in general, againſt epiſcopal government, againſt ſome particular prelates and other eccleſiaſtics, againſt innovations, againſt the late convocation, ſerved them for foundation to ſcrutiniſe the biſhops conduct with all the rigor their deſign required. Several pretend, all theſe petitions were ſollicited for; nor will I affirm the contrary, tho' I know nothing particular in the matter (1). There is no clearer evidence of the commons deſign, with regard to the biſhops, than their reſolution, on the twentieth of November, ſeventeen days after opening the parliament, viz. that on Sunday * the twenty-ſecond of the ſame month, every member ſhould be obliged to receive the communion, and bring with him a ticket of his name and place for which he ſerved, and that after the communion-day none ſhould ſit in the houſe but ſuch as had firſt received the ſacrament. This reſolution could be with no other view, than to prevent the commons from being eſteemed Preſbyterians, and on that pretenſe their reſolutions diſparaged. Thus, in the reign of Henry V. the houſe of commons, intending to give a mortal blow to the clergy, began with paſſing an act for burning heretics, leſt the clergy ſhould pretend that the houſe conſiſted only of ſuch.

* Here we have rectified a ſmall miſtake of M. Rapin.

To ſhew now all preparations made in the houſe of commons, before they proceeded in the bill I have been ſpeaking of, I ſhall juſt briefly run over the petitions which were preſented, the ſpeeches made on this ſubject, and the ſeveral reſolutions taken.

Proceedings of the commons concerning religion in 1640, and 1641. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 39. Nalſon, p. 516.

On the tenth of November, ſeven days after opening the parliament, ſir Edward Deering made a ſpeech in the houſe, to perſuade them to enter upon matters of religion. He took occaſion to preſent a petition from one Wilſon, a miniſter, againſt the archbiſhop who had ſuſpended him, and concluded with ſaying, "Our manifold griefs do fill "mighty and vaſt circumference, yet ſo that from "every part our lines of ſorrow do lead unto him, "and point at him the center, from whence our "miſeries in this church, and many of them in the "commonwealth, do flow."

The ſame day, was read the petition of Peter Smart, priſoner in the King's-bench, complaining of dr. Coſins's innovations in the church of Durham, and his proſecution of that priſoner in the high-commiſſion at York, where he was ſentenced and deprived of his living, and prebend of Durham.

Id. p. 518. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. p. 41.

(1) Lord Clarendon (Vol. I. p. 161.) ſays, their way was to prepare a petition very modeſt and dutiful for the form; and for the matter, not very unreaſonable; and to communicate it at ſome public meeting, where care was taken it ſhould be received with approbation: the ſubſcription of very few hands filled the paper itſelf where the petition was written, and therefore many more ſheets were annexed, for reception of the number which gave all the credit, and procured all the countenance to the undertaking. When a multitude of hands was procured, the petition itſelf was cut off, and a new one framed ſuitable to the deſign in hand, and annexed to the long liſt of names ſubſcribed to the former.

Charles I An' 1640.

Whereupon it was ordered, that he ſhould have liberty to go abroad in ſafe cuſtody, to proſecute his petition, which was refered to a commitee, who were to conſider by whoſe motion and means doctor Coſins was prefered to his late dignity (1). It was archbiſhop Laud they had a mind to fall upon. On the twenty-firſt, doctor Coſins was ſent for as a delinquent by the ſerjeant at arms.

Nalſon, p. 538. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 55.

The ſame day, ſir Edward Deering made a ſpeech, complaining, that there was a ſevere high-commiſſion eſtabliſhed in England, worſe than the Popiſh Inquiſition; that the archbiſhop of Canterbury affected the title and power of a patriarch, and acted like a Sovereign; that he allowed of the impreſſion of books in favor of Popery, of which he named ſeveral, and refuſed the ſame licenſe for printing orthodox writings. He moved that there might be a commitee to inquire into the great number of oppreſſed miniſters under the biſhops tyranny *; and to examine the licenſes granted for bad books, and refuſed for good books.

On the thirtieth, it was reported from the commitee for mr. Wilſon's petition, that he had been ſequeſtered four years from his living, only for not reading the Book of Sports on the Lord's-day: that after he was abſolved, he was proſecuted for not reading the prayer commanded by the archbiſhop to be read againſt the Scots.

On the firſt of December, was read a bill for reformation of abuſes in eccleſiaſtical courts.

p. 81.

Three days after, the houſe received a petition from two of the inhabitants of Cheſter, complaining of their having been inhumanly treated by the high-commiſſion at York, for viſiting mr. Pryn when he was going to his priſon in Caernarvon caſtle. Upon this petition the houſe appointed a numerous commitee to examine the juriſdiction of the two commiſſions of Canterbury and York, and the abuſes commited in thoſe courts.

p. 91.

On the ninth, a commitee was appointed to examine the proceedings of the late convocation, as well as the convocation-writs, whether they were the ſame with the writs of former times, and the opinions of the judges in that affair, and inquire how and by whom the commiſſion, which inabled the clergy to give and take the new oath, was withdrawn.

p. 93.

On the eleventh, the houſe received a petition ſubſcribed by a great number of Londoners (2) and the inhabitants of diverſe counties, containing twenty-eight grievances againſt epiſcopal government, the ſubſtance whereof was:

The Londoners and others petition againſt biſhops. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 39. Nalſon, p. 666.

1. Grievance. The biſhops ſubjecting and inthraling all miniſters under them and their authority, and ſo by degrees exempting them from the temporal power.

2. The faint-heartedneſs of miniſters to preach the truth of God, and oppoſe the progreſs of Arminianiſm, leſt they ſhould diſpleaſe the prelates.

3. The incouragement of miniſters to deſpiſe the temporal magiſtracy, and to live contentiouſly with their neighbors, knowing that they, being the biſhops creatures, ſhall be ſupported.

4. The reſtraint of many godly and able men from the miniſtry, and thruſting out of many congregations their miniſters, becauſe they could not in conſcience ſubmit to, and maintain the biſhops needleſs deviſes.

5. The ſuppreſſing the buying of impropriations, and placing therein able miniſters.

6 The great increaſe of ſcandalous men in the miniſtry, who, if they but wear a canonical coat, a ſurplice, a hood, and bow at the name of Jeſus, think they have fully diſcharged their duty.

Charles I An' 1640.

7. The diſcouragement of many from bringing up their children in learning; the many errors and ſtrange opinions in the church; great corruptions in the univerſities; the want of preaching miniſters in many places; the loathing of the miniſtry, and the general defection to all manner of profaneneſs.

8. The ſwarming of laſcivious and unprofitable books, in diſgrace of religion; as Ovid's Fits of Love, The Parliament of Women, &c.

9. The hindering of godly books to be printed; the bloting out or perverting, in thoſe which they ſuffer, whatever ſtrikes either at Popery or Arminianiſm; the adding of what pleaſeth them, and the reſtraint of re-printing books formerly licenſed, without re-licenſing.

10. The publiſhing Popiſh, Arminian, and other dangerous books and tenets; as "That the church "of Rome is a true church, and in the worſt times "never erred in fundamentals: that the ſubjects "have no propriety in their eſtates; but that the "King may take from them what he pleaſeth; "that all is the King's, and that he is bound by "no law, &c."

11. The growth of Popery, and increaſe of Papiſts, prieſts and Jeſuits; the frequent vending of crucifixes and Popiſh pictures, both ingraven and printed, and the placing ſuch in bibles.

12. The multitude of monopolies, and impoſitions upon all kinds of commodities, &c. (3).

13. That the church-government in England was upheld the ſame way as in the Romiſh church. Hence it was the prelates maintained, that the Pope is not Antichriſt, and forbad praying in the church for the Queen's converſion.

14. The great conformity of veſtures and ceremonies with thoſe of the church of Rome.

15 The ſtanding up at the Gloria Patri, and at reading the goſpel; praying towards the eaſt; bowing at the name of Jeſus; bowing to the altar; towards the eaſt; croſs in baptiſm; kneeling at the communion.

16. Turning the communion-table altar-wiſe; ſeting images and tapers upon them; reading the ſecond ſervice at the altar, which is termed the Mercy-ſeat; forcing people to come up thither to receive the ſacrament.

17. Conſecrating churches, chapels, fonts, &c. and re-conſecrating them upon pretended pollution.

18. The liturgy moſtly taken from the Romiſh Breviary, and the book of ordination framed out of the Roman Pontifical.

19. The multitude of canons; abuſe of excommunication; denying of appeals; the canons of the laſt ſynod.

20. Plurality of benefices; prohibiting marriages without licenſe at certain times, and licenſing marriages without bans aſking.

21. Profanation of the Lord's-day; ſuſpending and depriving miniſters for not reading a declaration for tolerating ſports on that day.

22. Preſſing the ſtrict obſervation of ſaints days, and drawing great ſums of money from peoples purſes for giving them leave to work on them.

23. The great increaſe of adulteries, &c. occaſioned by the prelates corrupt adminiſtration of juſtice in ſuch caſes, who taking upon them the puniſhment of it, do turn all into money for filling their own purſes.

24. The general abuſe of excommunication, which was inflicted for trivial matters, the abſolution whereof could not be obtained without money, &c.

25. The prelates claiming their office and juriſdiction to be Jure divino; their taking upon them temporal dignities, &c.

26. Their forcing people to take commiſſions out of their own courts.

27. The impoſing oaths upon church-wardens and ſideſmen, which they cannot take without perjury (1).

28. The great abuſe of eccleſiaſtical courts, and the biſhops uſurpations.

This petition ended with ſome conſiderations, the laſt whereof was, that the biſhops having occaſioned the war with Scotland, this war could be terminated only by the ſuppreſſion of epiſcopacy.

Their lordſhips contented themſelves with ordering, that divine ſervice ſhould be performed as appointed by acts of parliament; and that miniſters ſhould forbear introducing any innovations.

p. 145. The nineteenth, the city of Gloceſter preſented a petition againſt biſhops.

p. 152. The twenty-third, was read a petition of ſeveral miniſters, in behalf of themſelves and many others their brethren, praying a redreſs of certain irregularities in church-government. To this was annexed a remonſtrance, ſeting forth theſe pretended irregularities, and the great revenues and little uſe of deans and chapters.

All theſe petitions, which the houſe of commons received moſt graciouſly, being plain indications of that houſe's having ſome ſiniſter deſign againſt the biſhops, his Majeſty ſent for both houſes to attend him at the Banqueting houſe at Whitehall, where he thus addreſſed them: viz.

My lords, and you the knights, citizens and burgeſſes,

Charles's ſpeech to the parliament. Jan. 25. Ruſhworth, Vol, IV. p. 154. Nalſon, P. 735.

" THE principal cauſe of my coming here, at " this time, is by reaſon of the ſlow pro- " ceedings in parliament, touching which is a great " deal of inconvenience. Therefore I think it " very neceſſary to lay before you the ſtate of " my affairs as now they ſtand, thereby to haſten " (not to interrupt) your proceedings.

" Firſt, I muſt remember you, that there are " two armies in the kingdom, in a manner main- " tained by you, the very naming of which doth " more clearly ſhew the inconvenience thereof, " than a better tongue than mine can expreſs. " Therefore, in the firſt place, I ſhall recommend " unto you the quick diſpatch of that buſineſs. " In the next place, I muſt recommend unto you " the ſtate of my navy and forts; the condition " of both which is ſo well known unto you, that " I need not tell you the particulars, only thus " much; they are the walls and defenſe of this " kingdon, which, if out of order, all men may " eaſily judge what incouragement it will be to " our enemies, and what diſheartening to our " friends. Laſt of all (and not the leaſt to be con- " ſidered) I muſt lay before you the diſtractions " which are at this preſent occaſioned thro' the " connivance of parliament; for there are ſome " men who, more maliciouſly than ignorantly, " will put no difference between reformation, and " alteration of government. Hence it cometh " that divine ſervice is irreverently interrupted, and " petitions in an ill way given in neither diſputed " nor denied.

" But I will enter into no more particulars, but " ſhew you a way of remedy, by ſhewing you " my clear intentions, and ſome rocks which may " hinder this good work.

" I ſhall willingly and chearfully concur with " you for the reformation of all innovations both " in church and commonwealth, and conſequently " that all courts of juſtice may be reformed ac- " cording to law: for my intention is clearly to " reduce all things to the beſt and pureſt times, as " they were in the time of Queen Elizabeth. " Moreover, whatſoever part of my revenue ſhall " be found illegal, or heavy to my ſubjects, I " ſhall be willing to lay it down, truſting in their " affections.

" Having thus clearly and ſhortly ſet down my " intentions, I will ſhew you ſome rubs, and muſt " needs take notice of ſome very ſtrange (I know " not what term to give them) petitions given in " the name of diverſe counties, againſt the preſent " eſtabliſhed government, and of the great threaten- " ings againſt the biſhops, that they will make " them to be but cyphers, or at leaſt their voices " to be taken away. Now I muſt tell you, that " I make a great difference between reformation " and alteration of government; tho' I am for the " firſt, I cannot give way to the latter.

" If ſome of them have overſtretched their " power, and incroached too much upon the tem- " porality, if it be ſo, I ſhall not be unwilling " theſe things ſhould be redreſſed and reformed, " as all other abuſes, according to the wiſdom of " former times; ſo far I ſhall go with you: nay " farther, if upon ſerious debate you ſhall ſhew " me, that biſhops have ſome temporal authority " inconvenient to the ſtate, and not ſo neceſſary " for the government of the church, and upholding " epiſcopal juriſdiction, I ſhall not be unwilling " to deſire them to lay it down: but this muſt " not be underſtood, that I ſhall any way conſent " that their voices in parliament ſhall be taken " away; for in all the times of my predeceſſors " ſince the conqueſt, and before, they have in- " joyed it; I am bound to maintain them in it, " as one of the fundamental conſtitutions of this " kingdom. There is another rock you are on, " not in ſubſtance but in form; yet the form is ſo " eſſential that, unleſs it be reformed, it will marr " the ſubſtance.

" There is a bill lately put in concerning par- " liaments.

(1) This refers to an oath appointed by the biſhop of Wincheſter. Rapin.

(2) The paper was firſt delivered to the King, and recommended by him to the conſideration and juſtice of the houſe of peers. Nalſon, Vol. I. p. 727.

(3) They added; " That the King could not make a perfect law, for that he was not a perfect man; that they ought not " to obey him, but in civil things, &c." Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 144.

Charles I An' 1640.

" liaments. The thing I like well, to have frequent parliaments, but to give power to ſheriffs " and conſtables, and I know not whom, to uſe " my authority, that I cannot yield unto. But to " ſhew you, that I am deſirous to give you content " in forms which deſtroy not the ſubſtance, you " ſhall have a bill for this purpoſe; ſo that it " trench neither againſt my honor, nor againſt the " ancient prerogative of the crown, concerning " parliaments, to which purpoſe I have commanded " my learned counſel to wait upon you, my lords, " with ſuch propoſitions as I hope will give you " content; for I ingenuouſly confeſs, that frequent " parliaments are the beſt means to keep a right " underſtanding between me and my people, which " I ſo much deſire.

" To conclude, I have now ſhewn you the ſtate " of my affairs, my own clear intentions, and the " rocks I wiſh you to eſchew; in all which you " may perceive the deſire I have to give you con- " tent, as you ſhall find alſo by thoſe miniſters I " have, or ſhall have about me for the effecting " of theſe my good intentions, which I doubt not " will bring peace and happineſs to my ſubjects, " and contentment to you all.

" Concerning the conference, you ſhall have a " direct anſwer, which ſhall give you ſatiſ- " faction."

This ſpeech produced not the effect King Charles expected. Firſt, becauſe ſeemingly the excluſion of prelates was already reſolved, and his Majeſty's diſcourſe contained nothing capable of diverting that reſolution. Secondly, the high concern Charles expreſſed for the biſhops right was preciſely the main cauſe which made their excluſion deſired. Thirdly, that Prince ſeemed to banter the parliament, in ſaying, " if they would ſhew him that " the biſhops have any temporal authority incon- " venient to the ſtate, he ſhould not be unwilling " to deſire them to lay it down." As if the parliament, from the prelates pure condeſcenſion, ought to have expected the reformation of a power prejudicial to the ſtate; a maxim directly contrary to the parliament's then principles.

Complaint againſt Wren biſhop of Ely. Jan. 26. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 158.

Next day, a complaint was brought to the commons againſt Matthew Wren, for having, while biſhop of Norwich, by oppreſſions, innovations and requiring certain oaths, forced more than fifty families of that city to quit England.

The firſt of February, the commons began to examine the London miniſters remonſtrance againſt prelates. In the debate on this ſubject, ſome ſmart repartees paſſed between Grimſton and Selden. Grimſton argued thus: " That biſhops are Jure divino, is a " queſtion; that archbiſhops are not Jure divino, " is out of queſtion: now that biſhops, who are " queſtioned whether Jure divino, or archbiſhops, " who out of queſtion are not Jure divine, ſhould " ſuſpend miniſters who are Jure divino, I leave " to you to be conſidered." To which Selden replied; " That the convocation is Jure divino, is " a queſtion; that parliaments are not Jure divino, " is out of queſtion; that religion is Jure divino, " there is no queſtion: now, ſir, that the con- " vocation, which is queſtionable whether Jure " divino, and parliaments, which out of queſtion " are not Jure divino, ſhould meddle with re- " ligion, which queſtionleſs is Jure divino, I leave " to your conſideration."

Grimſton's and Selden's arguments. Ib. p. 165. Nalſon, p. 744.

I own theſe two arguments ſeem not to me equally forcible. The firſt ſuppoſes that, for the particular act of ſuſpending a miniſter, there muſt be a divine authority; a ſuppoſition ſeemingly very natural. The other ſuppoſes, that there is occaſion for the like authority to meddle with affairs of religion; a ſuppoſition which to me appears ſomewhat too general, and which ſhould be reduced to particular acts, to render this argument like the other.

Charles I An' 1640.

The fifth, on a complaint from the inhabitants of Wood-church in Kent, againſt their miniſter mr. Bowen, who, being likewiſe a juſtice of peace, had by color of that office done ſeveral things contrary to law, the houſe ordered, that the lord-keeper ſhould be deſired to leave out the clergy of England and Wales, on renewing the commiſſion of the peace. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 169.

The eighth and ninth, the houſe reſumed their debates concerning biſhops, and many ſpeeches paſſed, pro and con, by far too long to be inſerted. I ſhall content myſelf with obſerving that, tho' the point in queſtion was ſeemingly only to know, whether biſhops ought to be excluded from the houſe of peers, yet the arguments againſt them tended much farther, even to the utter abolition of epiſcopacy. p. 170, 187, Nalſon, p. 184.

I ſhall likewiſe animadvert that, among thoſe who ſpake for the biſhops, not one denied the prelates having abuſed their power: but they maintained, that theſe were perſonal faults, which might be puniſhed and prevented for the future, without any neceſſity of attacking epiſcopacy itſelf. Contrariwiſe, the biſhops adverſaries intimated, that there was no reforming epiſcopacy but by quite changing church-government. They ſaid, while biſhops exiſted, there would be ſo many uſurping tyrants, who would think more of eſtabliſhing their own grandure than of the peoples ſalvation: unluckily for the right reverend, they had but too many inſtances to confirm their opinion. Lord Falkland, who that day ſpake againſt biſhops, among other matters ſaid;

Part of lord Falkland's ſpeech againſt biſhops. Feb. 9. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 184. Nalſon, p. 690.

" We ſhall find them to have tythed minth and " aniſe, and have left undone the weightier works " of the law; to have been leſs eager upon thoſe " who damn our church, than upon thoſe who, " upon weak conſcience, and perhaps as weak " reaſon (the diſlike of ſome commanded garment, " or ſome uncommanded poſture) only abſtained " from it. Nay, it hath been more dangerous " for men to go to ſome neighbor pariſh, when " they had no ſermon in their own, than to be " obſtinate and perpetual recuſants; while maſſes " have been ſaid in ſecurity, a conventicle hath " been a crime; and which is yet more, the con- " forming to ceremonies hath been more exacted " than the conforming to Chriſtianity; and while " men for ſcruples have been undone, for attempts " upon ſodomy they have only been admoniſhed."

The oppoſition which the enemies of epiſcopacy then met with, in the execution of their deſigns, was ſtrong enough to retard it, but not capable to make them deſiſt. What they had juſt done was properly but an effort, in order to take more effectual meaſures hereafter. They were therefore contented with having prevailed on the houſe, that the Londoners petition ſhould be taken into conſideration, contrary to the opinion of thoſe who would have it rejected without reading. Beſide, what had been ſaid, on this occaſion, againſt the biſhops promoted puting in execution the project of taking away their votes in the houſe of peers, which moſt of the commons had already reſolved in private. They continued therefore to receive petitions againſt prelacy, and to take ſeveral ſteps tending to inſpire people with averſion for the biſhops, and all other church of England eccleſiaſtics.

The thirteenth of February, a bill was brought in for aboliſhing ſuperſtition, as ſuppoſing that biſhops had introduced into the church ſundry ſuperſtitious practiſes. p. 775. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 188. Ib. p. 202.

The firſt of March, the commons appointed a commitee to prepare reaſons to be offered to their lordſhips, that all eccleſiaſtics, throughout England and

Charles I An' 1640.

and Wales, ſhould be put out of the commiſſion of the peace.

The nineth, it was moved in the houſe, that a bill be drawn againſt pluraliſts *.

* Alio non-reſidents. Votes of the commons againſt biſhops. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 206. Nalſon, p. 786. Diurn. Occurr.

The ſame day, were preſented, from the commitee for the miniſters remonſtrance againſt the biſhops, three heads for the houſe's debate and conſideration. The firſt concerned their ſecular imploys, viz. their legiſlative and judicial power in parliament; their judicial power in the ſtar-chamber, and commiſſions for the peace; their imployment as privy counſellors, and temporal officers. The ſecond related to their ſole power in matters eccleſiaſtical, as ordination and cenſures. The third concerned the large revenues of deans and chapters, the little uſe of them, and the inconveniencies thence ariſing. The houſe, having debated on the firſt of theſe heads, came to theſe reſolutions:

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 212.

I. That the legiſlative and judicial power of biſhops, in the houſe of peers, is a great hindrance to the diſcharge of their ſpiritual function, prejudicial to the commonwealth, and fit to be taken away by bill, and that a bill be drawn to that purpoſe.

II. That for biſhops, or any other clergymen, to be in commiſſion of the peace, or to have any judicial power in the ſtar-chamber, or in any civil court, is a great hindrance to the diſcharge of their ſpiritual function, prejudicial to the commonwealth, and fit to be taken away; and that a bill be brought in for that purpoſe.

Doctor Pocklington's books ordered to be burned. Nalſon, p. 774. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 208, 229.

The ſame day, their lordſhips ordered the burning of two books, written by dr. Pocklington, intitled, Sunday no Sabbath, and Altare Chriſtianum.

The fifteenth, the commons ſent up to the lords articles againſt dr. Coſins, who was accuſed of introducing into the church of Durham diverſe innovations, tending to reſtore Popery.

The twenty-firſt of April, petitions againſt the hierarchy were preſented by Nottinghamſhire and Lancaſhire.

p. 235. Nalſon, p. 806. † A ſecond time.

The twenty-ſixth of the ſame month, was read † a bill, for puniſhing and fining the members of the late convocation. Archbiſhop Laud's fine was twenty thouſand pounds. There were others of ten thouſand pounds, of five thouſand, three thouſand, two thouſand, and no biſhop was fined under a thouſand. The other members were rated, each in proportion to his eccleſiaſtical revenues (1).

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 238. Nalſon, p. 240.

The ſame day, was read a bill for regulating abuſes in eccleſiaſtical courts.

It was evident, that the commons were projecting ſome great reformation in eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, and very poſſibly the deans and chapters were firſt to be attacked, their uſe not appearing ſo manifeſt. For this reaſon, dr. Hacket deſired leave to ſpeak before the houſe, on the behalf of deans and chapters, which was granted him: but when he had done, dr. Burgeſs was alſo ſuffered to anſwer his reaſons. Moreover both univerſities preſented petitions to the houſe on that account, but they produced not the leaſt effect.

Finally, the bill againſt prelates and other eccleſiaſtics exerciſing temporal juriſdiction paſſed in the houſe of commons, and was ſent up to the lords for their concurrence: but this bill meeting with great oppoſition from the peers, who put off the debate from day to day, the commons cauſed a new bill to be brought into their houſe, for quite laying aſide archbiſhops, biſhops, deans, archdeacons, &c. which was read the firſt time. While they were debating, whether it ſhould be read again or rejected, a meſſage came from their lordſhips, ſignifying, that they were ready to concur with them as to the former bill, except only taking away the biſhops votes in parliament: but the commons, without taking any notice of this offer, ordered the new bill to be read a ſecond time.

Charles I An' 1640.

The ſecond of June, at a conference between both houſes, the lords gave reaſons why they judged not biſhops ſiting in parliament illegal, alleging that, for their right to vote there, they conceived by the common and ſtatute law, and ancient practiſe, there was no queſtion of it. As for any inconveniencies, they did not yet underſtand any ſuch as might induce them to deprive the biſhops and their ſucceſſors of their right: but for removing them from the ſtar-chamber, council-table, or any office in ſecular affairs, they would fully concur with the commons.

Next day, heads for a conference with the peers were reported, containing nine reaſons, why biſhops ought not to have votes in parliament (2).

Reaſons why biſhops ought not to have votes in parliament. Ibid. Nalſon, p. 260.

"1. Becauſe it is a great hindrance to their miniſterial function.

"2. Becauſe they do vow and undertake at their ordination, when they enter into holy orders, that they will give themſelves wholly to that vocation.

"3. Becauſe councils and canons, in ſeveral ages, do forbid them to meddle in ſecular affairs.

"4. Becauſe the twenty-four biſhops have dependance on the two archbiſhops, and take their oath of canonical obedience to them.

"5. Becauſe they are but for their lives, and therefore are not fit to have legiſlative power over the honors, inheritances, perſons, and liberties of others.

"6. Becauſe of biſhops dependency and expectancy of tranſlation to places of greater profit.

"7. That the ſeveral biſhops have of late greatly incroached upon the conſciences and liberties of the ſubject; and they and their ſucceſſors will be highly incouraged ſtill to incroach; and the ſubject will be much diſcouraged from complaining againſt ſuch incroachment, if twenty-ſix of that order are to be judges upon that complaint. The ſame reaſon extends to their legiſlative power in any bill to paſs for the regulation of that power, upon any emergent inconveniency thereby.

"8. Becauſe the whole number of them are intereſted to maintain the juriſdiction of biſhops; which hath been found ſo grievous to the three kingdoms; that Scotland hath utterly aboliſhed it.

"9. Becauſe the biſhops, being lords of parliament, it ſets too great a diſtance between them and the reſt of their brethren in the miniſtry; which occaſions pride in them, diſcontent in others, and diſquiet in the church. And as to their having votes a long time, the anſwer is, if it be inconvenient, time and uſage are not to be conſidered with law-makers: ſome abbots voted as anciently in parliament as biſhops, yet are taken away."

Among theſe reaſons, the commons only inſinuated the principal in the ſixth article, which however was univerſally known, viz. that the biſhops had been too much devoted to the King, and countenanced arbitrary power.

Mean while, the commons ordered a bill to be

The ſeventh of June, their lordſhips voted for maintaining the biſhops right to ſit in parliament.

Preamble to the bill againſt epiſcopacy. p. 283.

"Whereas the government of the church of "England by archbiſhops and biſhops, their chan- "cellors and commiſſaries, deans, archdeacons, "and other eccleſiaſtical officers, hath been found "by long experience to be a great impediment to "the perfect reformation and growth of religion, "and very prejudicial to the ſtate and government "of this kingdom, &c.

Votes againſt the hierarchy. p. 285.

The fifteenth, the commons voted that all deans, deans and chapters, archdeacons, prebendaries, chanters, canons, and petty-canons, with their officers, ſhall be utterly aboliſhed: that all the lands taken from deans and chapters ſhall be imployed to the advancement of learning and piety, proviſion being made that his Majeſty be no loſer in his rents, firſt-fruits, and other duties; and that a competent maintenance ſhall be made to the ſeveral perſons concerned, if ſuch perſons appear not to be delinquents. Several ſpeeches, too long to be inſerted, were made on this occaſion.

p. 293. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 295.

The twenty firſt, the houſe being reſolved into a grand commitee to debate the bill for aboliſhing epiſcopacy, ſir Edward Deering in a ſpeech propoſed, that there ſhould be in every ſhire twelve divines and a preſident, to whom might be given what title they pleaſed, whether that of biſhop or any other: but this never was brought to any reſolution.

By what paſſed in the parliament, during the firſt months, with regard to the church, it is eaſy to comprehend that the commons conſidered this affair as a capital point, tho' they affected to let it paſs as dependent on the deſign of reforming the civil government: for ſcarce a day paſſed without ſome debate, directly or indirectly, on this topic. But, as this was not what alone the parliament had then in agitation, it will be neceſſary to break off the narrative, in order to touch on ſome other matters no leſs momentous.

King Charles could not but be highly diſguſted at the commons proceedings, as well in the affair of grievances, as in that relating to prelates. The two things he had moſt at heart, ſince his reign commenced, were ſtretching his prerogative, and maintaining the church of England in its full luſter, and biſhops in their whole authority. Nevertheleſs, on theſe two points the commons ſeemed to affect giving him daily mortifications, not only by their ſpeeches, but likewiſe by their votes and the bills they ſent up to the lords.

Proceedings of the commons againſt Papiſts.

But beſide grievances and epiſcopacy, there was another article wherein the commons expreſſed not any great complaiſance for his Majeſty, viz. the affair of the Catholics. Charles followed the King his father's method, i.e. he appeared to be intirely attached to the Proteſtant religion, and church of England; while, on the other hand, he protected and countenanced the Papiſts. But there was between father and ſon this difference; King James's religion was ever very dubious, nothwithſtanding his outward profeſſion of the Proteſtant creed; whereas King Charles was never charged with being actually a Papiſt, but by men of paſſionate and fiery ſpirits. However, diverſe particulars induced him to favor Romaniſts, which gave his enemies ſome advantage. 1. The example of the King his father, who, throughout his whole reign, could never be prevailed on to execute the laws againſt them. 2. Tho' the Papiſts would not take the oath of ſupremacy, they refuſed not to ſwear allegiance, and that was ſufficient for him to reckon them good ſubjects. 3. In his project of humbling the parliament, and reducing the commons to the ſole affair of ſupply, the parliament's deſiring execution of the laws againſt Papiſts ſufficed to throw him upon a contrary courſe, in order gradually to deſtroy their uſage of obtaining all their deſires thro' dint of importunity. 4. The Catholics having no other refuge but the King's protection, it was natural for them firmly to adhere to his perſon and intereſt, and Charles deemed himſelf obliged to grant them extraordinary protection to recompenſe their fidelity. 5. Nothing was more grating to the Puritans than to ſee Papiſts well received at court; and as King Charles deteſted the Puritans, he took a pleaſure in mortifying them, by careſſing their avowed adverſaries. 6. The Queen, for whom this Prince had a ſingular condeſcenſion, contributed not a little to inſpire him with a good opinion, if not of her religion, at leaſt of the profeſſors. 7. Archbiſhop Laud, who was a very rank Arminian, took care not to ſtrengthen the Calviniſtical party by inſenſing his Majeſty againſt Papiſts. 8. Laſtly, King Charles was naturally of a moſt inflexible diſpoſition, and this quality, added to his maxims of government, made him impatient of whatever tended to the curbing his will. Very ſeemingly, theſe are the reaſons which induced this Prince to countenance the Catholics, during the firſt fifteen years of his reign. He carried his regard for them ſo far, that not only the penal laws inacted againſt them were never executed, but the Papiſts were alſo conſidered at court as the beſt ſubjects; whereas the Puritans were regarded as enemies to both King and ſtate.

Reaſons why King Charles favored Papiſts.

The face of affairs being changed by calling this parliament, and Charles unable to protect the Papiſts, they were treated rigorouſly. It was ſuppoſed there was a ſettled deſign to introduce Popery, and that ſeveral biſhops and other churchmen were in the combination. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhops of Ely, and of Bath and Wells, dr. Coſins, ſecretary Windebank, and ſome others, were accuſed of being chiefly concerned in this affair, which was openly ſaid to be managed by the Queen and her confidents. Tho' this charge was perhaps carried too far, with reſpect to the particular perſons, it can ſcarcely be denied that they gave ſome cauſe for it by their procedure. Their hatred to the Preſbyterians made them not ſcruple making too near approaches towards Popery, in order to be at a greater diſtance from Preſbyterianiſm. This, if I miſtake not, was the true cauſe of all the innovations induced into the public worſhip, and of the inviolable attachment to the obſervance of certain indifferent, or unneceſſary rites and ceremonies. The church's governors chief aim was to widen continually the diſtance between Preſbyterianiſm and the church of England: but this policy, which was advantageous to the Puritans adverſaries while the King ruled abſolutely, turned wholly to their prejudice, becauſe in this parliament they were charged with more ſecret deſigns; in a word, of having intended to introduce Popery, and the puniſhment of faults commited by ſome hot and paſſionate perſons was made to fall on the whole church.

In all the parliament's proceedings againſt Papiſts, his Majeſty had properly nothing to ſay. He could not deny there being laws againſt recuſants, and that thoſe laws had not been executed, tho' he had ſeveral times ſolemnly promiſed it. It was no longer a proper ſeaſon to protect them openly, and therefore he iſſued proclamations, injoining execution of the laws, in order to content the parliament: but theſe proclamations were ſo artfully drawn, that they properly granted nothing of what they ſeemed to promiſe. More particularly, the parliament could never prevail on him to let the condemned prieſts be executed; whether Charles deemed theſe ſentences too rigorous, or the Queen's ſollicitations had a greater influence over him than thoſe of the parliament. I ſhall now proceed to the moſt material tranſactions, relating to Papiſts, during the firſt ſeven or eight months of this ſeſſion.

Report of the commitee touching the proclamation againſt recuſants. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 65. Nalſon, p. 569.

In the begining of this parliament, King Charles having publiſhed a proclamation againſt recuſants, the commitee, charged with examining it, reported, it was not according to the houſe's expectation, for theſe reaſons; viz.

1. In the clauſe wherein the proclamation commands all Popiſh recuſants, within fifteen days, to depart the city, &c. it is added, 'Without ſpecial "licenſe had thereunto:" So that if, by any means, they can obtain a licenſe from his Majeſty (which the commitee thinks they cannot) or from the lords of the council, biſhop, lieutenant, or deputy-lieutenant, then they are not within that clauſe.

2. The order to diſarm all recuſants, is limited to recuſants convict, and being ſo reſtrained, if any be armed and not convicted, a juſtice of peace cannot diſarm them.

3. Recuſants are commanded to depart to their own dwelling houſes; but as of late days there is great reſort of recuſants to London, Weſtminſter and places adjacent, there is no urging them from thence by law.

The commitee added, that many recuſants had letters of grace to protect their perſons and eſtates.

Ib. p. 571. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 68, 69, 70.

In the continuation of this report, a few days after, the commitee ſaid, That on examination of the keepers of two priſons only, Newgate and the Clink, they found ſixty-four prieſts and Jeſuits diſcharged in one year, ſome by privy-ſignet, others by warrants from the lords of the council, but moſt of them by warrants from ſecretary Windebank, without any mention of the King's pleaſure (1): that upon examination of the clerk of the peace for Middleſex, and the clerk of the crown in the King's-bench, it was found that, within the compaſs of ſeven or eight years, there had been ſeventy four letters of grace (2). Then they deſcended to particular circumſtances, concerning the diſcharge of ſeveral perſons condemned for treaſon, all by order of Windebank: they ſaid moreover, that they had diſcovered ſixty four letters of grace to ſtay proſecutions againſt Papiſts, directed to ſeveral counties and judges. It was added, that indeed the King had power to pardon the condemned; but to command no farther proſecution was contrary to law.

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 67.

The thirtieth of November, the commons deſired the general of the army to dimiſs all Popiſh officers (3); and moved his Majeſty, that all commanders and other officers, in any town or gariſon, who were Papiſts, might be removed. Charles replied; he knew of no Papiſt had the command of any place, but had however given orders to be more particularly informed.

The firſt of December, the houſe ordered the preparing a remonſtrance to his Majeſty, concerning the Pope's nuncio. This was count Roſetti, who exerciſed in England the function of nuncio, under color, that it was neceſſary to the Queen for matters of conſcience.

The fifth, the houſe diſpatched orders to all the juſtices of peace of Weſtminſter, London and Middleſex, injoining them to proceed againſt recuſants according to law, any inhibition or reſtraint notwithſtanding. CHARLES AN' 1640.

Buſineſs of Goodman the Jeſuit. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 153, 155, 157, 158, 165. Nalſon, P. 739, 746.

In January following, there was a ſort of diſpute between the King and commons, on account of John Goodman, a Jeſuit, who had been ſentenced to death, but was reprieved by his Majeſty. The houſes held diverſe conferences upon this ſubject, and at length agreed to join in a remonſtrance to the King, to move him, that the laws might be executed againſt prieſts and Jeſuits, and particularly againſt Goodman. Charles, who deſired to ſave this Jeſuit, alleged, That he had been condemned merely for being in orders of a prieſt, and had never been convicted or baniſhed before. But the two houſes repreſented to him, that this prieſt and Jeſuit had been a miniſter in the church of England, and had been formerly twice commited and diſcharged. To this his Majeſty replied, That if Goodman was put to death, the Proteſtants abroad in Catholic countries might ſuffer for it; but however, he would leave it to both houſes to act as they judged proper. Next day, Goodman ſent a petition to the King, which was immediately communicated to the houſe of lords, wherein he ſaid, That he was content to die, rather than live the ſubject of ſo great diſcontent between him and his people. As it appears not that the parliament inſiſted farther on this matter, it is likely Charles obtained his deſire, and ſaved the Jeſuit's life. But this ſort of victory failed not doing him ſome prejudice, in that his enemies thence took occaſion to repreſent, that there was no depending upon his proclamations or promiſes, with reſpect to Papiſts, ſince they were never executed. It is not doubted but the Queen ſollicited ſtrongly in Goodman's behalf.

The eleventh of February 1640, notice was given to the commons, that the Papiſts were preparing to execute ſome great deſign (4), and that, by the Queen's order, all Roman Catholics faſted every Saturday, for the proſperous ſucceſs thereof. Hereupon were iſſued orders, that all judges in their circuits ſhould effectually put in execution the penal laws againſt prieſts and Jeſuits (5).

In January laſt, the commons had begun to take into conſideration the contribution raiſed among the Roman Catholics, for carrying on the late war againſt the Scots, at the inſtance of her Majeſty, who wrote a circular letter to exhort them thereto. Walter Montague and ſir Kenelm Digby, were ſent for and examined, and the commons ſeemed reſolved vigorouſly to puſh this affair: but the Queen found means to appeaſe them by a meſſage, wherein ſhe ſaid, That ſhe was moved to raiſe money in that manner for the King's aſſiſtance, merely out of her tender affection to him, and if it were illegal, ſhe

The nature of theſe letters of grace was this: they were directed to archbiſhops, biſhops, judges, and all other the King's officers, to ſtay all proceedings againſt the perſons therein named.

was ignorant of the law, but promiſed to be more cautions for the future. She ſaid moreover; That, underſtanding the having one ſent to her from the Pope was diſtaſteful to the kingdom, ſhe was deſirous to give the parliament ſatisfaction, and in convenient time would remove him. This convenient time was not yet come in June following, when the nuncio Roſetti was ſtill with her Majeſty: but at length the commons having ordered him to be brought to the bar of their houſe to be examined, he hid himſelf, and on the morrow departed for Rome. Montague, Winter and ſir Kenelm Digby retired to France.

The Queen's confeſſor accuſed. p. 300, &c. Diurn. Occur.

Father Philips, the Queen's confeſſor, was alſo examined by the commons, who afterwards brought an accuſation againſt him to the lords, and againſt the ſuperior of the Capuchins belonging to the Queen. Poſſibly, this accuſation was only to frighten and oblige them to withdraw.

Theſe are all the material paſſages with regard to Catholics, before King Charles's journey to Scotland, which will be mentioned hereafter. It is time to return to the Scotiſh army, which we left at Newcaſtle.

Affairs with the Scots.

Charles had flattered himſelf, that the parliament would eſpouſe his cauſe againſt Scotland, and furniſh him with means to drive the Scots from England. This was the firſt, or rather the only affair he recommended in his firſt ſpeech to both houſes. But to be convinced how vain this hope was, it needs only be conſidered, that the leading men of that party which oppoſed the King, were thoſe who incouraged the Scots to enter England, and that this party was ſo ſuperior in the parliament, that but few of Charles's partiſans durſt utter a ſillable to ſupport his intereſt. It was this Scotiſh invaſion which conſtrained him to call a parliament, and inabled the parliament to break all that Prince's meaſures, and oblige him to admit the redreſs of grievances. In a word, it was ſolely by means of the Scots that the parliament had in their power to reſtore the government to its ancient and natural ſtate. They would therefore have acted againſt their own intereſt, and directly contrary to the end they propoſed, had they ſupplied his Majeſty with means to expel the Scots from England: accordingly, they took not one ſtep that way tending. On the contrary, it evidently appeared, that they conſidered the Scots as brethren, who, having the ſame intereſt as the Engliſh, were come to aſſiſt and act in concert with them.

The ninth of November, ſix days after opening the parliament, ſir William Widdrington, knight of the ſhire for Northumberland, ſpeaking concerning the matter of a petition, preſented by that county on account of the oppreſſions they labored under from the Scotiſh army, termed the Scots, invading rebels. The houſe was ſo offended at this expreſſion that Widdrington eſcaped impriſonment only by recanting, and promiſing never more to ſtile them rebels. Nothing was more capable to convince Charles how averſe the commons were from aiding him againſt the Scots: but this was not the only mark they gave of their intention. Firſt, they thought proper to make the Scots a preſent of three hundred thouſand pounds, in recompenſe for their brotherly aſſiſtance to England. Secondly, they found means to prolong the negociation for peace 'till the ſeventh of Auguſt 1641, that is, 'till almoſt all the grievances were redreſſed, the triennial bill paſſed, and another, that the parliament ſhould not be diſſolved but by a particular act for that purpoſe. All this was very remote from the hopes wherewith Charles had flattered himſelf, that he ſhould have a ſufficient ſupply to compel the Scots to return home. As the troubles of Scotland were the fountain and origin of whatever paſſed in this parliament, I am perſuaded the reader will not be diſpleaſed at ſeeing here a ſuccinct account of the negociation of peace between King Charles and the Scots, between Scotland and England. What follows is the ſubſtance of the earl of Briſtol's ſpeech to both houſes, when he was ſelected by the lords-commiſſioners to acquaint them with what had thitherto paſſed in that affair.

The earl of Briſtol's relation of his negociation with the Scots. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 6.

" The commiſſioners imployed by his Majeſty " intend not to look farther back into the buſineſs, " than the acts of their own imployments; they " intend to give no account of the pacification " interrupted, nor war renewed; no account how " the armies in England, Ireland, and by ſea were " deſigned; they purpoſe not to lay fault upon " any man, nor to inquire into the cauſe why the " Scots (as they pretended from neceſſity) were " drawn to enter this kingdom; nor why the " King's army, when ſervice was to be done, was " out of the way; but that thoſe thro' whoſe hands " theſe have paſſed, may hereafter give their own " account.

" His Majeſty having called his great council " at York, made to them two propoſitions. The " firſt was, how his army ſhould be relieved and " maintained? To this the lords reſolved to ingage " themſelves, and to ſend deputies to London to " negociate a ſupply. The ſecond propoſition " was that, after the Scots had paſſed Northumber- " land, taken Newcaſtle, and poſſeſſed the biſhop- " rick of Durham, they ſent a petition to his Ma- " jeſty, which contained in general terms a deſire " to have their grievances taken into conſideration. " Upon receit of his Majeſty's anſwer, the Scotiſh " lords ſent his Majeſty a ſecond petition, in which " they made their particular demands, and declared " that, according to his Majeſty's command, they " would advance no farther into England. So " his Majeſty aſked the lords, what anſwer ſhould " be made to that petitionary letter? The lords " replied, that it was impoſſible for them to give " any well-grounded advice, unleſs the true ſtate " of his affairs, and the condition of his army " were laid before them. Whereupon his Ma- " jeſty commanded the earl of Traquair to make " the narration of the Scotiſh buſineſs, and their " late acts of parliament, and the lord-lieutenant- " general * to give account in what condition the " army ſtood.

His Majeſty's " foot army, conſiſting of twelve or fourteen " thouſand man in Newcaſtle, likewiſe retired to " York, whereby the town of Newcaſtle, a place " of great conſideration, was fallen into the Scots " hands, and the biſhoprick of Durham brought " under contribution.

" In this ſtate the gentry of that biſhoprick " repaired to his Majeſty; from whom they were " refered to the earl of Strafford, who gave them " this anſwer poſitively; That they could look for " no help nor protection from the King, and there- " fore they might uſe the beſt means they could to " preſerve their lives and eſtates; whereby they " were forced to conſent to a very heavy contri- " bution, tho' ſuch without which the Scotiſh army " could not ſubſiſt. This contribution was eight " hundred and fifty pounds a day for the biſhop- " rick of Durham, Northumberland, and New- " caſtle. Theſe gentlemen much lamented their " eſtates, that the Scots ſhould be irritated by " being proclaimed traitors.

" another of ten thouſand out of Ireland, and by " proclamation declared traitors and rebels; and " having heard of another army providing, of eight " or ten thouſand, by ſhiping to hinder their trade, " at leaſt their commerce with England, that they " were drawn together by neceſſity, as they pre- " tended, of defenſe. They farther alleged, that " it was a common diſcourſe, of which they had " ſeen papers, that they ſhould be reduced into a " province, which would be but one ſummer's " work. Therefore they had drawn their power " together, and being aſſembled, and their coun- " try poor, taking advantage of the time, while " all thoſe armies which ſhould oppoſe them were " out of the way, they were forced to enter Eng- " land.

" Thus the great council of lords, found that " the Scots had increaſed their confines near four- " ſcore miles in England, and had paſſed the rivers " of Tweed and Tine; and that the river of Tees, " the boundary of Yorkſhire, was not to be de- " fended, being fordable in many places by forty " horſe in front: that if the Scots ſhould paſs that " river, there was no poſſibility to hinder them " from coming to York, without hazarding a bat- " tle, which the earl of Strafford declared to them " he would not adviſe, becauſe the King's army " conſiſted of troops untrained, and unuſed to " arms.

" This being the caſe, the lords adviſed his " Majeſty that the Scots and their grievances might " be heard: and whereas their complaint had " been, that their petitions to his Majeſty had " been conveyed by conduits of an evil reliſh, " that there might be choſen ſuch lords-commiſ- " ſioners of whoſe integrity they could not doubt. " The King was pleaſed to refer the choice of " theſe commiſſioners to the great council: and " to them power was given, under the great ſeal " of England, to hear whatſoever the Scots could " lay before them, and to enter into treaty with " them.

" When this was propoſed to the Scots commiſ- " ſioners, they repreſented, that the countries where " they lay were become poor; that they could not " think, as their affairs ſtood, of returning home; " that his Majeſty had reſtrained them from paſſing " farther into England; ſo that a treaty in this " exigent was worſe than a war, unleſs means might " be thought upon how they might ſubſiſt while the " treaty was on foot; otherwiſe they ſhould be " obliged to plunder the country.

" The commiſſioners having diſpatched ſome of " their company to acquaint his Majeſty with the " Scots demands, a commiſſion was given them by " the King to treat with the Scots for a maintenance, " and the commiſſioners thought that, inſtead of " giving them any allowance, they ſhould be left " to their proportion of that contribution of eight " hundred and fifty pounds a day, already agreed " on by the counties, as leſs diſhonorable than to " aſſign them maintenance. Accordingly, the pre- " liminaries were agreed upon; the treaty of ceſſa- " tion concluded, and the commiſſioners adviſed " his Majeſty to ratify it, which was done. The " parliament approaching, their lordſhips adviſed " his Majeſty to transfer the treaty from Rippon to " London; whereto his Majeſty conſented.

" To excuſe the preliminaries agreed on at Rip- " pon, the earl of Briſtol added, that it was indeed " hard to pay the Scots a contribution of eight " hundred and fifty pounds a day, and that there " was already ſome doubt that the countries were " not able to bear it: but that, on the other ſide, " it was objected by the Scots, that it was impoſ- " ſible, if the payment ſhould fail, to keep their " promiſe, or to obey his Majeſty, but that they " ſhould be neceſſitated againſt their will to plun- " der the country. For which reaſons the earl of " Strafford had declared, that the counties of Cum- " berland and Weſtmoreland being under the Scots " power, it was reaſonable that 'in ſubſidium' " they ſhould contribute ſome help to their neigh- " bors: but he added, that the commiſſioners left " at Durham had written, that it was impoſſible " for them to proceed in the agreement; which if " it were broken on their part, the Scots would " allege an impoſſibility to conſent to ſtarve; ſo " that if ſome means were not found, by which " thoſe counties ingaged might be relieved, he was " afraid all their labor and treaty would come to " nothing. Therefore the commiſſioners, and all " the lords, ingaged themſelves faithfully and truly " to declare all theſe things to the parliament.

CHARLES I AN' 1640.

" The earl of Briſtol declared farther, that it " was far from the lord-commiſſioners purpoſe to " move any ſupply of money from the houſe of " commons, but to lay the cauſe before them; " avering certainly, that if ſome courſe was not " taken, the whole kingdom would be put into " diſorder. Armies would not ſtarve; retiring " was not yet in the thoughts of the Scots; there- " fore they muſt plunder and deſtroy, or advance " into Yorkſhire, and ſo farther into England to " ſeek ſubſiſtance; the prevention whereof did " highly import the King and kingdom.

" Laſtly, the earl propoſed to the parliament " another thing, no leſs worthy of conſideration, " viz. That if the Scots army were provided of a " competency, it were very ſtrange there ſhould " not an equal care be had for maintaining the " King's army. He ſaid the Scots army was ſtrong " and powerful, and little other reſiſtance againſt " it but the impediments of an army marching in " winter; but whether it were fit for a kingdom " to be truſted to accidents of froſts, with a peo- " ple bred in Swedeland (1) and cold countries, " he left to their diſcretion. He confeſſed, that " the Scots had made great proteſtations, and with " great execrations avered, that they had no intent " to advance forward, but return when they ſhall " have received ſatisfaction: yet the commiſſioners " did not conceive that the kingdom ſhould rely " upon promiſes and proteſtations. Many acci- " dents might happen, when a nation, come from " a far country to a better, ſhould be told, the " buſineſs they came about was juſt, and their quar- " rel good; who, finding themſelves in af at paſture, " may pick quarrels with their leaders if they ſhould " go about to prevent them. Upon theſe grounds " his lordſhip preſented to the general conſideration, " the ſupply of his Majeſty's army, that it be not " diſbanded; which if it ſhould come to paſs, " Yorkſhire, and other parts of England were left " to the Scots diſcretion. His lordſhip ſaid, he " durſt not ſay the Scots would not come forward, " but that it was in their power if they would; " and therefore he recommended this repreſenta- " tion to the whole body of the kingdom, to pre- " vent future dangers."

There was no occaſion to uſe many arguments to induce the parliament to allow that the Scotiſh army ſhould be maintained in England. Upon the earl of Briſtol's report, it was reſolved, " that the " commons approve the perſons of thoſe lords " who were commiſſioners in the late treaty, to

(1) This alludes to the ſix thouſand Scots ſent by King Charles to the King of Sweden, under command of marquis Hamilton. Theſe troops ſerved in Germany, and never in Sweden. Rapin.

" be commiſſioners now to treat with the Scots " commiſſioners in this declaration, that no con- " cluſion of theirs ſhould bind the commons, with- " out their conſent in parliament." Tho' the Scotiſh army was very expenſive to England, yet the negociation held 'till the ſeventh of Auguſt 1641, when the treaty was finally ſigned. I ſhall inſert here a ſummary of the articles, that it may be ſeen; firſt, wherein conſiſted the differences between King Charles and the Scots, and the difficulties of a pacification; and ſecondly, what was the fruit of Charles's grand project, of reducing the kirk of Scotland to a perfect conformity with the church of England, and perhaps of rendering himſelf abſolute in Scotland, as in ſome meaſure he was in England when he formed this enterpriſe.

Subſtance of the treaty concluded between England and Scotland, the ſeventh of Auguſt, 1641.

Tteaty with Scotland. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 362, &c.

" FIRST, the Scots declare that, by their " treating with the Engliſh parliament, they " do not acknowledge any dependence of Scotland " upon England, &c.

1. The Scots firſt demand.

" That his Majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed " to command, that the acts of the late parliament, " of Scotland may be publiſhed in his Majeſty's " name, with conſent of the eſtates of parliament " convened, by his Majeſty's authority, the ſecond " of June, 1640.

Anſwer. His Majeſty doth, in the word of a King, promiſe the publiſhing of the ſaid acts, with the acts to be made in the next ſeſſion of the ſame parliament; and that all the ſaid acts have in all time coming the ſtrength of laws, &c.

2d Demand. " That the caſtle of Edinburg, " and other ſtrengths of the kingdom ſhould be " furniſhed, and uſed for defenſe and ſecurity of the " kingdom.

Anſwer. Agreed.

3d Demand. " That Scotiſh men, within his " Majeſty's dominions of England and Ireland, " may be freed from cenſure for ſubſcribing the co- " venant, and be no more preſſed with oaths and " ſubſcriptions, unwarranted by their laws, and " contrary to their national oath and covenant ap- " proved by his Majeſty.

Anſwer. Granted, with regard to the ſubjects of Scotland who ſhall be ſojourners only in England or Ireland: but ſuch ſhall be excepted as are ſettled inhabitants in either of the two kingdoms. The Engliſh and Iriſh ſhall have the like privilege in Scotland.

4th Demand. " That whoſoever ſhall be found, " upon trial and examination, by the eſtates of " either of the two parliaments, to have been the " authors and cauſers of the late and preſent troubles " and combuſtions, whether by laboring to make " and foment diviſion between the King and his " people, or between the two nations, or any other " way, ſhall be liable to the cenſure and ſentence of " the ſaid parliaments reſpectively, the Engliſh to " the parliament of England, and the Scots to that " of Scotland.

Anſwer. His Majeſty believeth he hath none ſuch as incendiaries about him; and therefore he can make no other declaration, than that all his courts of juſtice are free and open to all men. His parliament in this kingdom is now ſiting, and the current parliament of Scotland near approaching the time of their meeting. To either of which, he doth not prohibit any of his ſubjects to preſent their juſt grievances and complaints, of whatſoever nature.

And whereas it was farther demanded, that his Majeſty would be pleaſed not to imploy any perſon or perſons, in office or place, who ſhall be judged incapable by ſentence of parliament, his Majeſty agreeth thereto; nor will he make uſe of their ſervice without the conſent of parliament, nor grant them acceſs to his perſon.

5th Demand. " That their ſhips and goods, and " all damage thereof may be reſtored.

Anſwer. This is condeſcended to, on condition it be reciprocal. And the Scotiſh commiſſioners having informed, that about fourſcore ſhips of Scotland are yet ſtayed in the Engliſh ports, and are like to ſuffer much farther loſs and damage; it is agreed, warrants ſhall be preſently granted for their delivery, and that four thouſand pounds be preſently advanced, for helping the preſent ſeting forth of the ſaid ſhips.

6th Demand. " That for the loſſes which the " kingdom of Scotland hath ſuſtained, and for the " vaſt charges they have been put to, reparation " be made.

Anſwer. The parliament of England grants to the Scots, for this purpoſe, the ſum of three hundred thouſand pounds.

And whereas it was deſired by the Scotiſh commiſſioners, that the Engliſh commiſſioners would let them know the ſecurity, manner and terms of payment of the aforeſaid ſum, and of the arrears due for relief of the northern counties; it was agreed, by order of the parliament, that they ſhould have fourſcore thouſand pounds, with the whole arrears due to the army, before the diſbanding thereof: and for paying the remnant of the ſaid ſum, an act of parliament of public faith ſhall paſs for ſecurity thereof; and that one moiety ſhall be paid at Midſummer 1642, and the other moiety a year after, in 1643.

And in like manner, whereas it was deſired by the Scotiſh commiſſioners, that they might know to whom they ſhould addreſs themſelves for payment of the forementioned ſums, the parliament hath appointed commiſſioners——and reſolved that the place of payment ſhall be the chamber of London. And laſtly, that a ſafe conduct ſhall be granted for the ſecure tranſporting of the monies to Scotland.

7th Demand. " That all ſuch declarations, pro- " clamations, books, libels, &c. as have been " made againſt the ſubjects of Scotland, may be " ſuppreſſed and deſtroyed.

Anſwer. It is agreed, that all ſuch declarations, &c. be reciprocally ſuppreſſed in England, Ireland and Scotland.

8th Demand.

Containing ſeveral articles.

" 1. That all tokens and ſhews of hoſtility upon " the borders of the two kingdoms may be taken " away; and particularly, that not only the gari- " ſons of Berwick and Carliſle may be removed, " but that the works may be ſlighted, and the " places diſmantled (1).

Anſwer. His Majeſty is deſirous, that all things between the kingdoms of England and Scotland be reduced into the ſame ſtate they were in before the begining of the late troubles.

" 2. That there be unity in religion, and uni- " formity of church-government between the two " nations.

Anſwer. His Majeſty, with the advice of both houſes of parliament, doth approve of the affection of his ſubjects of Scotland, in their deſire of having a conformity in church-government between the two nations; and as the parliament hath already taken into conſideration the reformation of church-government, ſo they will proceed in due time, as ſhall beſt conduce to the glory of God, the peace of the church, and of both kingdoms.

"3. That the King's Majeſty and the Prince "come and reſide ſometimes in Scotland.

Anſwer. His Majeſty will repair thither, as he ſhall find the urgency of their affairs require his preſenſe, and his other conveniencies here permit.

"4. That the officers of ſtate, counſellors and "ſeſſioners, within the kingdom of Scotland, be "placed by advice of parliament.

Anſwer. His Majeſty promiſes to give ear ſo far to the informations of his parliament, and, when the parliament is not ſiting, of his council and college of juſtice, as that he ſhall either make choice of ſuch as they ſhall recommend unto him, or, if he thinks another perſon fiter than any of thoſe recommended, he ſhall make the ſame known to the parliament, or in the time between parliament to the council and ſeſſion, that if there is juſt exception againſt the life and qualification of the ſaid party, he may timely nominate ſome other, againſt whom there ſhall be no juſt exception. His Majeſty declares alſo, that the places in the college of juſtice, ſhall be provided unto the judges, 'Quamdiu ſe 'bene geſſerint.' If this anſwer cannot content the Scotiſh commiſſioners, his Majeſty remits the whole anſwer to be conſidered by him, or his commiſſioners, at the parliament, at the next ſiting thereof.

"5. That his Majeſty would be pleaſed to place "about his own perſon, in places of greateſt near-"neſs and truſt, ſome of his Scotiſh ſubjects.

Anſwer. His Majeſty ſhall continue the ſame care which hitherto he hath done for their ſatisfaction in this particular; and not only ſo, but ſhall alſo recommend the ſame to the Prince his ſon.

"6. That none may have place about his Ma-"jeſty, and the Prince, but ſuch as are of the re-"formed religion.

Anſwer. His Majeſty doth conceive, that his ſubjects of Scotland have no intention by this propoſition (eſpecially by way of demand) to limit, or preſcribe unto him the choice of his ſervants, but rather to ſhew their zeal to religion; wherein his own piety will make him do therein that which may give juſt ſatisfaction to his people.

"7. That the copper coin which hath paſſed in "Scotland this long time, for ſeven times and a-"bove as much as the true value and worth "thereof, be newly regulated; and that no cop-"per money be coined hereafter without conſent "of the eſtates convened in parliament.

Anſwer. His Majeſty recommends this matter to the inſuing parliament of Scotland, not only concerning the copper coin to be coined hereafter, but alſo the copper money already coined, how the ſame ſhall paſs in payment for the time to come.

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 370.

After theſe articles, there was added to the treaty, the draught of an act of oblivion, the moſt ample that could be, which was to paſs in all the parliaments of the three kingdoms, but of which the benefit was not to extend to the Scotiſh prelates, the earl of Traquair, ſir Robert Spoteſwood, ſir John Hay, and mr. Walter Balcanqual.

Id. p. 373.

Lord Loudon having carried this treaty to Scotland, to communicate it to the parliament of that kingdom, now aſſembled, returned ſome time after with twelve articles, explaining certain paſſages of the treaty, and whereto the Engliſh commiſſioners returned anſwers which were approved. Theſe articles with the anſwers were added to the treaty. In fine, the treaty was confirmed and ratified by an act of parliament inſerted at the end, to this effect:

CHARLES I AN' 1640.

"Be it therefore inacted by his Majeſty, with P. 374. "the aſſent of the lords and commons in this "preſent parliament aſſembled, that the ſaid treaty, "and all the articles thereof aſſented to, as afore-"ſaid, be and ſtand for ever ratified and eſtabliſhed, "and have the force, vigor, ſtrength and authority "of a law, ſtatute, and act of parliament.

(The ſame for Scotland.)

"And his Majeſty for himſelf, and his ſucceſſors, "doth promiſe 'in verbo principis,' never to "come in the contrary of this ſtatute and ſanction, "or any thing therein contained; but to hold the "ſame in all points firm and ſtable, and ſhall "cauſe it to be truly obſerved by all his Majeſty's "leiges, according to the tenor and intent thereof, "for now and ever. Like as the parliament of "both kingdoms give full aſſurance, and do make "public faith, in the name of both kingdoms re-"ſpectively, for the true and faithful obſervance of "this treaty, and whole articles thereof inviolably, "hinc inde,' in all time to come."

As Charles afterwards ſuppoſed he had reaſon to complain, that the Scots had violated this treaty in two of the principal articles, I am of opinion the reader will be glad to ſee at large theſe two articles whereon this complaint was grounded. They are contained in the act of oblivion, under theſe words:

A particular clauſe concerning the war. Id. p. 371.

"It is agreed, that an act be paſſed in the par-"liament of England; that the kingdoms of Eng-"land or Ireland ſhall not denounce nor make "war upon the kingdom of Scotland, without "conſent of the parliament of England: as, on "the other part, it ſhall be inacted there, that the "kingdom of Scotland ſhall not denounce nor "make war againſt the kingdom of England, or "Ireland, without conſent of the parliament of "Scotland.

"And in caſe any of the ſubjects of either "kingdom ſhall riſe in arms, or make war againſt "any of the kingdoms and ſubjects thereof, with-"out conſent of the parliament of that kingdom "whereof they are ſubjects, or upon which they "do depend, that they ſhall be held, reputed and "demeaned as traitors to the ſtates whereof they "are ſubjects."

It afterwards occurred that the King and parliament making war upon each other, the Scots ſent an army to aſſiſt the Engliſh parliament againſt King Charles, whence he infered, that to make war againſt him, was to make war againſt England. The Scots, on the contrary, pretended that, very far from making war againſt England, they ſent their troops thither on purpoſe to aſſiſt that kingdom. It is eaſy to perceive, that from the diverſity of principles proceeds the diverſity of conſequences.

Charles concedes to the Scots all they demand. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 375, 383. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 439, &c.

To finiſh in a word what relates to Scotland, I ſhall only add, that the King went thither in Auguſt 1641, ſtayed there 'till the ninteenth of November, aſſiſted in perſon at the parliament, and gave the royal aſſent to all the acts tendered him. To this came the projects he had formed with regard to Scotland, from the begining of his reign (1).

He reſents the mortifications given him in England.

What has hitherto been ſaid of the parliament's behavior towards his Majeſty, is ſufficient to ſhew, how ſenſible that Prince muſt have been of the mortifications he daily received. He had paſſionately deſired to be revenged on the Scots, or at leaſt to expel them the kingdom; and he ſaw that the parliament made them a preſent of three hundred thouſand pounds to reward them for their coming.

He

Charles I An' 1640.

He hated the Preſbyterians, and would moſt gladly have had it in his power utterly to exterminate Preſbytery; but he perceived that, on the contrary, the houſe of commons openly took their part, and labored to deſtroy epiſcopacy. His two principal miniſters in whom he moſt confided, were in the Tower, and he readily comprehended that the commons deſigned not to ſtop there, ſince, with regard to the earl of Strafford, they were daily ſeeking means to make good their charge. Two others of his miniſters had been forced to flee, and the appearing ſtill well-affected to him ſufficed to render any perſon the object of the commons perſecution.

We have already ſhewn after what manner King Charles governed during fifteen years, and the reader muſt be convinced that he intended to alter the government, and procure for himſelf and ſucceſſors a power far more extenſive than what was allowed him by the laws, and to which none of his predeceſſors, Richard II excepted, had ever pretended. I except not even Henry VIII, the moſt abſolute of all the Kings of England, ſince William the Conqueror. But there was between Henry VIII, and Charles I, this difference. Henry did whatever he pleaſed by way of parliament; whereas Charles was for ruling without parliaments, looking on them as little neceſſary to the government's conſtitution. Since this parliament aſſembled, ſcarce a day had paſſed, but the commons attacked this Prince's project, by declaring illegal what he had done during fifteen years, or by rigorouſly proſecuting the inſtruments he had uſed to execute his deſigns. It is therefore eaſy to gueſs how far Charles muſt have been touched with all theſe mortifications, and with what impatience he bore the parliament's haughty deportment towards him. Nothing was more contrary to his inflexible humor, than to be forced to ſtoop to a houſe of commons, for whom he had thitherto expreſſed the utmoſt contempt. It is not therefore to be wondered at if, in the melancholy poſture of his affairs, he ſhould meditate ſome way to free himſelf from this thraldom. But one ſlight attempt to compaſs this end ſerved only to hurry him into irretrievable deſtruction.

Difference between Charles I and Henry VIII.

Plot to get the army to declare for the King: Clarendon, p. 191, &c. 210. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 271. Manch. Mem. Warwick.

This was a project of gaining the army, and cauſing it to declare for his Majeſty. Charles approved the ſcheme without foreſeeing the conſequences; not having any miniſter about him who had either the inclination or ability to give him wholeſome counſel. I am ſenſible this is a place full of dangerous rocks, whereon a hiſtorian cannot eaſily avoid ſpliting. This plot to gain the army is by ſome looked on as a chimera, a mere fiction, to render King Charles odious. But, on the other hand, the parliament conſidered it as a real conſpiracy, and pretended to draw thence evident proofs that this Prince's compliance to redreſs grievances, was all diſſimulation and grimace, in expectation of ſome opportunity forcibly to reſtore himſelf to the ſituation he was in before this parliament. This bred in the parliament a moſt inſuperable diſtruſt of the King, and a reſolution to put it out of his power to break his word, and the means they uſed to execute this reſolution occaſioned thoſe inteſtine wars whereof I ſhall treat hereafter. It is therefore abſolutely requiſite we examine this conſpiracy, in order to diſcover whether it was real or ſuppoſitious; ſince thence flow all the inſuing proceedings of King and parliament, and upon this it is that the intelligent and unbiaſſed reader may cenſure either of the parties. But before I proceed to this combination, it will be neceſſary to ſay a few words of the earl of Strafford's affair, with which this has ſome connexion.

which does him great prejudice.

Neceſſity of examining the reality of this plot.

Its connexion with the earl of Strafford's affair.

Charles I An' 1640.

That noble perſonage had been impeached by the commons, the eleventh of November, 1640; but his proceſs could not be ready for trial before the twenty-ſecond of March 1640-1. This trial held 'till the twelfth of April, and then the commons, who had been conſtantly preſent, doubtleſs finding that the ſentence would not be ſo rigorous as they wiſhed, reſolved to proceed againſt that earl by way of bill of attainder. They therefore, on the ſixteenth and ninteenth of April, voted it to have been ſufficiently proved, that the earl of Strafford had indeavored to ſubvert the kingdom's fundamental laws, and introduce arbitrary and tyrannical government into the realms of England and Ireland; and that this was high-treaſon. On the twenty-firſt of the ſame month, the bill of attainder paſſed, with a majority of 204 againſt 59.

Bill of attainder againſt that earl paſſes the houſe of commons. Clarendon, p. 178. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 224.

p. 225.

The bill met with ſuch ſtrong oppoſition in the houſe of peers, that it was very doubtful whether it would paſs, or be thrown out. For which reaſon, on the twenty-fourth, was preſented to both houſes a petition, ſubſcribed by upwards of forty-thouſand (1) Londoners, ſeting forth the cauſes of their fears and ſuſpicions: and among others, that juſtice was not yet executed upon the earl of Strafford, and that there was reaſon to apprehend ſome ſecret conſpiracy againſt the parliament. The twenty-eighth of April, the commons ſent to acquaint their lordſhips, with their having received information, that the earl of Strafford had a deſign to make his eſcape from the Tower: that the guard about him was weak, and therefore they deſired he might be cloſe priſoner, and his guards ſtrengthened; whereto the lords conſented. The firſt of May, his Majeſty went to the parliament, and addreſſed both houſes to this purport, viz.—"That having been preſent at the "trial of the earl of Strafford, he could not in "conſcience condemn him of high-treaſon, tho' he "thought him guilty of miſdemeanors: therefore "he deſired the lords to find ſome way to bring "him out of this great ſtreight."

Charles's ſpeech in parliament.

The commons were greatly troubled and diſguſted with this ſpeech, and immediately adjourned 'till May the third, on which day great multitudes of people (2) repairing to Weſtminſter, inſulted and menaced the lords, as they were going to their houſe, crying out, juſtice! juſtice!

The ſame day, mr. Pym made known to the houſe, "That there were diverſe informations given "of deſperate deſigns, both at home and abroad, "againſt the parliament, and the peace of the "nation; and that the perſons ingaged therein "were under an oath of ſecreſy: that indeavors "were uſed to diſaffect the army, not only againſt "the parliament's proceedings, but to bring them "up againſt the parliament to over-awe them: "that there was alſo a deſign upon the Tower; "and indeavors for the earl of Strafford's eſcape: "that theſe combinations at home had a correſpon-"dency with practiſes abroad; and that the French "were drawing down their forces amain to the ſea-"ſide; and there was cauſe to fear their intent "was upon Portſmouth: that diverſe perſons of "eminency about the Queen were deeply ingaged "in theſe plots: that it was neceſſary the ports "ſhould be ſtoped, and his Majeſty deſired to "command, that no perſon attending upon the "King, Queen, or Prince, ſhould depart without "leave of his Majeſty, with the humble advice of "his parliament."

Hereupon

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

Hereupon the houſe fell into a ſerious debate of this matter, and were generally of opinion, that it was neceſſary to enter into a common reſolution for the kingdom's ſafety.

If one reflects in what juncture this conſpiracy was diſcovered to the houſe, tho' mr. Pym was informed of it long before; that it was at a time when the peers were to be in ſome meaſure conſtrained to paſs the bill of attainder againſt the earl of Strafford, and when the populace were likewiſe uſing violence for that purpoſe; there ſeems to be ground for ſuſpicion, that it was a mere artifice to ſtir up the people, and induce the lords to do as the commons deſired, from a dread of the imminent danger wherewith the kingdom was menaced: at leaſt, there is room to believe this conſpiracy was much exagerated; tho' this is only a conjecture, which ought not to be relied on 'till the arguments pro and con are examined. Howſoever this be, the commons, after ſome debate, came to a reſolution of taking the following proteſtation.

Clarendon. p. 210, 211.

Proteſtation taken by the commons. p. 198. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 241.

"I A. B. do, in the preſenſe of Almighty God, "promiſe, vow and proteſt, to maintain and "defend, as far as lawfully I may, with my life, "power and eſtate, the true reformed Proteſtant "religion, expreſſed in the doctrine of the church "of England, againſt all Popery and Popiſh inno-"vation within this realm, contrary to the ſaid "doctrine; and, according to the duty of my alle-"giance, I will maintain and defend his Maje-"ſty's royal perſon, honor and eſtate.

"Alſo the power and privilege of parliaments, "the lawful rights and liberties of the ſubjects, "and every perſon ſhall make this proteſtation, "in whatſoever he ſhall do in the lawful purſuance "of the ſame; and to my power, as far as law-"fully I may, I will oppoſe, and, by all good ways "and means, indeavor to bring condign puniſhment "on all ſuch as ſhall by force, practiſe, counſels, "plots, conſpiracies, or otherwiſe, do any thing "to the contrary in this preſent proteſtation con-"tained. And farther, that I ſhall, in all juſt "and honorable ways, indeavor to preſerve the "union and peace betwixt the three kingdoms of "England, Scotland and Ireland; and neither for "hope, fear, or any other reſpects, ſhall relinquiſh "this promiſe, vow and proteſtation."

Remarks on this ſubject.

It muſt be obſerved, this proteſtation was taken on mr. Pym's bare aſſurance of the diſcovery of a plot, and before there was any proof. Hence it may be conjectured, that the buſineſs had been determined among the leading men in the houſe. Next, the commons came to ſeveral reſolutions, to provide for the kingdom's ſecurity, and of Portſmouth in particular. They communicated to their lordſhips the informations they had received, the votes they had paſſed, and their proteſtation, deſiring that every peer might be ordered to take it.

Petition of the rabble to the lords. p. 249.

Their lordſhips could not eaſily refuſe complying with the commons deſire. Firſt, they had inſpired the nation with ſuch a terror, that no man durſt oppoſe their reſolves, for fear of being looked on as a dangerous malignant, and expoſed to inevitable ruin. Secondly, the populace ſtill continued flocking to Weſtminſter, and openly threatening the peers. Thirdly, that very day, thoſe outrageous multitudes preſented to the lords a petition, demanding juſtice upon the earl of Strafford, and that their lordſhips would pleaſe to free them from their fears of the conſpiracy. Fourthly, on the morrow, being the fourth of May, a mob more numerous than before repairing to Weſtminſter, certain incendiaries affixed to a wall, in Old Palace-yard, a paper containing the names of fifty ſix members, ſtiling them Straffordians, and betrayers of their country. Laſtly, alſo that day, the rabble addreſſed their lordſhips with a ſecond petition, "That they "underſtood the Tower was going to receive a "gariſon of men, not of the Hamlets (as uſually) "but conſiſting of other perſons under the com-"mand of a captain, a great confident of the earl "of Strafford's, and that this was done to make "way for that earl's eſcape."

Heylin's obſerv. Another petition. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. p. 249.

The houſe hereupon deputed ſix peers to examine ſir William Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower, concerning the truth of this fact. Balfour replied; "It was true, he had his Majeſty's order to receive "one hundred men (1) into the Tower, and captain "Billingſly to command them, and to receive only "ſuch men as the captain ſhould bring to him; "but now underſtanding their lordſhips pleaſure, "he would receive no other guard intoh te Tower "but the Hamlet men."

Balfour's confeſſion.

Their lordſhips, at a conference with the commons, farther declared, that they were drawing to a concluſion with the bill of attainder, but were ſo incompaſſed with multitudes that they might be conceived not to be free, and therefore deſired the commons to join with them, in deviſing means to ſend home the populace. Then they debated the proteſtation, paſſed and took it; viz. four hundred and thirty-three commoners, and one hundred and ſix lords, including the biſhops and judges. The commons having ordered dr. Burgeſs to acquaint the multitude with the proteſtation taken by both houſes, and that they were deſired to return to their homes, they forthwith departed.

The lords deſire the commons concurrence to diſperſe the mob.

The populace retire. Diurn. Occur.

In this affair manifeſtly appear two particulars. The firſt, that there was a project on foot to favor the earl of Strafford's eſcape, which will be hereafter more clearly evidenced. The ſecond, that this concourſe of people was privately procured by ſome of the leading commoners, ſince the houſe had not taken the preceding day any one ſtep towards diſperſing thoſe multitudes, tho' they were deſired by the lords, and ſince they found means to make that rabble retire, inſtantly on their being aſcertained that the lords had reſolved to take the proteſtation.

But the proteſtation was not this conſpiracy's ſole effect. That very day, the commons ordered a bill to be prepared for this preſent parliament's continuance, that it might not be diſſolved without conſent of both houſes. They alſo ordered, that the proteſtation ſhould be tendered univerſally throughout England.

Bill for the parliament's continuance. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 250.

The ſame day, May four, the houſe was informed, that ſix or eight of the conſpirators were fled, of whom mr. Henry Jermin, and mr. Henry Percy, members of the houſe, were two, and that they were gone towards Portſmouth; as likewiſe, that her Majeſty was preparing for the ſame journey. Theſe two ſucceſſive informations cauſing ſtrong ſuſpicions, the houſes diſpatched to Portſmouth one peer and two commoners, to propoſe certain queries to the governor, and make neceſſary proviſion for the ſecurity of that town and haven. They withal agreed to move the Queen to defer her journey to Portſmouth, alleging diverſe, tho' not the true reaſons*. They likewiſe requeſted his Majeſty to iſſue a proclamation for calling in Jermin, Percy, and other fugitives; which Charles promiſed. The speaker's letter to the army. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 252. Nalson, Vol. II. p. 288.

SIR,

"WE have had cause to doubt, that some ill-affected persons have indeavored to make a misunderstanding in the army of the intentions of the parliament towards them. To take away all misunderstanding in that kind, the house of commons have commanded me to assure you, that they have taken the affairs of the army into their serious care: and tho', for the present, their monies have not come in as they wished, and as was due, by reason of the many distractions, and other impediments, which his house could no ways avoid; yet they rest most assured, that they shall not only have their full pay, but the house will take their merits into their farther consideration, in regard they take notice that, nothwithstanding their want, and indeavors of those ill-affected persons, they have not demeaned themselves otherwise than as men of honor, and well-affected to the common wealth; which this house takes in so good part, that we have already found out a way to get money for a good part of their pay, and will take the most speedy course we possibly may for the rest. So I remain,

Your very loving friend,
William Lenthall.

Mean while the commitee, appointed to inquire into the conspiracy, made their report as follows.

Report concerning the plot. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 253.

"That this plot consisteth of three heads. The first was, a design upon the Tower. The second, to ingage the army. The third, to bring in foreign forces. For the Tower, it appeared to be thus: captain Billingsly, being examined upon oath, confessed; That he was acquainted with sir John Suckling: that the said sir John lately offered him imployment in one of the King's ships, then at Portsmouth; afterwards imployment for Portugal: that this deponent, having notice to meet at the privy-lodgings at White-hall, did there receive orders to get a hundred men to serve in the Tower under him; and if he did fail, he should answer it with his life: and afterwards meeting with sir John Suckling, and acquainting him therewith, he told him he would furnish him with the said number. Sir William Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower, being examined, said; That he had orders to receive captain Billingsly into the Tower with a hundred men, who should be under his command: that the earl of Strafford, at that time expostulating with him about his escape, told him, he would attempt nothing in that kind without his privity; and that he should have the King's warrant for his indemnity; and that the warrant should be to command him to remove the earl of Strafford from the Tower, to some other castle; and he would then take his opportunity to escape; that the lieutenant of the Tower not giving any complying answer thereunto, the said earl sent again to intreat him to come to him, and would have persuaded him to let him escape; saying, "Without your concurrence it cannot be done; and if you will consent thereunto, I will make you present payment of twenty-two thousand pounds; beside you shall have a good marriage for your son." To which the lieutenant of the Tower replied, he was so far from concurring therein, that he was not to be farther moved in such a thing. Thus much the lieutenant of the Tower delivered upon his oath.

"Colonel Goring, upon his examination in the house of commons, did confess; That sir John Suckling was the first person who ever made him any overture concerning the army's marching towards London: afterwards, being in the Queen's lodgings, he met with mr. H. Percy, which was about the begining, or middle of Lent last, and mr. Percy told him, there was a consultation of officers to be had, concerning the good of the army; and desired him to go along with him to his chamber, where the meeting was to be. There were present at the same meeting, commissary Wilmot, colonel Ashburnham, captain Pollard, sir John Berkley, Daniel O Neal, mr. Jermin, and himself: that mr. Percy said, there were propositions to be made which were of great concernment; and that it was necessary there should be an oath of secresy taken before any thing was propounded: that the oath should be to this purpose: that we should neither directly nor indirectly discover any part of the consultation, nor ever think our selves dissolved from that oath by any other oath which might be imposed upon us hereafter; which oath was read out of a paper, when it was tendered them; and thereupon they were sworn, by laying their hands on the bible; that he and Jermin were sworn together; for the rest had taken the oath before.

"Then three propositions were made them; viz.

These propositions being specified in a subsequent letter, they are omited here to avoid unnecessary repetitions.

"He farther said, that the whole number there met, were of opinion, that the army should not march towards London, 'till a declaration had been first sent up to the parliament: that he the said Goring answered, it was a nice point to interpose in the proceeding of the parliament; and did propound some difficulties to allay the business, to divert commissary Wilmot, and those other persons from so dangerous a business; and said, that he did think it was a design of folly to undertake it; for they must think the Scots would take the advantage upon the army's removal southwards, whose correspondency was so great with the city; and for them to begin to shew their teeth, and not be able to bite, would argue little prudence; that they should either undertake it so as to go thro' with it, or let it alone: that he did ask them, what ammunition they had to accommodate so great an army; and whether they could command the ammunition in the Tower: that Wilmot, Pollard and Ashburnham then made answer, they had no purpose to go to London; for to surprise the Tower was to conquer the kingdom: that this, among other passages, was part of the discourse at their first meeting.

"That, shortly after, there was another meeting of the same persons, and in the same place, in mr. Percy's chamber, where there were propositions of another nature, desperate and impious on the one hand, and foolish on the other; and that he indeavored by argument to divert them, by propounding an impossibility to effect the same: for how could the army, lodged in several quarters, unpaid, and at such a distance, march on a sudden to London and surprise what they had in design?

"That mr. Jermin was the person who first propосed the army's marching towards London; that for his part he declared himself absolutely against it: that mr. Jermin replied to him in private, 'You do not dislike the design, for you are as ready for any wild, mad undertaking as "any

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" any man I know; but you diſlike the temper of " thoſe perſons who are ingaged in the buſineſs.'

" He did farther confeſs, that he propounded " that Suckling might be admited to the conſulta- " tion: but Wilmot, Aſhburnham and Pollard " would not hear of it: and they three did then " declare themſelves againſt the army's marching " towards London.

" Then he took occaſion to ſay, that he did ac- " quaint ſome members of both houſes, whom he " could name, that there were ſome of the army, " whom they did not think ſo well of, were more " faithful and ſerviceable to the parliament than " they were aware of, which time would produce; " and named them: and they did accordingly " give teſtimony of his integrity, ſo far as general " terms could diſcover the deſign. He confeſſed, " that mr. Jermin did make him ſome offers to " relinquiſh the government of Portſmouth, upon " ſome terms of advance; but he ſaid, he did not " conclude any thing, for he would firſt ſee the " performance of what was offered; ſo had no " farther diſcourſe with him concerning that buſi- " neſs: but he doth believe, that Suckling and " Jermin did confer together about the deſign. He " ſaid they deſired his opinion about a general; " ſome were for Eſſex, ſome for Holland; but he, " with mr. Jermin, were for Newcaſtle.

" Being again examined, upon his oath, before " the commitee of lords and commons, and preſ- " ſed more particularly to anſwer queſtions not be- " fore propoſed to him, he did confeſs that, meet- " ing with mr. Jermin in the Queen's withdrawing " chamber, her Majeſty came and told him the " King would ſpeak with him; and meeting with " his Majeſty, he told him; he was minded to ſet " his army in a good poſture, being adviſed there- " to by the earl of Briſtol, as he ſaid; and his Ma- " jeſty then commanded him to join with mr. " Percy, and ſome others in that buſineſs.

" As for the deſigns from beyond ſea, the com- " mitee did make report to the houſe, that it was " cleared unto them, that Jermin indeavored to " have got poſſeſſion of Portſmouth; that the " King of France had drawn down great forces to " the ſea-ſide; that the governor of Calais had " examined ſome Engliſh men, whether the earl of " Strafford's head was cut off? And this was, in " point of time, the firſt of May, according to " the Engliſh ſtile, and ſir Philip Cartaret, go- " vernor of Guernſey, wrote letters alſo, which " came in great haſte, that he underſtood the French " had a deſign upon that iſland, or ſome part of " England. It alſo appeared to the commitee, by " diverſe of the letters which were opened coming " from beyond ſea, that they expected the earl of " Strafford there; and that they hoped the horſe- " leeches ſhould be ſtarved for want of blood: and, " in ſome of thoſe letters, there was advice to the " cardinal to beſtir himſelf betimes, to interrupt " the height of the proceedings here in England. " Alſo examinations of ſome prieſts were taken in " Lancaſhire, and ſent up to London, which were " there taken the third of May, which did teſtify, " that the prieſts did ſay, the parliament ſhould be " ſuddenly diſſolved; for the army was to march " up thither with all ſpeed, and they would be ſe- " conded by forces out of France; and that Mon- " tague did write from France to mr. Percy (which " was alſo intercepted) that if he did perform what " he had undertaken, he would be made a knight " of the garter."

Votes againſt Percy, &c. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 258. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 407.

On theſe depoſitions, the commons paſſed againſt Percy, Jermin and Suckling theſe votes, viz.

" 1. That, in the months of March and April " laſt, they did conſpire to draw together the " army, and imploy it againſt the parliament, and, " by force and dread thereof to compel the par- " liament to agree to certain propoſitions by them " contrived, and to hinder and interrupt the parlia- " ment's proceedings.

" 2. That, in purſuance of the ſaid deſign, " they did indeavor to perſuade diverſe members " of the houſe of commons, and others, being of- " ficers of the ſaid army, namely Wilmot, Aſh- " burnham, Berkley, Pollard, and O Neal, that " they were diſobliged by the parliament, thereby " to inſenſe them againſt the parliament; and did " hold diverſe conſultations with the ſaid parties, " to effect the ſaid wicked deſign; and to that " purpoſe did ſet down in writing certain propoſi- " tions to the effect as followeth, viz. 1. The " preſerving of biſhops in their functions and votes. " 2. The not diſbanding of the Iriſh army, until " the Scots were diſbanded. 3. And the indea- " voring to ſettle the King's revenue to the pro- " portion it was formerly.

" 3. That for the more ſecret carriage of this " plot, they did adminiſter to the ſaid parties a " wicked and unlawful oath, whereby they did " ſwear upon the holy evangeliſts, not to reveal " any thing ſpoken concerning the buſineſs.

" 4. That they did propound, and indeavor to " perſuade the perſons before-named, and other " officers of the army, to put the ſaid army into " a warlike poſture, to bring them up to Lon- " don, to make themſelves ſure of the Tower, " and ſo by force to compel the parliament to con- " form to their will: and they did indeavor to " work a belief in the ſaid army, that the King " and parliament would diſagree; and that all " the French about the city of London would " aſſiſt them; and, to the great ſcandal of the " King, that the Prince and earl of Newcaſtle were " to meet the army at Nottingham with a thouſand " horſe; that Suckling, to compaſs the deſign of " gaining the Tower, did contrive that a hundred " men, under captain Billingſly, ſhould be deſign- " ed for that purpoſe, when the opportunity was " offered, to the end the city of London ſhould " not be able to make any reſiſtance, when the " ſaid army ſhould come up; and Suckling, by " the means and plot aforeſaid, did thereby in- " deavor, that the earl of Strafford, then priſo- " ner in the Tower, might better compaſs his " eſcape."

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

Beſide the above depoſitions, here is one of the chief conſpirator's teſtimony, whereof the parliament made great uſe. It is Percy's letter, after his flight into France, to the earl of Northumberland his brother.

Mr. Percy's letter to the earl of Northumberland. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 259. Diurn. Occur. Nalſon, p. 386.

" WHAT with my innocency, and the vio- " lence I hear is againſt me, I find my ſelf " much diſtracted. I will not aſk your counſel, " becauſe it may bring prejudice upon you; but " I will, with all faithfulneſs and truth, tell you " what my part hath been, that at leaſt it may be " declared by you, whatſoever becomes of me.

" When there were fifty thouſand pounds ready, " deſigned by the parliament for the Engliſh army, " there was, as I take it, a ſudden demand by the " Scots at the ſame time of twenty-five thouſand " pounds, of which fifteen thouſand pounds were " ready; this they preſſed with ſuch neceſſity, as " the parliament, after an order made, did think " it fit for them to deduct ten thouſand pounds out " of the fifty thouſand pounds formerly granted: " upon which the ſoldiers in our houſe were much " ſcandaliſed; among whom I was one, and ſiting " by Wilmot and Aſhburnham, Wilmot ſtood up, " and told them, if that the Scots could thus pro- " cure money, he doubted not but the officers of " the Engliſh army might eaſily do the like. But

Charles I An' 1641.

" the firſt order was reverſed notwithſtanding, and " ten thouſand pounds given to the Scots. This " was the cauſe of many diſcourſes of diſlike among " us, and came to this purpoſe, that they were " diſobliged by the parliament, and not by the " King. This being ſaid often to one another, we " did reſolve, Wilmot, Aſhburnham, Pollard, " O Neal and my ſelf, to make ſome expreſſions " of ſerving the King in all things he would com- " mand us, which were honorable for him and us, " being likewiſe agreeing to the fundamental laws " of the kingdom, that ſo far we would live and " die with him; this was agreed upon with us, " not having any communication with others whom " I am now coupled withal: and farther, by their " joint conſent, I was to tell his Majeſty thus much " from them; but withal, I was to order the mat- " ter ſo as the King might apprehend this as " a great ſervice done him at this time, when his " affairs were in ſo ill a condition, and they were " moſt confident, that they would ingage the " whole army thus far; but farther they would " undertake nothing, becauſe they would neither " infringe the liberties of the ſubjects, nor deſtroy " the laws; to which I and every one conſented; " and having their ſenſe, I drew the heads up in " a paper, which they all approved when I read " it; and then we did, by an oath, promiſe one " another to be conſtant and ſecret in all this, and " did all of us take that oath together: then I ſaid; " well, ſirs, I muſt now be informed what your " particular deſires are, that ſo I may be the bet- " ter able to ſerve you; which they were pleaſed " to do; and ſo I did very faithfully ſerve them " therein as far as I could. This is the truth, and " all the truth upon my ſoul, in particular diſ- " courſes.

" After that we did fall upon petitioning the " King and parliament for monies, there being ſo " great arrears due to us, and ſo much delay made " in the procuring them; but that was never " done.

" 1. Concerning the biſhops functions and " votes.

" 2. The not diſbanding the Iriſh army, until " the Scots were diſbanded too.

" 3. The indeavoring to ſettle his Majeſty's re- " venue to that proportion it was formerly (1)

" And it was reſolved by us all, if the King " ſhould require our aſſiſtance in thoſe things, that, " as far as we could, we might contribute there- " unto, without breaking the laws of the king- " dom; and in caſe the King ſhould be denied theſe " things being put to them, we would not fly from " him. All theſe perſons did act and concur in this " as well as I. This being all imparted to the King " by me from them, I perceived he had been treat- " ed with, by others, concerning ſome things of " our army which agreed not with what was pur- " poſed by me, but inclined a way more ſharp and " high, not having limits either of honor or law. " I told the King, he might be pleaſed to conſider " with himſelf, which way it was fit for him to " hearken unto; for us, we were reſolved not to " depart from our grounds; we ſhould not be diſ- " pleaſed, whoſoever they were, but the particular " of the deſigns, or the perſons, we deſired not " to know; tho' it was no hard matter to gueſs at " them. In the end, I believe the danger of the " one, the juſtice of the other, made the King tell " me, he would leave all thoughts of other propo- " ſitions but ours, as things not practicable; but " deſired notwithſtanding, that Goring and Jer- " min, who were acquainted with the other pro- " ceedings, ſhould be admited among us. I told " him, I thought the other gentry would never con- " ſent to it, but I would propoſe it; which I did, " and we were all much againſt it: but the King " did preſs ſo much as, at laſt, it was conſented " unto; and Goring and Jermin came to my " chamber; there I was appointed to tell them, " after they had ſworn to ſecreſy, what we had " propoſed; which I did. But before I go into " the debate of the way, I muſt tell you, Jermin " and Goring were very earneſt Suckling ſhould be " admited; which we did all decline, and I was " deſired by all our men to be reſolute in it, which " I was, and gave many reaſons: whereupon Gor- " ing made anſwer, he was ingaged with Suckling " for his being imployed in the army; but for his " meeting with us, they were contented to paſs it " by. Then we took up again the ways propoſed; " which took great debate, and theirs differed from " ours in violence and heat; which we all proteſted " againſt, and parted diſagreeing totally, yet re- " mited it to be ſpoken of by me and Jermin to " the King, which we both did; and the King, " conſtant to his former reſolutions, told him, theſe " ways were all vain and fooliſh, and he would " think of them no more. I omit one thing of " mr. Goring; he deſired to know how the chief " commanders were to be diſpoſed of; for if he " had not a condition worthy of him, he would " not go along with us. We made anſwer, that " no body thought of that; we intended, if we " were ſent down, to go all in the ſame capacity " we were in. He did not like that by any means, " and by that did work ſo with mr. Chudleigh, " that there was a letter ſent by ſome of the com- " manders to make him lieutenant-general; and " when he had ordered this at London, and mr. " Chudleigh had his inſtructions, then did he go to " Portſmouth, pretending to be abſent when this was " working. We all deſired my lords of Eſſex and " Holland; but they ſaid, if there was a general, " they were for Newcaſtle. They were pleaſed to " give report, that I ſhould be general of the horſe; " but I proteſt, neither to the King, or any elſe, " did I ever ſo much as think of it. My lord of " Holland was made general, and ſo all things were " laid aſide. And this is the truth, and all the " truth I know of theſe proceedings; and this I " will and do proteſt unto you upon my faith. " Wilmot, Aſhburnham and O Neal, have ſeveral " times confeſſed and ſworn, I never ſaid any " thing in the buſineſs which they did not every " one agree to and juſtify. This relation I ſent " you, rather to inform you of the truth of this " matter, that you may the better know how to " do me good; but I ſhould think my ſelf very " unhappy to be made a betrayer of any body. " What concerned the Tower, or any thing elſe, I " never meddled withal, nor ever ſpake with Gor- " ing but that night before them all; and I ſaid " nothing but what was conſented to by every " party: I never ſpake one word with Suckling, " Carnarvan, Davenant, or any other creature. " Methinks, if my friends and kindred knew the " truth and juſtice of the buſineſs, it were no hard " matter to ſerve me in ſome meaſure" (2).

Charles I An' 1641.

This letter plainly evidences there was really a project to gain the army, and ingage them to ſerve his Majeſty againſt the parliament, and that Charles knew and approved thereof.

(1) The word 'formerly' is very ambiguous; for it may ſignify either the King's rightful revenues, or thoſe he injoyed juſt before this parliament. Rapin.

The

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 291. Diurn. Occurr. p. 150.

The ſixteenth of June, the commitee appointed to examine the affair of this plot to ſeduce the army, made a ſecond report to the houſe, and cauſed to be read ſundry depoſitions.

The firſt, was captain Billingſly's, who confeſſed, that ſir John Suckling had invited him to take command of the hundred men deſigned to guard the Tower.

The ſecond, mr. Nutt's, whereby it appeared that the earl of Strafford's eſcape was projected.

The third, lieutenant-colonel Ballard's, who ſaid, that captain Chudleigh brought down to the army many propoſitions; ſome of which were, that colonel Goring ſhould be lieutenant-general, and that the Prince and earl of Newcaſtle would be in Nottinghamſhire, with a thouſand horſe, ready to join the army.

The fourth was Willis's, who declared, that the French were to favor the enterpriſe; that the clergy would, at their own charge, ſend two thouſand horſe, and that the Prince was to come down to the army.

Draught of the officers petition communicated to his Majeſty; who approves it. Clarendon, p. 208.

The houſe was farther informed, that thoſe officers who had undertaken to ſerve his Majeſty, had communicated to him the draught of a petition, which was to be directed to the King and parliament from the army: that they hoped to get it ſubſcribed by moſt of the officers, and that his Majeſty, on peruſing it, had approved thereof, and writ at the bottom C. R. in token of his approbation.

Theſe are the grounds whereon this plot was preſumed real, and which was extremely injurious to King Charles, by the diſtruſt it bred in the minds of moſt of the members of parliament, and of the nation in general: but we muſt alſo obſerve that, even now, this Prince's favorers ſtile it a mere chimera. For my own part, I cannot but ſay, that I believe there was ſome truth in it; but am likewiſe of opinion, that the heads of that faction which oppoſed King Charles greatly agravated the circumſtances and conſequences, in order the more eaſily to get paſſed the earl of Strafford's attainder, and the act for continuing the parliament, to which Charles gave the royal aſſent that very day, and in this ſame juncture: nay, I am ſtill farther confirmed in this opinion by the very arguments alleged by that Prince's friends to ſhew it to have been a fiction to render him odious; for they cannot help owning there was a project to ingage the army to declare for his Majeſty. They ſay only, that the end propoſed by the authors of this project, was to hinder the army from being ſeduced to eſpouſe the parliament's intereſt. Firſt, there appears not the leaſt ſign of this pretended ſole end, either in the witneſſes depoſitions, or in Percy's letter, or in the reports of the commitee appointed to examine this affair. Secondly, King Charles, whom the parliament ſo often reproached afterwards with this conſpiracy, never uſed this reaſon to excuſe the authors. Thirdly, there is no probability the officers ſhould have any ſuch purpoſe, ſince at that time the army was too far diſguſted with the parliament to afford any ground for apprehenſion they ſhould be ſeduced to declare againſt his Majeſty. The moſt plauſible argument they uſe is, that there was never any expreſs deſign of marching the army to London, upon which however the commons chiefly inſiſted. The denial of this circumſtance was what King Charles ſolely adhered to, as will appear hereafter. He called God to witneſs, he never knew of any ſuch deſign: but he never denied poſitively his having been informed of a deſign to ingage the army to ſide with him. We muſt therefore, in this conſpiracy carefully diſtinguiſh two particulars, viz. the deſign of gaining the army, which is evident; and the deſign of marching it to London.

Reaſons to believe the plot real. Ib. p. 208, &c.

By the depoſitions it appears, that this was propoſed in the aſſembly of officers, but not approved: ſo Charles could affirm he knew not of it, becauſe indeed it was never reſolved, tho' he was not ignorant of its having been propoſed. CHARLES I AN' 1641.

In Percy's letter there is a circumſtance which may greatly conduce to clear this affair. There were, as he ſays, two ſets of men, who formed at the ſame time a deſign to ingage the army for the King, without having communicated to each other their true ſentiments. The firſt were, Percy, Wilmot, Aſhburnham, and Pollard. The ſecond, Jermin and Goring, whoſe views reached much farther, and who propoſed marching the army to London. For tho' Goring, in his depoſition, affirmed, he had done his utmoſt to diſſuade the reſt from this deſign, he is however charged with having been its firſt mover. If Percy's letter is to be credited, the King had at firſt liſtened to Jermin and Goring; but, upon Percy's repreſentation, had rejected their project as impracticable, and laid aſide all thoughts of it. King Charles's friends confound theſe two projects, and all their proofs are directed againſt that of Jermin and Goring, without meddling with Percy's: and becauſe the parliament could not fully prove any expreſs reſolution of bringing the army to London, they conclude, that the conſpiracy in general was only a fiction and impoſture. But even had there never been a ſettled deſign of marching the army to London, it may be however fact that indeavors were uſed to gain them, and that King Charles approved the deſign. In ſhort, this Prince's partiſans deny not that the draught of the petition was communicated to him, before it was recommended to the officers of the army for their ſubſcription. Of this petition I am yet to ſpeak, in order to ſet this matter in a clear light.

It is ſomewhat unaccountable that this petition, which has made ſo much noiſe, ſhould never be produced, either by the parliament, in ſupport of their charge, or by the King, for his own vindication. Indeed, Charles afterwards gave out he had recovered a copy, but thought not fit to produce it, tho' he affirmed it to be very innocent. This gives occaſion to ſuſpect it included ſomething to his prejudice. The earl of Clarendon has in his hiſtory inſerted a petition, which he aſſures to be word for word the ſame as was ſigned by the King with C. R. But it is evident, this cannot be the petition in queſtion, as to the reader will be obvious.

To the King's moſt excellent Majeſty; the lords ſpiritual and temporal; the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes, now aſſembled in the high-court of parliament; the humble petition of the officers and ſoldiers of the army.

The army officers pretended petition. Clarendon, p. 192.

" demeaned ourſelves, that your Majeſty's great
" and weighty affairs in this preſent parliament
" have hitherto received no interruption, by any
" complaint, either from us or againſt us; a temper
" not uſual in armies; eſpecially in one deſtitute
" not only of pay, but alſo of martial diſcipline,
" and many of its principal officers; that we can-
" not but attribute it to a particular bleſſing of " Almighty God on our moſt hearty affections
" and zeal to the common good, in the happy
" ſucceſs of this parliament, to which, as we " ſhould have been ready hourly to contribute our
" deareſt blood, ſo now that it hath pleaſed God

" as likewiſe his great mercy, in that he hath in" clined your Majeſty's royal heart ſo to co-ope-
" rate with the wiſdom of parliament, as to effect
" ſo great and happy a reformation upon the former
" diſtempers of this church and common-wealth:
" as firſt, in your Majeſty's gracious condeſcending
" to the many important demands of our neigh" bors of the Scotiſh nation: ſecondly, in granting
" ſo free a courſe of juſtice againſt all delinquents,
" of what quality ſoever: thirdly, in the removal
" of all thoſe grievances, wherewith the ſubjects
" did conceive either their liberty of perſons, pro" perty, or eſtate, or freedom of conſcience, pre-
" judiced: and laſtly, in the greateſt pledge of " ſecurity that ever the ſubjects of England received
" from their Sovereign, the bill of triennial par" liament.

" Theſe things ſo graciouſly accorded unto by " your Majeſty, without bargain or compenſa-
" tion, as they are more than expectation or hope
" could extend unto, ſo now they are certainly
" ſuch, as all loyal hearts ought to acquieſce in
" with thankfulneſs; which we do with all humi-
" lity, and do at this time, with as much earneſt-
" neſs as any, pray and wiſh, that the kingdom
" may be ſettled in peace and quietneſs, and that " all men may, at their own homes, injoy the
" bleſſed fruits of your wiſdom and juſtice.

" But may it pleaſe your excellent Majeſty, and
" this high court of parliament, to give us leave,
" with grief and anguiſh of heart, to repreſent unto
" you, that we hear there are certain perſons ſtir-
" ring and pragmatical, who, inſtead of rendering
" glory to God, thanks to your Majeſty, and " acknowledgment to the parliament, remain yet
" as unſatisfied and mutinous as ever; who, while
" all the reſt of the kingdom are arrived even be" yond their wiſhes, are daily forging new and " unreaſonable demands; who, while all men of " reaſon, loyalty and moderation are thinking how " they may provide for your Majeſty's honor and
" plenty, in return of ſo many graces to the ſubject,
" are ſtill attempting new diminutions of your Ma-
" jeſty's juſt regalities, which ever muſt be no leſs
" dear to all honeſt men than our own freedoms;
" in fine, men of ſuch turbulent ſpirits, as are " ready to ſacrifice the honor and welfare of the " whole kingdom to their private fancies, whom
" nothing elſe than a ſubverſion of the whole frame
" of government will ſatisfy. Far be it from our " thoughts to believe, that the violence and un-
" reaſonableneſs of ſuch kind of perſons can have " any influence upon the prudence and juſtice of " the parliament. But that which begets the " trouble and diſquiet of our loyal hearts at this
" preſent is, that we hear thoſe ill-affected perſons
" are backed in their violence by the multitude
" and the power of raiſing tumults; that thouſands
" flock at their call, and beſet the parliament,
" and Whitehall itſelf; not only to the prejudice
" of that freedom which is neceſſary to great
" councils and judicatories, but poſſibly to ſome
" perſonal danger of your ſacred Majeſty, and the " peers.

" The vaſt conſequence of theſe perſons maligni-
" ty, and of the licenciouſneſs of thoſe multitudes
" which follow them, conſidered in moſt deep care
" and zealous affection for the ſafety of your ſacred
" Majeſty, and the parliament; our humble peti" tion is that, in your wiſdom, you would be
" pleaſed to remove ſuch dangers, by puniſhing
" the ringleaders of theſe tumults, that your Ma-
" jeſty and the parliament may be ſecured from
" ſuch inſolencies hereafter. For the ſuppreſſing
" of which, in all humility we offer our ſelves to " wait upon you (if you pleaſe) hoping we ſhall
" appear as conſiderable in the way of defenſe to
" our gracious Sovereign, the parliament, our reli" gion, and the eſtabliſhed laws of the kingdom,
" as what number ſoever ſhall audaciouſly preſume
" to violate them. So ſhall we, by the wiſdom
" of your Majeſty and the parliament, not only
" be vindicated from precedent innovations, but
" be ſecured from the future which are threatened,
" and likely to produce more dangerous effects than
" the former:

And we ſhall pray, &c.

Charles I An' 1641.

Reaſons why this cannot be the true petition which was communicated to his Majeſty.

Permit me to make ſome remarks on this petition, in order to ſhew that it cannot be the ſame which was communicated to the King, and ſubſcribed by him with the letters C. R. in token of his approbation.

Firſt, it very plainly appears, this was drawn up at London, at the very juncture when thoſe multitudes flocked to Weſtminſter, which happened not 'till the third and fourth of May, there having been no ſuch concourſe of people before, and this laſting only two days. But it will hereafter appear, that Charles himſelf ſaid this petition, which he ſigned with C. R. was brought him from the army, and that after having read it, be approved it, as being very innocent. If the petition communicated to his Majeſty, had been prepared in the army, it cannot be this, ſince thoſe who drew it up could not foreſee the riotous aſſemblies at Weſtminſter on the third and fourth of May, which however they ſpeak of as then in being. And if it was drawn at London, as is very probable, it cannot be that which was communicated to the King, ſince he affirmed it was brought him from the army.

It may poſſibly be alleged, that this petition might be prepared at London the third or fourth of May, at the time of the concourſe; that it was ſent to the army, and then returned in order to be communicated to his Majeſty. But allowing only a fortnight for thoſe journies from London to York, and thence back to London, and for communicating it to the officers diſperſed in different quarters about the country, the petition would have reached Charles's hands too late, and have been quite uſeleſs, ſince the tumults were over, Strafford executed, and the bill for the parliament's continuance aſſented to by his Majeſty. It therefore would have been very prepoſterous for King Charles, at ſuch a juncture, to have approved this petition.

Again; lord Clarendon intimates this petition to have been projected and drawn long before the third and fourth of May, by thoſe very officers who were afterwards charged with the conſpiracy. He ſays, after its being ſubſcribed by his Majeſty, it was carried down to the army and ſigned by ſome officers, but was ſuddenly quaſhed, and no more heard of 'till the diſcovery of this pretended plot, of which more in its place. This is a clear evidence, that the petition Charles ſubſcribed with C. R. had been communicated long before the third or fourth of May, the time when this plot was diſcovered. But if this be ſo, how could the authors of this petition mention thoſe riots which happened on the third and fourth of May, as actually in being? The petition which King Charles ſubſcribed cannot therefore be that inſerted by lord Clarendon in his hiſtory. p. 194. p. 192.

Thirdly; the officers who would have gained the army to Charles's intereſt, and who, according to lord Clarendon, projected alſo the petition to King and parliament, which was approved by his Majeſty, propoſed as their end, " to preſerve the
" biſhops votes and functions, to hinder diſbanding
" the Iriſh army 'till that of the Scots was diſbanded
" likewiſe,

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

"likewiſe, and to ſettle the King's revenues." But in the above petition none of theſe articles are mentioned (1).

Laſtly; it will appear in the ſequel that Charles, to juſtify his ſigning the petition, ſaid, nothing more was required in it than ſettling the government on the ſame foot as under Queen Elizabeth. But in this petition given us by lord Clarendon, as ſubſcribed by his Majeſty, there is not a ſillable like it, Elizabeth not being therein even named (2).

Doubts concerning Percy's letter. p. 210, 212, &c,

Before leaving this ſubject, we muſt not forget what has been ſaid touching Percy's letter to his brother, the earl of Northumberland. Some pretend that Percy, attempting his eſcape to France, was known at the ſea-ſide and wounded by certain perſons who indeavored to ſtop him: that geting from them, to the earl of Northumberland's, that nobleman prevailed with ſome leading men of the commons *, that his brother's eſcape ſhould be connived at, on condition he would write the abovecited letter, as from France. One may readily perceive, that the deſign was hereby to render the relation in that letter ſuſpected of falſity: but I find it not poſitively affirmed, or that any proofs are produced to detect the forgery. The whole amounts to a bare aſſertion, that the plot in queſtion was mere impoſture, a fiction, a chimera: that the parliament curtailed the depoſitions of the witneſſes, omiting whatever ſerved to juſtify the King: that the conferences in Percy's chamber were free converſations among friends, of whom ſome were members of parliament: that the witneſſes were properer to demonſtrate there never was any conſpiracy to ſeduce the army, than to prove there was really any ſuch affair: but, upon the whole, we muſt take as convincing proofs the bare aſſertion of thoſe who relate theſe facts, which they have not any way cleared (3).

*Mr. Pym in particular.

As King Charles was afterwards frequently reproached with this conſpiracy, I deemed it requiſite to give a true idea of the objections and anſwers I ſhall have frequent occaſion to introduce. It is now time we proceed to lord Strafford's trial.

The earl of Strafford's trial.

If it be not pre-ſuppoſed, that King Charles I, from the begining of his reign to this laſt parliament's meeting, had formed a deſign to eſtabliſh deſpotiſm in England, it will be in a manner impoſſible to underſtand his hiſtory, and particularly this part of it we are now upon. But on this ſuppoſition, which to me appears inconteſtible, all difficulties vaniſh. It is not ſurpriſing to find this Prince's council, his miniſters, favorites, the ſtar-chamber, high-commiſſion, judges of the realm, in a word, all perſons in public imploy, intent upon a ſingle point, I mean, ſtretching the royal authority as far as lay in their power. It is not ſurpriſing to ſee the houſe of commons implacable averſion to the King's miniſters, and particularly to thoſe who were moſt truſted by his Majeſty, and believed the chief authors of all public evils. Among theſe, the earl of Strafford was conſidered as the moſt dangerous, becauſe the ableſt, and becauſe his two high poſts of preſident of the court of York, and lord lieutenant of Ireland, afforded him frequent occaſions effectually to ſerve his royal maſter, and aſſiſt him to execute his deſigns: accordingly, it was he whom the commons firſt attacked, eight days after opening the parliament. The impeachment and trial of this nobleman, contains many remarkables, ſome whereof do, as I may ſay, ſurpaſs the comprehenſion of foreigners, by reaſon of the wide difference between the laws and cuſtoms of England, and thoſe of other ſtates. It would therefore be a taſk too difficult for me to undertake a particular detail of all the circumſtances of this memorable trial, which have been collected in a bulky folio. I ſhall for this reaſon content my ſelf with giving thereof a general idea, ſuch as I ſhall judge proper to gratify a reader's curioſity.

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

When the commons impeached the earl of Strafford, his ruin was doubtleſs reſolved by the leading men of that houſe. This earl being looked on as the moſt powerful, and moſt in favor of all King Charles's miniſters, and as the chief author of all the nation's miſeries; it was ſufficient to make it thought requiſite he ſhould be ſacrificed to the public. There is not, in my opinion, any neceſſity for ſeeking other motives of this reſolution, or aſcribing it to more ſecret cauſes. Since the parliament undertook to redreſs grievances, and reſtore the government to its ancient ſtate, nothing was more natural than to puniſh ſuch as had helped to unhinge it, and among theſe the earl of Strafford was the principal, and conſequently the fiteſt to ſerve for example to thoſe who ſhould, in after times, ingage in like enterpriſes: but beſide this, he had created himſelf abundance of enemies, by his imperious deportment, to which great miniſters, who are ſecure of their patron's favor, are generally but too obnoxious. Moreover, he had deſerted the peoples intereſt, after having ſtrongly ſupported it while a member of the lower houſe, and intirely devoted himſelf to his Majeſty. This ſufficed to render him odious, and the commons, in impeaching him, were ſatisfied they could not take any one ſtep more acceptable to the people. Thus was he charged with high-treaſons; not that in the ſhort ſpace ſince opening the parliament the commons could have any certainty of his being guilty of that crime, but upon a certain public evidence, and the inward conviction of moſt of the members. After his being ſent to the Tower upon this impeachment, the houſe conſidered of the articles whereon they were to ground his accuſation, which being laid before the peers, proofs were ſought to ſupport them.

Ruſhworth, Vol. VIII. laſt edition. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 1. ——206. Clarendon, p. 169, &c. Annals.

Theſe articles, twenty eight in number, tended to prove in general, that the earl of Strafford had indeavored to ſubvert the fundamental laws of the ſtate, and eſtabliſh arbitrary power. So, notwithſtanding each of the pretended crimes whereof he was accuſed could not be accounted high-treaſon, the houſe pretended, that all together manifeſtly evidenced his intentions, and the means he had

(1) According to Whitlock (p. 46.) the affair was this. The officers put themſelves into a junto of ſworn ſecreſy, drew up ſome heads by way of petition to the King and parliament, "For money for the army. Not to diſband before the "Scots. To preſerve biſhops votes and functions. To ſettle the King's revenues." The army being tainted from hence, met, and drew up a letter, or petition, which was ſhewed to the King, and approved and ſigned by him with C. R. and a direction to captain Leg, that none ſhould ſee it but ſir Jacob Aſhley; the main drift was, "That the army might be called up to "attend the ſafety of the King's perſon, and parliament's ſecurity, or that both armies might be diſbanded.

(2) Lord Clarendon (Vol. I. p. 195.) ſays; That Goring, who propoſed the marching of the army to London, being diſguſted at having that propoſal rejected and ridiculed, did the ſame, or next day whereon he had propoſed it, diſcover all, and more than had paſſed, to the earl of Bedford, and lords Say and Kimbolton; but as dangerous as the deſign was afterwards alleged to be, it was not however communicated to the parliament 'till about three months after.

(3) Nalſon, who took upon him to juſtify King Charles againſt the falſe accuſations of his enemies, as he ſays himſelf in his introduction, paſſes over this article very ſlighly. See Vol. I. of his collections, near the concluſion. Rapin.

imployed to effect them. The ſubſtance of thoſe twenty eight articles here follows (1):

Articles of accuſation againſt the earl of Strafford. Ruſhworth, Vol. VIII. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 10.

" I. That he being preſident of the King's " council, in the north parts of England, had pro- " cured to himſelf a commiſſion, with inſtructions " annexed, whereby power was given him, to de- " termine all offenſes, ſuits, &c. within certain " percincts therein ſpecified, and in ſuch manner as " the ſaid inſtructions nid appoint, according to the " proceedings of the ſtar-chamber: by virtue of " which commiſſion, he had exerciſed exorbitant " and unlawful juriſdiction over the perſons and " eſtates of his Majeſty's ſubjects in thoſe parts, " to their ruin.

" II. That, at the aſſizes held for the county " of York, he did publicly declare and publiſh, " that ſome of the juſtices were all for law, and " nothing would pleaſe them but law; but they " ſhould find, ' That the King's little finger " ſhould be heavier than the loins of the law."

" III. That being lord-deputy of Ireland, he " ſaid in a public ſpeech, That Ireland was a con- " quered nation, and that the King might do with " them what he pleaſed. And, ſpeaking of the " charters of former Kings of England made to the " city of Dublin, he farther then ſaid, That their " charters were nothing worth, and did bind the " King no farther than he pleaſed.

" IV. That Richard earl of Cork, a peer of " Ireland, having ſued out proceſs in courſe of " law, for recovery of his poſſeſſions, from which " he was put, by color of an order made by lord " Strafford, and the council; he, the ſaid lord " Strafford, threatened the ſaid earl to impriſon " him, unleſs he would ſurceaſe his ſuit, and ſaid, " that he would have neither law nor lawyers " diſpute or queſtion his orders.

" That the ſaid earl of Cork having conteſted " the validity of an order of council made in Ire- " land, in the time of King James I, lord Strafford " had ſaid, That he would make the ſaid earl and " all Ireland know that, ſo long as he had the go- " vernment of that kingdom, any act of ſtate there " made, or to be made, ſhould be as binding to " the ſubjects of that kingdom as acts of parlia- " ment: and that he did ſundry other times, and " upon ſundry other occaſions, by his words and " ſpeeches, arrogate to himſelf a power above the " fundamental laws, and eſtabliſhed government of " that kingdom, and ſcorned the ſaid laws and " eſtabliſhed government.

" V. That he did give, and procure to be " given, againſt lord Mountnorris (then a peer " of Ireland, vice-treaſurer, and receiver-general " of that kingdom, treaſurer at war, one of the " principal ſecretaries of ſtate, and keeper of the " privy-ſignet of the ſaid kingdom) a ſentence of " death by a council of war, called together by " the ſaid earl of Strafford, without any warrant " or authority of law, or offenſe deſerving any " ſuch puniſhment.

" And he the ſaid earl did alſo, at Dublin, " without any legal or due proceedings or trial, " give and cauſe to be given a ſentence of death " againſt another of his Majeſty's ſubjects; and " cauſed him to be put to death in execution of " ſuch ſentence.

" VI. That, without any legal proceedings, and " upon a paper-petition, he did cauſe the ſaid " lord Mountnorris to be diſſeized and put out " of his manor of Tymore in the kingdom of " Ireland; the ſaid lord Mountnorris having " been eighteen years before in quiet poſſeſſion " thereof.

" VII. That he did cauſe a caſe, commonly " termed "The Caſe of Tenures upon defective " Titles," to be made and drawn up without any " jury or trial, or other legal proceſs, and with- " out the conſent of parties, and did then procure " the judges of the realm of Ireland to deliver their " opinions and reſolutions to that caſe, and by " color of ſuch opinion did, without any legal " proceeding, cauſe Thomas lord Dillon, and many " others, to be put out of the poſſeſſion of diverſe " lands and tenements, whereby many of his Ma- " jeſty's ſubjects, and their families, were utterly " undone.

" VIII. That, without any legal proceſs, he had " made a decree or order againſt Adam viſcount " Loftus, a peer and lord-chancellor of Ireland, " and did cauſe the ſaid viſcount to be impriſoned, " on pretenſe of diſobedience to the ſaid decree or " order: that afterwards, without any authority, " he required and commanded the ſaid lord viſ- " count to yield up to him the great ſeal of Ire- " land, which was then in his cuſtody, by his " Majeſty's command, and impriſoned the ſaid " chancellor for not obeying ſuch his command.

" That he did impriſon George earl of Kildare, " thereby to inforce him to ſubmit his title to the " manner and lordſhip of Caſtle-leigh in Queen's " County, being of great yearly value, tothe ſaid " earl of Strafford's will and pleaſure, and held " him a year priſoner for the ſaid cauſe; and re- " fuſed to inlarge him, notwithſtanding his Maje- " ſty's letters for his inlargement to the ſaid earl " of Strafford directed.

" That, upon a petition exhibited to him againſt " dame Mary Hibbots, widow, the ſaid earl of " Strafford recommended the ſaid petition to the " council-table of Ireland, where moſt part of the " council gave their vote and opinion for the ſaid " lady; but the ſaid earl finding fault herewith, " cauſed an order to be entered againſt the ſaid " lady, and threatened her, that, if ſhe refuſed to " ſubmit thereunto, he would impriſon her, and " fine her five hundred pounds; that, if ſhe con- " tinued obſtinate, he would continue her impriſon- " ment, and double her fine every month; by " means whereof ſhe was inforced to relinquiſh " her eſtate in the lands queſtioned in the ſaid pe- " tition, which ſhortly after were conveyed to ſir " Robert Meredith, to the uſe of the ſaid earl of " Strafford.

" That the ſaid earl, in like manner, did im- " priſon diverſe others of his Majeſty's ſubjects, " upon the like pretenſes, &c.

" IX. That the ſaid earl, aſſuming to himſelf a " power above and againſt law, took upon him, " by a general warrant under his hand, to give " power to the lord biſhop of Down and Connor, " his chancellor, &c. to attach and arreſt the " bodies of all ſuch of the meaner and poorer ſort " who, after citation, ſhould either refuſe to appear " before them, or appearing ſhould omit or deny " to perform, or undergo all lawful decrees,

(1) Theſe articles filled two hundred ſheets of paper. As ſome of the treaſons charged upon him were of fourteen years ſtanding, the earl deſired three months time to make his anſwer, but was allowed only 'till the twenty fourth of February. Whitelock, p. 41.——The chief manager, during the whole trial, was mr. Pym, of whom dr. Welwood (Memoirs p. 45.) tells the following ſtory. When the earl, then only ſir Thomas Wentworth, was upon making his peace with the court, he gave Pym ſome obſcure intimation of it. Pym underſtanding his drift, cut him ſhort with this expreſſion, " You need not uſe all this art to tell me, that you have a mind to leave us: but remember what I ſay, You " are going to be undone; and remember, that tho' you leave us now, I will never leave you while your head is upon " your ſhoulders."

" ſentences

CHARLES I An' 1641.

" ſentences, and orders impoſed, or given out againſt " them, and them to commit and keep in the next " jail, until they ſhould either perform ſuch ſen- " tences, or put in ſufficient bail, to ſhew ſome " reaſon before the council-table of ſuch their con- " tempt and neglect.

" X. That he had procured the cuſtoms of the " merchandiſe, exported out and imported into " Ireland, to be farmed to his own uſe: and, to " advance his own gain and lucre, did cauſe and " procure the native commodities of that kingdom " to be rated, in the book of rates for the cuſtoms, " according to which the cuſtoms were uſually " gathered, at far greater values and prices than in " reality they were worth; that is to ſay, every " hide at twenty ſhillings, which in truth was worth " but five ſhillings, every ſtone of wool at thirteen " ſhillings and four-pence, tho' the ſame were " really worth but five ſhillings, at the utmoſt " nine; by which means the cuſtom, which be- " fore was but a twentieth part of the true value " of the commodity, was inhanced ſometimes a " fifth part, and ſometimes to a fourth, and ſome- " times to a third part of the real value.

" XI. That the ſaid earl did reſtrain exporta- " tion of the commodities of Ireland, without his " licenſe; and then raiſed great ſums of money for " licenſes to export thoſe commodities, and for " diſpenſation of the ſaid reſtraints impoſed on " them, by which means thoſe commodities were " raiſed above half in half.

" XII. That, under color to regulate the im- " portation of tobacco into Ireland, he did iſſue " a proclamation, prohibiting the importation of " tobacco into that kingdom; after which reſtraint " the ſaid earl cauſed diverſe great quantities of " tobacco to be imported to his own uſe: that if a " ſhip brought tobacco into any port there, the ſaid " earl and his agents uſed to buy the ſame to his " own uſe, at their own price; and if the owners " refuſed to let him have the ſame at undue values, " then they were not permited to vend the ſame " there; by which undue means, the ſaid earl " having got the whole trade of tobacco into his " own hands, he ſold it at great and exceſſive " prices.

" That by a proclamation he commanded, that " none ſhould put to ſale any tobacco by wholeſale, " but what ſhould be made up into rolls, and the " ſame ſealed with two ſeals by himſelf appointed, " one at each end of the roll: and ſuch as was not " ſealed to be ſeized, appointing ſix-pence the " pound for a reward to ſuch perſons as ſhould " ſeize the ſame; which proclamation was rigo- " rouſly put in execution, by ſeizing the goods, " fining, impriſoning, whiping, and puting the " offenders in the pillory. And tho' he inhanced " the cuſtoms, where it concerned the merchants in " general, yet he drew down the impoſt formerly " taken on tobacco, from ſix-pence to three-pence " per pound, it being for his own profit ſo to do.

" That he raiſed ſeveral other monopolies and " unlawful exactions for his own gain, viz. on ſtarch, " iron-pots, glaſſes, tobacco-pipes, &c.

" XIII. That, flax being one of the principal " and native commodities of Ireland, the ſaid earl " having got great quantities thereof into his hands, " and growing on his own lands, did iſſue out " ſeveral proclamations, preſcribing and injoining " the working of flax into yarn and thread, and " the ordering it in ſuch ways wherein the natives " of that kingdom were unpractiſed, and unſkilful; " and the flax, wrought or ordered in other manner " than as the ſaid proclamation preſcribed, was " ſeized and imployed to the uſe of him and his " agents, and thereby the ſaid earl did gain, in " effect, the ſole ſale of that native commodity.

" XIV. That the ſaid earl, by proclamation, CHARLES I " did impoſe upon the owners, maſters, purſers, An' 1641. " and boatſwains of every ſhip, a new and un- " lawful oath, viz. That they, immediately after " the arrival of a ſhip within any port or creek " in the kingdom of Ireland, ſhould give in a " true invoice of the outward bulk of wares and " merchandiſes firſt laden aboard them, together " with the ſeveral marks and numbers of goods, " and their qualities and condition; the names of " the ſeveral merchants, proprietors of the ſaid " goods, and the place from whence they were " freighted, and whither they were bound, &c.

" XV. That, by his own authority, without any " warrant or color of law, he did tax and impoſe " great ſums of money upon diverſe towns and " places in Ireland; and did cauſe the ſame to be " levied upon the inhabitants of thoſe towns by " troops of ſoldiers, with force of arms, in a war- " like manner; and ſent numbers of ſoldiers to " lie on the lands and houſes of ſuch as would not " conform to his orders, until they ſhould render " obedience to his ſaid orders; and this he did at " ſeveral times, and in diverſe places, by which " means he levied war within the ſaid realm againſt " his Majeſty and his liege people of that king- " dom.

" XVI. That the ſaid earl did make a propo- " ſition, and obtained from his Majeſty allowance " thereof, that no complaint of injuſtice or op- " preſſion, done in Ireland, ſhould be received in " England againſt any, unleſs it appeared that " the party made firſt his addreſs to him the ſaid " earl: and to deprive the ſubjects of that realm " of all means of complaints to his Majeſty, and " of redreſs againſt him and his agents, he did iſſue " a proclamation, thereby commanding all the no- " bility, undertakers and others, who held eſtates " and offices in the ſaid kingdom, to make their " perſonal reſidence in the ſaid kingdom of Ireland, " and not to depart thence without licenſe of him- " ſelf; which proclamation the ſaid earl had by " ſeveral rigorous ways, as by fine, impriſonment, " and otherwiſe, put in execution; by means where- " of the ſubjects of that realm were reſtrained from " ſeeking relief againſt the oppreſſions of the ſaid " earl.

" XVII. That, ſpeaking of the army in Ireland, " he did declare, that his Majeſty was ſo well " pleaſed with the army of Ireland, and the con- " ſequences thereof, that his Majeſty would cer- " tainly make the ſame a pattern for all his three " kingdoms.

" XVIII. That, in order to draw dependency " upon himſelf, of the Papiſts in both kingdoms of " England and Ireland, during the time of his go- " vernment in Ireland, he reſtored diverſe frieries " and maſs-houſes (which had been formerly ſup- " preſſed by the precedent deputies of that king- " dom; two of which houſes are in the city of " Dublin, and had been aſſigned to the uſe of " the univerſity there) to the pretended owners " thereof.

" That, in the months of May and June laſt, " the ſaid earl did raiſe an army in Ireland, con- " ſiſting of eight thouſand foot, all of which, ex- " cept a thouſand or thereabouts, were Papiſts; " and the ſaid thouſand were drawn out of the old " army there, and in their places there were a " thouſand Papiſts put into the ſaid old army by " the ſaid earl.

" That the more to ingage and tie the ſaid new " army of Papiſts to himſelf, and to incourage " them, he did ſo provide, that the ſaid new army " of Papiſts were duly paid, &c. but the ſaid old " army were, for the ſpace of one whole year and " upwards, unpaid.

Charles I An' 1641.

" That being appointed a commiſſioner within " eleven ſeveral counties of the northern parts of " England, for compounding with recuſants for " their forfeitures due to his Majeſty; and being " alſo receiver of the compoſition money thereby " ariſing, he did compound with them at low and " under rates, and provided, that they ſhould " be diſcharged of all proceedings againſt them in " all his Majeſty's courts, both temporal and eccle- " ſiaſtical, contrary to the laws and ſtatutes of this " realm.

" XIX. That he did, of his own authority, " contrive and frame a new and unuſual oath, by " the purport whereof the party, taking the ſaid " oath, was to ſwear, that he ſhould not proteſt " againſt any of his Majeſty's royal commands, " but ſubmit himſelf in all due obedience thereunto; " which oath he inforced on the ſubjects of the " Scotiſh nation, inhabiting in Ireland; and com- " peled diverſe of his Majeſty's ſaid ſubjects there " to take the ſaid oath againſt their wills; and of " ſuch as refuſed to take it, ſome he grievouſly " fined and impriſoned, and others he deſtroyed " and exiled; namely, he fined Henry Steward " and his wife, who refuſed to take the ſaid oath, " five thouſand pounds each, and their two daugh- " ters, with James Gray, each three thouſand pounds, " and impriſoned them for not paying the ſaid " fines.

" That he did upon that occaſion declare, that " the ſaid oath did not only oblige them in point " of allegiance to his Majeſty, and acknowledg- " ment of his ſupremacy only, but to the cere- " monies and government of the church eſtabliſhed, " and to be eſtabliſhed by his Majeſty's royal au- " thority, and ſaid, that the refuſers to obey he " would proſecute to the blood.

" XX. That he was the chief incendiary of the " laſt war againſt the Scotiſh nation, by inciting " and provoking his Majeſty againſt his ſubjects of " Scotland; and had declared and adviſed his Ma- " jeſty, that the demands made by the Scots in " their parliament, were a ſufficient cauſe of war " againſt them: that he ſaid, that the nation of " the Scots were rebels and traitors; and he being " then about to come to England, farther ſaid, " that if it pleaſed his Majeſty to ſend him back " again, he would root out of the kingdom of " Ireland the Scotiſh nation both root and branch: " that he had cauſed diverſe of the ſhips and goods " of the Scots to be ſtayed, ſeized and moleſted, " to the intent to ſet on a war between the two " nations.

" XXI. That, at his arrival to England, find- " ing that his Majeſty had compoſed the troubles " in the north, and made a pacification with his " ſubjects of Scotland, he labored by all means to " procure his Majeſty to break that pacification: " and having incited his Majeſty to an offenſive " war againſt his Scotiſh ſubjects, he counſeled him " to call a parliament in England, yet he intended " that, if the proceedings of that parliament ſhould " not be ſuch as would ſtand with his miſchievous " deſigns, he would then procure his Majeſty to " break the ſame; and, by ways of force and " power, to raiſe monies upon the ſubjects of this " kingdom; and for the incouragement of his " Majeſty to hearken to his advice, he did before " his Majeſty and his privy council, then ſiting in " council, make a large declaration, that he would " ſerve his Majeſty in any other way, in caſe the " parliament ſhould not ſupply him.

" XXII. That, before the begining of laſt par- " liament, the ſaid earl of Strafford went into " Ireland, and procured the parliament of that " kingdom to declare their aſſiſtance in a war " againſt the Scots, and gave directions for the " raiſing an army there, conſiſting of eight thou- " ſand foot, and one thouſand horſe, being for the " moſt part Papiſts, as aforeſaid: and, confederat- " ing with one ſir George Ratcliffe, did together " with him traiterouſly conſpire to imploy the ſaid " army for the ruin and deſtruction of the kingdom " of Scotland, and of altering and ſubverting the " fundamental laws, and eſtabliſhed government of " that kingdom.

Charles I An' 1641.

" Shortly after, the ſaid earl returned into Eng- " land, and to ſundry perſons declared his opinion " to be, that his Majeſty ſhould firſt try the par- " liament here, and if that did not ſupply him " according to his occaſions, he might uſe then his " prerogative as he pleaſed, to levy what he needed; " and that he ſhould be acquited both of God and " man if he took ſome other courſes to ſupply " himſelf, tho' it were againſt the wills of his " ſubjects.

" XXIII. That, upon the thirteenth day of " April laſt, the parliament of England met, and " the commons houſe did enter into debate and " conſideration of the grievances of this kingdom; " he the ſaid earl of Strafford, and the archbiſhop " of Canterbury, did procure his Majeſty, by ſun- " dry ſpeeches and meſſages, to urge the ſaid com- " mons houſe to enter into ſome reſolution for his " Majeſty's ſupply, for maintenance of his war " againſt his ſubjects of Scotland, before any courſe " taken for the relief of thoſe grievances where- " with this kingdom was then afflicted; whereupon " a demand was then made from his Majeſty of " twelve ſubſidies, for the releaſe of ſhip-money " only. And while the ſaid commons were in " debate and conſideration concerning ſome ſup- " ply, before any reſolution by them made, he " the ſaid earl of Strafford, with the help and " aſſiſtance of the ſaid archbiſhop, did procure his " Majeſty to diſſolve the ſaid parliament; and upon " the ſame day, the ſaid earl did indeavor to in- " ſenſe his Majeſty againſt his ſubjects who had been " members of the ſaid houſe of commons, by telling " his Majeſty, they had denied to ſupply him; " and afterwards upon the ſame day, did adviſe his " Majeſty to this effect, that having tried the " affections of his people, he was looſe and abſolved " from all rules of government; and that he was " to do every thing that power would admit; and " that his Majeſty had tried all ways, and was " refuſed, and ſhould be acquited towards God and " man; and that he had in Ireland an army which " he might imploy to reduce this kingdom.

" XXIV. That in the ſame month of May, he " declared before others of his Majeſty's privy " council, that the parliament of England had for- " ſaken the King, and that, in denying to ſupply " his Majeſty, they had given him advantage to " ſupply himſelf by other ways; and that he was " not to ſuffer himſelf to be maſtered by the fro- " wardneſs and undutifulneſs of the people.

" And having ſo maliciouſly ſlandered the ſaid " late houſe of commons, he did, with the help " and advice of the ſaid archbiſhop of Canterbury, " and lord Finch, late lord-keeper of the great- " ſeal of England, cauſe to be printed and pub- " liſhed, in his Majeſty's name, a falſe and ſcanda- " lous book, full of bitter and malicious invectives, " intitled, 'His Majeſty's Declaration of the Cauſes " which moved him to diſſolve the laſt Parlia- " ment.'

" XXV. That, not long after, he the ſaid earl " of Strafford did adviſe the King to go on vigo- " rouſly in levying ſhip-money, and did procure " the ſheriffs of ſeveral counties, who did not levy " the ſhip-money, to be ſent for, diverſe of whom " were by him threatened to be ſued in the ſtar- " chamber.

" And

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" And a great loan of one hundred thouſand " pounds was demanded of the city of London, " and the lord mayor, ſheriffs and aldermen of " the ſaid city were often ſent for, by his advice, " to the council-table, and required to certify the " names of ſuch inhabitants of the city as were fit " to lend; which they with much humility refuſing " to do, he the ſaid earl of Strafford did uſe theſe " and the like ſpeeches, viz. That they deſerved " to be put to fine and ranſom; and that no good " would be done with them 'till examples were " made of them, and they were laid by the heels, " and ſome of the aldermen hanged up.

" XXVI. That the ſaid earl having brought " his Majeſty into exceſſive charge, without any " juſt cauſe, did counſel and approve the two fol- " lowing dangerous and wicked projects, viz.

" To ſeize upon the bullion and money in the " mint: and to imbaſe his Majeſty's coin with the " mixture of braſs.

" And accordingly he procured one hundred and " thirty thouſand pounds, which was then in the " mint, and belonging to diverſe merchants, ſtran- " gers and others, to be ſeized on, and ſtayed to " his Majeſty's uſe. And when diverſe merchants " of London, owners of the ſaid bullion and mo- " ney, came to his houſe, to let him underſtand " the great miſchief that courſe would produce here " and in other parts, he the ſaid earl told them, " that the city of London dealed undutifully and " unthankfully with his Majeſty; and that they " were more ready to help the rebels than to help " his Majeſty: and that if any hurt came to them " they may thank themſelves; and that it was the " courſe of other Princes to make uſe of ſuch mo- " nies to ſerve their occaſions.

" And when the officers of his Majeſty's mint " came to him, and gave him diverſe reaſons againſt " imbaſing the ſaid money; he told them, that " the French King did uſe to ſend commiſſioners of " horſe, with commiſſion to ſearch into mens " eſtates, and to peruſe their accounts, that ſo they " may know what to levy of them by force, " which they did accordingly levy; and turning " to lord Cottington, then preſent, ſaid, that " this was a point worthy of his lordſhip's conſi- " deration.

" XXVII. That he was made lieutenant-general " of all his Majeſty's forces in the north; and be- " ing at York, did, by his own authority, impoſe " a tax on his Majeſty's ſubjects in the county of " York of eight pence per diem, for maintenance " of every ſoldier of the trained-bands of that " county; which ſums of money he cauſed to be " levied by force: and to compel his Majeſty's " ſubjects out of fear to pay the ſame, he did de- " clare, that he would commit them who refuſed the " payment thereof; and they who refuſed it, were " in very little better condition than of high-treaſon.

" XXVIII. That being lieutenant-general of his " Majeſty's army, he did not provide for defenſe of " the town of Newcaſtle as he ought to have done, " but ſuffered the ſame to be loſt, that ſo he might " the more inſenſe the Engliſh againſt the Scots.

" And, for the ſame purpoſe he did write to " lord Conway, general of the horſe, that he ſhould " fight with the Scotiſh army at the paſſage over " the Tine, whatſoever ſhould follow; notwith- " ſtanding that the ſaid lord Conway had formerly " by letters informed the ſaid earl, that his Ma- " jeſty's army, then under his command, was not " of force ſufficient to incounter the Scots."

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

The parliament of Ireland hearing the earl of Strafford was in the Tower, immediately ſent a commitee of both houſes to England, to lay before the parliament remonſtrances concerning the grievances indured by the Iriſh under that earl's adminiſtration. But as theſe remonſtrances contained little but what is mentioned in the twenty-eight articles, I think it not neceſſary they ſhould be inſerted.

Commitee from the Iriſh parliament to complain of Strafford. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 220.

This proceſs was not ready to be tried before the twenty-ſecond of March, 1640-1, and laſted 'till the twelfth of April. It would be too tedious to give a particular account of the proofs, depoſitions of the evidences, anſwers of the party accuſed upon each article, and replies of the commons. To give a general idea of the matter, it will ſuffice to ſay in two words, that the impeachment runing wholly upon the earl of Strafford's pretended intention to ſubvert the fundamental laws of the kingdom, the greateſt part of the crimes he was accuſed of could be accounted high-treaſon but on ſuppoſition of this ſame intention: and therefore the managers (1) inſiſted upon every one of the articles in order to prove this intention, maintaining that tho' each ſingly was not capable of proving it, they were however, when joined together, of the utmoſt evidence. But beſide that each of theſe articles was not equally well proved, it remained alſo to decide, whether the intention could render a man guilty of treaſon. The earl of Strafford's counſel maintained that tho', by law, the bare intention of killing the King was high-treaſon, it did not follow, that the intention could be conſidered on the ſame foot, with reſpect to other treaſons, which the law had not explained in the ſame manner. Strafford moreover ſhewed, that none of the particular crimes he was charged with could be deemed treaſon, and that a hundred felonies could never amount to one treaſon. But this diſpute concerned only the nature of the offenſe, in which the accuſed had a great advantage, eſpecially if it be conſidered that, in England, in criminal caſes, the judges are wonderfully careful not to miſtake, and to attend only to what proves directly the nature of the offenſe contained in the indictment. Had the commons been ſatisfied with accuſing the earl of Strafford of felony, or miſdemeanors, very probably they would have obtained againſt him a ſpeedy ſentence: but having ſolely impeached him of high-treaſon, it belonged to the peers to condemn or acquit him ſolely upon that ſpecies of offenſe. In the reign of Edward VI, the duke of Somerſet was accuſed of high-treaſon and felony. He was acquited as to the firſt, but condemned for the latter.

Reaſons for and againſt the earl.

The earl of Strafford defended himſelf with all the ability, preſenſe of mind, judgment and temper could be expected from a perſon of his great capacity (2). Accordingly, the commons readily perceived that the lords would not eaſily be induced duced to condemn him: and therefore they determined on taking a different courſe to attain their purpoſes.

Votes of the commons. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 224, 225. Vol. VIII. p. 50.

The nineteenth of April, it was voted by the commons, that the earl of Strafford's indeavor to ſubvert the fundamental laws of the realms of England and Ireland, and to introduce a tyrannical arbitrary government in both thoſe kingdoms, was high-treaſon. Two days after, a bill of attainder was brought in againſt him. The bill was read twice in the morning, and the third time in the afternoon, and paſſed with the majority of two hundred and four againſt fifty nine, after which it was ſent up to the lords.

Bill of attainder paſſed and ſent up to the lords. Id. Vol. I. p. 54.

Among thoſe who oppoſed the bill, lord Digby diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a very eloquent ſpeech, wherein he indeavored to ſhew, that to condemn the earl of Strafford in that manner was a real murder. Great exceptions were taken at this ſpeech, and tho' the houſe ſeemed at firſt not much to regard it, they afterwards ordered that it ſhould be publicly burned by the hangman.

Lord Digby's ſpeech againſt the bill. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 225. Vol. VIII. p. 50, 55,

The effect this bill of attainder produced was not ſuch as the commons deſired. Their lordſhips were not in any haſte to examine it, or to anſwer the commons impatience; being willing previouſly to conſider the arguments for and againſt the bill. In this interval, the peers cauſed ſir William Balfour to be examined concerning the earl of Strafford's projected eſcape. Several thouſands of Londoners preſented to both houſes a petition againſt his ſaid lordſhip, urging that he was the city's ſworn enemy. The twenty-ninth of April, mr. St. John, in name of the commons, made their lordſhips a long ſpeech, tending to prove the bill of attainder not contrary to law. May the firſt, Charles went to the parliament, and thus harangued both houſes.

My lords,

Charles's ſpeech in favor of Strafford. Id. IV. p. 239. VIII. 734.

"I Had not any intention to have ſpoken to you "of this buſineſs this day, which is the great "buſineſs of the earl of Strafford, becauſe I would "do nothing which might ſerve to hinder your oc-"caſions: but now it comes ſo to paſs that ſeeing, "of neceſſity, I muſt have part in the judgment, "I think it moſt neceſſary for me to declare my "conſcience therein. I am ſure you all know, "that I have been preſent at the hearing of this "great caſe, from the one end to the other (1), "and I muſt tell you, that I cannot in my con-"ſcience condemn him of high-treaſon; it is not "fit for me to argue the buſineſs; I am ſure you "will not expect that. 'A poſitive doctrine "beſt becomes the mouth of a Prince:' yet I muſt "tell you three great truths, which I am ſure no "body knows ſo well as my ſelf. 1. That I "never had any intention of bringing over the "Iriſh army into England; nor ever was adviſed "by any body ſo to do. 2. That there was never "any debate before me, neither in public council, "nor at private commitee, of the diſloyalty of my "Engliſh ſubjects, nor ever had I any ſuſpicion of "them. 3. I was never counſeled by any to alter "the leaſt of any of the laws of England, much "leſs to alter all the laws: nay, I muſt tell you "this, I think no body durſt ever be ſo impudent "as to move me in it; for, if they had, I ſhould "have put ſuch a mark upon them, and made them "ſuch an example, that all poſterity ſhould know "my intentions by it; for my intention was ever to "govern according to law, and no otherwiſe (2).

Charles I An' 1641.

"I deſire to be rightly underſtood. I told you "in my conſcience, I cannot condemn him of high-"treaſon; yet I cannot ſay I can clear him of miſ-"demeanors: therefore I hope you may find a way "to ſatisfy juſtice, and your own fears, and not "preſs upon my conſcience. My lords, I hope you "know what a tender thing conſcience is: yet I muſt "declare unto you, that to ſatisfy my people I would "do great matters: but this of conſcience, no fear, "no reſpect whatſoever, ſhall ever make me go "againſt it. Certainly I have not ſo ill deſerved of "the parliament at this time, that they ſhould preſs "me in this tender point; and therefore I cannot "expect that you will go about it.

"Nay, I muſt confeſs for matters of miſdemea-"nors, I am ſo clear in that, that tho' I will not "chalk out the way, yet let me tell you, that I "do think my lord Strafford is not fit hereafter to "ſerve me, or the common-wealth, in any place "of truſt, no, not ſo much as that of a conſtable. "therefore I leave it to you, my lords, to find "ſome ſuch way as may bring me out of this great "ſtreight, and keep ourſelves, and the king-"dom from ſuch great inconveniencies; certainly "he who thinks him guilty of high-treaſon, in his "conſcience may condemn him of miſdemeanors."

This ſpeech produced a quite contrary effect to what his Majeſty had expected. Accordingly, the earl of Clarendon intimates, that lord Say adviſed King Charles to it, in order to draw him into a ſnare, and render Strafford's ruin more certain (3). The commons were highly offended with it, ſaying, it was unprecedented for a King to meddle with bills before they were preſented to him, and a means to take away the freedom of votes, and inſtantly adjourned 'till Monday the third of May.

This ſpeech no way anſwers King Charles's intention. Clarendon, p. 201. Ruſhworth, Vol. VIII. 725.

That was the day whereon the London mob flocked to Weſtminſter: and on the ſame day the houſe of commons drew the already-mentioned proteſtation, and on the morrow, May the fourth, their lordſhips approved it, and paſſed the ſaid earl's bill of attainder, there being not in the houſe more than forty-ſix lords of the eighty who had conſtantly attended the trial (4). It is pretended, that thoſe who abſented themſelves, were terrified by threats from the populace.

"ſelf, I have been by the bleſſing of God taught, that the afflictions of this preſent life are not to be compared to "that eternal weight of glory which ſhall be revealed hereafter. And ſo, my lords, even ſo, with all tranquillity of "mind, I freely ſubmit myſelf to your judgment, and whether that judgment be life or death, 'Te Deum Lau-"damus.'" ——— Whitlock, (p. 44.) obſerves, "That certainly never any man acted ſuch a part, on ſuch a "theater, with more wiſdom, conſtancy and eloquence, with greater reaſon, judgment and temper, and with a better "grace in all his words and geſtures, than this great and excellent perſon did; and he moved the hearts of all his auditors "(ſome few excepted) to remorſe and pity."

(1) At the trial there was on the ſtage, a chair and cloth of ſtate for the King, on either ſide whereof was a cloſe gallery for the King, Queen and Prince to be private. In this place his Majeſty remained all the time of the trial. Whitlock, p. 41.

(2) It is very hard to reconcile this aſſertion of King Charles's with his government the firſt fifteen years of his reign. Rapin.

(3) When the earl of Strafford was told, with joy, by his friends, that the King had made a warm ſpeech in his favor to both houſes, he received it as his doom, and told them, "The King's kindneſs had ruined him, and that he had little elſe to "do but to prepare himſelf for death. Welwood's Mem. p. 46.

(4) Lord Clarendon (Vol. I. p. 401.) ſays, of the forty-ſix, eleven only diſſented. According to Whitlock (Mem. p. 45.) there were but forty-five, of whom twenty-ſix voted the earl guilty of high-treaſon, upon the fifteenth article. "For levying money in Ireland by force, in a warlike manner." And upon the nineteenth article, "For impoſing "an oath upon the ſubjects in Ireland.

earl's

CHARLES I. AN' 1641.

earl's not having done any thing but what was agreeable to his intentions and his maxims of government. He might be guilty, with regard to the people, on many accounts, but certainly he was not ſo with reſpect to the King, who had conſtantly approved his conduct. Beſide, his Majeſty had proteſted in full parliament, that he neither could nor would act againſt his conſcience, and that he did not believe, in his conſcience, the earl was guilty. On the other hand, if he conſented to the bill of attainder, after ſuch a declaration, he would manifeſt himſelf reduced to this extremity by the neceſſity of his affairs, ſo would not be thanked for it, and for the future would have nothing more to deny his parliament: but in caſe he rejected the bill, he plainly perceived the conſequences of his refuſal, and that at leaſt he ſhould be accuſed of denying his people juſtice, contrary to the advice of both houſes of parliament.

The continuance-bill paſſed in the upper houſe. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 251. Clarendon, p. 204.

It is not unlikely that, in this extremity, ſome one counſeled King Charles to diſſolve the parliament: at leaſt, the commons imagined he had no other means of extricating himſelf from his preſent imbaraſs. Wherefore, to deprive him of this refuge alſo, the ſame day, the fourth of May, they ordered the bringing in of a bill for this parliament's continuance, that it might not be diſſolved without the conſent of both houſes (1); which bill was read thrice in two days after in the upper-houſe, with the bill of attainder of the earl of Strafford. In theſe two or three days, the commons, as has been obſerved, vigorouſly puſhed the plot buſineſs to fill the people with fears, and force the lords to paſs thoſe two bills.

Charles's conſultations about the bill of attainder. May 9. Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 201. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 262. Vol. VIII. p. 755. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 192.

The bill of attainder having paſſed the upper-houſe, Charles aſſembled the privy-council, and ſent for his lawyers. He laid before them his ſcruples and reaſons for not conſenting to the bill. But Juxon, biſhop of London, was the only perſon who ventured to adviſe his Majeſty, to reject a bill preſented him by both houſes. All the reſt indeavored to perſuade him to ſatisfy his people, and that the life of any one perſon ought not to be put in a balance with the whole kingdom's ſafety. As to his ſcruples, they told him, he might conſult his biſhops, who would give him the propereſt advice. Charles, not meeting with the ſatisfaction he expected from his council, ſent for ſome biſhops to adviſe with. It is affirmed, that the archbiſhop of York, ſaid to him on this occaſion, "That "there was a private and a public conſcience; "that his public conſcience, as a King, might "not only diſpenſe with, but oblige him to do that "which was againſt his private conſcience, as a "man." And therefore, in plain terms, adviſed "even for conſcience ſake, to paſs the act (2)." But what contributed moſt to determine him was a letter from Strafford himſelf, who hearing of the ſtreights his Majeſty was in, "humbly beſought "him to paſs the bill, to remove him out of "the way towards a bleſſed agreement, which he "doubted not God would for ever eſtabliſh be-"twixt him and his ſubjects. Adding, That his "conſent would more acquit his Majeſty therein "to God, than all the world could do beſide. "To a willing man there is no injury." Finally Charles, no longer able to withſtand the preſſing inſtances of the parliament and his own counſellors, or rather the fear of the calamities he foreſaw would befal both himſelf and poſterity if he refuſed conſenting to the bill, ſigned a commiſſion to four peers, to paſs it in his name (3). By the ſame commiſſion, he impowered thoſe lords to give the royal aſſent to the bill for continuing the parliament, which was of much greater importance to him than the earl of Strafford's life, but which however it does not appear he much regarded, ſo full was he of the other. This bill, which was of ſuch conſequence to Charles, was brought in the ſixth of May, and in five days paſſed both houſes, and received his ſaid Majeſty's approbation, as if it had been a mere trifle.

Charles paſſes the two bills. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 262. Vol. VIII. p. 755.

The earl of Strafford beheaded. Ib. IV. p. 267, &c. Reaſons for and againſt him.

On the twelfth of May, the ſecond day after the royal aſſent to the bill of attainder, the earl of Strafford was executed, and ſuffered death with great firmneſs. It was then, and is yet a ſubject of diſpute, whether or no he merited capital puniſhment. Such as are for him, urge, That there needs only to examine the articles of accuſation, the evidences produced againſt him, and his anſwers, to be convinced that he was not guilty of high-treaſon: that this is ſtill farther proved by the conviction of his accuſers themſelves, who, finding they could not expect from the peers a ſentence anſwering their wiſhes, imployed, in order to attain their ends, ſo many extraordinary methods. Firſt, changing the judicial accuſation into a bill of attainder. Secondly, that tumultuous concourſe of the populace. Thirdly, the diſcovery made to the houſe of commons of the pretended conſpiracy, preciſely at this juncture, tho' it had been long neglected (4). Fourthly, their proteſtation, the ſole deſign whereof was to terrify the people, and inſenſe them againſt the King and his party. Laſtly, the violence uſed towards their lordſhips, to extort their conſent to the bill, and which obliged many to abſent themſelves, to avoid being expoſed to popular fury. It is pretended, all this ſhews that the commons themſelves did not believe him guilty, ſince they uſed ſo many artifices to take away his life.

They who are againſt him, allege; It cannot be denied that King Charles had formed a deſign to eſtabliſh arbitrary government, and aſſumed to himſelf a power contrary to law: that he had made choice of ſuch miniſters and counſelors as he thought moſt proper to ſerve him in the execution of his deſign: that from the council-board had proceeded all thoſe oppreſſions ſo long complained of by the people, and conſequently the King's miniſters and counſellors could not be innocent, except theſe op-

(1) This bill was brought into the houſe of commons, the next morning after it was propounded, and the ſame day it was perfected, and paſſed the houſe. The firſt motion for this bill was made by a Lancaſhire knight, who offered to procure the King 650,000 l. 'till the ſubſidies ſhould be raiſed, if he would paſs ſuch a bill. Whitelock, p. 45. The pretended reaſon of making ſuch a law was, That the great ſums of money which the Scots were to have, could not ſuddenly be raiſed; and that being to be borrowed for their preſent ridance, lenders would hardly be found, unleſs they ſaw a certain way to ſecure their monies, which the danger of diſſolving this parliament would hazard. (3) Nothwithſtanding Strafford's letter to the King, when his Majeſty ſent ſecretary Carleton to acquaint him with what was done, and the motives of it, the earl ſeriouſly aſked the ſecretary, Whether his Majeſty had paſſed the bill or not? As not believing, without ſome aſtoniſhment, that the King would have done it. And being again aſſured that it was paſſed, he roſe from his chair, lift up his eyes to heaven, laid his hand on his heart, and ſaid, "Put "not your truſt in Princes, nor in the ſons of men, for in them there is no ſalvation. Whitelock, p. 46. The ſame author adds, it was reported that, in order to bring the King to ſign this bill, he was promiſed the earl's life ſhould be ſpared.

preſſions, which were as clear as the ſun, were denied: that the earl of Strafford was univerſally known to be the chief of theſe miniſters, and the perſon in whom his Majeſty moſt confided, and to hold the firſt place in the ſecret council called the Junto, conſiſting of four or five perſons only, where all reſolutions for the ſubjects oppreſſion were taken: that he could not be ſuppoſed to be againſt all theſe reſolutions, ſince his arriving to ſo high a degree of favor was intirely owing to his attachment to his Majeſty's pleaſure: that it was no leſs evident that, in his three great poſts of privy-counſellor, preſident of the North, and lord-deputy of Ireland, he had always carried himſelf agreeably to Charles's principles and maxims, tho' he knew thoſe principles were contrary to law: that all his indeavors tended to augment the King's revenues, and extend his prerogative, by all methods, even the moſt irregular: that, in England, obedience to the King's orders excuſes not miniſters in illegal proceedings: that therefore it muſt either be denied, that the King ever did any thing contrary to law, or be confeſſed, that his miniſters, and eſpecially the chiefs, were not innocent of theſe violations: that the ſtreſs of the commons accuſation lay not ſo much upon each particular article, as upon all together, to ſhew that the earl of Strafford really intended to eſtabliſh arbitrary government: that every article was a proof of this intention, and it was a deluſion to repreſent them as being each ſingly a ſeparate charge of ſome particular crime: that this intention, joined to the manner of exerciſing the power given him by his Majeſty, was a crime unpardonable, ſince it tended to ſubvert all law, and alter the conſtitution: that it was not the ſame with the intention of ſubverting the laws, as with the intention of commiting any other offenſe, even treaſon itſelf: that theſe latter, when commited, may be puniſhed by law; but if the intention of ſubverting the laws be not puniſhable 'till put in execution, there is no remedy; aboliſhed laws not being of any uſe: that, upon theſe grounds, parliaments had, at all times, puniſhed ſeveral miniſters on this account. In ſhort, that examples being neceſſary to deter miniſters in after times from ſo abſolutely devoting themſelves to the King's will to oppreſs the ſubject, there could not be a properer one for that purpoſe than the earl of Strafford, whoſe power had made every one tremble, and who was moreover the object of public hatred, the whole nation conſidering him as the chief author of their miſeries.

To finiſh what relates to the earl of Strafford, I ſhall here ſubjoin that, not long after his death, this ſame parliament paſſed an act for reſtoring his children in blood and honor, and for ſettling his eſtate upon his heirs, and that in Charles II's reign the act of attainder was repealed. I believe not that ever any Engliſh ſubject has had beſtowed on him ſo many eulogies as the earl of Strafford. Diverſe, in mentioning him, have not been able to forbear adding always to his name ſome honorable epithet, to expreſs their eſteem. In a word, he is repreſented as one of the greateſt men, one of the moſt accompliſhed miniſters England ever produced. I pretend not by any means to queſtion his natural or acquired abilities: but in reality, on conſidering his life and actions, I ſee not what can ſerve for foundation to ſuch exalted encomiums. In the firſt place, after he was in favor, King Charles had no quarrel with any foreign ſtate: ſo, he had no opportunity to diſplay his talents in negociations and embaſſies. As to war, he was imployed but once, in the late war againſt Scotland, in quality of lieutenant-general, commanding the army in the general's abſenſe. On this occaſion, he may be charged with a very great error, in not being ready to oppoſe the Scots paſſage of the Tine, and in ſuffering them to take Newcaſtle, if perhaps it was not deſignedly done to ingage inevitably the two nations in a war, which certainly can be matter of no great commendation. It muſt therefore be acknowledged, that his talents were confined to the diſcharge of his employments. As to that, I find him charged with having prevaricated, and intirely devoted himſelf to accompliſh the King's deſign of ſeting up arbitrary government. Admiting this to be a calumny, and that he had never any ſuch thought, I nevertheleſs ſee not that his innocence can be matter of praiſe to him, any more than to many others who had before him been in the ſame imploys. What then did he perform in the adminiſtration of his offices to deſerve the character of a moſt accompliſhed miniſter, a very great man, which is generally given him? If it is urged, that he made uſe of his extraordinary talents to ſerve his royal maſter faithfully, and promote his deſigns, which doubtleſs is the ſole foundation of all thoſe eulogies beſtowed on him, it is to be feared, many will not allow that he ought to have ſerved the King in that manner, or that he did him any real ſervice, as the event has manifeſted. Wherefore, the high commendations given to this earl muſt be conſidered only as a ſenſible proof of the principles of his panegyriſts, who perhaps are very much out of humor he ſucceeded no better.

Charles I An' 1641.

The earl of Strafford's death was to King Charles a great, tho' not his only mortification. After the commons had made this eſſay of their ſtrength, they reſolved to complete the government's reformation, which 'till now was only commenced. The King, on his part, indeavored, tho' in vain, to cool the great ardor of the commons, by granting or promiſing places to ſuch as were moſt agreeable to them. He had made ſir Edward Littleton lord-keeper, in the room of lord Finch, who was forced to withdraw. For the ſame reaſon, dr. Juxon, biſhop of London, reſigned his treaſurer's ſtaff, which was to be given to the earl of Bedford: but that earl died, while he was earneſtly laboring to procure ſome wholſome agreement between his Majeſty and the commons. Oliver St. John, a leading man in the houſe of commons, had been made ſollicitor-general. Lord Cottington was to ſurrender the office of chancellor of the exchequer in favor of mr. Pym, and the place of maſter of the wards to make room for lord Say. The office of ſecretary of ſtate, exerciſed by Windebank, was deſigned for Denzil Hollis. The earl of Eſſex, lord Kimbolton, and mr. Hampden, were likewiſe to have places: but the earl of Bedford's death put a period to moſt of theſe projects. However King Charles ceaſed not, after the earl of Strafford's death, to gratify the commons, by making the earl of Eſſex lord-chamberlain, having firſt removed the earl of Pembroke; for Eſſex was a great favorite of the commons. But all this produced not the great alterations Charles expected: the wound was too deep to be cured by ſuch lenitives.

Charles in vain tries to pacify the commons. Clarendon. p. 166, 167, 199. Whitlock, p. 46.

The parliament's general aim was not only to redreſs paſſed grievances, but likewiſe to free the kingdom from all apprehenſion of being expoſed hereafter to like calamities. On the contrary, King Charles imagined that, by giving or promiſing good poſts to the leaders of the adverſe party, he ſhould ſtop their mouths, and render them dumb dogs: but they were too wiſe to fall into the ſnare. They were very ſenſible theſe places which the King gave, or offered to give them would be always at his diſpoſal, and that when the motive of his giving them ſhould ceaſe, it would be ever in his power to diſmiſs them: beſide, many of them were too conſcientious to ſacrifice the good of their country try to their own private intereſt. This diſpoſition of the leaders manifeſtly appeared, in that his Majeſty's favors were not forcible enough to make them drop their pretenſions; ſuch was their diſtruſt of his ſincerity. They could not believe that a Prince, who had ſo openly diſcovered a deſign to eſtabliſh arbitrary government, had ſuddenly changed his principles and maxims: nay, what he did in their favor convinced them of the neceſſity of firmly adhering to their project, perceiving his aim was to raiſe among them diviſions.

Extreme diffidence of the King.

Their project conſiſted, as has been intimated, firſt, in redreſſing all the grievances: ſecondly, in taking meaſures to prevent this Prince's reſuming his former conduct. This they labored with great diligence, after Strafford's execution. Hitherto they had only, by votes, prepared matters which plainly manifeſted their drift, and by the proteſtation ſubſcribed by both houſes. But they expected to meet, in the upper-houſe, with obſtacles ſo much the greater as Charles had there a very powerful party.

Obſervation on the houſe of peers.

The houſe of peers conſiſted of one hundred and twenty nobles, the two archbiſhops, and twenty-four biſhops. Among the firſt, the two Princes Charles and James, the duke of Buckingham, and ſeven or eight others, were yet minors; and there were ſome whoſe age, infirmities, or affairs hindered them from being preſented in this parliament. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, lord Finch and the earl of Strafford were no longer there at the time I am ſpeaking of: ſo that the prelates would have made a fifth part of the houſe, had it been complete. But as, according to lord Clarendon, there were not above eighty peers at the earl of Strafford's trial, a third part may be reckoned abſent; and as, on the other hand, there were vacant ſees, the biſhops and Popiſh lords may, withour a very erroneous calculation, be counted about a quarter part of the upper-houſe. As they were all his Majeſty's devotees, it is eaſy to perceive they rendered Charles's party very powerful in that houſe. Accordingly, this was the reaſon which obliged the commons to uſe their utmoſt efforts to take away their votes in parliament. Moſt of them had already rendered themſelves odious, by ſtretching their power as far as poſſible to promote the King's projects, and perſecuting the Puritans, and they ſtill continued to obſtruct the deſign of redreſſing grievances, by the number of their votes among the peers.

Political reaſons for the biſhops excluſion.

This was the plea made uſe of by the leading Preſbyterians, who had ſecret and more extenſive views, to induce ſuch of the church of England members as ſided not with his Majeſty, to ſacrifice the biſhops privilege of ſiting in parliament. They inſinuated to them, That while the King had ſo many votes in the upper-houſe, it would be almoſt impoſſible effectually to labor a redreſs of grievances: that in effect depriving biſhops of this privilege would, inſtead of being detrimental, be rather advantageous to religion, ſince they would thereby be more attached to their ſpiritual functions: that it would be no leſs beneficial to the ſtate, ſince it would deprive the King of a means he had always, too ſucceſsfully, uſed to break the parliament's meaſures.

Difference between the Puritans.

King Charles's opponents in this parliament, conſiſted indeed of Puritans; but they were, as I obſerved, of two ſpecies. Some were true Preſbyterians: others State Puritans, i. e. men whom the court had ever conſidered as Puritans; not that they were enemies to the church of England, but becauſe their maxims concerning civil government were thought to be founded upon Puritan principles. Theſe two ſorts of Puritans had been equally oppreſſed the firſt fifteen years of this reign, as well by the court as by the clergy, ſo that the hierarchy was become extremely odious to the one, and not a little ſuſpicious to the other. The true Preſbyterians moſt ardently wiſhed the utter extirpation of epiſcopacy. The other Puritans were highly inſenſed againſt the prelates and other eccleſiaſtics, who had conſtantly ſupported and countenanced Charles's deſigns. Theſe were therefore eaſily perſuaded, that it would be a great ſervice to the ſtate, to clip the clergy's wings, and render them leſs uſeful to the King: beſide, tho' church of England men, they agreed not in ſentiment with thoſe who believed religion could not ſubſiſt without biſhops, and that epiſcopacy was ſo cloſely united with the monarchy, that one could not be aboliſhed without the other's deſtruction. So far was the hierarchy itſelf from cauſing them any uneaſineſs, that they would very gladly have contributed towards its preſervation, provided church-men could have been confined to their ſpiritual functions: but they were uneaſy at ſeeing the clergy inveſted with a ſecular power, which they abuſed. It muſt be farther added that, being thus diſpoſed, they perceived the Preſbyterians, who were numerous throughout England and ſupported by the Scots, ſtrenuouſly inſiſt upon depriving all prelates of their votes among the peers. It was dangerous to diſpleaſe them, for a very forcible reaſon: for, tho' the Preſbyterians affected mentioning the ſtate only, it was well known that religion was their main object, and that their proceedings with regard to the civil government tended only to diſable the King from oppreſſing them, if he remained too powerful. Had King Charles therefore tried to gain the Preſbyterians, by offering them reaſonable terms, they might have accepted them, and relinquiſhed their deſign of reforming the civil government, and then the State Puritans would have been at the court's mercy. Union between the Puritans was therefore abſolutely neceſſary: for, it was no leſs dangerous for the Preſbyterians, that his Majeſty ſhould content the State Puritans, in which caſe they would have infallibly abandoned the Preſbyterians.

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

Both theſe factions therefore ſtood greatly in need of each other, and it was their intereſt to ſupport one another, leſt Charles ſhould take advantage of their diviſion: but that Prince could never reſolve either to grant the Preſbyterian party any terms, or to ſatisfy thoſe I ſtile politicians. He was thereby himſelf the inſtrument of forming ſuch a ſtrict union between theſe two parties, that they became one and the ſame. The politicians choſe rather, thro' condeſcenſion to the Preſbyterians, to ſacrifice the biſhops privilege, than be expoſed to the danger of ſeeing themſelves again ſubject to a deſpotic government.

Charles himſelf contributes towards uniting the Puritans.

Anſwerably to theſe diſpoſitions, and the conſequent reſolutions, the houſe of commons equally labored the redreſs of grievances, and the execution of their ſcheme againſt prelates. Thus both church and ſtate affairs went hand in hand, ſo that ſcarce a day paſſed but the commons gave Charles ſome mortification, one while by paſſing bills or votes againſt his former proceedings, another while by proſecuting the authors of grievances or innovations; ſometimes by exclaiming againſt the late plot, and other times by loading freſh burdens upon the Papiſts.

The commons labor to exclude the biſhops and redreſs grievances.

All this tended to the end propoſed by Charles's oppoſites. It was ſuppoſed, as a thing notorious, that there had been a ſettled deſign to introduce Popery, and that ſome of the biſhops were therein deeply concerned. Thus, by accuſing the Papiſts of having miſchievous views, and by rigorouſly proſecuting them, this accuſation was made in ſome meaſure to reflect on the prelates and clergy. It was pretended, that thoſe innovations introduced into into divine ſervice were a conſequence of this project, and therefore, by their condemnation, the clergy, who had countenanced them, incurred a public odium. Accuſations againſt particular perſons, who had ſhewed moſt zeal in ſupporting theſe innovations, produced alſo the ſame effect. In a word, nothing was omited which could contribute to ſhew a neceſſity for reſtoring the government to its natural ſtate, and convince people, that the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy was, to both church and ſtate, more prejudicial than neceſſary. Theſe two articles found the commons imployment for three months, from the earl of Strafford's execution to Charles's journey to Scotland.

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 283, 284, 286.

Firſt, with reſpect to the ſtate, it was during this interval that bills were brought in to aboliſh the ſtar-chamber and court of York; to regulate the council-table; to aboliſh ſhip-money; prevent vexatious proceedings concerning knighthood; againſt illegal impriſonments; and for aſcertaining the bounds and limits of foreſts. Each judge in particular was accuſed. The tax Charles had impoſed on the ſhires, for the muſter-maſter's ſalary, was declared illegal. The conſpiracy to ſeduce the army was alſo examined, and Wilmot, Aſhburnham and Pollard were expeled the houſe and impriſoned. All patents for monopolies, moſt of which were ſuppreſſed, were brought before the houſe. It was likewiſe examined, by what means a certain clauſe had been inſerted in the petition of right, concerning tonage and poundage, and care was taken to regiſter a declaration on that head, to prevent poſterity's being deceived by that ſurreptitious clauſe. I paſs over in ſilence ſundry votes flowing from all theſe articles, or which concerned particular perſons.

Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 288.

Proceedings of the commons as to religion. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 278, 279, 281, 283, 285, 303, 359, &c. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 257, 260, 282, 395, 418.

As to religion, beſide what was tranſacted with reſpect to the Papiſts, and whereof mention has already been made, the commons declared illegal the oath by which miniſters were bound to maintain the hierarchy in the church. A bill was brought in againſt pluraliſts. Thoſe canons made by the late convocation were condemned. A bill was paſſed to aboliſh the high commiſſion. Suppreſſion of deans and chapters was voted. Matthew Wren, biſhop of Ely, was impeached. The proteſtation was ordered to be ſubſcribed by the whole nation. Accuſations were laid before their lordſhips againſt thirteen biſhops, who had aſſiſted at the convocation.

Difference between both houſes touching the proteſtation. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 357, 358.

Theſe articles I have but juſt mentioned, becauſe a particular account of each ſeemed to me needleſs. I ſhall only add, that there were ſome differences between the two houſes concerning the proteſtation. The lords were for leaving every one at liberty to ſign it; but did not think proper to uſe compulſion. The commons, contrariwiſe, regarded this proteſtation as a Shiboleth, to diſtinguiſh the Ephramites (1); and their lordſhips finally agreed to what the commons required.

The commons explain a clauſe in the proteſtation. Ib. p. 273. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 241. Clarendon, p. 199. Diurn. Occur. p. 101.

One article of the proteſtation occaſioning ſome diſputes, the commons more fully explained that article, which was thus worded: "I ſwear to defend the true reformed Proteſtant religion, expreſſed in the doctrine of the church of England, againſt all Popery and Popiſh innovations, within this realm, contrary to the ſame doctrine." Some, inſiſting on the firſt part of this clauſe, pretended, that there was no other doctrine of the church of England than what is contained in the thirty-nine articles drawn up in Queen Elizabeth's reign, one of which is "to preſerve the government of the church by archbiſhops, biſhops, deans, &c." Hence they infered, that thoſe who ſhould take the proteſtation were bound to maintain epiſcopacy. But the commons, conſidering that whole clauſe literally as expreſſed in the proteſtation, declared, "That by theſe words was, and is meaned, only the public doctrine profeſſed in the ſaid church, ſo far as it is oppoſite to Popery and Popiſh innovations; and that the ſaid words are not to be extended to the maintaining any form of worſhip, diſcipline or government, nor of any rites or ceremonies of the ſaid church of England." This clearly manifeſted what was their intention with regard to the hierarchy.

Another difference about the ſtar-chamber. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. p. 304.

There was likewiſe another diſpute between both houſes, touching the ſtar-chamber. The peers were willing to agree it ſhould be reformed, but refuſed conſenting to its abolition. Mean while, the commons vigorouſly ſupporting the bill they had ſent their lordſhips, it finally paſſed, and, on the fifth of July, Charles gave his aſſent.

In this interval, I mean, from the earl of Strafford's death to his Majeſty's going into Scotland, certain other paſſages occurred which muſt neceſſarily be mentioned.

The cuſtomers offer 150,000l. which is accepted. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 277, 278.

The cuſtomers, who had collected the duties impoſed on merchandiſes, by his Majeſty's ſole authority without conſent of parliament, finding themſelves in no ſmall danger of being attacked, voluntarily offered a hundred and fifty thouſand pounds for an act of oblivion, and their offer was accepted (2).

Lord Digby called to the houſe of peers. p. 283.

Lord Digby, the earl of Briſtol's ſon, and member of the houſe of commons, was called by writ to the upper-houſe, the tenth of June. In the begining of this parliament, he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his zeal for the redreſs of grievances: but his ſpeech againſt the earl of Strafford's bill of attainder made him forfeit the commons affection. Whether he was already gained by the King, or on this occaſion firſt joined his party, his Majeſty thought proper to ſcreen him from the commons reſentment, by calling him to the houſe of peers. He will hereafter appear King Charles's chief miniſter and counſelor, a great enemy to the commons, as they on their part never pardoned his defection.

Charles inclinable to give Spain part of the Iriſh army. p. 357, 360, 381. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 411, 426, 465.

The Iriſh army ought to have been long ſince diſbanded, as there was no occaſion to keep it on foot, and the commons had frequently deſired it of his Majeſty: nevertheleſs, this army ſubſiſted the laſt, tho' the commons had taken care for their payment. When they came to be diſbanded, Charles acquainted both houſes, that the Catholic King having deſired to take this army into his ſervice, and intimated as much by his embaſſador, he had promiſed to ſend him four thouſand men. The lords ſcrupled not agreeing to his Majeſty's ingagement. But the commons, ever full of fears and ſuſpicions, judged it no way proper theſe troops ſhould remain on foot in name of the Spaniard, who would make them ſerve in the Netherlands, whence Charles might draw them whenever he pleaſed. Beſide, the French embaſſador had deſired the reſidue of that army for his maſter, to which Charles had likewiſe conſented. They deemed it one of the King's artifices to detain this Popiſh army, which was devoted to him, and whereon he could much better rely than on that of England. They therefore deſired him to recall his promiſe.

The commons oppoſe it. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 381.

(1) They declared, that whoſoever ſhould not take the proteſtation, was unfit to bear office in church or commonwealth, and ordered this vote to be printed, and ſent down to every county, city and borough. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 357.

(2) This petition was delivered to the houſe by the great farmers of tonage and poundage, namely, ſir Paul Pindar, ſir Abraham Daws, ſir John Wolſtenholm, and ſir John Jacob. The petty cuſtomers had the liberty likewiſe to come in upon compoſition, and then have the benefit of the act of oblivion. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 256.

On

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

On this occaſion, ſeveral conferences paſſed between both houſes, wherein the commons alleged ſundry reaſons to ſupport their opinion, without expreſſing the true one; but it was pretty obvious. King Charles was highly diſpleaſed with the commons oppoſition; whether he thought himſelf bound in honor to keep his word, or really aimed at retaining this army, by lending it to the Kings of France and Spain, in order to uſe it himſelf in caſe of neceſſity: what leaves room to ſuſpect he had formed ſuch a project is, its not appearing that their Catholic and moſt Chriſtian Majeſties had then any great occaſion for thoſe troops. Howſoever this was, Charles, without regarding the commons oppoſing it, ſhewed that he deſigned to perform his promiſe; and this affair was not yet decided when his ſaid Majeſty ſet out for Scotland. Some time after, he ſent a meſſage to the lords, dated from Edinburg, wherein he appeared firm in ſtanding to his ingagement, let what would be the conſequence; but the two houſes found means to render his reſolution ineffectual, by publiſhing an ordinance declaring, that whoever ſhould aſſiſt in tranſporting theſe Iriſh troops into any foreign country, ſhould be deemed enemies to the ſtate. This ordinance broke all Charles's meaſures, not one owner of a ſhip caring, for his ſake, to hazard inevitable ruin.

Charles bent on keeping his word. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 457. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 381.

Ordinance againſt tranſporting forces into foreign parts. Sep. 9. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 477.—481.

King Charles, as has been obſerved, thought the parliament would have granted him aid capable of inabling him to drive the Scots out of England. He ſoon found his miſtake, and clearly perceived, that the Scots had entered England at the ſollicitation of the Engliſh male-contents, and that theſe male-contents were the very perſons who had moſt credit and authority in both houſes. He judged therefore that, inſtead of thinking any longer of expeling the Scots by arms, he ſhould rather indeavor to agree with them, in order to diſjoin their intereſt from that of the Engliſh, and induce them to diſband their army, which was ever ready to ſupport the parliament. When therefore the commiſſioners of both kingdoms met at London, to continue the Rippon-treaty, they found no reſiſtance from the King who, by granting the Scots firſt demand, plainly ſhewed he was diſpoſed to refuſe them nothing. This demand was, that Charles ſhould cauſe to be publiſhed, in his name, the parliament of Scotland's acts, as well thoſe already paſſed in the firſt ſeſſion, as thoſe which ſhould be paſſed in the ſecond. So great a condeſcenſion on this point, which had properly occaſioned the ſecond war, convinced the commons, that Charles's aim was ſpeedily to get rid of the Scotiſh army, which to him was a no ſmall incumbrance, but to them very neceſſary for the execution of their projects: and therefore, as the Scotiſh commiſſioners had a good underſtanding with the commons, they ſo managed that the pacific negociation was prolonged 'till the ſeventh of Auguſt, 1641, tho' Charles, by granting whatever was required, did to the very utmoſt of his power remove all difficulties.

His reaſons for ſo doing.

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 363.

Finally, the negociation being near a period, and nothing more wanting to conclude the treaty, but to agree upon certain articles of no great importance, Charles permited the parliament of Scotland to meet, and promiſed to be there in perſon, to paſs ſuch acts as ſhould be judged requiſite. The commons, having knowledge of his Majeſty's reſolution, entertained ſome ſuſpicion of this journey, and were apprehenſive his deſign was to put himſelf at the head of his army in the north, under color of going to Scotland. They deſired therefore a conference with the lords, and moved, that the armies might be diſbanded before his Majeſty's departure, and that both houſes ſhould preſent a petition, intreating him to defer his journey. They ſupported their motion with diverſe arguments, and among others with this; That it was neceſſary to prevent the peoples ſuſpicions, and the deſigns ſome might have to make uſe of the army to raiſe diſturbances: that beſide, ſeveral bills were ſent up to the lords, and not yet paſſed; that others were now under conſideration in the lower-houſe, and it was requiſite his Majeſty ſhould give the royal aſſent to them before his departure (1). In a word after ſundry conferences, it was reſolved, with Charles's conſent, that he ſhould defer his journey 'till the tenth of Auguſt, and that the two armies ſhould by that time be diſmiſſed (2). Nevertheleſs, as the Engliſh army could not be intirely diſbanded before the King's departure, for want of money, the commons deſired a farther delay of a fortnight, alleging ſtill the peoples jealouſies: but their lordſhips refuſed to concur with them, and Charles departed the tenth of Auguſt, as had been agreed.

Charles ſets out for Scotland.

He promiſes to go into Scotland.

The commons are jealous of this journey.

The commons diſtruſt of this Prince ſtill ſubſiſting, they deſired the peers concurrence, that a commitee of lords and commoners might be ſent to the parliament of Scotland to remain there, and inform them from time to time of their proceedings; to which their lordſhips conſented. The perſons nominated commiſſioners to Scotland, were the earl of Bedford, lord Howard of Eſerick, Nathaniel Fiennes, ſir William Armyne, ſir Philip Stapleton, and John Hampden, and a draught of a commiſſion was diſpatched away by a courier, for his Majeſty to ſign: but Charles refuſed it, as ſeeing no neceſſity for ſuch a commiſſion. He however conſented that the commitee ſhould come and attend him in Scotland, to ſee the treaty ratified. As this commitee were properly deſigned only for ſpies upon the King's actions, both houſes thought fit to ſend them into Scotland, on ſome other pretenſe: but the earl of Bedford went not on this ſervice.

Some days after, the houſe of commons came to ſeveral reſolutions againſt the monopoly of ſoap, which was declared illegal. They moreover voted, that the ſentence in the ſtar-chamber againſt certain ſoap-boilers of London ſhould be reverſed, and the judges of that court, who had given their votes in the ſentence, ſhould pay the parties coſts and damages. It was likewiſe ordered, that inquiry ſhould be made, what members of the privy-council had given their conſent to the illegal orders made at the council-table about the ſoap-monopoly.

As the commons had undertaken to redreſs all grievances, that of London, concerning the plantation of Londonderry, was alſo taken into conſideration while King Charles was in Scotland. The houſe paſſed ſundry votes upon this ſubject, and declared illegal all the ſtar-chamber's proceedings, reverſed the ſentence againſt the city of London, as unjuſt and given by incompetent judges. They declared, that when his Majeſty ſhould be pleaſed to repay to the city thoſe ſums he had received, the patent thereupon granted ſhould be cancelled or ſurrendered.

This done, both houſes reſolved to adjourn, from the ninth of September to the twentieth of October, that the members might go to their homes, whence they had been ten months abſent. No ſooner was this reſolution taken, but a great number of peers and commoners retired into the country, to gain a little more time to repoſe themſelves, ſo that only twenty-two lords remained in the upper, and a hundred and fifteen members in the lower-houſe. Then ſome one, who was doubtleſs a Preſbyterian, willing to improve ſuch a favorable opportunity, moved, that it was neceſſary to make ſome alterations in the common-prayer-book. This motion occaſioned a very warm debate. Mr. Hyde, afterwards earl of Clarendon, ſtrenuouſly defended the liturgy, ſo that, contrary to the expectation of him who had raiſed the debate, nothing was determined.

Debate about the liturgy. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 385.

But, ſome few days after, the affair of innovations in the church was canvaſſed, and the houſe paſſed ſeveral votes declaring, that certain innovations ought to be aboliſhed. Alſo then, the remaining peers, finding that the lower-houſe called in queſtion the liturgy's authenticneſs, voted, that it ſhould be obſerved in all churches as before, without any omiſſion or alteration. This begot a conference between both houſes, wherein the commons requeſted their lordſhips conſent to the following declaration, and that they would join with them in its publication.

The lords renew their order concerning divine ſervice. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 387.

Their lordſhips regarded not the commons requeſt. But next day, September the ninth, appointed for the adjournment, they communicated to the commons, in a conference, an order dated January the ſixteenth, 1640-1, injoining that divine ſervice ſhould be performed without any alteration, as appointed by acts of parliament, and a confirmation of the ſame, purſuant to a reſolution taken on the preſent ninth of September, deſiring the commons to concur with them in publiſhing this order.

The commons refuſe their conſent.

The commons abſolutely refuſed to join in ſuch publication, deeming it unſeaſonable, at ſuch a juncture, to preſs a rigorous obſervance of the laws concerning divine ſervice, when a great part of the nation called for a reformation. Beſide, they knew this laſt order, which confirmed that of the ſixteenth of January, was made when there were only twenty peers in the houſe, and by a majority of but two voices, eleven againſt nine. Then they drew up a declaration, inſerting that of the day before, to which their lordſhips had not returned any anſwer, with the peers order of the ſixteenth of January, and the confirmation of the ſame order of the ninth of September, with the refuſal of the commons to concur with them, and ordered, that their declaration ſhould be printed and publiſhed.

Declaration of the commons without the peers concurrence. Sept. 9.

Remarks on theſe differences.

I preſume it will not be amiſs to remark, concerning this diſſenſion between the two houſes;---First; that paſſion reigned on both ſides, ſince the time of making theſe two motions was no way convenient, there not being more than a fifth part of the members preſent in each houſe.

Secondly; that there was a great difference in the two points in queſtion, with reſpect to their importance. One concerned the preſervation of the public worſhip and liturgy, appointed by law ſince the reformation, but wherein however many people ardently wiſhed great alterations might be made; nay, wiſhed they might be utterly ſuppreſſed, while the reſt of the nation believed them abſolutely neceſſary. This was a thing of ſuch conſequence that, ſeemingly, nothing ought to have been decided for or againſt it, but upon mature deliberation, and when both houſes had their complete number of members. For this reaſon, if the motion for making alterations in the liturgy had been approved in the lower-houſe, doubtleſs the peers would have juſtly oppoſed it, and refuſed their concurrence. But, contrariwiſe, as the commons had taken no reſolution, there ſeems not to have been any neceſſity for the lords to renew their order of the ſixteenth of January, which remained in force, and wanted not this confirmation: nay, it appeared that this order was renewed purely thro' pique, becauſe the commons had made a declaration againſt innovations. Had their lordſhips been ſatisfied with refuſing their conſent to the commons declaration of the eighth of September, there would have been nothing to object: but, in refuſing to return any anſwer to the commons, and renewing withal their order of the ſixteenth of January, they diſcovered that they acted out of ſpleen and revenge, and it was not doubted but the right reverend were the chief promoters of renewing this order.

The ſecond point, which concerned innovations, was not alike important. The queſtion was only to know, whether they were really innovations, and if ſo, whether illegal, or dangerous to religion. But this was a matter not to be debated at ſuch a juncture, when both houſes were on the point of adjourning, and moſt of the members already gone into the country. So their lordſhips might have refuſed their conſent to the commons votes, tho' it had been only on pretenſe of the houſes being ſo thin of members: but, in returning no anſwer to the commons, they ſhewed in ſome meaſure that they approved theſe innovations, which had ſo long ſerved for occaſion of complaints and murmurs in the kingdom.

The

CHARLES I. AN' 1641.

The same day, before the adjournment, the commons appointed a commitee of forty three (1), to take care, during the recess, of the most weighty and urgent affairs. Their lordships likewise nominated a commitee, consisting of only seven peers, which done, both houses adjourned to the twentieth of October.

Both houses appoint commitees during the recess. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 387, 388. Nalson, Vol. II. p. 484, 486.

During this recess, the commitee which had followed King Charles into Scotland wrote to the house's commitee, that there was a sort of conspiracy in Scotland, and that the aim of the parties concerned seemingly was, to interrupt the Scotish parliament's proceedings, and destroy marquis Hamilton, with the earls of Argyle and Lanerick. As the commitee received this notice but two days before the parliament re-assembled, they only ordered the lord-mayor of London to post convenient guards in several places of the city, fearing the conspirators of Scotland might have correspondents in England, to disturb all at once the peace of both kingdoms.

Notice of a plot in Scotland. Vol. II. p. 488. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 390, 391.

The parliament meeting October twenty, mr. Pym made a report of what the commitee had done during the recess: whereupon the commons desired a conference with their lordships, whereat they represented to them:

Report of the commitee, p. 390. Nalson, ib.

"1. That a letter from the commitee in Scotland gave ground to think, that when there was a design in England to seduce the King's army, and interrupt the parliament, that there was the like design at that time in Scotland.

"2. That the principal party named in that design in Scotland, lord Crawford, is a person thought to be Popishly affected; and therefore may have correspondence with the like party in England.

"3. That it has been lately published in England, that some things were to be done in Scotland, before it broke out there: therefore we may suspect some correspondence here."

Conference about the Scotish conspiracy.

Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 390, 391.

On these grounds, the commons proposed to their lordships, that a strong guard should be kept in the cities of London and Westminster, and care taken for defense of the whole kingdom, and that a messenger be sent expressly to the commitee of both houses in Scotland, to acquaint them, that the parliament of England was ready to give the Scots all necessary assistance against those who should disturb the peace.

p. 392.

These proposals being approved by their lordships, instructions were sent to the commitee agreeable to the commons desires.

The same day, October twenty, both houses desired the earl of Essex, whom his Majesty had made general on the south of the Trent, to place a guard at Westminster, for the parliament's security, which was done accordingly. This Scotish conspiracy made a great noise at that time: but it was not possible to discover it fully. See what Burnet says of it, in his Memoirs of the duke of Hamilton.

The parliament desire a guard of the earl of Essex. Ibid. Nalson, Vol. II. p. 492.

Account of the pretended conspiracy in Scotland.

"A gentleman not known to the marquis of Hamilton, brought him and the earl of Argyle the discovery of a plot which, he said, was laid for their lives, and the earl of Lanerick's, which he said he could justify by one witness who was invited to the execution of it. He told also a long formal story of the persons to be actors, of the time, place and manner: and said it was to be executed that very night. This the marquis carried to the King, without naming particulars; which could not be done fately by the law of Scotland, since he had but one witness to prove them by. The King desired him to examine the thing to the bottom, and bring him what farther evidence he could find. In the evening, other presumptions were brought to the marquis, but no clear evidence: however, the matter was got abroad, and in every body's mouth, so that all who depended on these lords came about them in great numbers; and those on whom the design was fastened gave out, it was a forgery to make them odious, and gathered also together. The marquis, hearing this, did not stir out of doors, lest some of their too officious followers should raise tumults; and next day in the evening, he, with the earl of Argyle, and his brother the earl of Lanerick, and half a dozen servants went out of town to his house of Keneel, twelve miles from Edinburg, and sent his excuse to his Majesty, with an account of the reasons. Upon this many discourses went about, people of all sides passing constructions as they were affected: but the parliament took the whole matter into consideration. Those who had given the information owned what they had said, and those on whom the plot was fixed did as positively deny all; so that, no clear proof being brought, the parliament could come to no other decision, but that the lords had good reason to withdraw themselves; and so they were invited to return to their place in parliament."

There is however, in lord Clarendon's history, a particular which may give some light to this affair. The earl of Montross told the King, that the marquis of Hamilton was false to him, and even offered to rid him of this secret enemy; but the King abhored the expedient. Perhaps the earl of Montross thought he should do his Majesty a pleasure in having the marquis assassinated, and mentioning it to some person, the secret was divulged. Howsoever this be, the commons of England were, it seems, extremely jealous of Charles, or at least they did their utmost to inspire the people with distrust: for their fear was grounded but upon very slight presumptions, and a bare possibility, that this pretended plot against three Scotish lords could have any influence in England.

Remark on this conspiracy. Clarendon, p. 236.

Next day, a complaint was made to the commons against some persons, for not obeying the declaration, of the ninth of September, published by order of the house. As this affair was debated with great warmth, sir Edward Deering made a speech, which I think proper to insert, to shew that it was not without ground that the commons were accused of exceeding their power, in publishing that declaration, without obtaining the peers concurrence.

Complaint to the commons concerning the non-observance of their declaration. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 393. Diurn. Occurr.

Mr. speaker,

"IT is very true (as is instanced unto you) that your late order and declaration, of the eighth and ninth of September, are much debated and disputed abroad; perhaps it may be a good occasion for us to re-dispute them here.

Sir Edward Deering's speech. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 392. Nalson, Vol. II. p. 610.

"The intent of your order to me seems doubtful, and therefore I am bold, for my own instruction, to propound two queries.

"1. How far an order of this house is binding?

"2. Whether this particular order be continuant, or expired?

"Your orders (I am out of doubt) are powerful, if they be grounded upon the laws of the land. Upon that warranty we may, by an order, inforce any thing that is undoubtedly so grounded, and by the same rule we may abrogate whatsoever is introduced contrary to the undoubted foundation of our laws. But, sir, this order is of another nature, another temper, especially in one part of it, of which (in particular) at some other time.

(1) Rushworth names forty-seven. Vol. IV. p. 387.

"Sir,

" Sir, there want not ſome abroad, men of " birth, quality and fortune, ſuch as know the " ſtrength of our votes here as well as ſome of us " (I ſpeak my own infirmities) men of the beſt " worth, and of good aſſiſtance in us, and no way " obnoxious to us: they know they ſent us hither " as their truſtees, to make and unmake laws; " they know they did not ſend us hither to rule " and govern them by arbitrary, revocable and diſ- " putable orders, eſpecially in religion. No time " is fit for that, and this time as unfit as any: I " deſire to be inſtructed herein.

" Mr. ſpeaker, in the ſecond place, there is a " queſtion, whether this order (whereupon the pre- " ſent complaint is grounded) be permanent and " binding, or elſe expired, and by our ſelves de- " ſerted? I obſerve, that the order being made the " eighth of September, in hope then of concurrence " therein by the lords; that failing, you did iſſue " forth your laſt reſolution by way of declaration, " wherein thus you expreſs your ſelf; " That it " may well be hoped, when both houſes ſhall meet " again, that the good propoſitions and prepara- " tions in the houſe of commons, for preventing " the like grievances, and reforming the diſorders " and abuſes in matters of religion, may be brought " to perfection; wherefore you do expect that " the commons of this realm do in the mean " time:"---(what, obey and perform your order " made the day before? No ſuch thing, but in the " mean time) " quietly attend the reformation in- " tended."

" Theſe are your words, and this my doubt upon " them; whether by theſe words you have not ſu- " perſeded your own order? Sure I am, the words " do bear this ſenſe, and good men may think and " hope it was your meaning.

" My humble motion therefore is this; I be- " ſeech you to declare that, upon this our recon- " vention, your order of the eighth of September " is out of date; and that the commons of Eng- " land muſt (as you ſay) " quietly attend the refor- " mation intended;" which certainly is intended to " be perfected up into acts of parliament. And " in the mean time, that they muſt patiently in- " dure the preſent laws, until you can make new, " or mend the old."

The commons carry on the bill againſt biſhops. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. P. 394.

The twenty-ſecond of October, the bill for diſ- abling perſons in holy orders to exerciſe temporal juriſdiction was again debated, and ſeveral ſpeeches made pro and con. At laſt, it was reſolved to proſecute thoſe biſhops who had aſſiſted at the late convocation, and to puſh the bill for excluding biſhops from their votes in parliament. To that end, the houſe deſired a conference with their lord- ſhips, whereat mr. Pym and mr. St. John explain- ed the commons demands, with reaſons to ſupport them. Pym ſpake firſt thus:

Pym's ſpeech before the lords againſt prelates. p. 395. Diurn. Occur. p. 381. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 500.

My lords,

" THE parliament, the fountain of juſtice, " ought to be preſerved pure from corrup- " tion, and free from partiality, which will add " not only luſter, reputation and honor, but autho- " rity to what is done in parliament. All mens " eſtates and liberties are preſerved under the ſafe- " cuſtody of parliament; this moveth us to be " careful of any thing which may prejudice the par- " liament in point of freedom and integrity.

" Therefore the knights, citizens and burgeſſes " of the houſe of commons, have commanded me, " with my collegue, to repreſent unto your lord- " ſhips two propoſitions, which they hold of very " great importance and neceſſity to be put in exe- " cution at this time.

" Firſt, that thoſe thirteen biſhops who ſtand " accuſed before your lordſhips, for making the " late book of canons, and puting them in execu- " tion, may be excluded from their votes in par- " liament.

" Secondly, that all the biſhops may be excluded " from having any vote in that act, come from the " houſe of commons to your lordſhips, intitled, " ' An act to take away the biſhops votes in par- " liament, &c.

" That which concerneth the thirteen biſhops " falleth to my charge to open, as I am command- " ed to tell your lordſhips, that it ſtandeth not with " honor and with juſtice, that theſe biſhops ſhould " have votes, ſtanding thus charged with the " breach of truſt, and of the higheſt truſt, againſt " the prerogative of the King, againſt the privilege " of the parliament, againſt the property of the " ſubject, and againſt the peace of the kingdom; " theſe are the jewels which are depoſited under the " truſt and ſafeguard of parliament, and all theſe " have been broken; and this appeareth by making " the new canons voted by your lordſhips to be " againſt all theſe truſts.

" That theſe perſons have been parties to the " breach of this truſt, will appear by the journals " of the convocation, which are now in the coun- " try, and may be ſent for; the entry of the book " is, that all the thirteen biſhops were parties, and " did confirm and ſubſcribe theſe canons; there- " fore it is hoped by theſe canons, that thoſe who " have aſſumed to themſelves a legiſlative power, " whereby they have, as much as in them lies, " rooted out the foundation of parliament; ſhould " have no intereſt in the legiſlative power at all in " parliament.

" Next, that thoſe who have deprived the ſub- " jects of thoſe good laws which are already made " for them, ſhould have no intereſt or part of mak- " ing future laws for the ſubject; this they con- " ceive ſtandeth with a great deal of equity and " juſtice, which is one reaſon to deſire they ſhould " be excluded from their votes in parliament.

" Next is, the heinouſneſs of their offenſe. It is " very fit they ſhould be innocent men, and faith- " ful men, who ſhould have the exerciſe of ſo great " a thing as it is; much leſs then ſhould they be " delinquents of ſo high a nature, actors in ſub- " verting the laws of the realm, that they ſhould " continue their votes and places in parliament: " and that their delinquency may the better ap- " pear, you are deſired to read the votes paſſed in " the houſe of commons (nullo contradicente) " and with which the lords have concurred and " agreed."

Next were read by mr. Goodwin, the votes about making the ſaid canons.

Then mr. ſollicitor St. John thus proceeded.

" That he was in the next place to preſent ſome " reaſons and precedents concerning the biſhops not " having their votes touching the bill, intitled, " ' An act to take away the biſhops votes in par- " liament, &c.

" 1. Becauſe they have no ſuch inherent right " and liberty of being there, as the lords tempo- " ral and peers of the realm have; for they are " not there repreſentative of any body elſe; no, " not of the clergy; for if ſo, then the clergy were " twice repreſented by them, viz. in the lords- " houſe, and in the convocation: for their writ of " election is to ſend two clerks, ' ad conſentien- " dum, &c.' Beſide, none are there repreſentative " of others, but thoſe who have their ſuffrages " from others; and therefore only the clerks in the " convocation do repreſent them.

" 2. They have not the inherent right of peer- " age, as the lords have, becauſe in ſome things " they cannot do that there which the lords may " do, in caſe of treaſon and matter of blood.

" Upon

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" Upon trial of any peer, they have no liberty of " vote, which could not be taken away by any " canon, if their right of voting there was inhe- " rent.

" 3. If they were repreſentative of the clergy, " as a third eſtate and degree, no act of parlia- " ment could be good, if they did wholly diſaſſent; " and yet they have diſaſſented and the law good " and in force; as in the act for eſtabliſhing the " book of common-prayer in Queen Elizabeth's " time, they did diſaſſent from the confirming " that law, which could not have been good, if " they had been a third eſtate and diſaſſented.

" 4. The King may hold his parliament with- " out calling the biſhops at all to it, as hath been " adjudged by all the judges of England, 7 Hen. 8, " occaſioned by the convocation's citing one dr. " Standiſh, for ſpeaking words againſt their power " and privilege, as they conceived. In that caſe " all the judges of England, in preſenſe of the " King, declared, that the King might hold his " parliament without calling them at all.

" So 25 Edward 1, in reſpect the prelacy would " not agree with the reſt of the kingdom, in grant- " ing a reaſonable and neceſſary aid and ſupply, " they were excluded in the parliament at Carliſle: " and, before that parliament, an act paſſed againſt " ſeveral oppreſſions of the abbots, priors and " biſhops upon the inferior clergy of the kingdom, " by purveyance, and ſeting high prices, &c. to " be collected; and ſix or ſeven acts more, all to " this purpoſe, concerning the carriage of the pre- " lates to the inferior clergy; ſo that when them- " ſelves were concerned, they were excluded their " votes.

" In all theſe records of the matter concerning " the clergy, the entry is; that the King, 'habito " tractatu,' &c. with the earls, the barons, and " others the nobles, &c. hath agreed to this act, " or 'by the aſſent of the earls, barons, and other " lay-people:' which ſhews, that the biſhops did " not conſent, for if they had they ſhould have " been firſt named before the earls and barons: for " the order of naming the degrees of nobility, in " all ancient records, is prelates, earls and ba- " rons.

" Thus, 3 Richard 2. there being proviſion the " Pope ſhould not make preſentation, &c. it is " ſaid, that the petition of the commons was aſ- " ſented unto by the King and the lords tempo- " ral, and was always eſteemed a firm act of par- " liament, notwithſtanding the biſhops oppoſed the " ſame."

The biſhops affair remains in ſuſpenſe.

This affair was carried no farther at that time, doubtleſs by reaſon of the obſtacles which occurred in the upper-houſe, where the biſhops gave their voices, to decide whether they were to vote or not. But it was reſerved for another time (1).

Deſigns of Charles's opponents.

Grievances being near redreſſed, the parliament ſeemed to have little more to do: but their diſtruſt with regard to the King being exceſſive, the leaders of that party which oppoſed Charles believed redreſſing paſſed grievances not to be ſufficient: they had likewiſe a mind to prevent ſuch like for the future, by diſabling the King to abuſe his power. It cannot well be denied that this deſign was founded on reaſons very plauſible, and apt to gain the conſent of thoſe who had in view only their country's welfare: for if the King, while he was inveſted with all the prerogatives allowed him by laws, had abuſed his power to eſtabliſh deſpotiſm; if he had purſued the execution of this deſign fifteen years ſucceſſively; if he had deſiſted but by a ſuperior force obliging him to call this parliament; how could it be imagined he would alter his principles and maxims, if left in poſſeſſion of the ſame power which had ſerved him to execute his project? Now there were ſcarce any of the members of both houſes, I ſay, even of thoſe moſt attached to the King, who were not fully convinced that; the conſtitution had of late years been greatly indangered. See what lord Clarendon ſays, on this occaſion, in his hiſtory of the civil wars.

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" who muſt be imployed in them, and to diſcoun- " tenance and ſuppreſs all bold inquiries and oppo- " ſers, the council-table and ſtar-chamber inlarge " their juriſdictions to a vaſt extent. The council- " table, by proclamations, injoining to the people " what was not injoined by the law, and prohibit- " ing that which was not prohibited; and the " ſtar-chamber cenſuring the breach and diſobe- " dience to thoſe proclamations by very great fines " and impriſonment; ſo that any diſreſpect to any " acts of ſtate, or to the perſons of ſtateſmen, was " in no time more penal; and theſe foundations of " right, by which men valued their ſecurity, to " the apprehenſion and underſtanding of wiſe men, " never more in danger to be deſtroyed."

If perſons moſt devoted to the King, as was the earl of Clarendon, had ſuch ſentiments, we may eaſily judge what others thought, and whether they had reaſon to believe, that the redreſs of paſſed grievances was a ſufficient ſecurity for after-times.

But it cannot contrariwiſe be denied, that this parliament contained perſons who were projecting ſecret machinations againſt church-government, and that theſe men thought a diminution of the regal power was abſolutely neceſſary to the execution of their deſigns, conſcious that King Charles would oppoſe them, while cloathed with his uſual authority. It cannot however be infered, from their uſing the above-cited reaſons to inflame the parliament's diſtruſt of this Prince, for a private end of their own, that therefore theſe reaſons were defective. On the other hand, we may venture to aſſert, it was ſolely by the weight of theſe reaſons, that the Preſbyterians, whoſe number was inconſiderable in the parliament and kingdom, finally prevailed to perſuade the other members of the neceſſity to reſtrain the regal power. Had not theſe reaſons been capable of convincing ſuch minds as were leaſt prejudiced, they would never have ſucceeded in cauſing the parliament to take thoſe reſolutions we ſhall ſee in the ſequel. For what intereſt could the major part of the parliament's members have to alter the conſtitution of church and ſtate, had not the paſſed afforded them a juſt occaſion for future apprehenſions?

Two oppoſite opinions concerning the parliament's deſigns.

From what has been advanced reſult two opinions, which have and ſtill do divide all England. The firſt aſcribes to the commons in general, and to ſeveral peers, the private end deſigned by the Preſbyterians. The followers of this opinion will not allow moſt of the members propoſed to themſelves a leſs ſiniſter end in all their proceedings againſt King Charles. Thoſe who ſtickle for the ſecond opinion, refuſe likewiſe to admit of this diſtinction of ends and principles. They pretend, that the King's opponents always acted on motives of equity, juſtice and love of their country. For my own particular part, I ſhall not ſcruple ſaying, that I deem both theſe opinions very groundleſs.

(1) July 9, it was propoſed by ſome of the commons, that the biſhops lands might be put into the hands of feoffees, nine of the laity, and three of the clergy in every dioceſe; and the reſt of the lands belonging to deans, &c. to be imployed for the advancement of learning, and the biſhops to have a liberal allowance during life. Ruſhorth, Vol. IV. p. 438.

Charles I An' 1641.

I can never believe, that a great majority of this parliament's members, who, even by the confeſſion of Charles's partiſans, had at firſt no deſire to make any alterations in the conſtitution of either church or ſtate, ſhould ſuffer themſelves to be corrupted by a ſmall number of other members, of whoſe views and deſigns they were not ſo ignorant as to be guided ſolely by their directions: neither can I think that they run into the project of ſubverting church and ſtate thro' mere ſupineneſs, ignorance or ſtupidity, or that they fell into all the ſnares the others laid for them, as lord Clarendon inſinuates. I am rather of opinion, that they weighed the reaſons which were to ingage them to maintain the civil and eccleſiaſtical conſtitution, with the danger of leaving it in its natural ſtate, and that this danger appeared to them ſo great, that, to prevent it, they determined on agreeing to the alterations projected by the Preſbyterians.

On the other hand, I can as difficultly believe, that they who took ſo much care to cheriſh diſtruſt between the King and parliament, who were always ready to give ſiniſter turns to all Charles's words and actions, who inſtead of healing inflamed the wound, that theſe men, I ſay, ſhould have in view only juſtice and the good of their country: eſpecially as they were ſeen to practiſe all methods to accompliſh their private end, I mean, the change of church-government, wherein the other members had no intereſt: nay rather, it would have concerned them to oppoſe it, had they not dreaded a greater miſchief.

If therefore a man blindly follows either of theſe two opinions, without any limitation, he will never be able to give a juſt idea of this parliament's conduct. It is as difficult to believe, that a whole parliament, or at leaſt its majority, may combine together to ſubvert the government of church and ſtate, as it is to conceive, that all theſe ſame members may have acted only upon diſintereſted motives, and with the ſole view of procuring their country's welfare at ſuch a juncture. This, however, is the error into which all the Engliſh hiſtorians have fallen. They have all imbraced one or other of theſe opinions, the ſpirit of party not ſuffering them fairly to conſider the ſeveral motives whereon the members of this parliament proceeded; and this has occaſioned great obſcurity in all they have ſaid upon this ſubject. The trueſt and moſt probable hypotheſis, in my opinion, is briefly this:

The author's hypotheſis.

King Charles had, during the firſt fifteen years of his reign, given his ſubjects great cauſe of complaint. It is therefore no wonder that he had created himſelf abundance of enemies, who earneſtly wiſhed to have the government reſtored to its natural ſtate. Among theſe enemies, the Preſbyterians, who beſide the general grievances had their own private ones, were the moſt eager. They deſired not only to diminiſh the King's power, that he might not be able to hurt them, but likewiſe to ſubvert the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy, and eſtabliſh Preſbytery in its ſtead, wherein they were ſupported by the Scots. Charles being, much againſt his will, obliged to call this parliament, moſt of its members were well diſpoſed to redreſs paſſed grievances, and prevent the like hereafter. Even they who were not that Prince's enemies were in this diſpoſition, and it may be affirmed, that this was both houſes general ſentiment at opening the parliament: but even among thoſe who deſired a redreſs of grievances, there were two different views. Some were for ſtoping at the redreſs of grievances, without proceeding any farther, believing that would be ſufficient to prevent their Sovereign's again attempting ſo unſucceſsful a project. This was Charles's ſentiment, as well as that of many members of both houſes. Others were not only for redreſſing grievances, but likewiſe for taking proper meaſures to prevent ſuch miſchiefs for the future. The Preſbyterians were of this number: but they had alſo more extenſive views, and other ſecret deſigns, viz. to introduce into the church a Preſbyterian government. To attain this end, it was neceſſary to deprive the King of a power which they foreſaw he would not fail to exert in oppoſition to their deſign; and there was no better method than by cheriſhing the parliaments diſtruſt, to which moſt of the members were already but too well diſpoſed. They had therefore only to gain a ſufficient number of thoſe who were willing to ſtop at the redreſs of grievances, and nothing was properer to obtain their concurrence than to fill them with fears and ſuſpicions. This was the reaſon why ſuch care was taken to agravate the plot for ſeducing the army; to dwell continually upon the pretended deſign of marching them to London; to ſpread rumors of a French army ready to land and ſeize Portſmouth with the King's conſent, and I know not how many other reports alike improbable. This was the cauſe of ſo many efforts to exclude prelates from the upper-houſe, in order to diminiſh as much as poſſible the party of thoſe who were for ſtoping at the redreſs of grievances. This was alſo the reaſon, why ſo many mortifications were given King Charles to induce him to take ſome meaſures, which ſhould give advantage againſt him, and be apt to convince the more moderate, that it was dangerous to leave him in poſſeſſion of his whole power. It is not therefore much to be wondered at that many of thoſe who were againſt puſhing matters to extremities ſhould, in the end, be prevailed on by the fears and ſuſpicions wherewith they were continually inſpired. To confirm themſelves in their ſentiment, they had no other ground than their confidence in the King's word, againſt which there were unanſwerable objections, as for inſtance, his violation of the petition of right.

Charles I An' 1641.

By theſe direct and indirect means, the Preſbyterians finally ſucceeded in gaining a ſufficient number of votes to give them a ſuperiority in the houſe of commons, at leaſt, as to the deſign of diminiſhing the regal power. When this faction was grown ſuperior, their oppoſers indeavored in vain to curb their fury. On the other hand, King Charles himſelf fell into the ſnares laid for him, and took meaſures which, as will hereafter appear, made him loſe a great number of thoſe who had thitherto appeared the moſt moderate. The following paſſage, from lord Clarendon's hiſtory, will ſerve to illuſtrate this matter.

" I know not how theſe men have already an- p. 253.
" ſwered it to their own conſciences, who having " aſſumed their country's truſt, and it may be
" with great earneſtneſs labored to procure that
" truſt, by their ſupine lazineſs, negligence and
" abſenſe, were the firſt inlets to thoſe inundations;
" and ſo contributed to thoſe licenſes which have " overwhelmed us. For by this means a handful " of men, much inferior in the begining, in num" ber and intereſt, came to give laws to the major " part; and to ſhew that three diligent perſons are " really a greater and more ſignificant number than " ten unconcerned, they, by plurality of voices, in " the end, converted or reduced the whole body to " their opinions. It is true, men of activity and " faction in any deſign have many advantages which
" a compoſed and ſettled council, tho' induſtrious
" enough, uſually have not; and ſome which
" gallant men cannot give themſelves leave to enter" tain, even for the prevention of all the miſchief
" the others intend.

The earl of Clarendon grants, that a handful of men, at firſt much inferior in number and credit, finally converted the whole houſe to their opinions. But as he was a zealous advocate for the King, he took

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

I took care not to aſcribe the ſucceſs of this handful of men to the weight of thoſe reaſons they alleged to the others to bring them over. It was however neceſſary to give ſome reaſon of it, and he found no better, than the lazineſs, negligence, abſenſe and unconcernedneſs of King Charles's friends, and the adverſe party's vigilance. I know not whether this reaſon will be capable to ſatisfy the impartial.

This, as I verily believe, is the true hypotheſis which ought to be eſtabliſhed, in order to form a clear idea of this parliament's conduct; and I hope this digreſſion will not be unſerviceable for the better comprehending the ſequel.

The commons prepare a remonſtrance of the kingdom's condition. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 425, &c.

The parliament ſeemed to have nothing more to do, all the grievances being in a manner redreſſed, and the armies diſmiſſed. But after what has been ſaid, it will not doubtleſs be thought ſtrange, that the houſe of commons ſhould order the commitee, which at the parliament's firſt aſſembling was charged with preparing a remonſtrance of the nation's ſtate and condition, to reſume and finiſh that work. Nothing would have been more needleſs than ſuch a remonſtrance, after the grievances were redreſſed, had it not been purpoſely deſigned to quarrel with the King, and afford a pretenſe for poſtponing the ſetling his revenues, which was the only buſineſs which remained unfiniſhed, and which his Majeſty expected. I have already obſerved, there was in the parliament a party who intended not to ſtop at redreſſing grievances. Theſe were the men who cauſed the remonſtrance to be reſumed, in expectation of Charles's being thereat diſguſted, and taking ſome ſtep which ſhould promote the execution of their project.

The Iriſh rebellion. p. 398.

But while this remonſtrance was geting ready, there occurred a certain affair of ſuch conſequence, and ſo unexpected, that the commons were obliged for a time to lay aſide all other buſineſs. I mean the Iriſh rebellion, the news whereof reached London the firſt of November, 1641.

Since the end of Queen Elizabeth's reign, when Tir-Oen's rebellion was happily quelled, the Iriſh had lived peaceably under the dominion of James I, and Charles I. Not but that the lords-deputies had continually over that people a vigilant eye, conſidering them as men whoſe fidelity was very ſuſpicious: however, they had at leaſt no occaſion to complain, they were worſe treated than in the former reigns. Touching their religion, it may readily be ſuppoſed they had not ſuffered new troubles under theſe two Princes, who thought of nothing leſs than of perſecuting the Catholics. Nevertheleſs, in March or April this year 1641, the Iriſh formed the project of caſting off the Engliſh yoke; of ſeizing all the fortified places, and of cuting the throats of all the Engliſh in that iſland. The day appointed for executing this bloody deſign was the twenty-third of October, when the inſurrection was to be general all over Ireland. This deſign was really executed as projected, and it is ſaid, on that and ſome few ſucceeding days, upwards of forty thouſand Engliſh Proteſtants were maſſacred by the Iriſh. But their project of ſeizing the ſame day upon Dublin caſtle, where was a great magazine of proviſions and ſtores, was diſcovered over-night, and prevented by the diligence of the lords juſtices of Ireland, who governed in the abſenſe of the earl of Leiceſter, he having been appointed lord-lieutenant ſome months before, and was yet in England.

Nov. 1. p. 249. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 513.

This news being communicated to the commons by the lords of the privy-council, filled the houſe with terror and conſternation, and at the ſame time with indignation againſt thoſe inhuman revolters. They inſtantly turned themſelves into a grand commitee, and paſſed the following reſolves:

That fifty thouſand pounds ſhould be forthwith provided for the ſervice of Ireland.

That a conference be had with the lords to move them, that a ſelect commitee of the members of both houſes may be appointed to go to the city of London, and propoſe to them the loan of that ſum.

That a ſelect commitee of both houſes may be named to conſider of the affairs of Ireland, and of ſending men and ammunition from hence into that kingdom.

That Owen O Conally, who diſcovered this great treaſon in Ireland, ſhall have five hundred pounds preſently paid him, and two hundred pounds per annum penſion, 'till proviſion be made for an inheritance of greater value.

That the cuſtody of the Iſle of Wight be taken for the preſent from lord Weſton, ſuſpected of being a Catholic, and ſequeſtered into another hand.

That the perſons of Papiſts of quality in the ſeveral counties of this kingdom, where ever they reſide, may be ſecured.

That the lords be deſired to join concerning the diſſolution of the houſe of Capuchins, and the ſpeedy ſending them away, according to the former deſires of this houſe.

That the embaſſadors may be ſent to from both houſes to deliver up ſuch prieſts of the King's ſubjects as are in their houſes.

That a liſt be brought in of the Queen's prieſts, and others her ſervants.

That a proclamation be iſſued forth, commanding all ſtrangers who are not of the Proteſtant religion, to deliver in tickets of their names, and account of their ſtay here, within two days after iſſuing the ſaid proclamation, or elſe depart the kingdom forthwith, &c.

Their lordſhips agreed to the propoſed loan, and nominated ſome of their members to form a commitee of both houſes. Whereupon the commons appointed fifty two to meet the lords, and to be a ſtanding commitee for the affairs of Ireland.

Two days after the commons farther voted;

That the houſe holds fit, that twenty thouſand pounds be forthwith ſupplied for the preſent occaſions of Ireland.

That a convenient number of ſhips ſhall be provided for guarding the ſea-coaſt of Ireland.

That ſix thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe ſhall be raiſed, with all convenient ſpeed, for the preſent expedition into Ireland: and that the lord-lieutenant ſhall preſent, to both houſes of parliament, ſuch officers as he ſhall think fit to ſend into Ireland, to command any forces to be tranſported thither.

That the magazines of victuals ſhall be forthwith provided at Weſt-Cheſter, to be ſent over to Dublin, as the occaſions of that kingdom ſhall require.

That the magazines of arms, ammunition, powder, &c. now in Carliſle, ſhall be forthwith ſent over to Knockfergus in Ireland.

That it be refered to the King's council to conſider of ſome fit way, and to preſent it to the houſe, for a publication to be made of rewards to be given to ſuch as ſhall do ſervice in this expedition into Ireland, and for a pardon of ſuch of the rebels as ſhall come in by a time limited, and of a ſum of money to be appointed for a reward of ſuch as ſhall bring in the heads of ſuch principal rebels as ſhall be nominated.

That letters ſhall be forthwith ſent to the juſtices in Ireland, to acquaint them how ſenſible this houſe is of the affairs of Ireland.

That the commitee of Iriſh affairs ſhall conſider how, and in what manner this kingdom ſhall make uſe of the friendſhip and aſſiſtance of Scotland in the buſineſs of Ireland.

That directions ſhall be given for drawing a bill for preſſing men, for this particular of Ireland.

CHARLES I. AN' 1641.

A few days after, both houſes publiſhed a declaration, to acquaint the public of their having reſolved on aſſiſting his Majeſty, with their whole power, to reduce the Iriſh rebels.

Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 406.

Charles, who was ſtill in Scotland, had received notice of what had paſſed in North Ireland, but knew not that the Iriſh had miſcarried in their deſign upon Dublin caſtle. He immediately communicated his intelligence to the parliament of Scotland, and demanded their aſſiſtance. The parliament replied, "That "Ireland being dependent on the crown of Eng- "land, and his Majeſty having already writ to "the parliament of England, and ſent to Ireland "for farther information, no other courſe could be "taken, and the rather as the parliament of Eng- "land might conceive jealouſies; but that, after "fuller information, if the Engliſh ſhould think the "aſſiſtance of Scotland neceſſary, it ſhould be ready "as ſoon as England."

Charles demands aid of the Scotiſh parliament.

Their anſwer. Octob. 28. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 604. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 407.

The rebellion daily augmented. Even thoſe very Engliſh termed of the Pale joined with the Iriſh, having pretended being for ſome time attached to the intereſt of England. Theſe Engliſh of the Pale are deſcendants of the ancient conquerors of Ireland, who ſettled there in the reign of Henry II, and who at the reformation continued in the Roman Catholic religion. It was therefore neceſſary a ſtrong force ſhould be ſent into Ireland, to reduce thoſe revolters. Nevertheleſs, tho' the letters from the lords juſtices for aſſiſtance were frequent and preſſing; tho' the rebels continually increaſed in number and ſtrength; tho' his Majeſty moſt earneſtly preſſed both houſes to ſend men, money and ammunition to Ireland; tho' the parliament expreſſed a great deſire to reduce that kingdom, it is certain, that the ſuccors ſent thither were but ſmall, and properer to continue than terminate the war. It would doubtleſs be thought ſtrange to ſee ſo much ardor in words, and ſo little deſire to ſhew it in deeds, if the reaſon of this conduct was not known: and therefore it will be requiſite we explain this matter.

Ireland's great neceſſity of a powerful ſuccor. Ib. p. 410, Cox's Hiſt. of Ireland. P. II. p. 97.

Weak ſupplies are ſent;

and why.

The houſe of commons diſpoſition, while King Charles was in Scotland has been already intimated. A reſolution was taken to diveſt him of part of his power. The views of ſome were only to hinder him from abuſing it for the future. Others added to this motive the deſign of rendering him unable to oppoſe the change they were meditating, with reſpect to church-government. The houſe's order to the commitee to prepare their remonſtrance of the kingdom's condition, was a clear evidence they had ſome ſecret deſign which would ſhew itſelf when occaſion offered. While meaſures are taking to execute this deſign, the Iriſh riſe in rebellion, at a time when they ſeemed to have leaſt reaſon, ſince the government had never treated them with greater lenity than under this preſent reign. They maſſacre in cold blood more than forty thouſand Engliſh Proteſtants (1), and, unfortunately for King Charles, ſpread a report, that they had his authority for what they did. They call themſelves the Queen's army, and diſperſe every where copies of a ſuppoſed commiſſion under the great ſeal, which they pretend to have from the King to authoriſe their taking arms. All this muſt be owned ſufficient to make impreſſions on the minds of thoſe who were already diſaffected to this Prince, and believed him capable of any thing to avoid the dependency which was preparing for him. Indeed, the unprejudiced and moſt conſiderate did not think it poſſible, or even probable, that the King ſhould deſire his Proteſtant ſubjects of Ireland ſhould be maſſacred: yet they ſuſpected that this rebellion, raiſed at ſuch a juncture, was not wholly owing to the diſcontent of the Iriſh, and that very poſſibly his Majeſty might have excited it, to find the parliament imployment, and divert them from the project they had formed. As to maſſacring the Proteſtants, they did not believe the King had any hand in it, but imagined it very poſſible that, after raiſing the rebellion, it was not in his power to reſtrain the Iriſh. Charles, on his part, ignorant of what was ſaid againſt him in England, uſed his utmoſt indeavors to clear himſelf from this atrocious imputation, by preſſing the parliament to ſend a ſpeedy aid into Ireland. But theſe ſollicitations produced a quite contrary effect, ſince it was believed his aim was to leave England unprovided of forces, and to ingage the parliament in a dangerous and moſt expenſive Iriſh war. This was the reaſon why the commons proceeded with deliberation, and ſent but inconſiderable ſuccors into Ireland, being apprehenſive this Iriſh rebellion was a ſnare Charles had laid, to make them conſume the Engliſh ſoldiery and treaſure.

The Iriſh pretend to act by Charles's orders. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 400. Borlaſe.

Burnet.

As diverſe have treated of this imaginary commiſſion from King Charles to the Papiſts of Ireland, authoriſing them to take arms, and as ſome have repreſented it as genuine, others as dubious, but moſt as a notorious forgery, I judged my inſerting it would not be unacceptable. I ſhall add a circular letter ſent with the copy of this pretended commiſſion from the principal rebels to thoſe of their party.

Witneſs ourſelf at Edinburg, the firſt day of October, in the ſeventeenth year of our reign.

Arguments that King Charles cannot have given this commiſſion.

Tho', for many reaſons, it be more than probable that King Charles never granted the Iriſh a commiſſion to take arms, it is however certain they boaſted of having ſuch a thing. But it is no leſs certain that it cannot be the ſame with what was above peruſed, nor can this be the commiſſion publiſhed by the leaders of the Iriſh rebels. My reaſon is, becauſe in this commiſſion his Majeſty is made to ſay things which happened not 'till ſeveral months after the day of its date, and which thoſe who are ſuppoſed to have publiſhed it the fourth of November could not foreſee. Charles is introduced ſaying, on the firſt of October 1641, that the parliament had poſſeſſed themſelves of his ſovereignty, and appointed governors, commanders and officers, in all places; which certainly was not done before the month of October 1642. Ruſhworth therefore, who has inſerted this commiſſion in his collections, muſt have had unfaithful memoirs and little judgment, not to diſcern in this pretended commiſſion, of the firſt of October 1641, paſſages which occurred not 'till the inſuing year 1642. Nothing is however truer than that the Iriſh boaſted of having his Majeſty's commiſſion: but it is pretended they themſelves forged it, and fixed thereto a ſurreptitious impreſſion of the great ſeal, taken from ſome grant or patent (1).

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 402. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 529.

What conſequence this rumor was of to King Charles. Nalſon, p. 526, &c. Clarendon, p. 237.

Howſoever this be, the pretenſion of the Iriſh, that they had the King's and Queen's authority, was of very ill conſequence to his Majeſty. There were but too many who harbored a very indifferent opinion of his zeal for the Proteſtant religion, and believed him capable of being induced by the Queen's ſollicitations to reſtore Popery in England. The former parliaments had diſcovered their ſuſpicions, and this Prince, inſtead of undeceiving them, had given only words, not ſeconded with any effects. When therefore notice came that the Iriſh Papiſts were in arms, and had maſſacred the Proteſtants, it was very natural to dread ſome ſuch combination in England, which could not but be extremely to his Majeſty's prejudice. Tho' the parliament ſeemed not much to regard this calumny ſpread againſt him, they were however full of diffidence, and this diffidence made them judge it not proper to leave England without troops, money and ammunition, in order to aſſiſt Ireland, leſt England ſhould be unprovided in caſe a like conſpiracy was hatching there alſo: nay, it was the leading members intereſt to feign a greater diſtruſt than they really had, to confirm in their dreads and ſuſpicions ſuch of their aſſociates as were not fully perſuaded. This ſerved to convince them how neceſſary it was to bridle the King's power, and diſable him to execute his deſigns.

Charles's adverſaries attain their ends gradually and by various methods.

Nevertheleſs, tho' the partiſans of thoſe who were for diminiſhing the regal power was numerous in the parliament, they were not yet in condition to proceed as they pleaſed. Matters were to be prepared gradually, one while by cheriſhing ſuſpicions and fears, other whiles by ingaging the houſe to take ſuch ſteps as might conduct them to their real purpoſe, whereof all the members were not appriſed.

Inſtructions to the commitee in Scotland mortifying to King Charles.

With this view it was that, under color of thanking the Scots for their promiſed aſſiſtance to ſuppreſs the rebellion in Ireland, and of treating with them about it, they ingaged the houſe to ſend to the commitee in Scotland freſh inſtructions, which were to Charles extremely mortifying. In theſe inſtructions the houſe ſaid:

" That they had juſt cauſe to believe, that the " conſpiracies and commotions in Ireland were but " the effects of the counſels of thoſe who con- " tinued in credit, authority and imployment about " his Majeſty; therefore they feared that the great " aids, which ſhould be raiſed for ſubduing the " rebellion in Ireland, would be applied to the Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 529. ——— To theſe reaſons, to prove the forgery of this commiſſion, may be added another, which ſeems demonſtrative. The commiſſion is ſuppoſed to be under the great ſeal of Scotland, and yet, in the enumeration of the King's titles, England is named before Scotland, which doubtleſs never was done in any writings publiſhed by authority in that kingdom. Ruſhworth himſelf (Vol. IV. p. 400.) obſerves, that the words of the commiſſion are enough to ſhew the villanous practiſe of the authors, and its bare recital a ſufficient refutation and detection of the unparalleled forgery. " fomenting it there, and incouraging ſome ſuch " like attempt in England. Therefore the commons beſought his Majeſty to change thoſe councils, from which ſuch ill courſes had proceeded, " and to imploy ſuch miniſters as ſhould be approved of by his parliament, who were his greateſt " and moſt faithful council. But if his Majeſty did " not condeſcend to their ſupplications, they ſhould " be forced to reſolve upon ſome way of defending " Ireland from the rebels, and of ſecuring themſelves from miſchievous counſels and deſigns, and " command thoſe aids and contributions which " ſhould be raiſed for the reducing Ireland to the " cuſtody and diſpoſing of ſuch perſons of honor " and fidelity as they had cauſe to confide in."

Theſe inſtructions cloſe with the ſubſequent article.

Great debates touching the remonſtrance. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 425. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 667, &c.

This was properly a preparative to the remonſtrance of the kingdom's ſtate and ſituation, which was to be brought into the houſe the firſt opportunity, and which was indeed read the twenty-ſecond of November. It met with ſuch ſtrong oppoſition, that the debates held from three in the afternoon 'till three in the morning (2). Many thought it needleſs to reproach the King with grievances, to the redreſs whereof he had without ſollicitation given a full conſent, and that, beſide the uſeleſneſs of their remonſtrance, it would ſerve only to open old wounds, to which a cure had been applied, and infallibly widen the breach between King and parliament. But this very reaſon was preciſely what excited others to get the remonſtrance approved, becauſe they wanted a diſſenſion between Charles and his parliament, in order to obtain the conſent of both houſes to the diminution of regal power. I pretend not to determine, whether the deſign of diſabling Charles from governing thence-forwards as he had done during fifteen years, was in itſelf equitable, or neceſſary for the kingdom's ſafety and welfare: but it cannot well be denied that the reaſons wherewith it was ſupported were very plauſible. I will not aſſert, that they who formed it, or preſſed its execution, had only in view their country's benefit; as, on the other hand, I do not ſee what could be hoped for or depended on by thoſe who were for leaving that Monarch in poſſeſſion of the ſame power he had thitherto injoyed. Howſoever this be, the remonſtrance was as a ſort of criterion, which was to ſhew which of the two parties ſhould prevail, and withal in ſome meaſure to decide the fate of King Charles's affairs. In ſhort, after a debate of twelve hours, it was carried, by a plurality of nine voices only, that the remonſtrance ſhould be preſented to his Majeſty. Lord Clarendon ſays, " It was carried " by the hour of the night, which drove away a " greater number of old and infirm oppoſers than " would have made thoſe of the negative ſuperior " in number." But to me this reaſon appears little forcible; ſince it might be alleged to ſhew the remonſtrance would have paſſed by more than nine voices, had not ſeveral of thoſe who were for it left the houſe: for why ſhould infirmity or fatigue produce a greater effect on one party than on the other (3)?

Charles I An' 1641.

It paſſes by nine votes only. p. 247.

No ſooner was this reſolution taken, but mr. Hampden, who was of the victorious party, moved for the immediate printing this remonſtrance, not ſeeing, as he ſaid, any neceſſity for imparting it to their lordſhips, ſince it ran only in name of the commons. His deſign was it ſhould be diſperſed every where to excite people againſt the King, which was likewiſe the drift of that whole faction. This motion, which was contrary to cuſtom, ſince the remonſtrance ſhould have been at leaſt preſented to his Majeſty before its publication was thought on, produced a violent debate in the houſe, every one manifeſtly foreſeeing the conſequence: but, at length, the ſame party which prevailed in the firſt, prevailed alſo in the ſecond queſtion, and the remonſtrance was ordered to be printed. Some of the oppoſers offered to enter a proteſtation againſt it, but as it was not cuſtomary for the houſe to admit of proteſtations, mr. Palmer, who firſt cried, " I do " proteſt," was ſent to the Tower, but was a few days after releaſed, and reſumed his place in the houſe.

Three days after, viz. the twenty-fifth of November, his Majeſty, being returned from Scotland, paſſed thro' the city of London, and dined at Guildhall. He was received in his capital with the ſame demonſtrations of joy, reſpect and ſubmiſſion as were given on like occaſions to the moſt popular of his predeceſſors, and had all reaſon to be pleaſed with the manner wherein every one ſtrove to do him honor: but the ſatisfaction he received from theſe public demonſtrations of the Londoners affection was not of long continuance.

Immediately on Charles's arrival at Whitehall, the earl of Eſſex ſurrendered up his commiſſion as captain-general of the ſouth part of the kingdom, and next day his Majeſty diſmiſſed the guards given by that earl to both houſes, at their requeſt. the King, that thoſe guards might be continued 'till they had ſatisfied his Majeſty of the reaſons, why a guard was neceſſary. To this the peers conſented, and the earl of Warwick, with lord Digby, were ordered to move his Majeſty on this affair; but they could not prevail. Charles replied; He ſaw no reaſon for continuing that guard; but however, he would command the earl of Dorſet to appoint ſome of the trained-bands, for a few days only, to wait on both houſes, and if in that time he ſhould be ſatisfied there was juſt reaſon, he would continue them. He perceived, that the aim of thoſe who deſired a continuance of the guards, was purely to cheriſh the peoples fears and ſuſpicions. Upon this anſwer, the commons preſented to his Majeſty a memorial, containing the reaſons why they deſired a guard, adding, they would not have it under the command of any perſon not choſen by themſelves. But as their reaſons were founded upon very improbable ſuppoſitions, they produced no effect.

The commons inſiſted no farther on this ſubject, but within a few days ſent a commitee, to preſent to Charles, then at Hampton-court, the remonſtrance, with a petition. This was, as we may ſay, the alarm of diſcord between King and parliament, as this Prince's adverſaries had viſibly foreſeen. I deem it wholly requiſite to inſert here what paſſed with reſpect to this remonſtrance, which was attended with ſuch conſequences; the report of the commitee ſent to his Majeſty; the houſe's petition, with the remonſtrance itſelf; whereon I ſhall make ſome remarks, to inable my readers to judge of what is genuine and reaſonable, as alſo of what is agravated or diſguiſed.

"HE ſaid, that laſt night, in the evening, he, and thoſe who accompanied him, came into Hampton-court, where meeting with ſir Richard Wynn, he went in to his Majeſty, and gave him notice of our being there; and, within a quarter of an hour, the King ſent a gentleman-uſher to call us in, with directions for none to come in but ourſelves; whereupon I did, according to your order, and the reſt with me, upon our knees, preſent the petition and remonſtrance, and begun to read it kneeling; but his Majeſty would not permit that, but commanded us all to riſe, and ſo I read it.

"The firſt thing his Majeſty ſpake at the reading thereof, was to that part of the petition which charges a malignant party to be about his Majeſty, with a deſign to change religion; to which his Majeſty with a hearty fervency ſaid, 'The devil take him, whoſoever he be, who has a deſign to change religion.' Then I proceeded to read on; and when I came to that part of the remonſtrance, of reſerving the lands of the rebels in Ireland toward the ſuppreſſing them: his Majeſty ſpake and ſaid, 'We muſt not diſpoſe of the bear's ſkin, 'till the bear be dead.'

"After the petition was read, his Majeſty ſaid, he deſired to aſk us ſome queſtions; but I anſwered, we had no power to ſpeak to any thing, but wherein we had commiſſion; then ſaid his Majeſty; Doth the houſe intend to publiſh this declaration? We ſaid, we could not anſwer to it. 'Well then (ſaid his Majeſty) I ſuppoſe you do not expect a preſent anſwer to ſo long a petition; but this let me tell you, I have left Scotland well in peace; they are well ſatisfied with me, and I with them; and tho' I ſtayed longer than I expected, I think if I had not gone, you had not been ſo ſoon rid of the army. I ſhall give you my anſwer to this buſineſs, with as much ſpeed as the weight thereof will permit.' And ſo was pleaſed to give us his hand to kiſs; and thereupon we took our leave, and afterwards mr. Comptroller came to us with this meſſage; that the King deſired there ſhould be no publiſhing of this declaration, 'till we had received his anſwer. We were all that night treated by mr. Comptroller at ſupper, entertained with great reſpect, and lodged by the King's harbinger."

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

Petition of the houſe of commons, which accompanied the remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom, when it was preſented to his Majeſty, at Hampton-court, Dec. 1, 1641.

Moſt gracious Sovereign,

The petition which accompanied the remonſtrance. p. 437. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 692.

"YOUR Majeſty's moſt humble and faithful ſubjects, the commons in this preſent parliament aſſembled, do, with much thankfulneſs and joy, acknowledge the great mercy and favor of God, in giving your Majeſty a ſafe and peaceable return out of Scotland, into your kingdom of England, where the preſſing dangers and diſtempers of the ſtate have cauſed us with much earneſtneſs to deſire the comfort of your gracious preſenſe, and likewiſe the unity and juſtice of your royal authority, to give more life and power to the dutiful and loyal counſels and indeavors of your parliament, for the prevention of that imminent ruin and deſtruction wherein your kingdoms of England and Scotland are threatened. The duty which we owe to your Majeſty, and our country, cannot but make us very ſenſible and apprehenſive, that the multiplicity, ſharpneſs and malignity of thoſe evils under which we have now many years ſuffered, are fomented and cheriſhed by a corrupt and ill-affected party, who, among other their miſchievous deviſes for the alteration of religion and government, have ſought by many falſe ſcandals and imputations, cunningly inſinuated and diſperſed among the people, to blemiſh and diſgrace our proceedings in this parliament, and to get themſelves a party and faction among your ſubjects, for the better ſtrengthening themſelves in their wicked courſes, and hindering thoſe proviſions and remedies, which might, by the wiſdom of your Majeſty, and counſel of your parliament, be oppoſed againſt them.

"For preventing whereof, and the better information of your Majeſty, your peers, and all other your loyal ſubjects, we have been neceſſitated to make a declaration of the ſtate of the kingdom, both before and ſince the aſſembly of this parliament, unto this time, which we do humbly preſent to your Majeſty, without the leaſt intention to lay any blemiſh upon your royal perſon, but only to repreſent how your royal authority and truſt have been abuſed, to the great prejudice and danger of your Majeſty, and all your good ſubjects. (1)

REMARK (1) The deſign of this declaration or remonſtrance was not to inform the King, as the commons aſſured him, but ſolely to make their apology, and exaſperate the people againſt him. Firſt, the remonſtrance is not directed to the King, and he is always mentioned in the third perſon. Secondly, the commons voted that the remonſtrance ſhould be printed, before they had received any anſwer from the King, and publiſhed it againſt his will. So that what they ſay at the cloſe of this article is all a flouriſh, without one word of truth.

"And becauſe we have reaſon to believe, that thoſe malignant parties, whoſe proceedings evidently appear to be mainly for the advantage and increaſe of Popery, are compoſed, ſet up and acted

Rem. (5) The commons were not ſatisfied with requiring that thoſe biſhops whom they ſuppoſed guilty of the deſign to countenance Popery ſhould be puniſhed, but thence alſo took occaſion to in- flict a penalty on the whole bench, by depriving them of the privilege of ſiting in parliament.

" For the taking away ſuch oppreſſions in reli- " gion, church-government and diſcipline, as have " been brought in and fomented by them; for " uniting together all ſuch your loyal ſubjects as " join in the ſame fundamental truths againſt the " Papiſts, by removing ſome oppreſſions and un- " neceſſary ceremonies, by which diverſe weak " conſciences have been ſcrupled, and ſeem to be " divided from the reſt, (6) and for the due exe- " cution of thoſe good laws, which have been made " for ſecuring the liberty of your ſubjects.

A remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom, pre- ſented to the King, from the houſe of commons, the firſt of December, 1641.

" THE commons in this preſent parliament " aſſembled, having with much earneſtneſs " and faithfulneſs of affection and zeal to the pub- " lic good of this kingdom, and his Majeſty's ho- " nor and ſervice, for the ſpace of twelve months, " wreſtled with great dangers and fears, the preſ- " ſing miſeries and calamities, the various diſtem- " pers and diſorders which had not only aſſaulted, " but even overwhelmed and extinguiſhed the li- " berty, peace and proſperity of this kingdom, " the comfort and hopes of all his Majeſty's good " ſubjects, and exceedingly weakened and under- " mined the foundation and ſtrength of his own " royal throne.

" Do yet find an abounding malignity and op- " poſition in thoſe parties and factions who have " been the cauſe of thoſe evils, and do ſtill labor " to caſt aſperſions upon that which hath been done, " and to raiſe many difficulties for the hinderance " of that which remains yet undone, and to foment " jealouſies betwixt the King and parliament, that " ſo they may deprive him and his people of the " fruit of his own gracious intentions, and their " humble deſires of procuring the public peace, " ſafety and happineſs of this realm. Charles I An' 1641.

" venting thoſe miſerable effects, which ſuch mali-
" cious indeavors may produce, we have thought
" good to declare: (1)

Remark (1) This was all flouriſh, and a pretenſe uſed by the commons to have occaſion to publiſh this remonſtrance, which was reſolved on at the very firſt aſſembling of this parliament, before any one thought of cenſuring their conduct.

" The root and growth of theſe miſchievous
" deſigns.

" The maturity and ripeneſs to which they " have attained before the begining of the parlia-
" ment.

" The effectual means which have been uſed for
" the extirpation of thoſe dangerous evils, and the " progreſs which hath therein been made by his
" Majeſty's goodneſs, and the wiſdom of the par" liament.

" The ways of obſtruction and oppoſition, by " which that progreſs hath been interrupted.

" The courſes to be taken for the removing thoſe
" obſtacles, and for accompliſhing our moſt
" dutiful and faithful intentions and indeavors of
" reſtoring and eſtabliſhing the ancient honor,
" greatneſs and ſecurity of this crown and nation.

" The root of all this miſchief we find to be a
" malignant and pernicious deſign of ſubverting the " fundamental laws and principles of government,
" upon which the religion and juſtice of this king-
" dom are firmly eſtabliſhed. The actors and pro-
" moters hereof have been,

" 1. The jeſuited Papiſts, who hate the laws,
" as they are the obſtacles of that change and ſub-
" verſion of religion which they ſo much long
" for.

" 2. Tbe biſhops, and the corrupt part of the " clergy, who cheriſh formality and ſuperſtition,
" as the natural effects, and more probable ſup-
" ports of their own eccleſiaſtical tyranny and uſur-
" pation.

" 3. Such counſellors and courtiers as, for pri" vate ends, have ingaged themſelves to farther
" the intereſts of ſome foreign Princes or ſtates, to
" the prejudice of his Majeſty and the ſtate at " home.

" The common principles by which they mould-
" ed and governed all their particular counſels and
" actions were theſe:

" Firſt, to maintain continual differences and
" diſcontents betwixt the King and the people,
" upon queſtions of prerogative and liberty, that
" ſo they might have the advantage of ſiding with " him, and, under the notions of men addicted to " his ſervice, gain to themſelves and their parties
" the places of greateſt truſt and power in the king-
" dom. (2)

Rem. (2) It is certain, this was the method whereby archbiſhop Laud, and the Arminian party, grew powerful at court.

" A ſecond, to ſuppreſs the purity and power of " religion, and ſuch perſons as were beſt affected
" to it, as being contrary to their own ends, and
" the greateſt impediment to that change which " they thought to introduce.

" A third, to conjoin thoſe parties of the king-
" dom which were moſt propitious to their own
" ends, and to divide thoſe who were moſt oppo-
" ſite, which conſiſted in many particular obſerva-
" tions.

" To cheriſh the Arminian party, in thoſe
" points wherein they agree with the Papiſts; to " multiply and inlarge the difference between the " common Proteſtants, and thoſe whom they call
" Puritans; to introduce and countenance ſuch opi-
" nions and ceremonies as are fiteſt for accommo" dation with Popery; to increaſe and maintain ig-
" norance, looſeneſs and profaneneſs in the people:

" that of thoſe three parties, Papiſts, Arminians and Libertines, they might compoſe a body fit to act ſuch counſels and reſolutions, as were moſt conducible to their own ends. Charles I An' 1641.

" A fourth to diſaffect the King to parliaments,
" by ſlanders and falſe imputations, and by puting
" him upon other ways of ſupply, which in ſhew
" and appearance were fuller of advantage than the " ordinary courſe of ſubſidies, tho' in truth they " brought more loſs than gain both to King and
" people, and have cauſed the great diſtractions
" under which we both ſuffer.

" As, in all compounded bodies, the operations
" are qualified according to the predominant ele-
" ment, ſo in this mixed party the jeſuited counſels,
" being moſt active and prevailing, may eaſily be
" diſcovered to have had the greateſt ſway in all
" their determinations, and if they be not prevent" ed, are likely to devour the reſt, or to turn them
" into their own nature.

" In the begining of his Majeſty's reign, the " party began to revive and flouriſh again,
" having been ſomewhat damped by the breach
" with Spain, in the laſt year of King James, and
" by his Majeſty's marriage with France; the in-
" tereſts and counſels of that ſtate being not ſo con" trary to the good of religion, and the proſperity
" of this kingdom, as thoſe of Spain; and the Pa-
" piſts of England, having been ever more addict-
" ed to Spain than France, yet they ſtill retained a
" purpoſe and reſolution to weaken the Proteſtant
" parties in all parts, and even in France, where-
" by to make way for the change of religion, which " they intended at home.

" 1. The firſt effect and evidence of their reco-
" very and ſtrength, was the diſſolution of the par" liament at Oxford, after there had been given
" two ſubſidies to his Majeſty, and before they re" ceived relief in any one grievance: many other
" more miſerable effects followed.

" The loſs of the Rochel fleet, by the help of " our ſhiping ſet forth and delivered over to the " French, in oppoſition to the advice of parlia" ment, (3) which left that town without defenſe
" by ſea, and made way, not only to the loſs of " that important place, but likewiſe to the loſs of " all the ſtrength and ſecurity of the Proteſtant re-
" ligion in France.

Rem. (3) It cannot properly be ſaid, that the ſeven ſhips lent by King Charles to the King of France were delivered to the French, in oppoſition to the advice of parliament, ſince the thing was done before the parliament was acquainted with it. It is likewiſe a great agravation, to impute the loſs of the Rochel fleet, and of Rochel itſelf, to the aid of the ſeven Engliſh ſhips, which the mariners of that nation had deſerted.

" 3. The diverting his Majeſty's courſe of wars,
" from the Weſt-Indies, which was the moſt facile
" and hopeful way for this kingdom to prevail
" againſt the Spaniards, to a moſt expenſive and un-
" ſucceſsful attempt upon Cadiz, which was ſo or" dered, as if it had rather been intended to make
" us weary of war, than to proſper it. (4)

Rem. (4) This accuſation ſeems ſomewhat too far-ſtretched, ſince Queen Elizabeth had taken both courſes with ſucceſs.

" 4. The precipitate breach with France, by " taking their ſhips to a great value, without " making recompenſe to the Engliſh, whoſe goods
" were thereupon imbarked, and confiſcate in that
" kingdom.

" 5. The peace with Spain, without conſent of " parliament, contrary to the promiſe of King
" James to both houſes, whereby the Palatine's
" cauſe was deſerted and left to chargeable and
" hopeleſs treaties, which, for the moſt part, were

Charles I An' 1641.

" managed by thoſe who might juſtly be ſuſpected " to be no friends to that cauſe. (5)

Rem. (5) This article contains three accuſations againſt the King, 1. of making peace with Spain without conſent of parliament; 2. of neglecting, in this peace, the intereſt of the elector Palatine. 3. of treating of that Prince's affairs by ſuſpected perſons: As to the firſt, it is true, King James had promiſed not to make peace with Spain without the parliament's approbation: but it was at a time when the parliament began to ſupply him with money for the war, and ingaged to inable him to continue it. But the face of affairs was changed when his ſon King Charles made peace. As to the ſecond charge, of neglecting the elector Palatine's cauſe, it is properly a cavil; for King Charles, not having money to continue the war againſt Spain, was in no condition to ſupport the elector's intereſt. All can be ſaid is, that he would have had money from the parliament, had he been diſpoſed to redreſs grievances. As to the third accuſation, I am wholly ignorant of its foundation.

" 6. The charging the kingdom with billeted " ſoldiers in all parts of it, and that concomitant " deſign of German horſe, that the land might " either ſubmit with fear, or be inforced with rigor " to ſuch arbitrary contributions as ſhould be re- " quired of them. (6)

Rem. (6) Theſe two accuſations are unanſwerable. There was but too much reaſon to believe this was done purpoſely to eſtabliſh a deſpotic government.

" 7. The diſſolving the parliament in the ſecond " year of his Majeſty's reign, after a declaration of " their intent to grant five ſubſidies. (7)

Rem. (7) That parliament was diſſolved to ſave the duke of Buckingham.

" 8. The exacting the like proportion of five " ſubſidies after the parliament was diſſolved, by " commiſſion of loan; and diverſe gentlemen and " others impriſoned for not yielding to pay that " loan, whereby many of them contracted ſuch " ſickneſſes as coſt them their lives.

" 9. Great ſums of money required and raiſed " by privy-ſeals. (8)

Rem. (8) Theſe articles were notoriouſly true: there is no juſtifying them, but by aſſerting, that the King had a right to do whatever he did. But that is a very diſputable quere.

" 10. An unjuſt and pernicious attempt to extort " great payments from the ſubject by way of ex- " ciſe, and a commiſſion iſſued under ſeal for that " purpoſe.

" 11. The petition of right, which was granted " in full parliament, blaſted with an illegal declara- " tion, to make it deſtructive to itſelf, to the " power of parliament, to the liberty of the ſub- " ject, and to that purpoſe printed with it; and the " petition made of no uſe but to ſhew the bold and " preſumptuous injuſtice of ſuch miniſters as durſt " break the laws, and ſuppreſs the liberties of the " kingdom, after they had been ſo ſolemnly and " evidently declared.

" 12. Another parliament diſſolved 4 Car; the " privilege of parliament broken, by impriſoning " diverſe members of the houſe, detaining them " cloſe priſoners for many months together, with- " out the liberty of uſing books, pen, ink, or pa- " per, denying them all the comforts of life, all " means of preſervation of health, not permiting " their wives to come near them, even in time of " their ſickneſs.

" 13. And for the compleating that cruelty, af- " ter many years paſſed in ſuch miſerable durance, " depriving them of the neceſſary means of ſpiri- " tual conſolation, not ſuffering them to go abroad " to injoy God's ordinances in God's houſe, or " God's miniſters to viſit them to adminiſter com- " fort to them in their private chambers.

Charles I An' 1641.

" 14. And to keep them ſtill in this oppreſſed " condition, not admiting them to be bailed ac- " cording to law, yet vexing them with informa- " tions in inferior courts, ſentencing and fining ſome " of them for matters done in parliament, and ex- " torting the payments of thoſe fines from them, " inforcing others to put in ſecurity of good beha- " vior before they could be releaſed.

" 15. The impriſonment of the reſt who refuſed " to be bound ſtill continued, which might have " been perpetual, if neceſſity had not the laſt year " brought another parliament to relieve them, of " whom one * died by the cruelty and harſhneſs " of his impriſonment, which would admit of no " relaxation, notwithſtanding the imminent danger " of his life did ſufficiently appear by the declara- " tion of his phyſician; and his releaſe, or at leaſt " his refreſhment, was ſought by many humble " petitions: and his blood ſtill cries either for ven- " geance or the repentance of thoſe miniſters of ſtate " who have at once obſtructed the courſe both of " his Majeſty's juſtice and mercy. (9)

* Sir John Elliot.

Rem. (9) The rigor exerciſed upon theſe members of parliament is one of the ſtrongeſt proofs of the deſign to eſtabliſh arbitrary power: and therefore the commons largely inſiſt upon this article.

" 16. Upon the diſſolution of both theſe parlia- " ments, untrue and ſcandalous declarations were " publiſhed to aſperſe their proceedings, and ſome " of their members, unjuſtly to make them odious, " and color the violence which was uſed againſt " them. (10) Proclamations were ſet out to the " ſame purpoſe; and to the great dejecting the " hearts of the people, forbiding them even to " ſpeak of parliaments.

Rem. (10) If by theſe declarations are underſtood thoſe publiſhed to notify the cauſes of diſſolving theſe parliaments, the commons may be ſaid to have ſwerved from the reſpect due to his Majeſty, by terming them untrue and ſcandalous, ſince they were publiſhed in his name.

" 17. After the breach of the parliament in the " fourth of his Majeſty, injuſtice, oppreſſion and " violence broke in upon us, without any reſtraint " or moderation, and yet the firſt project was the " great ſums exacted thro' the whole kingdom, " for default of knighthood, which ſeemed to have " ſome color and ſhadow of a law; yet, if it be " rightly examined by that obſolete law which was " pretended for it, will be found to be againſt all " the rules of juſtice, both in reſpect of the perſons " charged, the proportion of the fines demanded, " and the abſurd and unreaſonable manner of their " proceedings.

" 18. Tonage and poundage have been received " without color or pretenſe of law; many other " heavy impoſitions continued againſt law; and " ſome ſo unreaſonable, that the ſum of the charge " exceeds the value of the goods.

" 19. The book of rates lately inhanced to a " high portion; and ſuch merchants as would not " ſubmit to their illegal and unreaſonable payments " were vexed and oppreſſed above meaſure; and " the ordinary courſe of juſtice, the common birth- " right of the ſubjects of England, wholly obſtruct- " ed and taken from them.

" 20. And altho' this was taken on pretenſe of " guarding the ſeas, yet a new and unheard-of tax " of ſhip-money was deviſed, and upon the ſame " pretenſe: by both which there was charged upon " the ſubject near ſeven hundred thouſand pounds " ſome years; and yet the merchants have been " left ſo naked to the violence of the Turkiſh py- " rates, that many great ſhips of value, and thou-

" ſands

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" ſands of his Majeſty's ſubjects, have been taken " by them, and do ſtill remain in miſerable ſlavery.

" 21. The inlargement of foreſts, contrary to " Charta de Foreſta,' and the compoſition there- " upon.

" 22. The exactions of coat and conduct money, " and diverſe other military charges. (11)

REM. (11) King Charles being ingaged in a war againſt Scotland, ordered that every county ſhould find a certain number of ſoldiers, and cloathe and pay them, 'till they came to the place of general rendezvous, on condition of being reimburſed. On this pretenſe it was agreed with the counties, that they ſhould ſupply his Majeſty with a certain ſum proportionable to the number of ſoldiers each county was to cloathe and pay, for which the King took the whole charge upon himſelf. This was ſtiled coat and conduct-money, i. e. money for cloathing and conducting the troops. But thoſe monies were not ever repaid.

" 23. The taking away the arms of the trained- " bands of diverſe counties. (12)

REM. (12) His Majeſty deſigning to make a magazine of arms in Edinburg caſtle, found no ſpeedier way than to take, in ſome counties, the arms of the militia, and ſend them to Scotland. But it was pretended, that, at the ſame time, his drift was, under that pretext, to diſarm ſuch perſons as were not well-affected to him. Accordingly, this is inſinuated by the remonſtrance, in the following article concerning powder.

" 24. The deſperate deſign of ingroſſing all the " gun-powder into one hand, keeping it in the " Tower of London, and ſeting ſo high a rate " upon it, that the poorer ſort were not able to " buy it; nor could any have it without licenſe; " thereby to leave the ſeveral parts of the kingdom " deſtitute of their neceſſary defenſe; and by ſelling " ſo dear that which was ſold, to make an unlawful " advantage of it, to the great charge and detri- " ment of the ſubject.

" 25. The general deſtruction of the King's " timber, eſpecially that in the foreſt of Dean, ſold " to Papiſts, which was the beſt ſtore-houſe of " this kingdom for the maintenance of our ſhip- " ing. (13)

REM. (13). Theſe points are perhaps ſomewhat exagerated, at leaſt in reſpect to the motives and conſequences.

" 26. The taking away of mens right, under " color of the King's title to land between high and " low water marks.

" 27. The monopolies of ſoap, ſalt, wine, leather, " ſea-coal, and in a manner of all things of moſt " common and neceſſary uſe.

" 28. The reſtraint of the liberties of the ſub- " jects in their habitations, trades and other in- " tereſts.

29. Their vexation and oppreſſion by purveyors, " clerks of the market, and ſalt-petre men.

" 30. The ſale of pretended nuſances, buildings " in and about London.

" 31. Converſion of arable into paſture, con- " tinuance of paſture under the name of depopula- " tion, have drawn many millions out of the ſub- " jects purſes, without any conſiderable profit to " his Majeſty. (14)

REM. (14) The woollen trade being the great ſourſe of the riches of England, the ſubjects were, by ſeveral ſtatutes, injoined not to change paſture into arable land, for fear of leſſening the flocks, and conſequently the wool. In King Charles's reign, the offenders againſt theſe ſtatutes were ſtrictly inquired after, not with a view to hinder the abuſes, but to authorife them by a compoſition with his Majeſty.

" 32. Large quantities of common, and ſeveral " grounds have been taken from the ſubject, by " color of the ſtatute of improvement, and by " abuſe of the commiſſion of ſewers, without their " conſent, and againſt it. (15)

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

REM. (15) Commiſſioners of ſewers are ſuch as, by authority under the great ſeal, ſee drains and ditches well ordered and maintained in marſhy and fenny countries, for better conveyance of the water into the ſea, and preſerving graſs upon the land for feeding flocks and herds. The commons complained of this commiſſion's being abuſed.

" 33. And not only private intereſt, but alſo " public faith hath been broken, in ſeizing the " money and bullion in the mint, and the whole " kingdom like to be robbed at once, in that " abominable project of braſs-money. (16)

REM. (16) King Charles took out of the mint only forty thouſand pounds, which money was afterwards returned to the proprietors.

" 34. Great numbers of his Majeſty's ſubjects, " for refuſing thoſe unlawful charges, have been " vexed with long and expenſive ſuits; ſome fined " and cenſured, others commited to long and hard " impriſonments and confinements, to the loſs of " health in many, of life in ſome; and others have " had their houſes broken up, their goods ſeized, " ſome have been reſtrained from their lawful callings.

" 35. Ships have been interrupted in their " voyages, ſurpriſed at ſea in hoſtile manner by " projectors, as by a common enemy.

" 36. Merchants prohibited to unlade their goods " in ſuch ports as were for their own advantage, " and forced to bring them to thoſe places which " were much for the advantage of the monopoliſers " and projectors.

" 37. The court of ſtar-chamber hath abounded " in extravagant cenſures, not only for the main- " tenance and improvement of monopolies, and " other unlawful taxes, but for diverſe other cauſes, " where there hath been no offenſe, or very ſmall; " whereby his Majeſty's ſubjects have been op- " preſſed by grievous fines, impriſonments, ſtig- " matiſing, mutilations, whipings, pillories, gags, " confinements and baniſhments, after ſo rigid a " manner, as hath not only deprived men of the " ſociety of their friends, exerciſe of their profeſſions, " comfort of books, uſe of paper and ink, but even " violated that near union which God hath eſta- " bliſhed betwixt men and their wives, by forced " and conſtrained ſeparation, whereby they have " been bereaved of the comfort and converſation " one of another for many years together, without " hope of relief, if God had not, by his over- " ruling providence, given ſome interruption to the " prevailing power and counſel of thoſe who were " the authors and promoters of ſuch peremptory " and heady courſes. (17)

REM. (17.) This whole article relates to the rigorous treatment of Pryn, Baſtwick, Burton, and others, by the ſtar-chamber.

" 38. Judges have been put out of their places " for refuſing to do againſt their oaths and con- " ſciences: others have been ſo awed that they durſt " not do their duties, and the better to hold a rod " over them, the clauſe, 'Quam diu ſe bene geſſerit,' " was left out of their patents, and a new clauſe, " Durante bene placito,' inſerted.

" 39. Lawyers have been checked for being faith- " ful to their clients: ſollicitors and attornies have " been threatened, and ſome puniſhed for following " lawful ſuits: and by this means all the approaches " to juſtice were interrupted and forecluded.

" 40. New oaths have been forced upon the ſub- " ject againſt law.

" 41. New judicatories erected without law. The " council-table have by their orders offered to bind " the ſubjects in their freeholds, eſtates, ſuits and " actions.

" 42. The

Charles I An' 1641.

" 42. The pretended court of the earl-marſhal " was arbitrary and illegal in its being and pro- " ceedings.

" 43. The chancery, exchequer-chamber, court " of wards, and other Engliſh courts, have been " grievous in exceeding their juriſdiction.

" 44. The eſtate of many families weakened, " and ſome ruined by exceſſive fines, exacted from " them for compoſitions of wardſhips.

" 45. All leaſes of above one hundred years " made to draw on wardſhip contrary to law.

" 46. Undue proceedings uſed in the finding of " offices, to make the jury find for the King.

" 47. The common-law courts, ſeeing all men " more inclinable to ſeek juſtice there, where it " may be fited to their own deſires, are known " frequently to forſake the rules of the common- " law, and ſtraying beyond their bounds, under " pretenſe of equity, to do injuſtice. (18)

Rem. (18) The laws of England are divided into common law, and ſtatute law; the firſt is founded on ancient cuſtom, &c. and the other on acts of parliament: from theſe laws the judges are not allowed to deviate, either to the right or left (a). The court of chancery only may, in ſome caſes, judge according to equity. Now the King's courts, in aſſuming the liberty of judging according to equity, and not ſtrictly to the letter of the law, had exceeded their juriſdiction, in order to favor the court.

" 48. Titles of honor, judicial places, ſerjeant- " ſhips at law, and other offices have been ſold for " great ſums of money; whereby the common " juſtice of the kingdom hath been much indangered, " not only by opening a way of employment in " places of great truſt and advantage to men of " weak parts, but alſo by giving occaſion to " bribery, extortion and partiality; it ſeldom hap- " pening that places ill-gotten are well uſed. (19)

Rem. (19) A ſerjeant at law, 'Serviens ad legem,' is the higheſt degree taken in that profeſſion, as that of doctor is in the civil law. One court is peculiar to them, viz. the court of common pleas, tho' they are not reſtrained from pleading in any other court. Out of theſe are choſe one or more King's ſerjeants, to plead for him in all cauſes, eſpecially in thoſe of treaſon.

" 49. Commiſſions have been granted for examin- " ing the exceſs of fees: and when great exactions " have been diſcovered, compoſitions have been " made with delinquents, not only for the time " paſſed, but likewiſe for immunity, and ſecurity " in offending for the time to come, which, under " color of remedy, hath but confirmed and in- " creaſed the grievance to the ſubject.

" 50. The uſual courſe of pricking ſheriffs not " obſerved, but many times ſheriffs made in an " extraordinary way, ſometimes as a puniſhment " and charge unto them, (20) ſometimes ſuch were " pricked out as would be inſtruments to execute " whatſoever they would have to be done.

Rem. (20) To hinder them from being choſen to ſerve in parliament, as ſir Edward Coke*.

* Alſo ſir Robert Philips and ſir Tho. Wentworth.

" 51. The biſhops and the reſt of the clergy " did triumph in the ſuſpenſions, excommunications, " deprivations, and degradations of diverſe painful, " learned and pious miniſters, in the vexation and " grievous oppreſſions of great numbers of his Ma- " jeſty's good ſubjects.

" 52. The high commiſſion grew to ſuch exceſs " of ſharpneſs and ſeverity, as was not much leſs " than the Romiſh Inquiſition, as yet in many caſes, " by the archbiſhop's power, was made much more " heavy, being aſſiſted and ſtrengthened by au- " thority of the council-table.

Charles I An' 1641.

" 53. The biſhops and their courts were as eager " in the country; altho' their juriſdiction could not " reach ſo high in rigor and extremity of puniſh- " ment, yet were they no leſs grievous in reſpect of " the generality and multiplicity of vexations, which, " lighting upon the meaner ſort of tradeſmen and " artificers, did impoveriſh many thouſands;

" 54. And ſo afflict and trouble others, that " great numbers, to avoid their miſeries, departed " out of the kingdom; ſome into New-England " and other parts of America, others into Holland:

" 55. Where they have tranſported their manu- " factures of cloth; which is not only a loſs, by " diminiſhing the preſent ſtock of the kingdom, " but a great miſchief, by impairing, and indanger- " ing the loſs of that peculiar trade of clothing, " which hath been a plentiful fountain of wealth and " honor to this nation.

" 56. Thoſe were fiteſt for eccleſiaſtical prefer- " ments, and ſooneſt obtained it, who were moſt " officious in promoting ſuperſtition, moſt virulent " in railing againſt godlineſs and honeſty. (21)

Rem. (21) By theſe are to be underſtood ſuch as were moſt inveterate againſt Preſbytery.

" 57. The moſt public and ſolemn ſermons be- " fore his Majeſty were, either to advance prero- " gative above law and decry the property of the " ſubject, or full of ſuch kind of invectives;

" 58. Whereby they might make thoſe odious who " ſought to maintain the religion; laws and liber- " ties of the kingdom; and ſuch men were ſure to " be weeded out of the commiſſion of the peace, " and out of all other imployments of power in " the government of the country.

" 59. Many noble perſons were counſellors in " name, but the power and authority remained in " a few of ſuch as were moſt addicted to this party: " whoſe reſolutions and determinations were brought " to the table for countenance and execution, and " not for debate and deliberation; and no man could " offer to oppoſe them without diſgrace and hazard " to himſelf.

" 60. Nay, all thoſe who did not wholly con- " cur, and actively contribute to the fartherance of " their deſigns, tho' otherwiſe perſons of ever ſo " great honor and abilities, were ſo far from being " imployed in any place of truſt and power, that " they were neglected, diſcountenanced and, upon " all occaſions, injured and oppreſſed.

" 61. This faction was grown to that height and " intireneſs of power, that now they began to think " of finiſhing their work, which conſiſted of theſe " three parts:

" 62. I. The government muſt be ſet free from " all reſtraint of laws concerning our perſons and " eſtates.

" 63. II. There muſt be a conjunction betwixt " Papiſts and Proteſtants in doctrine, diſcipline and " ceremonies, only it muſt not yet be called Popery.

" 64. III. The Puritans, under which name they " include all thoſe who deſire to preſerve the laws " and liberties of the kingdom, and to maintain " religion in the power of it, muſt be either rooted " out of the kingdom with force, or driven out " with fear.

" 65. For the effecting this, it was thought ne- " ceſſary to reduce Scotland to ſuch Popiſh ſuper- " ſtitions and innovations, as might make them apt " to join with England in that great change which " was intended.

" 66. Whereupon new canons and a new liturgy

(a) Here we have rectified a blunder of our author, who confounds both laws, making them one and the ſame. The like has been done alſo with regard to ſome other ſmall miſtakes in his next remark.

" were

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" were preſſed upon them; and when they refuſed " to admit them, an army was raiſed to force them " to it, towards which the clergy and the Papiſts " were very forward in their contribution.

" 67. The Scots likewiſe raiſed an army for their " defenſe.

" 68. And when both armies were come to- " gether, and ready for a bloody incounter, his " Majeſty's own gracious diſpoſition, the counſel of " the Engliſh nobility, and dutiful ſubmiſſion of " the Scots, did ſo far prevail againſt the evil " counſel of others, that a pacification was made, " and his Majeſty returned with peace and much " honor to London.

" 69. The unexpected reconciliation was moſt " acceptable to all the kingdom, except to the ma- " lignant party; whereof the archbiſhop and the " earl of Strafford being heads, they and their " faction began to inveigh againſt the peace, and " to agravate the proceedings of the ſtates, which " ſo inſenſed his Majeſty, that he forthwith pre- " pared again for war.

" 70. And ſuch was their confidence that, having " corrupted and diſtempered the whole frame and " government of the kingdom, they did now hope " to corrupt that which was the only means to re- " ſtore all to a right frame and temper again.

" 71. To which end, they perſuaded his Ma- " jeſty to call a parliament, not to ſeek counſel and " advice of them, but to draw countenance and " ſupply from them, and to ingage the whole " kingdom in their quarrel.

" 72. And in the mean time, continued all their " unjuſt levies of money, reſolving either to make " the parliament pliant to their will, and to eſtabliſh " miſchief by a law, or elſe to break it, and with " more color to go on by violence to take what they " could not obtain by conſent. The ground alleged " for the juſtification of this war was this:

" 73. That the undutiful demands of the par- " liaments in Scotland were ſufficient reaſons for " his Majeſty to take arms againſt them, without " hearing the reaſon of thoſe demands, and there- " upon a new army was prepared againſt them; " their ſhips were ſeized in all parts both of Eng- " land and Ireland, and at ſea, their petitions re- " jected, their commiſſioners refuſed audience.

" 74. This whole kingdom moſt miſerably di- " ſtempered with levies of men and money; and " impriſonments of thoſe who denied to ſubmit " to thoſe levies.

" 75. The earl of Strafford paſſed into Ireland, " cauſed the parliament there to declare againſt the " Scots, to give four ſubſidies towards that war; " and to ingage themſelves, their lives and fortunes, " for the proſecution of it; and gave directions for " an army, of eight thouſand foot, and one thouſand " horſe, to be levied there, which were for the moſt " part Papiſts.

" 76. The parliament met upon the thirteenth of " April 1640. The earl of Strafford and arch- " biſhop of Canterbury, with their party, ſo pre- " vailed with his Majeſty, that the houſe of com- " mons was preſſed to yield a ſupply for maintenance " of the war with Scotland, before they had pro- " vided any relief for the great and preſſing grie- " vances of the people; which being againſt the " fundamental privilege and proceeding of parlia- " ment, was yet in humble reſpect to his Majeſty " ſo far admited, as that they agreed to take the " matter of ſupply into conſideration, and two " ſeveral days it was debated.

" 77. Twelve ſubſidies were demanded for the " releaſe of ſhip-money alone. A third day was " appointed for concluſion, when the heads of that " party began to fear the people might cloſe with " the King in ſatisfying his deſires of money; but " that withal they were like to blaſt their malicious " deſigns againſt Scotland, finding them very much " indiſpoſed to give any countenance to that war.

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" 78. Thereupon they wickedly adviſed the King " to break off the parliament, and to return to the " ways of confuſion, in which their own evil inten- " tions were moſt like to proſper and ſucceed. (22)

REM. (22) Lord Clarendon, then a member of the houſe of commons, affirms, that the houſe was very well inclined to ſatisfy the King, if he would have had a little patience, and that he repented afterwards his precipitation. This confirms what is ſaid here, that the parliament was diſſolved, for ſome private ends of thoſe who moſt influenced the King's council.

" 79. After the parliament ended, the fifth of " May 1640, this party grew ſo bold, as to counſel " the King to ſupply himſelf out of his ſubjects " eſtates, by his own power, at his own will, with- " out their conſent.

" 80. The very next day, ſome members of " both houſes had their ſtudies and cabinets, yea " their pockets ſearched. Another of them, not " long after, was commited cloſe priſoner, for not " delivering ſome petitions which he received by " authority of that houſe.

" 81. And if harſher courſes were intended (as " was reported) it is very probable that the ſickneſs " of the earl of Strafford, and the tumultuous " riſing in Southwark and about Lambeth, were " the cauſes that ſuch violent intentions were not " brought to execution.

" 82. A falſe and ſcandalous declaration againſt " the houſe of commons was publiſhed, in his Ma- " jeſty's name, which yet wrought little effect with " the people, but only to manifeſt the impudence " of thoſe who were authors of it.

" 83. A forced loan of money was attempted in " the city of London.

" 84. The lord-mayor and aldermen, in their " ſeveral wards, injoined to bring in a liſt of the " names of ſuch perſons as they judged fit to lend, " and of the ſums they ſhould lend, and ſuch alder- " men as refuſed ſo to do were commited to priſon.

" 85. The archbiſhop, with the other biſhops " and clergy, continued the convocation, and by a " new commiſſion turned it into a provincial ſynod, " in which, by an unheard-of preſumption, they " made canons which contain in them many matters " contrary to the King's prerogative; to the fun- " damental laws and ſtatutes of the realm; to the " right of parliaments; to the property and liberty " of the ſubject; with matters tending to ſedition " and of dangerous conſequence; thereby eſtabliſh- " ing their own uſurpations, juſtifying their altar- " worſhip, and thoſe other ſuperſtitious innovations, " which they formerly introduced without warrant " of law.

" 86. They impoſed a new oath upon diverſe of " his Majeſty's ſubjects, both eccleſiaſtical and lay, " for maintenance of their own tyranny, and laid a " great tax upon the clergy for ſupply of his Ma- " jeſty, and generally they ſhewed themſelves very " affectionate to the war with Scotland, which was " by ſome of them ſtiled 'Bellum Epiſcopale,' " and a prayer compoſed and injoined to be read in " churches, calling the Scots rebels, to put the two " nations in blood, and make them irreconcileable.

" 87. All thoſe pretended canons and conſtitu- " tions were armed with the ſeveral cenſures of " ſuſpenſion, excommunication, deprivation, by " which they would have thruſt out all the good " miniſters, and moſt of the well-affected people " of the kingdom, and left an eaſy paſſage to their " own deſign of reconciliation with Rome. (23)

REM. (23) The commons go doubtleſs too far, when they impute to the whole convocation of 1640 a deſign a deſign of reſtoring Popery. This is not at all likely, ſuppoſing it true that ſome of the biſhops had formed ſuch a project, which was never well proved (a).

" 88. The Popiſh party injoyed ſuch exemptions " from penal laws as amounted to a toleration, be- " ſide many other incouragements and court-favors.

" 89. They had a ſecretary of ſtate, ſir Francis " Windebank, a powerful agent for ſpeeding all " their deſires.

" 90. A Pope's nuncio reſiding here, to act and " govern them according to ſuch influences as he " received from Rome, and to intercede for them, " with the moſt powerful concurrence of the foreign " Princes of that religion.

" 91. By his authority, Papiſts of all ſorts, no- " bility, gentry and clergy were convocated, after " the manner of a parliament.

" 92. New juriſdictions were erected of Romiſh " archbiſhops, taxes levied, another ſtate moulded " within this ſtate, independant in government, " contrary in intereſt and affection, ſecretly cor- " rupting the ignorant or negligent profeſſors of " our religion, and cloſely uniting and combining " themſelves againſt ſuch as were found in this " poſture, waiting for an opportunity, by force, to " deſtroy thoſe whom they could not hope to ſeduce.

" 93. For the effecting whereof, they were " ſtrengthened with arms and munition, incouraged " by ſuperſtitious prayers, injoined by the nuncio to " be weekly made for the proſperity of ſome great " deſign.

" 94. And ſuch power had they at court, that " ſecretly a commiſſion was iſſued out, or intended " to be iſſued to ſome great man of that profeſſion, " for the levying ſoldiers, and to command and " imploy them according to private inſtructions, " which we doubt were framed for the advantage of " thoſe who were the contrivers of them.

" 95. His Majeſty's treaſure was conſumed, his " revenue anticipated.

" 96. His ſervants and officers compeled to lend " great ſums of money.

" 97. Multitudes were called to the council- " table, who were tired with long attendances there, " for refuſing illegal payments.

" 98. The priſons were filled with their com- " mitments; many of the ſheriffs ſummoned into " the ſtar-chamber, and ſome impriſoned for not " being quick enough in levying ſhip-money; the " people languiſhed under grief and fear; no viſi- " ble hope being left but in deſperation.

" 99. The nobility began to be weary of their " ſilence and patience, and ſenſible of the duty and " truſt which belong to them; and thereupon " ſome of the moſt ancient of them did petition " his Majeſty, at ſuch a time when evil counſellors " were ſo ſtrong that they had occaſion to expect " more hazard to themſelves, than redreſs of thoſe " public evils for which they interceded.

" 100. While the kingdom was in this agitation " and diſtemper, the Scots, reſtrained in their trades, " impoveriſhed by the loſs of many of their ſhips, " bereaved of all poſſibility of ſatisfying his Ma- " jeſty by any naked ſupplications, entered with a " powerful army into the kingdom, and, without " any hoſtile act or ſpoil in the country they paſ- " ſed, more than forcing a paſſage over the Tine " at Newburne, near Newcaſtle, poſſeſſed them- " ſelves of Newcaſtle; and had a fair opportunity " to preſs on farther upon the King's army.

" 101. But duty and reverence to his Majeſty, " and brotherly love to the Engliſh nation, made " them ſtay there, whereby the King had leiſure " to entertain better counſels.

Charles I An' 1641.

" 102. Wherein God ſo bleſſed and directed " him, that he ſummoned the great council of peers " to meet at York, upon the twenty-fourth of Sep- " tember, and there declared a parliament, to be- " gin the third of November then following.

" 103. The Scots, the firſt day of the great coun- " cil, preſented their humble petition to his Majeſty; " whereupon the treaty was appointed at Rippon.

" 104. A preſent ceſſation of arms agreed upon, " and the full concluſion of all differences refered to " the wiſdom and care of the parliament. (24)

Rem. (24) The commons ſuppoſe that, as the Scots had petitioned the King to redreſs their griev- ances, with advice of the parliament of England, and as on that occaſion his Majeſty had called a par- liament, this was a tacit conſent of both parties to leave matters to the Engliſh parliament. But this is merely ſuppoſition; there not being any agree- ment to refer matters to the parliament.

" 105. At our firſt meeting, all oppoſition " ſeemed to vaniſh, the miſchiefs were ſo evident " which thoſe evil counſellors produced, that no " man durſt ſtand up to defend them, yet the work " itſelf afforded difficulty enough.

" 106. The multiplied evils and corruptions of " ſixteen years, ſtrengthened by cuſtom and autho- " rity, and the concurrent intereſt of many pow- " erful delinquents, were now to be brought to " judgment and reformation.

" 107. The King's houſhold was to be provided " for; they had brought him to that want, that he " could not ſupply his ordinary and neceſſary ex- " penſes without the aſſiſtance of his people.

" 108. Two armies were to be paid, which " amounted very near to eighty thouſand pounds a " month.

" 109. The people were to be tenderly charged, " having been formerly exhauſted with many bur- " denſome projects.

" 110. The difficulties ſeemed to be inſupera- " ble, which by the divine providence we have " overcome. The contrarieties incompatible, which " yet in a great meaſure we have reconciled.

" 111. Six ſubſidies have been granted, and a " bill of poll-money (b), which if it be duly levied, " may equal ſix ſubſidies more, in all ſix hundred " thouſand pounds.

" 112. Beſide, we have contracted a debt to " the Scots of two hundred and twenty thouſand " pounds; yet God hath ſo bleſſed the indeavors of " this parliament, that the kingdom is a great " gainer by all theſe charges.

" 113. The ſhip-money is aboliſhed, which coſt " the kingdom above two hundred thouſand pounds " a year.

" 114. The coat and conduct-money, and other " military charges are taken away, which in " many counties amounted to little leſs than the " ſhip-money.

" 115. The monopolies are all ſuppreſſed, " whereof ſome few did prejudice the ſubject above " a million yearly.

" 116. The ſoap, a hundred thouſand pounds.

" 117. The wine, three hundred thouſand pounds.

" 118. The leather muſt needs exceed both; and " ſalt could be no leſs than that.

" 119. Beſide, the inferior monopolies, which, " if they could be exactly computed, would make " up a great ſum.

(a) It is obſervable, that this very convocation cenſured Goodman, biſhop of Gloceſter, for favoring Popery.

(b) This poll-tax was raiſed for paying the Scotiſh army. And it was according to the following proportion. A duke paid 100l. a marquis 80l. earls 60l. viſcounts and barons 40l. knights of the Bath 30l. knights bachelors 20l. eſquires 10l. every gentleman who could ſpend 100l. a year 5l. and others in proportion. Hiſt. of Taxes, p. 287.

" 120. That

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" 120. That which is more beneficial than all " this, is, that the root of theſe evils is taken away, " which was the arbitrary power pretended to be " in his Majeſty of taxing the ſubject, or charging " their eſtates without conſent in parliament, which " is now declared to be againſt law, by the judgment " of both houſes, and likewiſe by act of parliament.

" 121. Another ſtep of great advantage is this; " the living grievances, the evil counſellors and " actors of theſe miſchiefs have been ſo quelled:

" 122. By the juſtice done upon the earl of Strafford, " the flight of lord Finch, and ſecretary Windebank:

" 123. The accuſation and impriſonment of the " archbiſhop of Canterbury, of judge Berkley; and,

" 124. The impeachment of diverſe other biſhops " and judges; that it is like not only to be an eaſe to " the preſent times, but a preſervation to the future.

" 125. The diſcontinuance of parliaments is pre- " vented by the bill for a triennial parliament, and " the abrupt diſſolution of this parliament by an- " other bill, by which it is provided, it ſhall not " be diſſolved or adjourned without the conſent of " both houſes.

" 126. Which two laws, well conſidered, may " be thought more advantageous than all the for- " mer, becauſe they ſecure a full operation of the " preſent remedy, and afford a perpetual ſpring of " remedies for the future.

" 127. The ſtar-chamber;

" 128. The high-commiſſion;

" 129. The courts of the preſident and council in " the north, were ſo many forges of miſery, oppreſſion " and violence, and are all taken away; whereby " men are more ſecured in their perſons, liberties " and eſtates, than they could by any law, or ex- " ample, for the regulation of thoſe courts of terror " of the judges.

" 130. The immoderate power of the council- " table, and the exceſſive abuſe of that power is ſo " ordered and reſtrained, that we may well hope " no ſuch things as were frequently done by them, " to the prejudice of public liberty, will appear in " future times but only in ſtories, to give us and " our poſterity more occaſion to praiſe God for his " Majeſty's goodneſs, and the faithful indeavors of " this parliament.

" 131. The canons and power of canon-making " are blaſted by the votes of both houſes.

" 132. The exorbitant power of biſhops and " their courts are much abated, by ſome proviſions " in the bill againſt the high-commiſſion courts, " authors of the many innovations in doctrine and " ceremonies.

" 133. The miniſters who have been ſcandalous " in their lives have been ſo terrified, by juſt com- " plaints and accuſations, that we may well hope " they will be more modeſt for the time to come; " either inwardly convicted by the ſight of their " own folly, or outwardly reſtrained by the fear " of puniſhment.

" 134. The foreſts are, by a good law, reduced " to their right bounds.

" 135. The incroachments and oppreſſions of " the ſtannery courts, the extortions of the clerk " of the market.

" 136. And the compulſion of the ſubject to re- " ceive the order of knighthood againſt his will, " paying fines for not receiving it, and the vexatious " proceedings thereupon for levying thoſe fines, " are by other beneficial laws reformed and prevented.

" 137. Many excellent laws and proviſions are " in preparation for removing the inordinate power, " vexation and uſurpations of biſhops; for reform- " ing the pride and idleneſs of many of the clergy; " for eaſing the people of unneceſſary ceremonies " in religion; for cenſuring and removing unworthy " and unprofitable miniſters, and for maintaining " godly and diligent preachers thro' the kingdom.

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" 138. Other things of main importance for the " good of this kingdom are in propoſition, tho' " little could hitherto be done in regard of the many " other more preſſing buſineſſes, which yet before " the end of this ſeſſion we hope may receive ſome " progreſs and perfection.

" 139. The eſtabliſhing and ordering the King's " revenue, that ſo the abuſe of officers, and ſuper- " fluity of expenſes may be cut off, and the neceſſary " diſburſements for his Majeſty's honor, the defenſe " and government of the kingdom, may more cer- " tainly be provided for.

" 140. The regulating courts of juſtice, and " abridging both the delays and charges of law-ſuits.

" 141. The ſetling ſome good courſes for pre- " venting the exportation of gold and ſilver, and " the inequality of exchanges betwixt us and other " nations, for the advancing native commodities, " increaſe of our manufacturies, and well-balancing " of trade, whereby the ſtock of the kingdom may " be increaſed, or at leaſt kept from impairing, as " thro' neglect hereof it hath done for many years " laſt paſſed.

" 142. Improving the hering-fiſhing upon our " own coaſts, which will be of mighty uſe in the " imployment of the poor, and a plentiful nurſery " of mariners, for inabling the kingdom in any " great action.

" 143. The oppoſitions, obſtructions, and other " difficulties wherewith we have been incountered, " and which ſtill lie in our way, with ſome ſtrength " and much obſtinacy, are theſe; the malignant " party, whom we have formerly deſcribed to be " the actors and promoters of all our miſery, who " have taken heart again.

" 144. They have been able to prefer ſome of " their own factors and agents to degrees of honor, " to places of truſt and imployment, even during " the parliament:

" 145. They have indeavored to work in his " Majeſty ill impreſſions and opinions of our pro- " ceedings, as if we had altogether done our own " work, and not his, and had obtained from him " many things very prejudicial to the crown, both " in reſpect of prerogative and profit.

" 146. To wipe out this ſlander, we think good " only to ſay thus much: that all we have done is " for his Majeſty, his greatneſs, honor and ſupport, " when we yield to give twenty-five thouſand " pounds a month for relief of the northern coun- " ties; this was given to the King, for he was " bound to protect his ſubjects.

" 147. They were his Majeſty's evil counſellors, " and their ill inſtruments, who were actors in " thoſe grievances which brought in the Scots.

" 148. And if his Majeſty pleaſe to force thoſe " who were the authors of this war to make ſatiſ- " faction, as he might juſtly and eaſily do, it ſeems " very reaſonable that the people might well be ex- " cuſed from taking upon them this burden, being " altogether innocent, and free from being any cauſe " of it.

" 149. When we undertook the charge of the " army, which coſt above fifty thouſand pounds a " month, was not this given to the King? Was it " not his Majeſty's army? Were not all the com- " manders under contract with his Majeſty at higher " rates, and greater wages than ordinary:

" 150. And have not we taken upon us to diſ- " charge all the brotherly aſſiſtance of three hundred " thouſand pounds, which we gave the Scots? Was " it not toward repair of thoſe damages and loſſes " which they received from the King's ſhips, and " from his miniſters?

" 151. Theſe three particulars amount to above " eleven hundred thouſand pounds.

" 152. Beſide,

" 152. Beſide his Majeſty hath received, by " impoſitions upon merchandiſe, at leaſt four hun- " dred thouſand pounds.

" 153. So that his Majeſty hath had out of the " ſubjects purſe, ſince the parliament began, one " million and a half; and yet theſe men can be ſo " impudent as to tell his Majeſty, that we have " done nothing for him.

" 154. As to the ſecond branch of this ſlander, " we acknowledge with much thankfulneſs, that " his Majeſty hath paſſed more good bills to the " advantage of the ſubjects, than have been in " many ages.

" 155. But withal we cannot forget, that thoſe " venomous counſels did manifeſt themſelves in " ſome indeavors to hinder theſe good acts.

" 156. And for both houſes of parliament we " may with truth and modeſty ſay thus much: " that we have ever been careful not to deſire any " thing which ſhould weaken the crown, either in " juſt profit or uſeful power.

" 157. The triennial parliament, for the mat- " ter of it, doth not extend to ſo much as by " law we ought to have required, there being two " ſtatutes ſtill in force for a parliament to be once " a year (25); and, for the manner of it, it is in " the King's power that it ſhall never take effect, " if he, by a timely ſummons, ſhall prevent any " other way of aſſembling. (26)

Rem. (25) But theſe ſtatutes, by diſuſe, were grown obſolete, like that of Edward II, on which the King proceeded to compel people to receive the order of knighthood.

Rem. (26) The commons might have ſaid, that he was himſelf the cauſe of this act, for not calling a parliament in twelve years.

" 158. In the bill for continuance of this preſent " parliament, there ſeems to be ſome reſtraint of " the royal power in diſſolving parliaments, not " to take it out of the crown, but to ſuſpend the " execution of it for this time and occaſion only; " which was ſo neceſſary for the King's own ſecu- " rity, and the public peace, that without it we " could not have undertaken any of theſe great " charges, but muſt have left both the armies to " diſorder and confuſion, and the whole kingdom " to blood and rapine. (27)

Rem. (27) The commons underſtand here more than they expreſs. Their aim is to ſhew that, without this act, the King would not have failed to diſſolve this parliament; conſequently the peace with Scotland could not have been concluded, and the two armies would have ravaged the kingdom.

" 159. The ſtar-chamber was much more fruit- " ful in oppreſſion than in profit, the great fines " being for the moſt part given away, and the reſt " ſtalled at long times.

" 160. The fines of the high-commiſſion were in " themſelves unjuſt, and ſeldom or never came " into the King's purſe. Theſe four bills are par- " ticularly and more ſpecially inſtanced.

" 161. In the reſt, there will not be found ſo " much as a ſhadow of prejudice to the crown.

" 162. They have ſought to diminiſh our repu- " tation with the people, and to bring them out " of love with parliaments.

" 163. The aſperſions which they have attempt- " ed this way have been ſuch as theſe;

" 164. That we have expended much time and " done little, eſpecially in thoſe grievances which " concern religion.

" 165. That the parliament is a burden to the " kingdom, by the abundance of protections which " hinder juſtice and trade (28), and by many ſub- " ſidies granted, much more heavy than any for- " merly indured.

Rem. (28) Every member of parliament has a right to grant protections to his ſervants and dependants, ſo that they cannot be proſecuted in any courts. It is certain, this right was abuſed by many members, in granting protections to perſons without any lawful foundation, nay, ſome even ſold them.

" 166. To which there is a ready anſwer; if " the time expended in this parliament be conſider- " ed in relation backward; to the long growth " and deep root of thoſe grievances which we have " removed; to the powerful ſupports of thoſe de- " linquents whom we have purſued; to the great " neceſſities and other charges of the common- " wealth, for which we have provided.

" 167. Or if it be conſidered in relation for- " ward; to many advantages, which not only the " preſent but future ages are like to reap by the " good laws, and other proceedings in this parlia- " ment, we doubt not but it will be thought, by " all indifferent judgments, that our time hath been " much better imployed, than in a far greater pro- " portion of time in many former parliaments put " together, and the charges which have been laid " upon the ſubjects, and the other inconveniencies " which they have borne, will ſeem very light, in " reſpect of the benefit they have and may receive.

" 168. And for the matter of protection, the " parliament is ſo ſenſible of it, that therein they " intended to give them whatſoever eaſe may ſtand " with honor and juſtice, and are in a way of " paſſing a bill to give them ſatisfaction.

" 169. They have ſought, by many ſubtil prac- " tiſes, to cauſe jealouſies and diviſions betwixt us " and our brethren of Scotland, by ſlandering " their proceedings and intentions toward us, and " by ſecret indeavors to inſtigate and inſenſe them " and us one againſt another.

" 170. They have had ſuch a party of biſhops, " and Popiſh lords, in the houſe of peers, as hath " cauſed much oppoſition and delay in the proſecu- " tion of delinquents, hindered the proceedings of " diverſe good bills paſſed in the commons houſe, " concerning the reformation of ſundry great abuſes " and corruptions, both in church and ſtate.

" 171. They have labored to ſeduce and corrupt " ſome of the commons houſe, to draw them into " conſpiracies and combinations againſt the liberty " of the parliament.

" 172. And, by their inſtruments and agents, " they have attempted to diſaffect and diſcontent " his Majeſty's army; and to ingage it for the " maintenance of their wicked and traitorous de- " ſigns; the keeping up of biſhops in votes and " functions, and by force to compel the parliament " to order, limit and diſpoſe their proceedings, in " ſuch manner as might beſt concur with the inten- " tions of this dangerous and potent faction.

" 173. And when one miſchievous deſign and " attempt of theirs, to bring on the army againſt " the parliament and city of London, had been " diſcovered and prevented;

" 174. They preſently undertook another of the " ſame damnable nature, with this addition, to in- " deavor to make the Scotiſh army neutral, while " the Engliſh army, which they had labored to " corrupt and invenom againſt us by their falſe and " ſlanderous ſuggeſtions, ſhould execute their ma- " lice, to the ſubverſion of our religion, and the " diſſolution of our government.

" 175. Thus they have been continually prac- " tiſing to diſturb the peace, and ploting the de- " ſtruction even of all the King's dominions; and " have imployed their emiſſaries and agents in " them, all for the promoting their deviliſh de- " ſigns, which the vigilancy of thoſe who were well " affected hath ſtill diſcovered and defeated, before " they were ripe for execution in England and " Scotland.

" 176. Only

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" 176. Only in Ireland, which is farther off, " they have had time and opportunity to mould " and prepare their work, and had brought it to " ſuch perfection, that they had poſſeſſed them- " ſelves of that whole kingdom; totally ſubverted " the government of it; rooted out religion, and " deſtroyed all the Proteſtants, whom the conſci- " ence of their duty to God, their King and coun- " try would not have permitted to join with them, " if by God's wonderful providence their main en- " terpriſe upon the city and caſtle of Dublin had " not been detected and prevented, upon the very " eve before it ſhould have been executed.

" 177. Notwithſtanding they have, in other " parts of that kingdom, broken out into open " rebellion, ſurpriſing towns and caſtles, commit- " ed murders, rapes and other villanies, and " ſhaken off all bounds of obedience to his Majeſty, " and the laws of the realm. (29)

REM. (29) The commons, in theſe two laſt articles, conſider the malignant party of England as the principal authors of the Iriſh rebellion, and artfully confound whatever had been done in England for fifteen years, and the maſſacre of Ireland in 1641, under the ſame idea, as proceeding from the ſame ſourſe, which was never well proved.

" 178. And in general have kindled ſuch a fire, " as nothing but God's infinite bleſſing upon the " wiſdom and indeavors of this ſtate will be able to " quench.

" 179. And certainly had not God, in his great " mercy unto this land, diſcovered and confounded " their former deſigns, we had been the prologue " to this tragedy in Ireland, and had by this been " made the lamentable ſpectacle of miſery and con- " fuſion.

" 180. And now what hope have we but in God, " when the only means of our ſubſiſtence and power " of reformation is, under him, in the parliament?

" 181. But what can we the commons, without " the conjunction of the houſe of lords; and what " conjunction can we expect there, when the bi- " ſhops and recuſant lords are ſo numerous, and " prevalent, that they are able to croſs and inter- " rupt our beſt indeavors for reformation, and by " that means give advantage to this malignant " party to traduce our proceedings?

" 182. They infuſe into the people, that we " mean to aboliſh all church-government, and leave " every man to his own fancy, for the ſervice and " worſhip of God, abſolving him of that obe- " dience which he owes under God to his Ma- " jeſty; whom we know to be intruſted with the " eccleſiaſtical law, as well as with the temporal, " to regulate all the members of the church of Eng- " land, 'by ſuch rule of order and diſcipline, as " are eſtabliſhed by parliament; which is his " great council, in all affars, both in church and " ſtate.' (30)

REM. (30) It is true, the commons declare here, that their intention is not to ſet up independency in matter of religion: but as to what concerns the government of the church they ſpeak obſcurely, becauſe it was not yet time to declare themſelves more openly. They are contented with aſſerting, that the King ought to take the parliament's advice in the church's concerns; a maxim they deſigned to make great uſe of.

" 183. We confeſs our intention is, and our in- " deavors have been, to reduce within bounds that " exorbitant power, which the prelates have aſſum- " ed unto themſelves, ſo contrary both to the word " of God, and to the laws of the land; to which " end we paſſed the bill for the removing them " from their temporal power and imployments; " that ſo the better they might with meekneſs ap- " ply themſelves to the diſcharge of their functions; " which bill themſelves oppoſe, and were the prin- " cipal inſtruments of croſſing it.

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" 184. And we do here declare, that it is far " from our purpoſe or deſire, to let looſe the golden " reins of diſcipline and government in the church, " to leave private perſons, or particular congrega- " tions, to take up what form of divine ſervice they " pleaſe; for we hold it requiſite, that there ſhould " be throughout the whole realm a conformity to " that order which the laws injoin, according to the " word of God. (31) And we deſire to unburden " the conſciences of men of needleſs and ſuperſti- " tious ceremonies, ſuppreſs innovations, and take " away the monuments of idolatry.

REM. (31) Great uſe was afterwards made of this reſtriction, 'according to the word of God,' to introduce greater alterations than thoſe mentioned in this article.

" 185. And the better to effect the intended re- " formation, we deſire there may be a general " ſynod of the moſt grave, pious, learned and ju- " dicious divines of this iſland, aſſiſted with ſome " from foreign parts, profeſſing the ſame religion " with us; who may conſider of all things neceſſa- " ry for the peace and good government of the " church, and repreſent the reſults of their conſul- " tations unto the parliament, to be there allowed " of and confirmed, and receive the ſtamp of au- " thority, thereby to find paſſage and obedience " throughout the kingdom. (32)

REM. (32) The commons diſcover here more clearly their intentions, in that, 1. It does not appear that they would admit biſhops into this ſynod. 2. In that they would have it to conſiſt of divines of the iſland, and conſequently of Scots, who were all Preſbyterians, and of ſome foreigners who were ſo likewiſe.

" 186. They have maliciouſly charged us, that " we intend to deſtroy and diſcourage learning; " whereas it is our chiefeſt care and deſire to ad- " vance it, and to provide a competent main- " tenance for conſcionable and preaching miniſters " throughout the kingdom, which will be a great " incouragement to ſcholars, and a certain means " whereby the want, meanneſs and ignorance, to " which a great part of the clergy is now ſubject, " will be prevented.

" 187. And we intend likewiſe to reform and " purge the fountains of learning, the two univer- " ſities, that the ſtreams flowing from thence may " be clear and pure, a comfort and honor to the " whole land. (33)

REM. (33) It is certain, at the time this remonſtrance was publiſhed, the reſolution of aboliſhing the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy was already taken, tho' it was not yet openly declared. Accordingly, the deſign to purge both univerſities was executed, by turning out the heads and profeſſors of the church of England, and puting in Preſbyterians.

" 188. They have ſtrained to blaſt our proceed- " ings in parliament, by wreſting the interpreta- " tions of our orders from their genuine intention.

" 189. They tell the people, that our medling " with the power of epiſcopacy hath cauſed ſecta- " ries and conventicles, when idolatry and Popiſh " ceremonies, introduced into the church by com- " mand of the biſhops, have not only debared the " people from thence, but expeled them from the " kingdom.

" 190. Thus, with Eliab, we are called by this " malignant party, 'troublers of the ſtate,' and " ſtill while we indeavor to reform their abuſes, " they make us the authors of thoſe miſchiefs we " ſtudy to prevent.

" 191. For perfecting the work begun, and re- " moving all future impediments, we conceive " theſe courſes will be very effectual, ſeeing the

CHARLES I An' 1641.

" religion of the Papiſts hath ſuch principles as do " certainly tend to the deſtruction and extirpation " of all Proteſtants, when they ſhall have oppor- " tunity to effect it.

" 192. It is neceſſary, in the firſt place, to keep " them in ſuch condition, as that they may not be " able to do us any hurt, and for avoiding ſuch " connivance and favor as hath heretofore been " ſhewed unto them:

" 193. That his Majeſty be pleaſed to grant a " ſtanding commiſſion to ſome choice men, named " in parliament, who may take notice of their in- " creaſe, their counſels and proceedings, and uſe all " due means, by execution of the laws, to prevent " all miſchievous deſigns againſt the peace and ſafety " of this kingdom.

" 194. That ſome good courſe be taken to diſ- " cover the counterfeit and falſe conformity of " Papiſts to the church, by color whereof perſons, " very much diſaffected to the true religion, have " been admited into places of greateſt truſt and au- " thority in the kingdom.

" 195. For the better preſervation of the laws " and liberties of the kingdom, that all the illegal " grievances and exactions be preſented and puniſhed " at the ſeſſions and aſſizes.

" 196. And that judges and juſtices be very " careful to give this in charge to the grand juries, " and both the ſheriff and juſtices to be ſworn to " the due execution of the petition of right, and " other laws.

" 197. That his Majeſty be humbly petitioned, " by both houſes, to imploy ſuch counſellors, em- " baſſadors and other miniſters, in managing his " buſineſs at home and abroad, as the parliament " may have cauſe to confide in, without which we " cannot give his Majeſty ſuch ſupplies for ſupport " of his own eſtate, nor ſuch aſſiſtance to the Pro- " teſtant party beyond the ſea, as is deſired.

" 198. It may often fall out, that the commons " may have juſt cauſe to take exceptions at ſome " men for being counſellors, and yet not charge " thoſe men with crimes; for there be grounds of " diffidence which lie not in proof.

" 199. There are others which, tho' they may " be proved, yet are not legally criminal.

" 200. To be a known favorer of Papiſts, or to " have been very forward in defending or coun- " tenancing ſome offenders queſtioned in parlia- " ment; or to ſpeak contemptuouſly of either par- " liaments, or parliamentary proceedings: (34)

REM. (34) It is not unlikely the commons here had in view lord Digby, the earl of Briſtol's ſon.

" 201. Or ſuch as are factors or agents for any " foreign Prince of another religion; ſuch as are " juſtly ſuſpected to get counſellors places, or any " other of truſt concerning public imployment for " money; for all theſe, and diverſe others, we may " have great reaſon to be earneſt with his Majeſty " not to put his great affairs into ſuch hands, tho' " we may be unwilling to proceed againſt them in " any legal way of charge or impeachment.

" 202. That all counſellors of ſtate may be ſworn " to obſerve thoſe laws which concern the ſubject " in his liberty; that they may likewiſe take an " oath not to receive, or give reward or penſion " from any foreign Prince, but ſuch as they ſhall, " within ſome reaſonable time, diſcover to the lords " of his Majeſty's council.

" 203. And altho' they ſhould wickedly for- " ſwear themſelves, yet it may herein do good to " make them known to be falſe and perjured to " thoſe who imployed them, and thereby bring " them into as little credit with them as with us.

" 204. That his Majeſty may have cauſe to be " in love with good counſel and good men, by " ſhewing him, in humble and dutiful manner, " how full of advantage it would be to himſelf to " ſee his own eſtate ſettled in a plentiful condition to " ſupport his honor; to ſee his people united in " ways of duty to him, and indeavors of the public " good; to ſee happineſs, wealth, peace and ſafety " derived to his own kingdom, and procured to " his allies, by the influence of his own power and " government."

CHARLES I An' 1641.

It is eaſy to perceive, after reading this remon- ſtrance or declaration, that it was a real manifeſto againſt the King, under name of counſellors, miniſters and malignants: and therefore, before we proceed, it is reaſonable to lay before my reader King Charles's anſwer to the petition which accom- panied this remonſtrance, and then to the remon- ſtrance itſelf.

His Majeſty's anſwer to the petition, which accompanied the declaration preſented him, at Hampton-court, December 1, 1641.

" WE having received from you, ſoon after " our return out of Scotland, a long peti- " tion, conſiſting of many deſires of great moment, " together with a declaration of a very unuſal na- " ture annexed thereunto, we had taken ſome time " to conſider of it, as befited us in a matter of that " conſequence, being confident that your own " reaſon and regard to us, as well as our expreſs " intimation, by our controller, to that purpoſe, " would have reſtrained you from publiſhing it, " 'till ſuch time as you ſhould have received our " anſwer to it; but, much againſt our expecta- " tion, finding the contrary, that the ſaid declara- " tion is already abroad in print, by directions from " your houſe, as appears by the printed copy, we " muſt let you know, that we are very ſenſible of " the diſreſpect. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 452. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 744.

" Notwithſtanding it is our intention, that no " failing on your part ſhall make us fail in ours, " of giving all due ſatisfaction to the deſires of " our people in a parliamentary way; and there- " fore we ſend you this anſwer to your petition, " reſerving ourſelf in point of the declaration, " which we think unparliamentary, and ſhall take " a courſe to do that which we ſhall think fit in " prudence and honor.

" To the petition we ſay, that altho' there are " diverſe things in the preamble of it, which we " are ſo far from admiting, that we profeſs we " cannot at all underſtand them, as of a 'wicked " and malignant party prevalent in the government; " of ſome of that party admited to our privy- " council, and to other imployments of truſt, and " neareſt to us and our children; of indeavors to " ſow among the people falſe ſcandals and im- " putations, to blemiſh and diſgrace the proceed- " ings of the parliament:' all, or any of which, " did we know of, we ſhould be as ready to remedy " and puniſh, as you to complain of; ſo that the " prayers of your petition are grounded upon ſuch " premiſes as we muſt in no wiſe admit; yet not- " withſtanding, we are pleaſed to give this anſwer " to you. (1)

REM. (1) This ſo general a reply from his Majeſty was not capable of combating the particular facts, whereby the commons pretended to prove, in the remonſtrance, that for ſeveral years paſſed, the court or malignant party had indeavored to eſtabliſh arbi- trary government.

" To the firſt, concerning religion, conſiſting " of ſeveral branches, we ſay that, for preſerving " the peace and ſafety of this kingdom from the " deſigns of the Popiſh party, we have, and will " ſtill concur with all the juſt deſires of our people " in a parliamentary way: (2) that for de- " priving the biſhops of their votes in par- " liament,

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" liament, we would have you conſider, that their " right is grounded upon the fundamental law of this " kingdom, and conſtitution of parliament. This " we would have you conſider; but ſince you de- " ſire our concurrence herein in a parliamentary " way, we will give no farther anſwer at this " time.

REM. (2) It is true, King Charles had never rejected the petitions preſented him on this occaſion by the parliament, but had always granted whatever was deſired: but then it is no leſs true, that his promiſes in this reſpect had never been executed. Wherefore the parliament did not complain of want of concurrence, but want of performance. So the King's anſwer, as to his concurrence, was not properly to the purpoſe.

" As for the abridging of the inordinate power " of the clergy, we conceive that the taking away " of the high-commiſſion court hath well mode- " rated that; but if there continue any uſurpations " or exceſſes in their juriſdictions, we therein nei- " ther have nor will protect them. (3)

REM. (3) It would have been very difficult to agree with this Prince upon what ſhould be conſidered as uſurpations or exceſſes in the clergy's juriſdiction. So Charles properly bound himſelf to nothing by this general promiſe.

" Unto that clauſe which concerneth corruptions " (as you ſtile them) in religion, in church-go- " vernment, and in diſcipline, and the removing " of ſuch neceſſary ceremonies as weak conſciences " might check: that for any illegal innovations " which may have creeped in, we ſhall willingly " concur in the removal of them: that if our par- " liament ſhall adviſe us to call a national ſynod, " which may duly examine ſuch ceremonies as give " juſt cauſe of offenſe to any, we ſhall take into " conſideration, and apply ourſelf to give due ſatiſ- " faction therein; (4) but we are very ſorry to hear, " in ſuch general terms, corruption in religion ob- " jected, ſince we are perſuaded, in our conſcience, " that no church can be found upon the earth which " profeſſeth the true religion with more purity of " doctrine than the church of England doth, nor " where the government and diſcipline are jointly " more beautiful, and free from ſuperſtition, than " as they are here eſtabliſhed by law; which by " the grace of God we will with conſtancy main- " tain (while we live) in their purity and glory, not " only againſt all invaſions of Popery, but alſo " from the irreverence of thoſe many Schiſmatics " and Separatiſts wherewith, of late, this kingdom " and this city abound, to the great diſhonor and " hazard both of church and ſtate, for the ſuppreſ- " ſion of whom we require your timely aid and " active aſſiſtance.

REM. (4) Another general anſwer which ſignifies nothing.

" To the ſecond prayer of the petition, con- " cerning the removal and choice of counſellors, " we know not any of our council to whom the " character ſet forth in the petition can belong. " That by thoſe whom we had expoſed to trial, " we have already given you ſufficient teſtimony, " that there is no man ſo near unto us, in place or " affection, whom we will not leave to the juſtice " of the law, if you ſhall bring a particular charge " and ſufficient proofs againſt him; and of this we " do again aſſure you: but, in the mean time, we " wiſh you to forbear ſuch general aſperſions as " may reflect upon all our council, ſince you name " none in particular.

" That for the choice of our counſellors and mi- " niſters of ſtate, it were to debar us that natural " liberty all freemen have; and as it is the un- " doubted right of the crown of England to call " ſuch perſons to our ſecret councils, to public em- " ployment, and our particular ſervice, as we ſhall " think fit; ſo we are, and ever ſhall be very " careful to make election of ſuch perſons, in thoſe " places of truſt, as ſhall have given good teſtimo- " nies of their abilities and integrity, and againſt " whom there can be no juſt cauſe of exception, " whereon reaſonably to ground a diffidence; and " to choices of this nature we aſſure you, that the " mediation of the neareſt unto us hath always " concurred. (5)

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

REM. (5) Meaning his Queen.

" To the third prayer of your petition, con- " cerning Ireland, we underſtand your deſire, of not " alienating the forfeited lands thereof, to proceed " from much care and love, and likewiſe that it " may be a reſolution very fit for us to take; but " whether it be ſeaſonable to declare reſolutions of " that nature, before the events of a war be ſeen, " that we much doubt of. Howſoever, we cannot " but thank you for this care, and your chearful " ingagement for the ſuppreſſion of that rebellion; " upon the ſpeedy effecting whereof, the glory of " God in the Proteſtant profeſſion, the ſafety of the " Britiſh there, our honor, and that of the nation " ſo much depend; all the intereſts of this king- " dom being ſo involved in that buſineſs, we can- " not but quicken your affections therein, and ſhall " deſire you to frame your counſels to give ſuch " expedition to the work, as the nature thereof, " and the preſſures in point of time require; and " whereof you are put in mind by the daily inſo- " lence and increaſe of thoſe rebels.

" For concluſion; your promiſe to apply your- " ſelves to ſuch courſes as may ſupport our royal " eſtate with honor and plenty at home, and with " power and reputation abroad, is that which we " have ever promiſed ourſelf, both from your loy- " alties and affections, and alſo for what we have " already done, and ſhall daily go adding unto, for " the comfort and happineſs of our people."

His Majeſty's anſwer to the remonſtrance appeared not 'till ſome time after; for, as far as I can conjecture, it was not ſent to the commons before January, 1641-2. I ſhall however inſert it in this place, as well not to divide this matter, as that the anſwer may be peruſed before the remonſtrance is out of memory.

The King's declaration, in anſwer to the remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom.

" ALtho' we do not believe that our houſe of " commons intended, by their remonſtrance " of the ſtate of the kingdom, to put us to any " apology, either for our paſſed or preſent actions: " notwithſtanding, ſince they have thought it ſo " very neceſſary (upon their obſervation of the pre- " ſent diſtempers) to publiſh the ſame, we, for the " ſatisfaction of all our loving ſubjects, have thought " it very ſuitable to the duty of our place (with " which God hath truſted us) to do our part to ſo " good a work, in which we ſhall not think it " below our kingly dignity to deſcend to any par- " ticular which may compoſe and ſettle the affec- " tions of our meaneſt ſubjects, ſince we are ſo con- " ſcious to ourſelf of ſuch upright intentions and " indeavors, and only of ſuch (for which we give " God thanks) for the peace and happineſs of our " kingdom, in which the proſperity of our ſubjects " muſt be included, that we wiſh from our heart " that even our moſt ſecret thoughts were publiſh- " ed to their view and examination: tho' we muſt " confeſs, we cannot but be very ſorry, in this " conjuncture of time (when the unhappineſs of this " kingdom is ſo generally underſtood abroad) there " ſhould be ſuch a neceſſity of publiſhing ſo many " particulars, from which we pray no inconvenien- " cies may inſue which were not intended.

" We

Charles I An' 1641.

" We ſhall in few words paſs over that part of " the narrative, wherein the misfortunes of this " kingdom, from our firſt entering to the crown " to the begining of this parliament, are remembered " in ſo ſenſible expreſſions. (1) And that other " which acknowledgeth the many good laws paſſed, " by our grace and favor, this parliament, for the " ſecurity of our people; of which we ſhall only " ſay thus much, that as we have not refuſed to " paſs any bill preſented to us by our parliament, " for redreſs of thoſe grievances mentioned in " the remonſtrance, ſo we have not had a greater " motive for the paſſing thoſe laws than our own " reſolution (grounded upon our obſervation, and " underſtanding the ſtate of the kingdom) to have " freed our ſubjects, for the future, from thoſe " preſſures which were grievous to them, if thoſe " laws had not been propounded, (2) which there- " fore we ſhall as inviolably maintain, as we look " to have our own rights preſerved; not doubting " but that all our loving ſubjects will look on thoſe " remedies with that full gratitude and affection, " that even the memory of what they have for- " merly undergone, by the accidents and neceſſities " of thoſe times, will not be unpleaſant to them: " and poſſibly, in a pious ſenſe of God's bleſſing " upon this nation (how little ſhare ſoever we ſhall " have of the acknowledgment) they will confeſs " they have injoyed a great meaſure of happineſs " (even theſe laſt ſixteen years) both in peace and " plenty, not only comparatively in reſpect of their " neighbors, but even of thoſe times which were " juſtly accounted fortunate. The fears and jealou- " ſies which may make ſome impreſſion in the " minds of our people, we will ſuppoſe may be " of two ſorts; either for religion, or liberty and " their civil intereſt. The fears for religion may " haply be, not only as ours here eſtabliſhed may " be invaded by the Romiſh party, but as it is ac- " companied with ſome ceremonies, at which ſome " tender conſciences really are, or pretend to be " ſcandaliſed; for of any other which have been " uſed, without any legal warrant or injunction, " and already are or ſpeedily may be aboliſhed, " we ſhall not ſpeak.

Remark (1). His Majeſty could not more ingenuouſly own what is ſaid in the remonſtrance, concerning the firſt fifteen years of his reign, than by intirely paſſing it over without anſwer.

Rem. (2) This is alſo a confeſſion that grievances were juſtly complained of. Charles ſays, his reſolution was to redreſs them, and it was not poſſible to convict him of the contrary: but after all, he was believed but by few perſons.

" Concerning religion, as there may be any ſuſ- " picion of favor or inclination to the Papiſts, we " are willing to declare to all the world, that as " we have been from our childhood brought up in, " and practiſed the religion now eſtabliſhed in this " kingdom, ſo it is well known, we have (not con- " tented ſimply with the principles of our educa- " tion) given a good proportion of our time and " pains to the examination of the grounds of this " religion, as it is different from that of Rome, " and are from our ſoul ſo fully ſatisfied and aſſured, " that it is the moſt pure and agreeable to the ſacred " word of God, of any religion now practiſed in " the Chriſtian world, that as we believe we can " maintain the ſame by unanſwerable reaſons, ſo " we hope we ſhould readily ſeal to it by the effu- " ſion of our blood, if it pleaſed God to call us " to that ſacrifice. And therefore nothing can be " ſo acceptable unto us, as any propoſition which " may contribute to the advancement of it here, or " the propagation of it abroad, being the only " means to draw down a bleſſing from God upon " our ſelves and this nation. And we have been " extremely unfortunate, if this profeſſion of ours " be wanting to our people: our conſtant practiſe " in our own perſon having always been (without " oſtentation) as much to the evidence of our care " and duty herein, as we could poſſibly tell how " to expreſs. (3)

Charles I An' 1641.

Rem. (3) The remonſtrance did not accuſe King Charles of being a Papiſt in his heart, but of having countenanced Papiſts, by not executing the laws againſt them. He clears himſelf here from being inclined to the Romiſh creed, and leaves the conſequence to be drawn, that ſince he is perſuaded of the truth of the Proteſtant religion, it is not poſſible he ſhould incourage the Roman. But his conduct had ſhewn that this conſequence did not neceſſarily follow, ſince it was notorious, he had countenanced Catholics from the very begining of his reign, whether thro' complaiſance to the Queen, or with ſome political views.

" For differences among ourſelves, for matters " indifferent in their own nature, concerning reli- " gion, we ſhall, in tenderneſs to any number of " our loving ſubjects, very willingly comply with " the advice of our parliament, that ſome law " may be made for the exemption of tender con- " ſciences from puniſhment, or proſecution for ſuch " ceremonies, and in ſuch caſes, which by the judg- " ment of moſt men are held to be matters indif- " ferent, and of ſome to be abſolutely unlawful. " Provided that this eaſe be attempted and pur- " ſued with that modeſty, temper and ſubmiſſion " that, in the mean time, the peace and quiet of " the kingdom be not diſturbed, the decency and " comelineſs of God's ſervice diſcountenanced, nor " the pious, ſober and devout actions of thoſe re- " verend perſons who were the firſt laborers in the " bleſſed reformation, or of that time, be ſcan- " daled and defamed (4): for we cannot, without " grief of heart, and without ſome tax upon our " ſelf, and our miniſters, for the non-execution of " our laws, look upon the bold licenſe of ſome " men, in printing pamphlets, in preaching and " printing ſermons, ſo full of bitterneſs and " malice againſt the preſent government, againſt " the laws eſtabliſhed; ſo full of ſedition againſt " ourſelf, and the peace of the kingdom, that we " are many times amazed to conſider by what eyes " theſe things are ſeen, and by what ears they are " heard. And therefore we have good cauſe to " command, as we have done, and hereby do, all our " judges and miniſters of juſtice, our attorney and ſol- " licitor-general, and the reſt of our learned council, " to proceed with all ſpeed againſt ſuch, and their " abetors, who either by writing or words, have " ſo boldly and maliciouſly violated the laws, di- " ſturbed the peace of the commonwealth, and as " much as in them lies, ſhaken the very founda- " tion upon which that peace and happineſs is " founded and conſtituted. And we doubt not but " all our loving ſubjects will be very ſenſible, that " this buſy, virulent demeanor is a fit prologue to " nothing but confuſion; and if not very ſeaſonably " puniſhed and prevented, will not only be a " blemiſh to that wholſome accommodation we in- " tend, but an unſpeakable ſcandal and imputa- " tion, even upon the profeſſion and religion of " this our kingdom of England.

Rem. (4) King Charles was not in the wrong to ſupport the eſtabliſhed worſhip, and to regard as an indulgence whatever ſhould be granted to tender conſciences. But after all, this indulgence was reduced to a very ſmall compaſs, if we conſider all the limitations contained in this article.

" Concerning the civil liberties and intereſts of " our ſubjects, we ſhall need to ſay the leſs, having " erected ſo many laſting monuments of our princely " and fatherly care of our people, in thoſe many

" excellent

Charles I An' 1641.

" excellent laws, paſſed by us this parliament, " which in truth (with very much content to our- " ſelf) we conceive to be ſo large and ample, that " very many ſober men have very little left to wiſh " for.

" We underſtood well the right, and pretenſes " of right we departed from in conſenting to the " bills of the triennial parliament, for the conti- " nuance of this preſent parliament, and in the pre- " amble to the bill of tonage and poundage: the " matter of which, having begot ſo many diſturb- " ances in late parliaments, we were willing to re- " move, that no intereſt of ours might hereafter " break that correſpondence; abundantly content- " ing ourſelf with an aſſurance (which we ſtill have) " that we ſhould be repaired and ſupplied by a juſt " proportion of confidence, bounty and obedience " of our people. In the bills for taking away the " high-commiſſion and ſtar-chamber courts, we be- " lieve we had given that real ſatisfaction, that all " jealouſies and apprehenſions of arbitrary preſ- " ſures, under the civil or eccleſiaſtical ſtate, " would eaſily have been abandoned, eſpecially " when they ſaw all poſſible doubts ſecured by the " viſitation of a triennial parliament.

" Theſe, and others of no mean conſideration, " we had rather ſhould be valued in the hearts and " affections of our people, than in any mention of " our own; not doubting but, as we have taken all " theſe occaſions to render their condition moſt " comfortable and happy, ſo they will always, in " a grateful and dutiful relation, be ready with " equal tenderneſs and alacrity to advance our " rights, and preſerve our honor, upon which their " own ſecurity and ſubſiſtence ſo much depend: " and we will be ſo careful, that no particular " ſhall be preſented unto us, for the compleating " and eſtabliſhing that ſecurity, to which we will " not with the ſame readineſs contribute our beſt " aſſiſtance.

" If theſe reſolutions be the effects of our preſent " counſels (and we take God to witneſs that they " are ſuch, and that all our loving ſubjects may " confidently expect the benefit of them from us) " certainly no ill deſign upon the public can ac- " company ſuch reſolution, neither will there be " greater cauſe of ſuſpicion of any perſons prefered " by us to degrees of honor, and places of truſt " and imployment, ſince this parliament. And " we muſt confeſs that, among our misfortunes, " we reckon it not the leaſt, that having not re- " tained in our ſervice, nor protected any one " perſon, againſt whom our parliament hath ex- " cepted during the whole ſiting of it, and having " in all that time ſcarce vouchſafed to any man one " inſtance of our grace and favor, but to ſuch " who were under ſome eminent character of eſti- " mation among our people, there ſhould ſo ſoon " be any miſunderſtanding or jealouſy of their " fidelity and uprightneſs, eſpecially in a time " when we take all occaſions to declare, that we " conceive ourſelf only capable of being ſerved by " honeſt men, and in honeſt ways. However, if " in truth we have been miſtaken in ſuch our " election, the particular ſhall be no ſooner diſ- " covered to us, either by our own obſervation, " or other certain information, than we will leave " them to public juſtice, under the marks of our " diſpleaſure.

" If, notwithſtanding this, any malignant party " ſhall take heart, and be willing to ſacrifice the " peace and happineſs of their country to their " own ſiniſter ends and ambitions, under what " pretenſe of religion and conſcience ſoever; if " they ſhall indeavor to leſſen our reputation and " intereſt, and to weaken our lawful power and " authority with our good ſubjects; if they ſhall " go about, by diſcountenancing the preſent laws, " to looſen the bands of government, that all diſ- " order and confuſion may break in upon us, we " doubt not but God, in his good time, will diſ- " cover them unto us, and the wiſdom and courage " of our high court of parliament join with us in " their ſuppreſſion and puniſhment.

Charles I An' 1641.

" Having now ſaid all we can to expreſs the " clearneſs and uprightneſs of our intentions to our " people, and done all we can to manifeſt thoſe " intentions, we cannot but confidently believe, " all our good ſubjects will acknowledge our part " to be fully performed, both in deeds paſſed and " preſent reſolutions, to do whatſoever with juſtice " may be required of us, and that their quiet and " proſperity depend now wholly upon themſelves, " and is in their own power, by yielding all obe- " dience and due reverence to the law, which is " the inheritance of every ſubject, and the only " ſecurity he can have for his life, liberty, or eſtate, " and the which being neglected or diſeſteemed " (under what ſpecious ſhews ſoever) a very great " meaſure of infelicity, if not irreparable confuſion, " muſt without doubt fall upon them: and we " doubt not, it will be the moſt acceptable decla- " ration a King can make to his ſubjects that, for " our part, we are reſolved not only duly to ob- " ſerve the laws ourſelf, but to maintain them " againſt what oppoſition ſoever, tho' with the " hazard of our being. (5)

Rem. (5) Unhappily for King Charles, theſe general promiſes, to which he could give what ſenſe he thought proper, produced not upon the commons the effect he expected, or rather they produced the quite contrary, and increaſed their diffidence. This the reader will be convinced of, when he comes to ſee what had paſſed, ſeemingly before this declaration was publiſhed.

" And our hope is, that not only the loyalty " and good affections of all our loving ſubjects, " will concur with us in the conſtant preſerving a " good underſtanding between us and our people, " but, at this time, their own and our intereſt, " and compaſſion of the lamentable condition of " our poor Proteſtant ſubjects in Ireland, will in- " vite them to a fair intelligence and unity among " themſelves, that ſo we may, with one heart, " intend the relieving and recovering that unhappy " kingdom, where thoſe barbarous rebels practiſe " ſuch inhuman and unheard-of outrages upon our " miſerable people, that no Chriſtian ear can hear " without horror, nor ſtory parallel. And as we " look upon this as the greateſt affliction it hath " pleaſed God to lay upon us, ſo our unhappineſs " is increaſed, in that, by the diſtempers at home, " ſo early remedies have not been applied to thoſe " growing evils as the expectation and neceſſity " there requires, tho' for our part, as we did upon " the firſt notice acquaint our parliament of Scot- " land (where we then were) with that rebellion, " requiring their aid and aſſiſtance, and gave like " ſpeedy intimation and recommendation to our " parliament here; ſo ſince our return hither, we " have been forward to all things which have been " propoſed to us towards that work, and have " lately ourſelf offered (by a meſſage to our houſe " of peers, and communicated to our houſe of " commons) to take upon us the care to raiſe " ſpeedily ten thouſand Engliſh volunteers for that " ſervice, if the houſe of commons ſhall declare, " that they will pay them (6); which particulars " we are (in a manner) neceſſitated to publiſh, " ſince we are informed, that the malice of ſome " perſons have whiſpered it abroad, that no ſpeedier " advancing of the buſineſs hath proceeded from " ſome want of alacrity in us to this great work; " whereas we acknowledge it a high crime againſt " Almighty

Charles I An' 1641.

" Almighty God, and inexcuſable to our good " ſubjects of our three kingdoms, if we did not to " the utmoſt imploy all our powers and faculties " to the ſpeedieſt and moſt effectual aſſiſtance and " protection of that diſtreſſed people.

Rem. (6) It appears by the above paſſage, that this anſwer was not publiſhed 'till after his Majeſty's offer of levying ten thouſand men for Ireland, viz. in January 1641-2.

" And we ſhall now conjure all our good ſub- " jects (of what degree ſoever) by all the bonds of " love, duty or obedience, which are precious to " good men, to join with us for the recovery of " the peace of that kingdom, and the preſervation " of the peace of this, to remove all thoſe doubts " and fears which may interrupt their affection to " us, and all their jealouſies and apprehenſions " which may leſſen their charity to each other, " and then (if the ſins of this nation have not pre- " pared an inevitable judgment for us all) God will " yet make us a great and glorious King, over a " free and happy people."

The bare peruſing this declaration ſufficiently evidences that Charles had no intention to give a particular anſwer to this remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom, which contained ſo many different articles untouched by this Prince's declaration: and, poſſibly, he would never have made any reply to it, had not his enemies triumphed on his ſilence. He thought proper therefore to publiſh this declaration, that he might ſay he had anſwered the remonſtrance, and not with deſign to anſwer it in reality; and beſide, he publiſhed it not 'till long after the remonſtrance was received. Mean while, the commons publiſhing this paper againſt his will, made a deep impreſſion on his mind, and convinced him they had ſome grand deſign, ſince they ſhewed him ſo little regard.

Effect of the remonſtrance.

It was not much to be wondered at that King Charles ſhould be highly diſpleaſed with ſuch a remonſtrance, which was properly no other than a ſeries of reproaches for his paſſed conduct, and againſt his government; with a remonſtrance, not directed to himſelf, but to the public, the authors whereof meaned only to inſenſe the people againſt him, and which was made at a time when it ſeemed leaſt neceſſary. Accordingly, the begining of the rupture between King Charles and his parliament is properly to be dated from this time, tho' ſome meaſures were yet kept on both ſides.

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 433.

On the morrow, December the ſecond, Charles coming to the parliament, the ſpeaker preſented to him the bill for tonage and poundage for ſome months only, wherein his Majeſty expreſly owned, he had 'till then levied theſe duties without a legal power. He made, on this occaſion, a fine ſpeech, full of praiſes for his Majeſty's goodneſs and affection to his people. After which, that Monarch addreſſed both houſes in theſe terms, viz.

My lords and gentlemen,

His Majeſty's ſpeech to both houſes. Dec. 2 Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 708. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. P. 454.

" I Think it fit, after ſo long abſenſe, at this firſt " occaſion to ſpeak a few words unto you: but " it is in no ways in anſwer to mr. ſpeaker's learned " ſpeech.

" Albeit I have ſtayed longer than I expected to " have done, when I went away, yet in this I have " kept my promiſe with you, that I have made " all the haſte back again the ſetling of my " Scotiſh affairs could any ways permit: in which " I have had ſo good ſucceſs, that I will confidently " affirm to you, that I have left that nation a " moſt peaceable and contented people; ſo that " altho' I have a little miſreckoned in time, yet I " was not deceived in my end.

" But if I have deceived your expectations a little " in the time of my return, I am aſſured, that my " expectation is as much and more deceived, in " the condition wherein I hoped to have found ſome " buſineſſes at my return. For that ſince before " my going I ſettled the liberties of my ſubjects, " and gave the laws a free and orderly courſe, I " expected to have found my people reaping the " fruits of theſe benefits, by living in quietneſs and " ſatisfaction of mind: but inſtead of this, I find " them diſturbed with jealouſies, frights and alarms " of dangerous deſigns and plots; in conſequence " of which, guards have been ſet to defend both " houſes. I ſay not this as in doubt that my ſub- " jects affections are any way leſſened unto me, in " this time of my abſenſe, for I cannot but re- " member, to my great comfort, the joyful re- " ception I had now at my entry into London; " but rather, as I hope, that my preſenſe will eaſily " diſperſe theſe fears; for I bring as perfect and " true affections to my people, as ever Prince did, " or as good ſubjects can poſſibly deſire: and I am " ſo far from repenting me of any act I have done " in this ſeſſion for the good of my people, that I " proteſt, if it were to do again, I would do it; " and will yet grant what elſe can be juſtly deſired, " for ſatisfaction in point of liberties, or in main- " tenance of the true religion which is here eſta- " bliſhed.

" Now I have but one particular to recommend " unto you at this time; it is Ireland; for which, " tho' I doubt not your care, yet methinks the " preparations for it go but ſlowly on. The occa- " ſion is the fiter for me now to mention, becauſe " of the arrival of two lords from Scotland, who " come inſtructed from my council there (who now " by act of parliament have full power for that " purpoſe) to anſwer that demand it pleaſed both " houſes to make me by way of petition, which " met me at Berwick, and which the duke of " Richmond ſent back, by my command, to my " Scotiſh council. Therefore my deſire is, that " both houſes would appoint a ſelect commitee to " end this buſineſs with theſe noblemen.

" I muſt conclude in telling you, that I ſeek my " peoples happineſs: for their flouriſhing is my " greateſt glory, and their affections my greateſt " ſtrength."

Charles I An' 1641.

It was not without abundance of reaſon that King Charles reſolved to ſhew a ſingular fervency of zeal for the public welfare, ſince the commons remonſtrance evidently taught him, that indeavors were uſing to make him forfeit his peoples affection. It was therefore neceſſary to countermine the deſigns of his adverſaries, by repeated aſſurances of great love to his ſubjects, and by intimating that he had intirely changed his principles and maxims: but herein he had one great diſadvantage, in that for his future deportment he could give no other ſecurity than his word, which his enemies pretended to demonſtrate was not to be relied on. They chiefly urged that, notwithſtanding his Majeſty had ſolemnly given his aſſent to the petition of right, he had never executed what he promiſed. The conſequence they drew from this non-performance was ſo much the ſtronger, as this Prince had nothing to oppoſe to it but bare promiſes, which were of no more force than thoſe he had made before with regard to that petition.

A commitee to treat about the Scotiſh ſuccors. p. 455. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 711, 729, 732.

As Charles had earneſtly recommended to the parliament's conſideration the affairs of Ireland, both houſes immediately appointed a commitee to treat with the Scots about ſuccors. The commons in particular paſſionately defired to negociate with Scotland. In their preſent belief that his Majeſty aimed at ingaging them to ſend into Ireland a body of forces purely in order to be more at eaſe in England, they could not find a more effectual way to break his meaſures, than to imploy Scotiſh troops in in that kingdom's defenſe. As they had already taken the reſolution, tho' ſecretly, of diveſting Charles of great part of his power, they eaſily foreſaw that a rupture would be the infallible conſequence, and then they ſhould ſtand in need of thoſe troops which this Prince was for having ſent into Ireland.

Great likelihood of a rupture.

On account of the remonſtrance, all things manifeſtly tended to a quarrel between Charles and his parliament, and the commons miſſed no occaſion of infuſing ſuſpicions into the people againſt their Sovereign. To this purpoſe, Daniel O Neal, who was concerned in the plot to ſeduce the army, was voted guilty of a ſecond attempt, in July laſt, to perſuade the chief officers of the army to declare for Charles againſt the parliament. This was done to inſinuate that this Prince had not relinquiſhed his project, of uſing force to awe the parliament.

Vote againſt O Neal. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 714, 754, &c. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 455.

The Iriſh demand a toleration. Ibid.

Contrariwiſe, the revolted Iriſh having preſented, to the lords juſtices of that kingdom, a letter in the nature of a remonſtrance, wherein they demanded "free exerciſe of their religion," and "a repeal "of all laws to the contrary," the commons grew thereupon very clamorous. They knew that lord Coſtelough, with lord Taaff, were on their way to England, with propoſitions to be offered his Majeſty concerning means for procuring the peace of Ireland. So, fearing, or pretending to fear Charles would grant the Iriſh Papiſts liberty of conſcience, they deſired and had a conference with the peers: after which, it was ſolemnly declared by both houſes, That they would never conſent to any toleration of the Popiſh religion in Ireland *. One may readily comprehend how much this contributed towards rendering King Charles ſuſpected.

Vote of both houſes thereupon. p. 455. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 723, 737, 754.

* Nor any other of his Majeſty's dominions.

Admiting (anſwerably to what I have inſinuated) that the commons, or at leaſt the greateſt part of their houſe, aimed at puting it out of King Charles's power to govern thenceforwards as he had governed before this parliament, and that, to prepare the people for this change, it was neceſſary to fill them with fears and ſuſpicions, the motives of all their proceedings, and that Monarch's infelicitous ſituation, will be perfectly underſtood. His ſubjects were prejudiced againſt him, and he had given but too much occaſion. Every ſtep taken by the commons tended to increaſe this prejudice, and Charles, to remove it, could allege only the ſincerity of his intentions, of which many were far from being convinced. This gave his enemies a great advantage, which on all occaſions they failed not to improve; nay, they deſcended even to the ſmaleſt trifles, to cheriſh the peoples jealouſies and apprehenſions: for on information that, among ſome barrels of ſoap, a merchant of London ſent to Dorcheſter, a barrel of Gun-powder was found, the houſe appointed a commitee to make ſtrict inquiſition, as into a matter of the utmoſt importance.

Motives of the commons proceedings.

Meſſage from the King touching certain condemned prieſts. p. 719, 732, 736, 740, 741.

About the ſame time, happened another affair, which gave ſome advantage againſt his Majeſty. The eighth of December, he ſent to acquaint both houſes, that ſix prieſts (1) having been condemned that week, the French embaſſador had requeſted him to change the ſentence of death into that of baniſhment, upon which he deſired to have their advice. Some days after, the commons voted, that thoſe prieſts ſhould be executed, and their lordſhips concurring with this vote, both houſes petitioned Charles to order execution. His Majeſty replied; he would baniſh the prieſts, if both houſes would give their conſent. As they thought not proper to return any anſwer, Charles took occaſion from their ſilence to ſuſpend the execution. Two months after, his Majeſty communicated to them a letter which ſecretary Nicholas had received from Venice, wherein he was aſſured, that the Pope threatened to ſend an army into Ireland, if the prieſts ſuffered death. Upon this menace, both houſes again prayed the King to execute thoſe prieſts: but he granted not their requeſt. His reaſon was, the fear of repriſals, and that this rigor might be highly prejudicial to ſuch of the Engliſh Proteſtants in Ireland, as ſhould fall into the rebels hands. This reaſon was ſo much the weaker, as it ſerved not only for the preſent caſe, but alſo for all which ſhould offer hereafter, and tended to render the laws ineffectual: beſide, the Iriſh having already, without any cauſe, maſſacred above forty thouſand Proteſtant Engliſh, the fear of repriſals from them ſeems a no very valid motive for ſparing the ſaid condemned prieſts; accordingly, it was generally thought to be owing to the Queen's ſollicitations. Be it ſo or otherwiſe, the prieſts were not put to death; for tho' afterwards Charles left it to both houſes, they did not think fit either to pardon or execute. All this was greatly to this Prince's detriment, ſince, at the very time he ſolemnly proteſted a reſolution of executing the laws, he protected theſe legally-convicted prieſts, ſhewing no regard to the inſtances of both houſes.

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

Ib. p. 719.

At this time, I mean in December 1641, two affairs ſucceſſively imployed the houſe of commons, viz. the ſuccors for Ireland and the accuſation laid before their lordſhips againſt the biſhops. I ſhall now touch on the firſt only.

Cauſes of the backwardneſs to aſſiſt Ireland. Clarendon, p. 257.

Both King and parliament equally allowed a neceſſity of relieving Ireland, and all the advices from thence were a demonſtration of that neceſſity. The Iriſh army was at the gates of Dublin, and had cut off a body of men ſent to Drogheda: ſo to all appearance, the lords-juſtices, with their few troops, could not long withſtand the rebels. The Scotiſh commiſſioners, who were at London to treat with the parliament, had offered a ſuccor of five thouſand men, who could eaſily be ſent, from Scotland, into the North of Ireland, to make a diverſion, and the commons had prevailed with them to treat for ten thouſand. The commons intention was to imploy only Scotiſh troops in the reduction of Ireland, that England might not be left unprovided of forces. Charles refuſed not the aſſiſtance of Scotland, but would have England ſend into Ireland the like number of Engliſh forces, on pretenſe, that there was danger of the Scots ſeizing upon Ireland when the Iriſh ſhould be ſubdued. He had found means to gain the peers, ſo that when the motion was made to their lordſhips for ſending into Ireland ten thouſand Scots, they conſented to it, provided a like number of Engliſh were alſo ſent thither.

Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 761.

The Scotiſh commiſſioners complaining, by a memorial, that in a fortnight they had no poſitive anſwer to their offers, the commons preſſed their lordſhips to diſpatch the affair, declaring, if they neglected it, the whole blame would fall upon them. They farther declared that, except the bill for preſſing ſoldiers paſſed, it was impoſſible for England to raiſe troops for this ſervice. Whereupon the lords debated theſe three queſtions, which were all reſolved in the negative.

Votes of the peers concerning Ireland. p. 763.

1. Whether this houſe ſhall conſent to ſend ten thouſand Scots into Ireland, before it can be aſcertained that ten thouſand Engliſh will be ſent thither alſo?

2. Whether this houſe ſhall conſent to ſend ten

ten thouſand Scots before the bill of preſſing be paſſed?

3. Whether this houſe ſhall join with the commons, in ſending now ten thouſand Scots into Ireland?

Sharp anſwers of the commons. p. 771.

The commons in a conference replied to theſe votes, That for aſcertaining their lordſhips deſire of ſending ten thouſand Engliſh into Ireland, the commons were not uſed to be capitulated with: that their actions are free, as well without conditions as capitulations, and deſire it may be ſo no more: that they had already given ſufficient certainty by a vote communicated to their lordſhips, and ſee no neceſſity of voting it again: that they deſire their lordſhips would vote the ſending ten thouſand Scots, without any relation to the ten thouſand Engliſh; and that ſpeedily, the preſervation of Ireland depending upon it: that they have the more reaſon to deſire this, as the Engliſh troops cannot go, unleſs the bill for preſſing paſſes. However, this ſufficed not to make the lords depart from their former reſolutions.

The commons impriſon the two lords ſent from Ireland. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. [413.]

Mean while, the commons, who had already commited to priſon the lords Coſtelough and Taaff (ſent to the King with propoſitions about procuring the peace of Ireland) cauſed all their papers to be examined, in their diſtruſt of the King, and doubtleſs in expectation of finding what might do him a prejudice.

Charles offers to raiſe ten thouſand men. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 757, 762, 768, 769, 771. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 259.

At the ſame time, his Majeſty acquainted the lords, that he would ingage to raiſe ten thouſand men for Ireland, if the commons would promiſe to pay them: but they were far from accepting this propoſition, being ſenſible he himſelf would iſſue the commiſſions, and give them only to ſuch officers as were his devotees; ſo the commons choſe rather to hazard the utter loſs of Ireland, than ſend thither ten thouſand Engliſh, at ſuch a juncture; and the lords choſe rather to run the riſk of ſeeing the Engliſh quite expulſed that iſland, than of ſeeing the Scots in condition to ſeize it. Charles perfectly knew the motive of the commons conduct, while they were not ignorant that the lords acted wholly by his direction.

A commitee to examine the cauſe of delaying the ſuccors. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 466. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 761.

The ſuccors for Ireland being ſtill retarded by theſe diſputes, the commons appointed a commitee to examine whence proceeded the obſtacles occuring in this affair. It was really difficult, for thoſe who were not acquainted with the King's and commons ſecret motives, to know where the blame lay, that Ireland was not relieved, ſince they ſeemed equally deſirous that a ſpeedy aid ſhould be ſent thither. Charles's partiſans urged, that his Majeſty's offer to raiſe ten thouſand men, provided the commons would ingage to pay them, was a clear evidence that the obſtructions did not proceed from him. His adverſaries contrariwiſe affirmed, that the refuſal of their lordſhips, or rather of the King who directed them, to accept the aid of ten thouſand Scots, on a frivolous pretenſe, plainly ſhewed, that the difficulties came not from the houſe of commons, ſince they were very ready to promiſe to pay theſe auxiliaries. For my part, I am of opinion, that both King and commons thought leſs ſeriouſly of aſſiſting Ireland, than of drawing from the Iriſh rebellion private advantages with regard to their reſpective differences. Charles wiſhed the parliament would ſend into Ireland a ſtrong army, that they might find it leſs eaſy to raiſe forces in caſe of a rupture with him, whereof there was but too much appearance. The commons, on their part, had prevailed with the Scots to offer ten thouſand men, in the belief that, if they were accepted, they ſhould be freed from the trouble and danger of ſending Engliſh forces over to Ireland, and, if they were refuſed, the delay of relief would be imputed to his Majeſty.

Howſoever this be, the houſe, on the commitee's report, found that one great obſtruction of relief to Ireland was, that the Iriſh had not yet been, by proclamation, declared rebels. Wherefore, on the firſt of January 1641-2, his Majeſty iſſued a proclamation, wherein the Iriſh were expreſly termed traitors and rebels: but only forty copies were printed, which were all ſent to ſecretary Nicholas, according to an order received by the printer, to this effect:

Proclamation declaring the Iriſh to be rebels and traitors. p. 809. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 466.

Order to the printer. P. 472.

"It is his Majeſty's pleaſure, that you forth-
"with print, on very good paper, and ſend unto
"me, for his Majeſty's ſervice, forty copies of "the proclamation incloſed, leaving convenient
"ſpace for his Majeſty to ſign above, and to "affix the privy ſignet underneath. And his Ma-
"jeſty's expreſs command is, that you print not "above the ſaid number of forty copies, and for-
"bear to make any farther publication of them
"'till his pleaſure be farther ſignified.

For his Majeſty's
Printer (1) Ed. Nicholas.

We ſhall ſee what uſe the commons made of this order, the original whereof they had in their hands, with his Majeſty's anſwer.

Proceedings of King and parliament.

I have already obſerved that, ſince King Charles's return from Scotland, there were between him and the commons ſeeds of diviſion, which menaced a near approaching rupture. This appeared on all occaſions, and the mutual diſtruſt continually increaſed; but with this difference, that the commons took not the leaſt ſtep but what tended to their main view of infuſing into the people fears and jealouſies; whereas Charles, not having yet formed any project, managed according to the preſent emergencies, without propoſing to himſelf a fixed and certain end, which was to him no ſmall diſadvantage. Soon after his return from Scotland, on notice that there was to be a tumultuous concourſe of the populace at Weſtminſter, he ſent a writ to the ſheriff, to poſt a guard near the houſes of parliament. At this the commons took offenſe, and, after ſome inquiry to ſhew it was done by the King's order, diſmiſſed thoſe guards.

Charles ſets a guard near the parliament. Decemb. 8. The commons diſmiſs them. p. 456. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 726, 727, 729, 732.

Two days after, King Charles iſſued another proclamation, ſtrictly commanding that divine ſervice ſhould be performed, in all the churches of England and Wales, according to the law and ſtatutes of the realm. This proclamation, which indeed contained nothing illegal, was however unſeaſonable, when the commons publicly ſhewed that, in the laws concerning divine worſhip, there were things offenſive to the conſciences of many people. But this Prince had ſometimes the misfortune to forget the ſituation of his affairs, and remember only his former ſtate, when his proclamations met with a ready compliance. He might eaſily have foreſeen, that this would be at leaſt uſeleſs, and conſequently he ſhould not have attempted it at ſuch a juncture. But he furniſhed his enemies with a far greater advantage againſt him, in another affair, which procured him no ſmall mortification.

Bill for preſſing ſoldiers. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 750, 771. Clarendon. p. 257.

The commons had voted, as I obſerved, that a body of troops ſhould be ſent into Ireland. But as they were extremely jealous of the King, they deviſed a good expedient to prevent his being concerned in raiſing theſe forces. They were apprehenſive, if theſe levies were made in the uſual manner, i. e. by liſting voluntiers, theſe troops would be too much at Charles's devotion. This expedient was to levy ſoldiers by way of compulſion, called in England, "Preſſing," and to paſs an act for that purpoſe. A bill was accordingly brought in, and ſent up to the lords. Very ſeemingly there was in this bill ſome clauſe repugnant to the prerogative royal, to hinder the King from having any hand in levying theſe troops (1). Charles, having thereof notice, repaired to the parliament, and made the following ſpeech to both houſes.

Charles's ſpeech in parliament. Dec. 4. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 457. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 738.

My lords and gentlemen,

"THE laſt time I was in this place, and the laſt thing I recommended unto you, was "the buſineſs of Ireland; whereby I was in good "hope, that I ſhould not have needed again to "have put you in mind of that buſineſs. But ſtill, "ſeeing the ſlow proceedings therein, and the "daily diſpatches which I have out of Ireland, of "the lamentable eſtate of my Proteſtant ſubjects "there, I cannot but again earneſtly recommend "the diſpatch of that expedition unto you; for it "is the chief buſineſs which at this time I take to "heart, and there cannot almoſt be any buſineſs I "can have more care of.

"I might now take up ſome of your time in "expreſſing my deteſtation of rebellions in general, "and of this in particular; but knowing that deeds "and not declarations muſt ſuppreſs this great in"ſolency, I do here in a word offer you whatſo"ever my power, pains, or induſtry can contribute "to this good and neceſſary work, of reducing "the Iriſh nation to their true and wonted obe"dience.

"And, that nothing may be omited on my "part, I muſt here take notice of the bill for "preſſing ſoldiers, now depending among you, my "lords; concerning which, I here declare that, "in caſe it come ſo to me as it may not infringe "or diminiſh my prerogative, I will paſs it: and "farther, ſeeing there is a diſpute raiſed (I being "little beholding to him whoſoever at this time "began it) concerning the bounds of this ancient "and undoubted prerogative; to avoid farther "debate at this time, I offer that the bill may paſs "with a 'Salvo Jure' both for King and people, "leaving ſuch debates to a time which may better "bear them. If this be not accepted, the fault is "not mine if this bill paſs not, but theirs who re"fuſe ſo fair an offer.

"To conclude, I conjure you by all that is or "can be dear to you, or me, that, laying aſide all "diſputes, you go on chearfully and ſpeedily for "the reducing Ireland."

Tho' it manifeſtly appeared that, in this ſpeech, King Charles had no intention to violate the privilege of parliament, but only to remove the obſtacles occurring on account of this bill, both houſes were alike diſguſted. They appointed a joint commitee to examine his Majeſty's ſpeech, and, upon their report, the lords unanimouſly voted,

Votes of the peers. P. 739, 741.

1. That the privileges of parliament were broken, by his Majeſty's taking notice of the bill for preſſing ſoldiers, being in agitation in both houſes, and not agreed on.

2. That his Majeſty's propounding a limitation and proviſional clauſe to be added to the bill, before it was preſented him by the conſent of both houſes, was a breach of the privilege of parliament.

3. That his Majeſty's expreſſing his diſpleaſure againſt ſome perſons, for matters moved in parliament, during the debate and preparation of that bill, was a breach of the privilege of parliament.

Theſe votes were likewiſe readily paſſed in the houſe of commons, after which both houſes united in a ſolemn declaration, importing, "That the "King ought not to take notice of any matter in "agitation or debate in either houſe of parliament, "but by their information and agreement: and "that his Majeſty ought not to propound any con"dition, proviſion, or limitation to any bill or "act in debate, or preparation in either houſe of "parliament; or to manifeſt or declare his conſent "or diſſent, approbation or diſlike of the ſame, "before it be preſented to his Majeſty in due courſe "of parliament; and that every particular mem"ber of either houſe hath free liberty of ſpeech to "propound or debate any matter according to the "order and courſe of parliament: and that his Ma"jeſty ought not to conceive diſpleaſure againſt "any man for ſuch opinions and propoſitions as "ſhall be delivered in ſuch debate; it belonging "to the ſeveral houſes of parliament reſpectively "to judge and determine ſuch errors and offenſes, "in words or actions, as ſhall be commited by "any of their members, in the handling or debating "any matters depending; and that his Majeſty "will be pleaſed to declare the authors of this miſ"information and evil counſel (2)."

Declaration of both houſes. P. 750. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 458.

Purſuant to this declaration, both houſes preſented to the King a more extenſive petition, which a few days after Charles anſwered in writing. The force of his reply conſiſted in, his not having any intention to infringe the privilege of parliament, and only aimed at haſtening the relief of Ireland. The houſes were ſatisfied with this explication, and the diſpute went no farther: but there ſtill remained upon Charles the blemiſh of violating the privilege of parliament, which was then of the utmoſt conſequence. This evidences that his ſaid Majeſty had not then about him any very able counſellors: for had they penetrated the commons drift ſince reaſſembling the parliament, they would have been careful not to adviſe the King to take ſo many not only unneceſſary ſteps, but ſuch as furniſhed his adverſaries with great advantages. Of this nature was the proclamation concerning divine ſervice. In the ſame rank I likewiſe place that extraordinary zeal he expreſſed for the church of England, which ſerved only to alienate ſtill farther from him all the commons adherents, and to ſhew them what they were to expect ſhould he be reſtored to his priſtine authority. In a word, nothing could be more unſeaſonable than this laſt ſpeech to both houſes, as if the bare threat of not paſſing the bill was ſufficient to awe them, whereas, at leaſt in regard to the commons, it was a very ſtrong argument to make them inſiſt upon their demand. Beſide, the breach of privilege muſt have been evident, ſince there was not in both houſes a ſingle member but what believed that Charles had violated it by his ſaid propoſal.

Petition to the King and his anſwer. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 751, 762. Clarendon, p. 258.

Faults of the King or his council.

Six or ſeven days after, King Charles gave a freſh occaſion of complaint by removing, from his poſt ſir William Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower,

Charles removes Balfour; Dec. 20. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 459. Clarendon, p. 262.

(1) In the preamble of the bill it was declared, "That the King had, in no caſe, but the invaſion from a foreign power, "authority to preſs the free-born ſubject, which could not conſiſt with the freedom and liberty of his perſon." Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 275.

(2) The ſame noble hiſtorian ſays, in his next page, that when the clauſe in the bill for preſſing put a ſtop to the bill in the houſe of lords, mr. St. John, the King's ſollicitor, went preſently to his Majeſty, and perſuaded him to go to the parliament houſe, and ſay thoſe very words in his ſpeech, relating to the Salvo Jure, as an expedient to remove rubs in the way of the Iriſh affairs. Upon which both houſes reſolving to do nothing 'till this manifeſt breach ſhould be repaired by paſſing the bill, the King was compelled to paſs it, as they had prepared it.

and gives his place to Lunsford; which creates jealousies.

with whom he had no reason to be pleased, on account of his evidence concerning the design of promoting the earl of Strafford's escape. This was universally perceived to be the sole cause of Balfour's disgrace: but possibly his removal would not have been of such ill consequence to this Prince, had he not intrusted that important place to colonel Lunsford, known to be a man of profligate manners, and fit for any purpose. This change induced the commons to mistrust that his Majesty designed to secure the Tower, in order to awe both city and parliament. As their jealousy of him was excessive, and as it is moreover certain they sought occasions to persuade the people that he had pernicious designs, they failed not improving this which offered so opportunely. The very day whereon Lunsford was put in possession of the Tower, a great number of Londoners, of whom some were of the common-council, presented a petition to the lower-house, representing, "That the whole state is deeply in"terested in the safe custody of the Tower, but "more especially the city of London: that colonel
"Lunsford is a man out-lawed, and most notorious
"for outrages, and therefore fit for any dangerous
"attempt. For which reason the petitioners, and "many more, who have intelligence of his having
"the office of lieutenant bestowed on him, are put "into such a height of fear and jealousy, as makes "them restless 'till they have represented the same
"to the house of commons, humbly desiring them
"to take this affair into such consideration as may
"secure both the city and kingdom."

Petition of many Londoners. Dec. 23. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 495. Nalson, Vol. II. p. 773.

It must be owned that Charles made a very bad choice in bestowing on Lunsford this imploy, and thereby gave room for disadvantageous suspicions: beside, it seems scarce excusable to intrust the Tower with one of so very indifferent a character, at a time when his enemies missed no opportunity to inspire the people with jealousies. The most favorable construction can be put upon King Charles's conduct in this particular is, that there being but few persons who would be at his devotion, for fear of the commons indignation, he thought himself obliged to chuse for lieutenant of the Tower one less scrupulous, and of a desperate fortune, who would depend on him; and it was not easy to find many so disposed.

The commons require Lunsford's removal. Dec. 23. p. 774. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 459.

The commons, having taken into consideration the petition presented them, desired a conference with their lordships, whereat they represented, "That colonel Lunsford was not a fit person for so "great a trust as the lieutenancy of the Tower.
"But if his Majesty saw cause that there should be "a lieutenant of the Tower, the same being "already under the command of the earl of New"port, who is constable thereof by his Majesty's "appointment, then that sir John Conyers may be "recommended to his Majesty for that place."

The lords refuse concurring.

The lords answered, they could not concur with them in addressing the King to remove colonel Lunsford, because they conceived the same would be an intrenchment upon his Majesty's prerogative.

Votes against Lunsford. p. 460. Nalson, Vol. II. p. 778.

The commons, nettled at the peers refusal, unanimously voted, "That colonel Lunsford was un-
"fit to be lieutenant of the Tower, as being a
"person in whom the commons could not confide."

The commons declaration, sent to the lords, who adjourn the debate;

At the same time they made a declaration, seting forth their reasons of apprehension and distrust; as the conspiracy to seduce the army; a former project for seizing the Tower; the Irish rebellion, and the continual delays and interruptions they met with in the upper-house, thro' the great number of bishops and Romish peers; wherefore they held themselves bound in conscience to protest themselves innocent of the blood which was like to be shed, and the confusions which might overwhelm the state, if Lunsford was continued in his charge: they moreover hoped, that such of their lordships as had the same apprehensions, would also take some course to make the same known to his Majesty. This declaration being communicated to the peers, it was resolved, by a majority of votes, that the debate should be adjourned 'till next Monday: but against this vote the lords entered their protest.

which vote is by the lords protested against. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 461.

Also that day, the commons desired the earl of Newport, to reside within the Tower, as constable, and to take that fortress into his custody.

The earl of Newport desired to reside in the Tower.

Beside the London citizens, whose petition had occasioned the commons declaration, the apprentices had flocked together in great numbers, and presented a petition to his Majesty, praying him to concur with the commons in rooting out Papists, innovators and bishops, as having all combined to subvert the government, and introduce Popery.

Petition of the apprentices. p. 462. Nalson, Vol. II. p. 773.

The lord mayor informs Charles of the peoples disposition. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 462.

Next day, December twenty-six, being Sunday, the lord-mayor seeing the apprentices begin to reassemble, and knowing they designed to go on the morrow to Whitehall for an answer to their petition, waited on his Majesty to inform him of it. He withal represented, that great mischiefs might insue if Lunsford was not removed; adding, that multitudes of Londoners were determined on attempting the Tower, to force him thence. Charles thereupon, that same evening, took the keys from Lunsford, but at the same time dismissed the earl of Newport from his constableship.

Lunsford removed; and also the earl of Newport.

Pretense against the earl of Newport. p. 463. Nalson, Vol. II. p. 780.

The reason, or perhaps the pretense of this nobleman's disgrace was, Charles's having been told that, at a meeting at Kensington, while he was in Scotland, the earl of Newport, on discourse of certain conspiracies there, said; "if there be such "a plot, yet here are his wife and children."
But his lordship hearing such a rumor had reached the Queen, waited on her Majesty, and with many protestations assured her, that never any such words were spoken, not the least thought conceived of any such matter: with which she seemed well satisfied. Nevertheless, several months after, and the same day sir William Balfour was removed from the lieutenancy of the Tower, Charles asked him, whether he had heard any debate at Kensington, "about seizing the Queen and her Children?"
The earl strongly denied it; to which his Majesty answered, "that he was sorry for his lord-
"ships memory." This is what was by the earl of Newport himself positively affirmed in the house of peers.

Decemb. 23.

Petition of the lords. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 465.

Their lordships being convinced that his Majesty, on a false rumor, had entertained suspicions of the earl of Newport, espoused his cause, and presented Charles a petition, praying him to declare the reporter of those words. The earl of Bath, December thirty, reported his Majesty's answer, viz.

Charles's answer. Ib. p. 465. Nalson, Vol. II. p. 796.

"It is true, that I have heard rumors of some "proposition which should have been made at
"Kensington, for seizing the persons of my wife
"and children; and, in things of so high a nature,
"it may be fit for any Prince to inquire, even
"where he hath no belief nor persuasion of the "thing; so I have asked Newport some questions
"concerning that business, but far from that way
"of expressing a belief of the thing, which
"Newport hath had the boldness and confi"dence to affirm; which I could easily make
"appear, but that I think it beneath me to con"test with any particular person. But let this
"suffice, that I assure you, I neither did nor do
"give credit to any such rumor. As for telling
"the name of him who informed me, I do stick
"to the answer which I gave to your last petition,
"upon the like particular.

What color soever King Charles put upon his behavior to the earl of Newport, it evidently appeared, peared, that he fell out with that nobleman purpoſely to remove him from the conſtableſhip of the Tower, juſt when he was deſired by the commons to reſide there. This no way helped to cure the commons ſuſpicions.

New meaſures of the commons.

I have already intimated what project had been formed by the leaders and managers of the houſe of commons againſt King Charles, viz. to diveſt him of great part of his power. To compaſs this end, it was neceſſary to remove the obſtacles which inceſſantly occurred in the houſe of peers, where the biſhop and Popiſh lords, by the number of their voices, were always able to oppoſe the execution of this deſign. Hitherto the commons had in vain indeavored to exclude the biſhops from the upper-houſe, and there was no likelihood that their ſollicitations would thenceforwards prove more effectual. They were therefore either to drop their pretenſions, or take more efficacious methods to obtain forcibly what would never have been by fair means effected. I am very ſenſible, ſome will take amiſs my poſitively affirming the tumults I am about mentioning to have been a mere effect of the intrigues of thoſe who oppoſed the King, and that ſeveral pretended it was all owing to accident, and the peoples diſcontents. The reader will be able to judge, when he has ſeen what paſſed about the cloſe of December.

Concourſe of the populace at Weſtminſter. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 463. Clarendon, p. 264, 266.

On Monday the twenty-ſeventh of this month, there was a great concourſe of people at Weſtminſter, whither flocked they who had preſented the Londoners petition, abundance of apprentices, infinite numbers of others, with pretenſe of waiting for his Majeſty's and the parliament's anſwer. Among theſe multitudes, many were heard to cry aloud, "No Biſhops! No Biſhops!" This correſponded with the apprentices petition. The biſhop of Lincoln*, lately nominated to the ſee of York, repairing with the earl of Dover to the houſe of peers, and obſerving a young fellow bellowing louder than the reſt againſt biſhops, ran and ſeized him, in order to have him ſent to priſon: but the mob reſcued the youth, and, gathering around the prelate, ſo hemmed him in that he could not ſtir, ſo that he was near being preſſed to death. However, they at length let him go, ſtill crying out as loud as they could, "No Biſhops!"

Tumult.

Origin of the name of Roundheads. p. 267. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 463.

At the ſame time, three or four officers, who had lately ſerved againſt the Scots, walking near Weſtminſter-hall, one of them, captain David Hide, drew his ſword, ſaying, "He would cut "the throats of thoſe round-headed crop-eared "dogs who bawled againſt the biſhops." But his brother-officers refuſing to ſecond him, he was laid hold on by ſome citizens, brought before the commons and by them impriſoned. There is no other known origin of the name of Roundheads, which thenceforwards was given to the parliamentarians (1).

Lunsford and others wound ſome citizens. p. 464.

The ſame day colonel Lunsford, with thirty or forty officers, coming thro' Weſtminſter-hall, and meeting the multitudes, drew their ſwords and hurt about twenty apprentices and citizens. Notice thereof being carried into the city, great numbers of apprentices and others, haſted down to Weſtminſter with ſwords and ſtaves, which occaſioned a terrible uproar both in London and Weſtminſter. The lord-mayor, to prevent farther diſorders, commanded the city gates to be ſhut, and put in arms the militia, while on the other hand Charles ordered ſome of the Middleſex and Weſtminſter trained-bands to come by turns and guard his perſon.

The lords try in vain to appeaſe the tumults. p. 463. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 781.

The lords, ſeeing ſo great a tumult, ordered the gentleman-uſher of the black rod, to command that mutinous rabble to depart home. Their anſwer was, they could not, becauſe Lunsford, with other ſwordſmen, lay in wait for them in Weſtminſter-hall, and had already wounded ſeveral. Thereupon their lordſhips appointed a commitee to examine, what warrant Lunsford and the other officers had to come to Weſtminſter, as alſo, what notice had been given to any others to come in multitudes about the parliament-houſe. They tried once more to ſend away the people; but, not ſucceeding, deſired the commons to join with them in publiſhing a declaration againſt tumults, and in petitioning the King for a guard. The commons replied, it was now ſo late, that they had not time to take this requeſt into conſideration. Mean while, on information that ſome of the mob were ſent to priſon, they appointed a commitee to examine, by whoſe authority they were impriſoned, with power to releaſe them if it was thought proper. A clear evidence that this tumult was not diſagreeable to the commons (2).

The commons act coldly. p. 784, 792.

The tumult continued. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 465.

Next morning, the twenty-eighth, the tumult was renewed in the ſame manner as the day before, and the commons were as little ſollicitous to have it appeaſed. On the contrary, they adjourned the debate of their lordſhips requeſt 'till the morrow. Finally, on the twenty ninth, a rabble being reaſſembled, they acquainted the lords, that they were ready to join in all lawful ways and means to appeaſe theſe tumults, but for printing a declaration, it was a matter which would require ſome farther deliberation (3).

Remark on the commons procedure. Nalſon. Vol. II. p. 788. Dugdale's view, p. 80.

It is very apparent that the commons deſired not to have theſe tumults ſo ſoon ended, eſpecially if what is reported of mr. Pym, one of the leading members, be real fact. It is affirmed, he ſaid to one who perſuaded him to indeavor preventing theſe tumultuous aſſemblies, "God forbid the people "ſhould be hindered from obtaining their juſt de-"ſires." Indeed, the houſe in general cannot be charged with having taken any reſolution to incourage theſe tumults. Nevertheleſs, it is but too probable, not to ſay certain, that they were cauſed by the intrigues and direction of ſome of the leaders of his Majeſty's opponents.

To be convinced of this truth, one needs only to conſider, what was the ſituation of affairs at the end of December, 1641. The redreſs of grievances was no longer the point; that was now compleated without any oppoſition from the King. He could therefore affirm, that his conſent to the acts paſſed in this parliament was the effect of his love for his people, with as much reaſon as his adverſaries could allege its being all diſſimulation and merely by compulſion. It is certain that, after King Charles's return from Scotland, there were in the parliament many members who wiſhed the reform might be carried no farther, perſuaded as they were, that what was already done ſufficed for the kingdom's ſafety, and prevention of arbitrary government hereafter. This was the prevailing opinion in the upper-houſe, chiefly becauſe of the biſhops and Popiſh lords, who always made the balance incline to his Majeſty's ſide, when this capital point was in queſtion, either directly or indirectly.

(1) The apprentices it ſeems wore the hair of their head cut round, and the Queen obſerving, from a window, Samuel Barnardiſton among them, cryed out: "See what a handſome young Roundhead is there!" This ſome aſſert to have given riſe to that appellative.

(2) Cornelius Burgeſs, a Puritan miniſter, uſed to ſay of the rabble, "Theſe are my ban-dogs, I can ſet them on, and I can "fetch them off again."

(3) This anſwer to the lords was on the eighth. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 465.

In

Charles I An' 1641.

In the houſe of commons it was quite otherwiſe. Moſt of the members, not contenting themſelves with having redreſſed grievances, were alſo for leſſening the royal authority, and incapacitating the King from governing thenceforwards as he had done before this parliament. Some acted thro' pure diffidence of Charles's ſincerity: others thro' fear of being expoſed to his reſentment, if he ſhould ever be in a condition to make them feel its effects. Beſide theſe two motives, the Preſbyterians had a third, viz. to alter church-government, which they evidently foreſaw could never be effected, but by diſabling Charles to make oppoſition. All theſe members were united in one ſcheme of retrenching great part of this Prince's power: but the difference between them was very wide as to their animoſity againſt him, and the zeal wherewith they purſued the execution of their project. The Preſbyterians were warmeſt and moſt paſſionate; while others, who acted only from motives of jealouſy and diffidence behaved with more moderation. They could not, without a ſort of remorſe, contribute towards precipitating the whole nation into confuſion, upon the foundation of a bare diſtruſt, or of a fear which would not admit of any remedy. This had occaſioned great debates among the members concerning their remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom. Many conſidered it as unneceſſary; while others ſupported it, becauſe they ſaw no ſurer way of making a breach between King and parliament: and without ſuch rupture they looked on themſelves as undone; for they could not otherwiſe hope to execute their projects. Oliver Cromwell, who as yet made no figure in the houſe, told lord Falkland,

Clarendon, p. 247.

"That if the remonſtrance had been rejected, he "would have ſold all he had next morning, and "never ſeen England more."

After this remonſtrance was preſented to King Charles, his enemies loſt no opportunity to cheriſh the peoples fears and jealouſies, wherein they had a double proſpect 1. They prepared them for the change they were meditating, by urging the abſolute neceſſity of diminiſhing the regal power. 2. By irritating Charles, they hoped to ingage him in ſome violent meaſures, proper to confirm the ſuſpicions they were ſtriving to infuſe into the people, in which they ſucceeded but too well; that Prince being ſo unhappy as not to have about him any able counſellors, to warn him of the ſnares laid for him by his inſidious adverſaries. Nevertheleſs, they were ſtill very far from their end, by reaſon of the obſtacles they met with in the houſe of peers, where the biſhops and Popiſh lords brake all their meaſures.

Very poſſibly, this contraſt between the two houſes would have been of much longer continuance had not the tumultuous concourſe of the Londoners about Weſtminſter very opportunely occurred to terrify the prelates and Popiſh peers, as will be ſeen preſently. When therefore ſuch multitudes were ſeen flocking to Weſtminſter, exclaiming againſt the biſhops and Catholic lords, inſulting the peers of Charles's party, in a word, acting ſo conformably to the commons deſires and intentions, one cannot eaſily help thinking but they were countenanced and incouraged by ſome of that houſe's members; and the rather, as no other probable reaſon of ſo ſudden a commotion can be aſſigned.

As to the juſtice of the commons project of diſabling their Sovereign from purſuing the courſe he had followed during fifteen years, it is a queſtion not readily to be decided. The point is to know whether, at the time we are now upon, in reſtoring King Charles to all his rights, there was juſt ground to confide in him, without any apprehenſion of his future abuſing ſuch power. But there is ſo much to be ſaid on either ſide of the queſtion, that unbiaſſed perſons muſt needs be at a loſs, and the more as the thing is to know perfectly, what was this Prince's intention, which no one can poſſibly diſcover. It is therefore barely on conjectures that ſome decide, that, after his Majeſty's conceſſions in this parliament, in favor of his ſubjects, it was reaſonable to rely on his word; and that others affirm, it was imprudent to conſider this Prince's aſſent to the acts as a proof of his intention to govern according to law, ſince this aſſent was not altogether voluntary. On this queſtion run all the papers which were afterwards publiſhed, either by King or parliament.

Charles I An' 1641.

The tumults ſtill continuing about the parliament houſe, and the commons not appearing very urgent to appeaſe them, twelve biſhops met at the archbiſhop of York's, to conſult what was to be done. Here, by advice of the archbiſhop, they reſolved on not going any more to the houſe of peers, but preſented to his Majeſty and their lordſhips the following proteſtation (1).

The tumults continue. Ruſhworth, Vol IV. p. 466. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 794. Hacket, Part II. p. 178. Clarendon, p. 271, &c.

To the King's moſt excellent Majeſty, and the lords and peers, now aſſembled in parliament; the humble petition and proteſtation of all the biſhops and prelates now called by his Majeſty's writs to attend the parliament, and preſent about London and Weſtminſter for that ſervice.

"THAT whereas the petitioners are called "up by ſeveral and reſpective writs, and "under great penalties, to attend in parliament, "and have a clear and indubitate right to vote in "bills, and other matters whatſoever, debatable "in parliament, by the ancient cuſtoms, laws and "ſtatutes of this realm, and ought to be protected "by your Majeſty, quietly to attend and proſecute "that great ſervice.

"They humbly remonſtrate and proteſt before "God, your Majeſty, and the noble lords and "peers now aſſembled in parliament, that, as they "have an indubitate right to ſit and vote in the "houſe of lords, ſo are they (if they may be protected from force and violence) moſt ready and "willing to perform their duties accordingly: and "that they do abominate all actions and opinions "tending to Popery, and the maintenance thereof; "as alſo all propenſion and inclination to any ma"lignant party, or any other ſide or party what"ſoever, to the which their own reaſon and con"ſciences ſhall not move them to adhere.

"But whereas they have been, at ſeveral times, "violently menaced, affronted and aſſaulted by "multitudes of people, in their coming to per"form their ſervices in that honorable houſe; and "lately chaſed away, and put in danger of their "lives, and can find no redreſs or protection, upon "ſundry complaints made to both houſes in theſe "particulars.

(1) This proteſtation was penned in heat and haſte, by Williams, archbiſhop of York, juſt after the treatment he had met with from the apprentices and others, and, without delay, preſented by him to the King, with an humble deſire, that his Majeſty would ſend it to the houſe of peers, ſince the biſhops could not do it themſelves, and that he would command, it ſhould be entered into the journal of the houſe. His Majeſty juſt caſt his eye upon it, and believing it drawn by mature advice, delivered it to the keeper, who unfortunately happened to be preſent, commanding him to deliver it to the houſe. Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 276. Some ſay, that the lord keeper was ordered not to read it, 'till the King, at the biſhops inſtance, came into the houſe of peers. But, that to ingratiate himſelf with the parliament, to whom he was become obnoxious, he communicated the petition to ſome unfriendly members of both houſes. Collier's Eccl. Hiſt. Vol. II. p. 818.

Remark on this proteſtation.

We are to obſerve that, among theſe twelve biſhops, there were nine of thoſe thirteen whom the commons accuſed on account of the late convocation's canons.

It is evident, that this proteſtation tended to diſſolve the parliament, without Charles's interpoſing: for if, according to the proteſtation, the houſe of peers could do nothing but what was in itſelf void, without the prelates concurrence, it was no leſs certain, that the houſe of commons could do nothing valid without concurrence of the peers; whence it followed, that the parliament was become uſeleſs, or ſuſpended, in the intention of the biſhops by this proteſtation. It is likewiſe manifeſt, that King Charles had the ſame thought, by his haſte to communicate the proteſtation to their lordſhips, poſſibly even before its being examined by his council. Very probably, he imagined their lordſhips would eſpouſe the biſhops cauſe, as making, according to his notion, a third eſtate of parliament, and that this affair might occaſion the parliament's diſſolution. But he found that this houſe of peers, hitherto ſo favorable to him, was no longer in the ſame diſpoſitions, ſince the biſhops and Popiſh lords were frightened away by tumults. The majority of voices not being now for his Majeſty, the houſe looked on this proteſtation with a very different eye from what Charles expected. They deſired a conference with the commons, where the lord-keeper, in name of all the peers, told them, "That this "proteſtation containing matters of dangerous con- "ſequence, extending to the deep intrenching upon "the fundamental privileges and being of parlia- "ments, the lords had thought fit to communicate "it to the commons, as a thing of great and ge- "neral concernment." CHARLES I AN' 1641. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 467. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 795.

No ſooner had the commons received the report of this conference, but they determined on inſtantly charging thoſe twelve biſhops of high-treaſon, for attempting to ſubvert the fundamental laws and the very being of parliaments. This reſolution ought not to ſeem ſtrange, after having ſeen how the commons ſtood affected towards prelates. They were very careful not to loſe ſuch a fair opportunity of freeing themſelves from thoſe obſtacles they perpetually met with, in the upper-houſe, from the biſhops; and beſide, the peers ſeemed diſpoſed to come into their meaſures. So, that very moment, mr. Glyn was deputed away to their lordſhips above, formally to accuſe the twelve biſhops of high-treaſon, and to deſire they might be put into ſafe cuſtody (1). The lords thereupon ordered the black-rod to bring thoſe twelve biſhops to the bar of their houſe, which was done by eight at night, and ten of them were commited to the Tower. Moreton biſhop of Durham, and Wright biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry, in regard of their great age, remained in the black-rod's cuſtody. The commons accuſe twelve biſhops of high-treaſon; p. 406, &c. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 467. Clarendon, p. 277, 278. who are ſent to the Tower. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 468.

On the morrow, December 31, the commons deſired their lordſhips to take into conſideration the bill, ſent up ſome months ſince, for taking away the biſhops votes; to which the lords anſwered; "They "would take the ſame into conſideration in con- "venient time (2)." Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 800.

Alſo that day, the commons ſent his Majeſty a commitee, repreſenting, "That the houſe was "under great apprehenſions, by reaſon of a malig- "nant party who were continually forming perni- "cious deſigns: nay, that ſome of them had im- "brued their hands in the blood of his ſubjects, at "the gates of his palace, in the face and at the "doors of the parliament. That therefore they "humbly beſought his Majeſty, that they might "have a guard * commanded by the earl of Eſſex, "of whoſe fidelity there could be no ſuſpicion." The commons deſire a guard. p. 793, 801. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 471. * From London.

As the London populace were diſperſed, and the officers ſtill kept about Weſtminſter, the houſe was under ſome apprehenſion of inſults from theſe reformades, and particularly Lunsford, who was a deſperate perſon. So, the King deſiring to have this meſſage in writing, which had been delivered by word of mouth only, and not returning any anſwer that day, the commons ordered, that thirty or forty halberts ſhould be brought into the houſe, for their better ſecurity. They cauſe arms to be brought into their houſe. Ibid.

Their apprehenſions were farther increaſed on notice, that the young gentlemen of the inns of court were aſſembled, and gone to Whitehall, to offer their ſervice to his Majeſty, who had received them very graciouſly, and ordered them to be handſomely entertained at tables provided for them. The inns of court gentlemen offer to guard the King. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 803.

King Charles, on his part, was not free from uneaſineſs. He feared the tumultuous concourſe of people would be renewed on New-year's day; and Charles injoins the lord mayor to prevent diſorders. Ibid. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 469.

(1) Lord Clarendon (Vol. I. p. 279.) ſays, the biſhops friends took ſo great offenſe at this indiſcreet proteſtation, that, tho' they deſired to preſerve their function, they had no compaſſion or regard of their perſons, or what became of them; inſomuch as, in the whole debate, there was only one gentleman who ſpake in their behalf, and ſaid, "He "did not believe they were guilty of high-treaſon; but that they were ſtark mad, and therefore deſired they might be "ſent to Bedlam."

(2) Not long before this, the King had filled in the following manner, ſome ſees which were made vacant. Dr. Prideaux was made biſhop of Worceſter, dr. Winniff of Lincoln, dr. Brownrigg of Exeter, dr. Henry King of Chicheſter, and dr. Weſtfield of Briſtol. The commons were, it ſeems, thereupon much troubled, that, at a time when they reſolved to take away the old, the King ſhould preſume to make new biſhops.——Mr. Edward Hyde (afterwards earl of Clarendon) was now admited into the King's favor. Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 239, 269. Warwick, p. 194.

Charles I An' 1641.

therefore ſent orders to the common-council of London, to take good meaſures for prevention of all ſuch diſorders as had lately happened, wherein he was obeyed moſt punctually.

The parliament having adjourned from Friday 'till Monday, the morrow being New-year's day, and next day Sunday, it was the third of January before Charles returned his anſwer to the commons meſſage concerning a guard, which was to this purport:

His Majeſty's anſwer concerning the required guard. p. 471. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 803.

"That it was with great grief of heart, he found "the commons, inſtead of reaping the fruits of "his grace and affection to his people, ſhould "ſuffer jealouſies, diſtruſts and fears to be ſo pre-"valent among them, as to induce them to declare "them unto him in ſo high a meaſure as they had "done: that he was wholly ignorant of the grounds "of their apprehenſions; but if he had any "knowledge or belief of the leaſt deſign, in any, "of violence againſt them, he would purſue them "with the ſame ſeverity and deteſtation as he "would do the greateſt attempt upon his crown. "Withal, he ingaged ſolemnly, on the word of a "King, that the ſecurity of all and every of them "from violence, was and ſhould ever be as much "his care, as the preſervation of himſelf and his "children: and if this general aſſurance ſhould not "ſuffice to remove their apprehenſions, he would "command ſuch a guard to wait upon them, as he "would be reſponſible for to him who had charged "him with the ſafety and protection of his "ſubjects."

Before we proceed, it will be neceſſary to ſhew exactly the ſituation of King Charles's affairs, in the begining of the year 1642. There was in the houſe of commons a ſtrong party, who were laboring to deprive him of good part of his prerogatives, ſome thro' fear or diſtruſt, others for more hidden deſigns; but theſe laſt took care not to divulge their intentions: they pretended to act only on the ſame motives of diſtruſt which influenced the firſt, in expectation of ingaging them by degrees to ſecond them in their projects. For this reaſon, they loſt no opportunity to inflame this diffidence of the King, by agravating whatſoever could be blamed in his government during the firſt fifteen years of his reign; and by refering all his actions, ſince this parliament began, to the ſame principles by which he had formerly governed: in ſhort, their drift was to make him thought ſtill the ſame, and not to have any way altered his maxims: that his condeſcenſion for the parliament had been forced, and was all diſſimulation: that he only waited for a proper ſeaſon to return to his old courſes, and when once he was reſtored to his authority, he would uſe it to be revenged on thoſe by whom he thought himſelf injured, and to take juſter meaſures to eſtabliſh a deſpotic government.

In effect, as all theſe particulars depended on this Prince's ſecret intentions, they could not be manifeſtly proved; yet ſuch hints were given as ſerved to make impreſſion on many people. It was obſerved, that Charles always talked of his aſſent to the acts of this parliament, as being of pure grace, and not of juſtice; whence it was eaſy to infer, that he reſerved to himſelf the power of revoking them when he ſhould find occaſion: that there was but too much reaſon to ſuſpect he was concerned in the Iriſh rebellion, conſidering in what juncture of time it brake out, and the rebels declaration, that they had the King's and Queen's authority for what they did: that it was very probable, he ſhewed a regard to the Papiſts, to make uſe of them on occaſion: that he could not reſolve to execute the ſeven prieſts legally condemned, tho' he had been earneſtly deſired by both houſes of parliament: that notwithſtanding his conſtant promiſes to put the laws in execution againſt recuſants, it had never been performed; but, on the contrary, he truſted recuſants with the moſt important charges: that the conſpiracy to ſeduce the army plainly diſcovered his deſigns: that, very lately, he had violated the privileges of parliament in ſo evident a manner, that there was not a ſingle member, in both houſes, who was not perſuaded of the reality of this violation: that nevertheleſs, inſtead of ſatisfaction, he had anſwered, "That he himſelf did not believe "he had violated the privileges of parliament, "nor ever intended it:" that therefore it was abſolutely neceſſary to limit his power, and diſable him from governing thenceforward at his pleaſure, as he had done during fifteen years ſucceſſively.

Charles I An' 1641.

Theſe reaſons produced in mens minds various effects, according to the temper, underſtanding and principles of thoſe to whom they were addreſſed. To ſome they appeared too uncertain to ground thereon projects of retrenching the regal power, and conſequently of altering the government's conſtitution. Others looked on them as unanſwerable. There were however many members who wavered between their diſtruſt of the King, and their fear of involving the nation in troubles, on a doubtful foundation. Nevertheleſs, theſe were eaſily perſuaded to join in proceedings repreſented to them as neceſſary precautions, without being let into their real deſign; as for inſtance, to conſent to the bill for excluding the biſhops. Had the leaders of the Preſbyterian faction told them, that it was their intention to diminiſh the royal power, in order more eaſily to eſtabliſh Preſbytery upon the ruins of Epiſcopacy, they would never have ſucceeded; nay, they would have rendered themſelves ſo ſuſpected as to have utterly forfeited their whole credit: for we are to recollect that the heads of that party which oppoſed the King, tho' moſtly Preſbyterians, had not yet acted as ſuch, but only as zealous aſſertors of the peoples rights, and as enemies to tyranny, wherein the whole faction were perfectly united. When therefore they ſtarted any motion againſt prelates, they inſinuated it not to be in hatred of epiſcopacy, but to leſſen the biſhops credit, which they had abuſed in ſupporting deſpotiſm, and to diſable them from doing ſo for the future. Unluckily, diverſe of the right reverend had given too much cauſe of complaint, and by their conduct ingaged even many church of England men to concur in the deſign of limiting the authority of prelates in general.

Before the biſhops and Popiſh peers had abſented themſelves from the houſe of lords, the laſt-mentioned faction met with unſurmountable obſtructions in that houſe: nay, even after that, the remnant were not alike devoted to this party. A good number of peers ſtill remained who, tho' oppoſite to Charles, and extremely jealous of him, could not however reſolve on taking any ſtep which ſtruck at the government of either church or ſtate, or at leaſt which tended to alter the conſtitution. So, ever ſince the parliament's re-aſſembling, the Preſbyterians had yet been as it were only ſtrugling with the reſt of King Charles's opponents, gradually to induce them to concur in retrenching the royal authority. They had got paſſed the remonſtrance of the kingdom's ſtate and condition, ſpread ſuſpicions of his Majeſty touching the Iriſh rebellion, and prevented ſending to Ireland any Engliſh forces. Their intrigues had bred great diſtruſt concerning the Popiſh party, countenanced and protected by Charles, and produced mortifying addreſſes to that Prince upon the breach of parliamentary privileges, and the lieutenancy of the Tower; tumultuous aſſemblies of mobs at Weſtminſter; the petition for a guard, as if the houſe of commons was greatly in danger from the King's party. Finally, diverſe biſhops, biſhops, their principal enemies, were in the Tower. In all this Preſbyterianiſm ſcarcely ſhewed itſelf at all, and if ſome ſuſpected it to be the chief cauſe of thoſe diſturbances, at leaſt to prove it would have been no eaſy matter.

Notwithſtanding all theſe advantages, the Preſbyterians ſtill ſaw themſelves very remote from their purpoſe. They had ſufficient credit to get paſſed in the houſe of commons votes agreeable to the whole party's general deſign; yet were they themſelves very ſenſible they durſt not yet venture openly to diſcover their particular end, I mean the church of England's overthrow, and Preſbytery's eſtabliſhment. It was firſt of all neceſſary to diſable Charles to oppoſe it. For that purpoſe were to be gained thoſe members of both houſes who ſtill wavered between their diffidence of this Prince, and the fear of involving in dangerous confuſions their country, if the conſtitution ſhould be attacked. Theſe members were ſufficiently numerous to raiſe invincible obſtacles to this project, by ſiding with the royaliſts: for it muſt not be imagined that all who oppoſed King Charles were of the ſame character, and acted on like principles and motives. They were only united in this ſingle point, i. e. tyranny being equally odious to them, they wiſhed to be intirely freed from it, with equal ardor.

Charles orders a peer and five commoners to be accuſed of high-treaſon. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 473. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 811. Annals, p. 906. Clarendon, p. 280.

Matters being in this poſition, Charles, as adviſed by lord Digby then his chief counſellor, took a ſtep the moſt imprudent, and moſt fatal to his affairs, he could poſſibly take at ſuch a juncture. The third of January, 1641-2, his attorney-general, ſir Edward Herbert, coming to the houſe of peers, acquainted them, that his Majeſty had commanded him to accuſe of high-treaſon lord Kimbolton (1), and five commoners, viz. Denzil Hollis, ſir Arthur Haſlerig, John Pym, John Hampden, and William Strode: At the ſame time he delivered the general articles of impeachment, which Charles himſelf gave him; viz.

Articles againſt them.

1. That they had traiterouſly indeavored to ſubvert the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom of England; to deprive the King of his royal power, and to place in ſubjects an arbitrary and tyrannical power over the lives, liberties and eſtates of his Majeſty's liege people.

2. That they had traiterouſly indeavored, by many foul aſperſions upon his Majeſty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his Majeſty odious unto them.

3. That they had indeavored to draw his Majeſty's late army to diſobedience to his Majeſty's command, and to ſide with them in their traiterous deſigns.

4. That they had traiterouſly invited and incouraged a foreign power to invade his Majeſty's kingdom of England.

5. That they had traiterouſly indeavored to ſubvert the rights, and the very being of parliaments.

6. That, for the compleating of their traiterous deſigns, they had indeavored, ſo far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the parliament to join with them in their traiterous deſigns; and to that end had actually raiſed and countenanced tumults againſt the King and parliament.

7. That they had traiterouſly conſpired to levy, and actually had levied, war againſt the King.

Then mr. attorney ſaid, that he was farther charged to deſire, on his Majeſty's behalf:

1. That a ſelect commitee, under a command of ſecreſy, may be appointed to take the examination of ſuch witneſſes as the King will produce in this buſineſs, as formerly hath been done in caſes of like nature, according to the juſtice of this houſe.

2. Liberty to add and alter, if there ſhould be cauſe.

CHARLES I An' 1641.

3. That their lordſhips would take care for ſecuring the perſons, as in juſtice there ſhould be cauſe.

Conſiderations on King Charles's conduct in this particular.

One cannot well conceive what Charles's driſt could be in this extraordinary accuſation, and what he could thence hope for, conſidering the numberleſs difficulties which preſented, and which it was ſcarcely poſſible not to foreſee.

Firſt; his Majeſty demanded of the peers juſtice againſt five members of the commons houſe, the parliament ſiting, which was a moſt evident irregularity, ſince their lordſhips were not the members of the lower-houſe's proper judges, while the parliament was aſſembled, without the conſent of that houſe, whereof King Charles could not be ignorant. Conſequently they had no power to commit the five members. Why then was it deſired?

Secondly; in this accuſation, Charles attacked five commoners, who were leading members in that houſe. How therefore could he expect, in ſuch junctures, that the commons would deliver up their leaders, on pretenſe of a general acculation which deſcended not to any particulars?

Thirdly; his Majeſty, in accuſing thoſe five members, properly accuſed of treaſon the whole houſe, as was eaſy to perceive by barely looking on the articles.

Finally; how could he expect that the parliament, who had given the Scots three hundred thouſand pounds, as a compenſation for their brotherly aſſiſtance, would conſider as high-treaſon the inviting them into the kingdom, ſuppoſing he had been able to prove this aſſertion?

All this manifeſts King Charles's having been very ill adviſed when he undertook this affair, at ſuch a juncture. Accordingly, not a ſingle hiſtorian, even among thoſe moſt devoted to him, who does not at leaſt own it was a moſt imprudent and unſeaſonable procedure.

The peers ſcrutiniſe the regularity of his Majeſty's procedure. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 474. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 812.

After reading the articles of accuſation, lord Kimbolton ſtood up and prayed, that, as he had a public charge, he might have a public clearing. But the peers proceeded not ſo haſtily as his Majeſty expected. The firſt ſtep they took was appointing a commitee to examine the regularity of this charge, and to ſearch the records, whether there ever had been any ſuch proceeding, and whether accuſations againſt a peer might be brought into their houſe by the attorney-general. As to the accuſation againſt the five commoners, they did not ſo much as take it into conſideration, whether they ſhould receive it, but contented themſelves with acquainting that houſe, that certain of their members were accuſed of high-treaſon by the attorney-general.

The papers, &c. of the parties accuſed ſealed up.

Alſo then the commons had notice, that ſeveral perſons were at mr. Hollis's and mr. Pym's, ſealing up their trunks, doors and papers. The like was done in the houſes of the three other parties accuſed. Thereupon the commons ordered their ſerjeant to break open the ſeals, and apprehend thoſe who put them on. Moreover they paſſed an order, "that "if any perſons whatever ſhould come to the "lodgings of any member of the houſe, and there "offer to ſeal the doors, trunks, or papers, that "then ſuch members ſhould require the aſſiſtance "of the conſtable to keep ſuch perſons in ſafe "cuſtody, 'till the houſe ſhould give farther order. "That if any perſon ſhould offer to arreſt or de-"tain a member, without firſt acquainting the "houſe therewith, it was lawful for ſuch member "to ſtand upon his guard of defenſe, and for any Conference between both houſes. Nalſon, Ibid.

Very ſoon after, the commons repreſented to their lordſhips, in a conference, that the King had ordered the trunks, chambers and ſtudies of ſeveral of their members to be ſealed up, and had in a warlike manner, poſted a guard at Whitehall; wherefore they deſired, that there might likewiſe be placed about the parliament ſuch guards as ſhould be approved by both houſes, or elſe that their lordſhips join with them in adjourning to a place of ſafety. During this conference, a ſerjeant at arms came from his Majeſty to the houſe of commons, and required the five members accuſed. The ſerjeant being ordered to withdraw, the commons appointed ſome of their members to wait on the King, and acquaint him, " That his meſſage was a matter of " great conſequence; that it concerned the pri- " vilege of parliament, and of all the commons of " England: that they will take it into conſideration, " and attend his Majeſty with their anſwer, with as " much ſpeed as the greatneſs of the buſineſs will " permit; and, in the mean time, the five mem- " bers ſhall be ready to anſwer any legal charge " made againſt them." Then they diſmiſſed the ſerjeant who had brought this meſſage. At the ſame time, they injoined the five members to give their daily attendance on the houſe.

Charles demands the five members. Ibid. Clarendon, p. 281. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 475.

Thoſe members ordered to attend daily on the houſe.

During this, the peers had ordered the doors and trunks of the members of both houſes which were ſealed ſhould be opened, and reſolved to join with the commons in a petition to his Majeſty for ſuch a guard as both houſes ſhould approve. They had moreover ordered, that two of their body, with ſome commoners, ſhould repreſent to the King, that the privileges of parliament had been violated.

Reſolution of the peers. Ibid.

Next morning, January four, lord Falkland reported his Majeſty's anſwer to the commons meſſage touching breach of privilege. He ſaid, the King aſked him, whether the houſe did expect any anſwer? and, before lord Falkland replied, told him, he would ſend his anſwer to-morrow as ſoon as the houſe was ſet. Mean while, he bid him acquaint the houſe, that the ſerjeant had done nothing but what he had directions from himſelf to do.

Report of the King's anſwer. p. 476.

Preſently after this report, the commons ſent and deſired a conference with their lordſhips, to acquaint them, that a ſcandalous paper was publiſhed, containing articles of high-treaſon againſt lord Kimbolton, &c. and to deſire they would concur in puniſhing the authors and publiſhers thereof.

Demand of the commons to their lordſhips. Ibid.

Then the gentlemen of the inns of court, who offered themſelves to be a guard to his Majeſty, were ſent to and examined, on a rumor that they were injoined to be ready the fourth of January. Thoſe of Lincoln's-Inn anſwered, " That laſt " week they went to White-hall to offer their ſer- " vice to the King, upon hearing that his perſon " was in danger: that yeſter-night, they had re- " ceived a meſſage from his Majeſty, by ſir William " Killigrew and ſir William Flemming, that they " ſhould keep within to-morrow, and be ready at " an hour's warning, if the King ſhould have oc- " caſion to uſe them: that they brought to them " likewiſe a paper of articles of accuſation againſt " lord Kimbolton and five members of the houſe " of commons: that they had only an intent to " defend the King's perſon, and would do their " utmoſt alſo to defend the parliament; being not " able to make any diſtinction between the King " and his parliament." The gentlemen of the other inns anſwered to the ſame effect (1).

The gentlemen of the inns of court examined. Ibid. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 816, 817.

That afternoon, the five accuſed members came into the houſe, as they had been injoined. They were no ſooner in their places, but one captain Langriſh informed the houſe, that the King was coming with a guard of military men, commanders and ſoldiers (2). As there was room to believe that Charles intended to ſeize the five members, they were immediately ordered to depart the houſe. They were ſcarcely got out when his Majeſty appeared, and going up to the chair, ſaid, " By " your leave, mr. ſpeaker, I muſt borrow your " chair a little." Being there ſeated, he looked round to ſee if he could diſcern any of the five members, and then harangued the houſe thus; his guard waiting at the door.

Gentlemen,

" I Am ſorry for this occaſion of coming unto " you. Yeſterday I ſent a ſerjeant at arms up- " on a very important occaſion, to apprehend ſome " who, by my command, were accuſed of high- " treaſon; whereunto I did expect obedience, and " not a meſſage. And I muſt declare unto you " here, that albeit no King of England ever had " or ſhall be more careful of your privileges, to " maintain them to the uttermoſt of his power, " than I ſhall be; yet you muſt know that, in " caſes of treaſon, no perſon hath a privilege. " And therefore I am come to know if any of theſe " perſons who were accuſed are here: for I muſt " tell you, gentlemen, that ſo long as theſe perſons, " whom I have accuſed (for no ſlight crime, but " for treaſon) are here, I cannot expect that this " houſe will be in the right way as I do heartily " wiſh it: therefore I am come to tell you, that " I muſt have them whereſoever I find them. " Well! ſince I ſee all the birds are flown, I do " expect from you, that you ſhall ſend them unto " me, as ſoon as they return hither. But I aſſure " you, on the word of a King, I never did intend " any force, but I ſhall proceed againſt them in a " legal and fair way, for I never meaned any " other.

" And now ſince I ſee I cannot do what I came " for, I think this no unfit occaſion to repeat what " I have ſaid formerly, that whatſoever I have " done in favor, and to the good of my ſubjects, " I do mean to maintain it.

" I will trouble you no more, but tell you, I " do expect, as ſoon as they come to the houſe, " you will ſend them to me; otherwiſe I muſt " take my own courſe to find them.

The houſe adjourns. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 478.

No ſooner was his Majeſty gone, but many members cried out aloud, ſo as he might hear them, Privilege! Privilege! and forthwith the houſe adjourned 'till next day at one.

Vote that the King had violated the privilege of parliament.

The commons, aſſembling on the morrow, January five, at the hour appointed, inſtantly voted, that the King had violated the houſe's privileges, and that they could not ſit any longer there, without a full vindication of ſo high a breach, and a guard for the ſafety of their perſons. Then it was resolved to adjourn 'till the eleventh of the same month, and a commitee of twenty-four was appointed to sit, during the adjournment, at Guild-hall, and to consider all things concerning the good and safety of the city and kingdom, and particularly how their privileges might be vindicated, and their persons secured (1). The commitee for the Irish affairs was ordered likewise to sit during the adjournment. That done, a message was sent the lords, to acquaint them with what had passed the preceding day, with their adjournment and commitee appointed to sit at Guild-hall.

Charles goes to the common-council of London. p. 283.

His Majesty, having that very day ordered the lord mayor to assemble the common-council, went to Guild-hall. As he passed the streets, he had the mortification to hear people cry, "Privileges "of parliament! Privileges of parliament!" Nay, one Henry Walker was so insolent as to throw into his coach a paper, wherein was written, "To your "tents, O Israel." Charles, arriving at Guild-hall, spake thus to the common-council.

His speech to them. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 479.

Gentlemen,

"I Am come to demand such persons as I have "already accused of high-treason, and do be-"lieve are shrouded in the city. I hope no good "man will keep them from me; their offenses are "treason, and misdemeanors of high-nature. I "desire your loving assistance herein, that they may "be brought to a legal trial.

"And whereas there are diverse suspicions raised, "that I am a favorer of the Popish religion; I "do profess, in the name of a King, that I did "and ever will, and that to the utmost of my "power, be a prosecutor of all such as shall any "ways oppose the laws and statutes of this king-"dom, either Papists or Separatists; and not only "so, but I will maintain and defend that true Pro-"testant religion which my father did profess; and "I will continue in it during my life.

Remark on this speech.

King Charles seems to have forgot the situation of his affairs, and to fancy himself still in the same state as before his war with Scotland. He could not surely be ignorant that the city of London was not very well affected to him, nor had reason to be so: yet he believed they would espouse his cause against the parliament, and deliver up the five members, whereof there was not the least probability. On the other hand, he could be still less ignorant, that it was chiefly in London that the Presbyterians were numerous and powerful, and yet he affected to say, he would maintain and defend the Protestant religion which the King his father had professed, and prosecute to the utmost of his power as well Separatists as Papists. To be frank, I see not the necessity or use of such a declaration, before the common-council of a city much more inclined to Presbyterianism than to the church of England, as was soon after notoriously evident.

The commitee full of business. Jan. 6, 7, 8. p. 480. Clarendon, p. 285.

During this the commitee, which sat at Guild-hall, were diligently taking informations of what passed the fourth of January, and preparing matters for their report to the house against their meeting. The commitee had intelligence, that sir John Byron, made lieutenant of the Tower, in Lunsford's stead, had sent to Whitehall a hundred fire-arms, with two barrels of powder. Rushworth, the relator of this particular, affirms the matter, being farther inquired into, was found to be true: but I know not whether we may intirely credit his testimony, tho' what he says is not improbable.

On the seventh, the Londoners presented to his Majesty a petition, which plainly shewed they were more inclined to the parliament than to him. "They represented their great fears and distrac-"tions, by reason of the progress of the rebels in "Ireland, fomented by the Papists in England "and their adherents: the want of aid to suppress "them, and the intimations received from abroad "and at home, of a design to extirpate the Pro-"testants: the puting out persons of honor and "trust from being constable and lieutenant of the "Tower: the preparations there lately made: the "fortifying Whitehall in a very unusual manner: "the indeavors used to the inns of court: the call-"ing diverse canoneers into the Tower: the disco-"very of sundry fire-works in the hands of a Pa-"pist: the misunderstanding betwixt his Majesty "and the parliament, thro' misinformation: his "Majesty's late going to the house of commons, "attended with a great multitude of armed men, "beside his ordinary guard, for the apprehending "diverse members, contrary to the privilege of "parliament:

CHARLES I An' 1641.

The city of London's petition. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 480. Nalson, Vol. II. p. 481.

This petition was very sufficient to convince Charles how far he was mistaken in his opinion, that the city of London was well disposed in his favor. He nevertheless returned a very mild answer to each of the articles, viz.

The King's answer. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 481.

"That, as for the business of Ireland, there was "nothing on his part unoffered or undone; and he "hoped, by the speedy advice and assistance of his "parliament, that great and necessary work would "be put in a sure forwardness, to which he would "contribute all his power.

"For the Tower; he wondered that, having "removed a servant of good trust and reputation "from that charge, only to satisfy the fears of the "city, and put in another of unquestionable repu-"tation and known ability, the petitioners should "still entertain those fears: and whatever prepara-"tions were there made, it was with as great an "eye of safety and advantage to the city as to his "own person.

"For the fortifying Whitehall with men and "munition, he doubted not but the petitioners "had observed the strange provocation he had re-"ceived to entertain that guard; and if any citi-"zens were wounded or ill treated, he was confi-"dently assured, that it happened by their own evil "and corrupt demeanors.

"That he knew no other indeavors to the inns "of court than a gracious intention; that he re-"ceived the tender of their loyal and dutiful affec-"tions with very good approbation and accept-"ance, with incouragement given them to continue "the same upon all occasions.

"For his going to the house of commons; he "was verily persuaded that, if the petitioners knew "the clear grounds upon which those persons stood "accused of high-treason, they would believe his "going thither was an act of grace and favor to "that house, and the most peaceable way of hav-"ing that necessary service for the apprehension of "those persons performed; especially, if such or-"ders had been made, which he was not willing "to believe, for the resistance of all lawful autho-"rity, as were discoursed of: and for the proceed-"ings against those persons, he ever intended the "same should be with all justice and favor, accord-"ing to the laws of the realm.

He concluded with these words, "And this ex-"traordinary way of satisfying a petition of so un-"usual a nature, his Majesty is confidently per-"suaded will be thought the greatest instance "can be given of his Majesty's clear intentions to "his subjects, and of the singular estimation he hath

Jan. 8. Proclamation to apprehend the five members. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 482.

On the morrow, January 8, Charles iſſued a proclamation, commanding all magiſtrates, and officers of juſtice, to apprehend the accuſed members, and carry them to the Tower.

While the commitee was aſſembled at Guild-Hall, they took the information of two witneſſes, who depoſed, that they heard captain Hide ſay what plainly evidenced his having ſome ill deſign againſt the houſe of commons.

Reſolution of the commitee. p. 481.

It was thereupon reſolved, that the ſheriffs of London and Middleſex ſhould raiſe the 'poſſe comitatus' for their ſafe going to Weſtminſter that day the parliament ſhould meet. Whereupon the watermen (1) came and tendered their ſervice, to guard the commitee by water to the parliament-houſe, which offer was accepted. But the apprentices proffer of accompanying them by land was refuſed.

p. 483.

Mean while, the commitee of twenty-four, having appointed a ſub-commitee to examine the affairs in queſtion, made their report, January 10, of what reſolutions had been taken; viz.

That the publiſhing ſeveral articles of high-treaſon againſt lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the houſe of commons, was a high breach of the privileges of parliament, a ſeditious act, tending to the ſubverſion of the peace of the kingdom.

That the privileges of parliament, ſo violated and broken, could not be fully and ſufficiently vindicated, unleſs his Majeſty would be pleaſed to diſcover the names of thoſe perſons who adviſed him to ſeal the chambers and ſtudies of the accuſed members; to ſend a ſerjeant at arms to the houſe of commons to demand them; to iſſue warrants under his own hand to apprehend them; to come in perſon to the houſe; to publiſh the articles of accuſation in the form of a proclamation; that ſuch pernicious counſellors might receive condign puniſhment.

His Majeſty quits London. p. 484.

The commitee of twenty-four determining to return next day to the parliament with a numerous guard, the King thought not proper to be expoſed to the danger of receiving ſome affront from the populace; and therefore choſe to withdraw to Hampton-court, and two days after to Windſor.

The commitee return to the houſe. Ibid.

January eleven, the commons being aſſembled at Weſtminſter, the commitee of twenty-four came thither by water, conducted by great numbers of ſeamen and others, while the London militia marched thro' the city in arms, to guard them alſo by land.

Charles repents his conduct.

It was then that Charles found he had taken wrong meaſures, and that his imprudent conduct could not but grieve him, and ruin his affairs. He repented of what he had done, and wiſhed he could appeaſe the diſorder himſelf had raiſed. To this end, next day, January twelve, he ſent the following meſſage to both houſes:

His meſſage to both houſes p. 484. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 488.

" poſed, his Majeſty will proceed thereupon in an
" unqueſtionable way, and aſſures his parliament,
" that upon all occaſions he will be as careful of " their privileges, as of his life or his crown.

He deſiſts from his method of proceeding.

Had there not been a ſettled deſign againſt King Charles, this meſſage would have ſufficed to pacify all, ſince he plainly manifeſted a repentance for what he had done, and in ſome meaſure acknowledged his fault. But he had given his adverſaries too many advantages for them to neglect improving this fair occaſion. I have obſerved, there were many members, in both houſes, not yet determined to join with thoſe who ſought only to throw all into diſorder and confuſion. Some began to penetrate into the Preſbyterians deſigns. Others had ſcruples, which they could not maſter when they reflected that the kingdom's utter ruin would be indangered by a bare diſtruſt, of a no very certain foundation. But their doubts became certainties, after the King's late procedure. Before the accuſation of the ſix members, it was dubious whether Charles had any thought of ſeeking vengeance on thoſe who had offended him: but this accuſation rendered ſuch deſign very manifeſt. It was doubtful, whether his condeſcenſion for the parliament was conſtrained: but this accuſation diſcovered, that he believed himſelf deprived of part of his rightful authority, and conſidered what the parliament had done, with reſpect to himſelf, as high-treaſon: for if the depriving him of part of his authority was treaſon, thoſe who had voted for triennial parliaments, and the continuance of this, could not be guiltleſs. If attempting to render the Sovereign odious to his ſubjects was treaſon, aſſuredly the ſix members were not the only criminals. If inviting the Scotiſh army into England was treaſon, how could the houſe of commons clear themſelves, after having rewarded the Scots, for their invaſion, with a preſent of three hundred thouſand pounds? If it was treaſon to indeavor ſubverting the rights, and the very being of parliaments, both houſes were guilty of this crime, when they aſſumed, by an act, the power of not being diſſolved, or prorogued, without their own conſent, ſince this was altering the nature of parliaments. If raiſing tumults was treaſon, the countenancing and incouraging ſuch tumults was no leſs ſo, and of this the whole houſe of commons were guilty. Finally, the charge againſt theſe particular members for conſpiring to levy, and for actually levying war againſt the King, neceſſarily aimed at the whole houſe, who had countenanced tumultuous aſſemblies, ſet themſelves a guard, and provided themſelves arms.

CHARLES I An' 1641.

Conſiderations on the imprudent accuſation of the members, in reſpect to the juncture.

All theſe filled with reflections thoſe who, 'till then, had preſerved a good-will for King Charles and entertained of him ſome favorable ſentiments. They plainly ſaw what judgment this Prince made of the parliament's actions, tho' he attacked ſix members only. The ſhallow artifice of loading on a few the whole body's crimes, had been proper, with regard to former parliaments, while the King was maſter: but it was ineffectual with the preſent parliament, and at ſuch a juncture. After redreſſing paſſed grievances, the point was to know, whether his Majeſty's word was to be relied on, and he reſtored to his natural ſtate. Many were of this ſentiment, as they could not imagine that, after what had been tranſacted in this parliament, that Monarch would attempt governing thenceforwards, as he had done before. They could not, from a bare motive of apprehenſion and diffidence, reſolve to alter the government's conſtitution, by abridging the Sovereign's authority. Others maintained, that Charles's condeſcenſion was all diſſimulation, and his word not to be depended on. Theſe men, to bring the reſt to their opinion, were forced to uſe various artifices to agravate and miſinterpret this Prince's actions, and nevertheleſs were not yet able to compaſs their ends: but, by accuſing the ſix members, Charles himſelf furniſhed them with arguments

arguments not eaſy to be anſwered. They had no farther need of uſing ſigns and conjectures to prove what they advanced, ſince the King himſelf ſupplied them with ſuch evident demonſtrations. So we may ſay, that King Charles never followed more pernicious counſel than this. If lord Digby was his counſellor, as is reported, it may be affirmed, that he drew him to a precipice whence it was not poſſible ever to free himſelf.

Thenceforwards, the queſtion was not to know, whether it was neceſſary to limit the regal power, but to know within what bounds it ſhould be confined; they who had hitherto been moſt moderate, having intirely loſt their doubts touching Charles's ſincerity: ſo the party which was moſt oppoſite to him, being grown incomparably ſuperior in both houſes, and meeting with little oppoſition, they who wiſhed to do him ſervice judged it ſafeſt, either to abſent themſelves from the parliament, or to be ſilent, in expectation of ſome opportunity to ſerve him effectually, ſhould affairs take a new turn. Hereby the adverſe party became ſtill more powerful.

It is therefore apparent that, in the parliament's then diſpoſition, Charles's laſt meſſage was not a ſufficient means to oblige his adverſaries to alter their meaſures; eſpecially as by this meſſage he deſiſted not from the accuſation, but only from the manner of proceeding, tho' it was eaſy to perceive he took this method only to extricate himſelf leſs diſhonorably. Accordingly, the commons expreſſed not for it much regard. January ſeventeen, they came to the like reſolutions with thoſe taken by the commitee in London, and digeſted them into a declaration. They only added the depoſitions of ſome witneſſes, touching the number of armed men who attended his Majeſty's going to the houſe, and who, according to theſe depoſitions, were about five hundred; touching the inſolent behavior of certain officers who accompanied him, with the words they uſed at the houſe door, which ſeemed to denote their waiting only for a ſignal to fall upon the members. Queſtionleſs, all theſe particulars were highly agravated: but theſe agravations were ſubſervient to thoſe ends the commons propoſed. They however declared, "That they deſigned "not to ſcreen their members, when accuſed of "treaſon or miſdemeanor, and proſecuted accord- "ing to law and the privileges of parliament: on "the contrary, they ſhould be always ready to "bring them to a ſpeedy and due trial; being "ſenſible that it equally imported them, as well "to ſee juſtice done againſt criminals, as to de- "fend the juſt rights and liberties of the ſubjects "and parliament of England."

Declaration of the commons. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 484. Clarendon, p. 286, 294.

Before this declaration was publiſhed, Charles had ſent to both houſes the following meſſage, which ſhewed how deſirous he was of giving them content, and terminating this unhappy affair.

Charles's ſecond meſſage to the parliament. Jan. 14. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 488. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 858.

"His Majeſty being no leſs tender of the pri- "vileges of parliament, and thinking himſelf no "leſs concerned that they be not broken, and that "they be aſſerted and vindicated whenſoever they "are ſo, than the parliament itſelf, hath thought "fit to add to his laſt meſſage this profeſſion; "that in all his proceedings againſt lord Kim- "bolton, and the reſt of the accuſed members, "he had never the leaſt intention of violating the "leaſt privilege of parliament: and, in caſe any "doubt of breach of privilege remains, will be "willing to clear that, and aſſert thoſe by any "reaſonable way which his parliament ſhall adviſe "him to; upon confidence of which, he no way "doubts his parliament will forthwith lay by all "jealouſies, and apply themſelves to the public "and preſſing affairs, and eſpecially to thoſe of "Ireland, wherein the good of this kingdom and "the true religion (which ſhall ever be his Ma- "jeſty's firſt care) are ſo highly and ſo nearly "concerned. And his Majeſty aſſures himſelf, "that his care of their privileges will increaſe their "tenderneſs of his lawful prerogative, which are "ſo neceſſary to the mutual defenſe of each other; "and both which will be the foundation of a per- "petual perfect intelligence between his Majeſty "and the parliament, and of the happineſs and "proſperity of his people."

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

This meſſage (for the above reaſon) was not capable of ſatisfying the commons. On the contrary, next day they had the attorney-general, ſir Edward Herbert, examined at the bar of the upper-houſe. His anſwers being laid before the commons, they ordered him to be accuſed of ſeveral high crimes and miſdemeanors, viz. of having violated the privileges of parliament, in exhibiting to the houſe of lords the articles he received from Charles's own hand, with expreſs command to exhibit them.

The commons impeach the attorney-general. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 488, 489. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 850, 873.

Two days after, both houſes petitioned his Majeſty, that they might be informed, what proof he had againſt the ſix members, that they might be ſpeedily proſecuted *. Charles replied, "He "thought it unuſual or unfit to diſcover what proof "was againſt them, before he was certain of the "way he was to proceed, leſt a new miſtake ſhould "breed more delays. That it ſhould therefore be "reſolved, whether his Majeſty was bound, in "reſpect of privilege, to proceed againſt them by "impeachment in parliament, or whether he was "at liberty to prefer an indictment at common "law, in the uſual way, or have his choice of "either."

Petition that his Majeſty would ſhew what proof was againſt the accuſed members. Jan. 21.

* In a parliamentary way. Charles's anſwer. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 491. Jan. 21.

This anſwer could not but imbaraſs the two houſes, ſince his Majeſty was willing to follow their directions, in the proſecution of thoſe accuſed members. Accordingly, they thought not proper to reſolve upon either of the methods Charles had propoſed. They contented themſelves with replying, in a ſecond petition, "That finding there "was ſtill no legal and parliamentary proceedings "againſt the accuſed members, they thought it "their duty once more to beſeech his Majeſty to "inform the parliament, what proof there was "againſt them, that they might be called to a "legal trial, it being the undoubted right and pri- "vilege of parliament, 'That no member can "be proceeded againſt without conſent of parlia- "ment."

The parliament inſiſt on their demand. Feb. 2. p. 492.

Charles, plainly perceiving there would be no end, and that new difficulties would be perpetually ſtarted, indeavored at once to terminate this affair by the following anſwer.

"That, as he once conceived that he had ground "enough to accuſe them, ſo now his Majeſty finds "as good cauſe wholly to deſert any proſecution of "them. And for a farther teſtimony of his Ma- "jeſty's real intention towards all his loving ſub- "jects (ſome of whom haply may be involved in "ſome unknowing and unwilling errors) for the "better compoſing and ſettling of all fears and jea- "louſies of what kind ſoever, his Majeſty is ready "to grant as free and general a pardon, for the "full contentment of all his loving ſubjects, as "ſhall, by the approbation of both houſes of par- "liament, be thought convenient for that purpoſe.

The King's third meſſage. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 492.

It was eaſy to perceive that Charles offered this general pardon only to have it ſaid, that the ſix members were exempted from the law's rigor by virtue of his pardon. But the parliament, not ſatisfied with his offer, addreſſed him with a third petition, deſiring that, according to two acts of the thirty ſeventh and thirty eighth of Edward ward III (1), his Majeſty would be pleaſed to ſend to the parliament thoſe perſons who had made ſuggeſtion or information to him of the ſix members crimes, that ſo the rights and privileges of parliament might be vindicated, which in juſtice ought not to be denied.

Sentence upon the attorney-general. April 23. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 490.

Charles not returning any anſwer to the petition, the affair reſted here, except that in April following the houſe of peers gave ſentence againſt the attorney-general, declaring him incapable of all offices but that of attorney-general, and commiting him to the Fleet-priſon during the houſe's pleaſure.

Tho' this affair was ſeemingly concluded, his Majeſty was upbraided with it a thouſand times afterwards. But before we quite leave it, I am of opinion it will not be amiſs to make ſome remarks on this ſubject, that I may not be obliged to reſume it elſewhere.

Remarks on the commons procedure.

Tho' the commons made much noiſe about the breach of their privileges, that was not the thing whereat they were moſt inſenſed. Their main grievance was Charles's having ſelected, to charge with high-treaſon, five members of their houſe who were its chief leaders and directors: ſo, to accuſe theſe five members was, as I obſerved, to accuſe the whole houſe. Now, if his Majeſty deemed the houſe guilty of treaſon, for having done that whereof he accuſed only five members, what aſſurance could there be that he would ſtrictly obſerve his promiſes, which, in his opinion, were extorted from him by traitors? There was reaſon therefore to ſuſpect his having ſome grand deſign, and that before the execution he was willing to ſecure thoſe who were moſt capable to obſtruct it, as well by their abilities, as by their great credit in the parliament and with the people. Such was the impreſſion that unſeaſonable accuſation made on the parliament; and to this contributed likewiſe Charles's zeal to ſeize thoſe five members, which even made him go perſonally to the houſe of commons to apprehend them, a thing never before done by any King of England: nay, very probably, had they been in the houſe, and made any reſiſtance, he would have imployed armed men, who attended him to the number of about five hundred, to carry them away. This was ſufficient to inſenſe againſt him thoſe who had hitherto conſidered as a doubtful point, whether his promiſes were to be relied on. It could not be conceived that, at a time when the moderate members began to unite in his favor, to eſtabliſh a ſolid peace, he ſhould be induced to take a ſtep ſo odiouſly extravagant, and ſo deſtructive of it, had he not deſigned to cruſh the parliament by violence. Thus the complaints of both houſes, about the breach of their privileges, was properly only a pretenſe to cover the true reaſon of their apprehenſions. As this reaſon was not of ſufficient evidence to convince the people, who could regard it but as a bare ſuſpicion, they inſiſted only on their privileges, 'till they ſhould ingage Charles to declare himſelf more openly. Their real aim was therefore to oblige this Prince to take ſome new ſtep, which might ſhew the nation it was not without cauſe they accuſed his Majeſty of ſiniſter deſigns. Certainly this was the motive of the parliament's petition, to be informed of the proofs before the method of proceeding ſhould be determined. This was a ſnare laid for King Charles, to ingage him to produce proofs of a crime whereof the whole parliament was no leſs guilty than the members accuſed, and thereby convince the public that he aimed at the parliament itſelf. But Charles avoided this ſnare, by droping the proſecution rather than be obliged to produce proofs which, after miſſing his aim, muſt have redounded to his prejudice. Breach of privilege was not the main article in queſtion, but the King's ſecret intention. By his late conduct, he had left room to preſume that a rupture between him and the parliament was not very remote, ſince he had deſtroyed that confidence whereon alone peace and a good harmony could be founded. In this light muſt his accuſing the ſix members be viewed, and not as a ſeparate fact relating only to the privileges of parliament.

It is therefore, in my opinion, very little to the purpoſe that ſome have undertaken to diſcuſs exactly this queſtion; whether the two houſes could legally refuſe ſending to priſon their members accuſed of high-treaſon? However I ſhall briefly ſpeak to this point, for my reader's better information.

Moſt certainly, the privileges of parliament extend not to crimes of high-treaſon, and in ſuch caſes the commons have no more right than the peers. But it is alſo a not diſputable maxim, that no member can be proceeded againſt without the conſent of his houſe. When a peer is accuſed, it belongs to the houſe of lords to examine, whether the proſecution ought to be admited, and, in caſe of conſent, whether the party accuſed is to be confined, or left free to anſwer the accuſation. Their lordſhips are determined to one or other, by the nature or circumſtances of the crime. It is the ſame with reſpect to members of the lower-houſe. In the preſent caſe, the commons thought there was no reaſon to impriſon their accuſed members, becauſe the accuſation was too general. On the contrary, Charles pretended that, on a bare accuſation, under color of its being for high-treaſon, he had power to apprehend the accuſed, without the conſent of their houſe, and to commit them to the Tower. One may readily ſee that King Charles carried this principle ſomewhat too far; that the privileges of parliament take not place in caſe of high-treaſon, ſince he extended it to a bare accuſation of treaſon: but a ſimple accuſation cannot deprive the houſes of parliament of their right to examine, whether there be reaſon to conſent to the proſecution, by direct proof, probable ſigns, or public evidence. Otherwiſe, the King might have pitched on not only five but a hundred members of the lower-houſe, and ſent them to priſon, on the bare accuſation of treaſon, which would render the privileges of parliament intirely uſeleſs. Nevertheleſs, this Prince acted as if his right was undeniable, tho' that was, at leaſt, the point in queſtion. I ſhall not undertake any farther illuſtration of this point, which has difficulties the ſolution whereof depends on a good knowledge of the Engliſh laws and cuſtoms. I ſhall only add, that King Charles did himſelf a very great injury by this unſeaſonable ſtep, and that his enemies received by it advantages which finally occaſioned his ruin.

The commons greatly miſtruſt Charles's ſincerity.

While the accuſed members affair was in hand, the commons continued to expreſs extreme diffidence of his Majeſty. This diſtruſt daily increaſed, 'till at length it produced a confirmed rupture.

The commons appoint themſelves a guard. p. 495. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 833.

Charles had anſwered the petition of both houſes concerning a guard, that he would appoint a hundred or two of the city militia (ſuch as the lord-mayor ſhould be anſwerable for to him) under command of the earl of Lindſey. But the commons refuſed this offer, and ordered, that two companies of the trained-bands ſhould every day attend upon the houſe as a guard, commanded by ſerjeant-major Skippon.

Aſſembly of officers at Kingſton. Jan. 12. p. 845, 846, 862, &c. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 495. Clarendon, p. 301.

The parliament's diſtruſt of King Charles was daily inflamed by ſucceſſive accidents, which that Prince's enemies knew how to improve. While matters ſtood thus, the parliament received information, that lord Digby, colonel Lunsford, and other diſbanded officers were at Kingſton upon Thames, with about two hundred horſe. Whereupon it was ordered, by both houſes, that the ſheriffs, calling to their aſſiſtance the trained-bands of the ſeveral counties of England and Wales, ſhould ſuppreſs all unlawful aſſemblies gathered together to the diſturbance of the kingdom's peace and tranquillity. They feared the King intended to ſecure Portſmouth, and perhaps their fears were not groundleſs. However this be, they ſent orders to colonel Goring, governor of Portſmouth, requiring him not to deliver up the town, nor receive any forces into it, but by his Majeſty's authority ſignified by both houſes of parliament. At the ſame time, the lords ſent expreſs order to lord Digby, to give his attendance in the houſe: but he thought fit to withdraw out of the kingdom (1).

Lord Digby quits the kingdom.

There had now been information, that he was the perſon who adviſed the King to accuſe the ſix members of parliament: beſide, the commons were exaſperated againſt him, on account of his ſpeech againſt the earl of Strafford's bill of attainder, while he was member of that houſe; ſo that the leaſt pretenſe was ſufficient to draw on him their reſentment.

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 502, 503.

The commons made great noiſe about the Kingſton affair, to perſuade the people his Majeſty intended to ſecure Portſmouth: nay, they cauſed ſeveral witneſſes to be examined; but this affair was carried no farther. They were contented with ſending for admiral Pennington, who reported, that lord Digby had ſhewn him a warrant under the King's own hand, to convey him ſafely into France or Holland, and that he durſt not diſobey the order.

The commons ſend Hotham to ſecure Hull. Jan. 1. p. 496. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 833. Clarendon, p. 301.

The parliament's apprehenſions concerning Portſmouth made them think of Hull, a place of great importance in Yorkſhire. The commons, inſtead of concealing, affected rather to diſcover their fears; wherefore they ſent their lordſhips a meſſage: that there was at Hull a magazine of arms for ſixteen thouſand men, and ammunition proportionable: that the town being weakly gariſoned, they deſired their concurrence in ordering, that ſome of that county's militia ſhall be put into Hull, under command of ſir John Hotham, member of the houſe of commons, with orders not to deliver up the place, or magazine, without the King's authority ſignified by both houſes. To this the lords readily conſenting, young Hotham, ſir John's ſon, was inſtantly diſpatched away to Hull to execute this order, 'till his father ſhould be ready to take on him its government.

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

Nothing more clearly manifeſts the parliament's diſtruſt, than this order about Hull; ſince it could be only on the ſuppoſition of a moſt urgent neceſſity, that they could pretend to nominate governors for places; and it was alſo this neceſſity which they deſired to inſinuate to the people. However, the ſequel ſhewed, that the parliament had reaſon to take this precaution.

Bill for the parliament's adjournment to any other place. Ruſhworth, Vol IV. p. 496. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 834.

Since the ſix members were accuſed, ſcarce a day had paſſed but the parliament expreſſed their ſuſpicions of his Majeſty, ſo that all things manifeſtly tended to a rupture. The better to perſuade people that both houſes were apprehenſive of ſome violence from the King, and not ſafe at Weſtminſter, a bill was paſſed to inable them to adjourn whitherſoever they judged proper.

A guard ſet about the Tower. Ruſhworth. Ibid. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 844.

They likewiſe ordered the earl of Newport, maſter of the ordnance, and the lieutenant of the Tower, not to ſuffer any cannon or ammunition to be carried thence: and for the Tower's better ſecurity, the ſheriffs of London and Middleſex were injoined to ſet round it a ſufficient guard, both by land and water. Alſo that day, the commons cauſed to be ſeized certain ſaddles, &c. which were to be ſent to Kingſton.

Falſe information given to the houſe. p. 859, 862. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 497.

Likewiſe, mr. Bagſhaw of Windſor, member of the houſe of commons, informed them, that laſt night, as he was going to Windſor (where the King then was) he ſaw diverſe troops of horſe, and that there came thither a waggon loaded with ammunition, and another waggon ſo loaded was ſent thence to Portſmouth: adding, there were at Windſor four hundred horſe, with about forty officers; whereupon Skippon was ordered to detach ſome horſe towards Windſor, for intelligence: but, in all appearance, no very great diſcovery was made, ſince nothing more was ſaid of the matter.

The lords decline petitioning againſt Byron. January 15. Ibid.

After that, the commons requeſted their lordſhips to join with them in a petition to his Majeſty, for the removal of ſir John Byron from the lieutenancy of the Tower, and offered their reaſons: but the lords thought fit to decline it.

The peers prohibit Eſſex's and Holland's going to court. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 836. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 497.

During this, their lordſhips being informed by the earl of Eſſex, that Charles had laid his commands on him and the earl of Holland, to attend him at Hampton-court, as lord-chamberlain and groom of the ſtole, they would not diſpenſe with their abſenſe; alleging, that their attendance in parliament, about the nation's high affairs, was truer ſervice to his Majeſty than any they could do him at court. Charles ſoon after removed both thoſe noblemen from their places (2).

Differences between both houſes about the Scotiſh ſuccors. p. 498.

Amidſt theſe differences between King and parliament, Ireland was left unſuccored. The commons would not pay ten thouſand men, who ſhould be levied by the King's commiſſions. They pretended, theſe troops ſhould be raiſed by way of preſſing, in order to chuſe ſuch for ſoldiers as ſhould be leaſt attached to the King, and that his Majeſty ſhould not be at all concerned in the levies. The bill for preſſing had been ſent up to the lords, who had not yet paſſed it, whereof the commons complained very loudly. At length the Scotiſh commiſſioners, ſeeing that the differences between Charles and his parliament retarded concluding the treaty for which they were ſent, bethought themſelves of offering their mediation to his Majeſty and both houſes, to procure a pacification. But Charles was offended at their offer, becauſe they had not firſt privately communicated to him their intentions. The two houſes, contrariwiſe, thanked them for this mark of their affection.

The parliament accepts it. p. 501.

Mean while, the commitee for Iriſh affairs, finding that kingdom wanted a ſpeedy aſſiſtance, and that the treaty for the ten thouſand Scots was not likely to be concluded ſoon enough, made the Scotiſh commiſſioners a propoſal, that the Scots ſhould ſend into Ireland two thouſand five hundred men, then in a readineſs, 'till the treaty for the ten thouſand ſhould be ended; to which the commiſſioners of Scotland agreed. To that purpoſe, they propounded certain conditions, which were approved by both houſes. But Charles objected to one of the conditions, which was, that Carrick-Fergus, a ſea-port in the north of Ireland, ſhould be delivered to the Scots. He ſaid, it was too great a truſt for auxiliary forces: but ſeeing the parliament willing to confide in the Scots, he thought he ſhould not refuſe that confidence to his native ſubjects. It muſt be obſerved, that the King and commons expreſſed a like deſire to aſſiſt Ireland; but each will have it in their own way. Charles wiſhed to have a body of Engliſh ſent thither, and blamed the commons for not haſtening the levies. The commons, on their ſide, ſuſpected Charles's aim was to leave England unprovided of men, arms and ammunition, and therefore inſiſted on the Scot's treaty for ten thouſand men, and charged his Majeſty with being the ſole cauſe of all obſtacles to the concluſion of that treaty: nay, they plainly intimated that, tho' the King ſeemed to preſs for Ireland's being relieved, he had no real intention to contribute towards its relief. Neceſſity however finally obliged the King and both houſes to accept the two thouſand five hundred Scots, who were ſent into the north of Ireland, where they did good ſervice.

Remark on the commons diſtruſt.

The commons ceaſed not to ſhew openly their diſtruſt of King Charles. This was abſolutely neceſſary to the execution of the deſigns of thoſe who had then the chief management of that houſe's affairs. But it follows not becauſe it was neceſſary to divulge this diffidence, that therefore it was imaginary. The leading men of that party did not indeed believe they had reaſon to confide in this Prince, and withal, it was their intereſt to ſhew the public the grounds of their diſtruſt. This they did in a ſolemn manner, by means of a ſpeech, delivered by mr. Pym, at a conference with the lords. This whole ſpeech merits being inſerted, ſince it ſhews by what ſteps the commons indeavored to compaſs their ends.

Pym's ſpeech to the lords. p. 503. Clarendon, p. 316.

My lords,

"I Am commanded by the knights, citizens and "burgeſſes, aſſembled for the commons in parliament, to preſent to your lordſhips diverſe petitions, which they have received, from ſeveral parts, concerning the ſtate of the kingdom: whereunto they are chiefly moved by that conſtant affection which they have always expreſſed, of maintaining a firm union and good correſpondence with your lordſhips; wherein they have ever found much advantage and contentment; but never held it more important and neceſſary than at this time, wherein the wiſdom and reſolution of parliament have as many great dangers and difficulties to paſs thro' as ever heretofore.

"We are united in the public truſt, which is derived from the commonwealth, in the common duty and obligation whereby God doth bind us to the diſcharge of that truſt; and the commons deſire to impart to your lordſhips, whatſoever information or intelligence, whatſoever incouragement or aſſiſtance they have received from thoſe ſeveral counties which they "repreſent, that ſo likewiſe we may be united in the ſame intentions and indeavors of improving all to the ſervice of his Majeſty, and the common good of the kingdom. Charles I An' 1641.

"The petitions which I am directed to communicate to your lordſhips, are four; from London, Middleſex, Eſſex, and Hertfordſhire. We have received many more, but it would take up too much time, and be too great a trouble to peruſe all; and in theſe four, you may perceive the effect and ſenſe of all: firſt, I am to deſire your lordſhips to hear them read, and then I ſhall purſue my inſtructions in propounding ſome obſervations out of them.

The petition of the lord-mayor and aldermen of London.

Sheweth,

"THAT the commitee of this honorable houſe, upon Saturday the 22d of this inſtant January, ſent a meſſage to the petitioners, for the loan of one hundred thouſand pounds, or of ſo much thereof as could conveniently be forthwith raiſed, for levying of forces to ſuppreſs the rebels in Ireland: to which meſſage ſomething was then anſwered, and a farther anſwer in writing promiſed. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 504, &c.

"In performance whereof, they humbly preſent the anſwer following, together with the reaſon thereof, deſiring that the ſame (being the beſt they are for the preſent able to give) may favorably be accepted.

As this anſwer is very long, and contains ſeveral particulars not abſolutely neceſſary, I ſhall inſert here only what is moſt material.

"That how ſenſible ſoever they were of the great miſeries of their brethren in Ireland, and of the imminent danger, not only of the total loſs of that kingdom, but of the ruin of this alſo, if that of Ireland ſhould be loſt; yet they are compeled to declare, 'That they have no power to raiſe any ſums by way of tax for any foreign uſe;' and that they have no means to do it, otherwiſe than by the immediate perſonal conſent of every lender, which they cannot hope to obtain, in regard of theſe obſtructions following:

"1. That immediately before the parliament, and ſince, diverſe great ſums, for the ſervice of the King and kingdom, have been already lent by the citizens of London, beſide fifty thouſand pounds for the ſupply of Ireland in particular; a great part whereof ſome of the lenders were obliged to borrow, and cannot to this day repay.

2. That ſuch part of thoſe monies as ſhould have been repaid out of the poll-money and ſubſidies, is not yet done.

"3. That the ſaid ſum of fifty thouſand pounds, lent for Ireland, was haſtened and ſpeedily paid, upon account of the urgent neceſſities of that kingdom; and yet no conſiderable forces are ſent thither to this day.

"4. The general with-holding of very great ſums of money from the petitioners, and many others, doth render diverſe perſons of good eſtate and credit hardly able to go on with trade, or to pay their debts, and maintain their charge.

"5. The refuſing to accept the offers of Scotland, to ſend ten thouſand men into Ireland, diſcourageth moſt men from lending any money, were they ever ſo able.

"6. The not paſſing the bill for preſſing ſoldiers put many men into fears, that there may rather be ſome deſign there to loſe Ireland, and to conſume this kingdom in the loſing Ireland, than to preſerve either the one or the other; ſince it cannot be conceived, that the rebels (being "grown

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" growe ſo powerful) will be ſuppreſſed by volun-
" teers. (1)

" 7. The ſlow iſſuing of commiſſions to thoſe
" who, being in Ireland, or going thither, are wil-
" ling to enter the field againſt the rebels, diſables
" them from doing any effectual execution upon the " enemy, unleſs in their own defenſe; and ſo all
" the monies which have been, or may be ſent thi-
" ther, are exhauſted to maintain our forces, to do
" little or nothing worthy of them, rather than im-
" ployed to chaſtiſe the rebels: by means whereof,
" thoſe rebels are ſo much imboldened, that they
" boaſt, they will extirpate the Britiſh nation there,
" and then make England the ſeat of war.

" 8. The not diſarming Papiſts here in England,
" after many diſcoveries of their treacheries and
" bloody deſigns; the great decays of fortifica-
" tions, block-houſes, and other ſea-forts; the not
" managing them, nor furniſhing them with ord-
" nance and ammunition; the not placing all of " them in ſuch hands in whom the parliament may " confide; and the not ſeting this kingdom in a
" poſture of defenſe, in times of ſo many fears
" and jealouſies of foreign invaſions, and inteſtine
" conſpiracies; the not removing the preſent lieu" tenant of the Tower, and puting ſuch a perſon
" into that place, as may be well approved of by
" the parliament, notwithſtanding the earneſt pe" titions exhibited to the houſe of commons for
" that purpoſe, which hath produced a forbear-
" ance to bring bullion into the Tower, in this " time of ſcarcity of monies; all which cannot
" but overthrow trading more and more, and
" make monies yet more ſcarce in the city and
" kingdom.

" 9. The King's ſhips are not fited and imployed,
" as the preſent condition of this kingdom and Ire-
" land requires, but ſome of them for conveying
" away delinquents (2).

" 10. The not queſtioning thoſe many thouſands
" of unknown perſons, who are ſheltered in Covent-
" garden, and thereabouts, which do not imploy
" themſelves in any lawful calling, and, it is very " probable, lie in a readineſs to adventure upon
" ſome deſperate attempt.

" 11. The miſunderſtanding between the King
" and the parliament; the not vindicating the pri-
" vileges of parliament; the not ſuppreſſing pro-
" tections; the not puniſhing delinquents; and the
" not executing all Prieſts and Jeſuits legally con" demned, while others, contrary to privilege of " parliament, have been charged with treaſon.

" 12. By means of the premiſſes, there is ſuch
" decay of trading, and ſuch ſcarcity of money,
" as it is likely, in a very ſhort time, to caſt innu" merable multitudes of poor artificers into ſuch a " depth of poverty and extremity, as may inforce
" them upon ſome dangerous and deſperate at" tempts.

" Theſe are the evils under which the petitioners
" do exceedingly labor and languiſh, which they
" humbly conceive to have ſprung from the im-
" ploying ill-affected perſons in places of truſt and
" honor in the ſtate, and near to the ſacred perſon
" of his Majeſty; and that theſe evils are ſtill con" tinued by means of the votes of biſhops and Po-
" piſh lords from the houſe of peers."

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 506.

The Eſſex petitioners thanked the commons for their extraordinary care; repreſenting withal, that they were ſtill apprehenſive of a " great ſtop of re-
" formation in matters of religion," and of the whole kingdom's being in apparent danger from Papiſts: nor could they expect any redreſs, except biſhops and Popiſh lords were removed from the houſe of peers.

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 507.

Thoſe of the county of Hertford prayed, that the Papiſts might be diſarmed; the kingdom put into a poſture of defenſe; the forts and ſtrong places commited to ſuch hands as the parliament might confide in; the privileges of parliament repaired; indeavors uſed to take away the votes of Popiſh lords and biſhops; Ireland ſpeedily relieved; delinquents brought to farther puniſhment; preſſures and grievances in church and ſtate removed; and whatever ſhall be amiſs reformed.

Theſe petitions being read, mr. Pym thus proceeded.

My lords,

" IN theſe four petitions, you may hear the " voice, or rather the cry of all England, and
" you cannot wonder if the urgency, the extremity,
" of the condition wherein we are do produce ſome
" earneſtneſs and vehemency of expreſſion more
" than ordinary; the agony, terrors and per-
" plexity in which the kingdom labors is univer-
" ſal, all parts are affected with it; and therefore
" in theſe you may obſerve the groans and miſer-
" able complaints of all. Diverſe reaſons may be " given, why thoſe diſeaſes which are epidemical,
" are more dangerous than others: 1. The cauſe of
" ſuch is univerſal and ſupernatural; not from an " evil conſtitution, or evil diet, or any other acci" dent; and ſuch cauſes work with more vigor
" and efficacy, than thoſe which are particular and " inferior. 2. In ſuch diſeaſes there is a commu-
" nicative quality, whereby the malignity of them
" is multiplied and inforced. 3. They have a
" converting, transforming power, which turns
" other diſeaſes and evil affections of mens bodies
" into their own nature.

" 1. The common and epidemical diſeaſe,
" wherein this commonwealth now lies gaſping,
" hath a ſuperior and univerſal cauſe from the evil
" counſels and deſigns of thoſe who, under his Ma-
" jeſty, bear the ſway in government. 2. It hath
" a contagious and infectious quality, whereby it is
" diffuſed and diſperſed thro' all parts of the king-
" dom. 3. It is apt to take in the diſcontents,
" evil affections and deſigns of particular perſons,
" to increaſe and fortify itſelf.

" I ſhall take occaſion, from ſeveral branches of " thoſe petitions which your lordſhips have heard,
" to obſerve:

" 1. The variety of dangers to which this king-
" dom is now ſubject.

" 2. The manifold diſtempers which are the
" cauſe of thoſe dangers.

" 3. The multiplicity of thoſe evil influences,
" which are the cauſes of thoſe diſtempers.

" The firſt danger is from enemies abroad: this " may ſeem a cauſeleſs and impertinent obſervation
" at this time, ſeeing we are at peace with all na" tions about us; but, my lords, you may be
" pleaſed to conſider, that the ſafety of the king" dom ought not to depend upon the will and
" diſpoſition of our neighbors, but upon our own
" ſtrength and proviſion: betwixt ſtates, there are " often ſudden changes from peace to war, accord" ing to occaſion and advantage; all the ſtates of " Chriſtendom are now armed, and we have no rea-
" ſon to believe, but thoſe of greateſt power have an " evil eye upon us in reſpect of our religion; and
" if their private differences ſhould be compoſed,
" how dangerouſly, how ſpeedily might thoſe great
" armies, and other preparations now ready, be " applied to ſome enterpriſe and attempt againſt

(1) They would inſinuate by this, that an army raiſed in the uſual manner by the King's commiſſions, would be very unfit to reduce Ireland, becauſe the King did not wiſh the rebels to be ſubdued. Rapin.

(2) They mean lord Digby. Rapin.

" us?

Charles I An' 1641.

" us? And if there were no other cauſe, this were " ſufficient to make us ſtand upon our guard; but " there are diverſe more eſpecial ſymptoms of dan- " gers of this kind. We may perceive, by ſeveral " advertiſements from abroad, that they did fore- " ſee our dangers many months before they broke " out; they could foretel the time and manner of " them, which is a clear evidence, they held intel- " ligence with thoſe who were the contrivers and " workers of the preſent troubles. We have many " dangerous traitors and fugitives now in other " parts, who can diſcover the weakneſs and di- " ſtemper of the kingdom; who hold intelligence " with the ill-affected party here, and, by all cun- " ning and ſubtil practiſes, indeavor to incite and " provoke other Princes againſt us. Some of the " miniſters of our neighbor Princes may be juſtly " ſuſpected to have had a more immediate hand " and operation in the inſurrection and rebellion of " Ireland; many of the commanders and moſt of " the ſoldiers, levied for the ſervice of Spain, are " now joined with the rebels there; and thoſe Iriſh " friers who were imployed by the Spaniſh embaſ- " ſador for making thoſe levies, are known to be " the chief incendiaries of this rebellion, and are " ſtill very active in the proſecution and incourage- " ment of it. The rebels have a ready and ſpeedy " ſupply from our neighbors. Two convoys of " munition and arms we are certainly informed of; " one from Dunkirk, the other from Nantz in " Bretagne; and certainly thoſe who are ſo for- " ward to inable others to hurt us, will not forbear " to hurt us themſelves, as ſoon as they ſhall have " means and opportunity to do it.

" Another danger is from the Papiſts and ill- " affected party at home. The Papiſts here are " acted by the ſame principles with thoſe in Ire- " land, many of the moſt active of them have " lately been there; which argues an intercourſe " and communication of council. They have " ſtill ſtore of arms and munition at their diſ- " poſing, notwithſtanding all our indeavors to " diſarm them; they have a free reſort to " the city and the court; they want no opportu- " nity to conſult together; they have the ſame or " greater incouragement from above, and from " about, (1) than ever, in reſpect of the example " and ſucceſs of the rebels in Ireland, and the great " confuſions and diviſions which, by their cunning " and ſubtil practiſes, are raiſed and fomented " among ourſelves at home.

" A third danger is of tumults and inſurrections " of the meaner ſort of people, by reaſon of their " ill vent of cloth and other manufactures, whereby " great multitudes are ſet on work, who live for " the moſt part by their daily getings, and will, " in a very ſhort time, be brought to great extre- " mity, if not imployed. Nothing is more ſharp " and preſſing than neceſſity and want; what they " cannot buy they will take; and from them the " like neceſſity will quickly be derived to the far- " mers and huſbandmen; and ſo grow higher, " and involve all in one equality of miſery and " diſtreſs, if it be not prevented: and, at this " time, ſuch tumults will be dangerous, becauſe " the kingdom is full of diſbanded ſoldiers and " officers, who will be ready to head and to ani- " mate the multitude to commit violence with more " ſtrength and advantage; and if they once grow " into a body, it will be much more difficult to " reduce them into order again, becauſe neceſſity " and want, which are the cauſe of this diſturb- " ance, will ſtill increaſe, as the effects do increaſe.

" A fourth danger is from the rebels in Ireland, " not only in the reſpect of that kingdom, but in " reſpect of this. They have ſeized upon the body " of that kingdom already: they abound in men " of very able bodies; they increaſe in arms and " munition; they have great hopes of ſupplies " from abroad, of incouragement here, and are " ſure of good entertainment from the Popiſh " party, ſo that they begin to ſpeak already there " of tranſporting themſelves hither, and making " this kingdom the ſeat of the war. The diſtem- " per which hath yet produced theſe dangers is va- " rious and exceeding violent. Whenſoever nature " is hindered in her operations and faculties, di- " ſtempers will neceſſarily follow.

Charles I An' 1641.

" The obſtructions which have brought us into " this diſtemper are very many, ſo that we cannot " wonder at the ſtrength and malignity of it. " Some of the chiefeſt of theſe obſtructions I ſhall " indeavor to remember.

" 1. The obſtruction of reformation in matters " of religion. No grievances are ſharper than thoſe " which preſs upon the tender conſciences of men; " and there was never church or ſtate afflicted with " more grievances of this kind than we have been: " and tho' they are, by the wiſdom of this parlia- " ment, partly eaſed and diminiſhed, yet many ſtill " remain; and as long as the biſhops and corrupt " part of the clergy continue in their power, there " will be little hope of freedom, either from the " ſenſe of thoſe which continue, or the fear of thoſe " which are removed. And of this obſtruction, " my lords, I muſt clear the commons; we are no " part guilty of it: ſome good bills have paſſed " us, and others are in preparation, which might " have been paſſed before this, if we had not found " ſuch ill ſucceſs in the other. Whatſoever miſ- " chief this obſtruction ſhall produce, we are free " from it, we may have our part in the miſery, " we can have no part in the guilt or diſhonor.

" 2. Obſtruction in trade. It is the trade which " brings food and nouriſhment to the kingdom: it " is that which preſerves and increaſes the ſtock of " the whole, and diſtributes a convenient portion " of maintenance to every part of it; therefore " ſuch obſtruction as this muſt needs be dangerous; " the freedom of trade being ſo neceſſary, the be- " nefit ſo important, as that it gives life, ſtrength " and beauty to the whole body of the common- " wealth: but I muſt proteſt, the houſe of com- " mons have given no cauſe to this obſtruction; " we have eaſed trade of many burdens and heavy " taxes, which are taken off; we have freed it " from many hard reſtraints by patents and mono- " polies; we have been willing to part with our " own privileges to give incouragement; we have " ſought to put the merchants into ſecurity and " confidence in reſpect to the Tower of London, " that ſo they might be invited to bring their bul- " lion to the mint, as heretofore they have done; " and we are no way guilty of the troubles, the fears, " and publick dangers which make men withdraw " their ſtocks, and keep their money by them, to " be ready for ſuch ſudden exigents, as intheſe great " diſtractions we have too much cauſe to expect.

" 3. The obſtructions in the relief of Ireland. It " muſt needs be accounted a great ſhame and diſ- " honor to this kingdom, that our neighbors have " ſhewed themſelves more forward to ſupply the " rebels, than we have been to relieve our di- " ſtreſſed brethren and fellow ſubjects: but I muſt " declare, that we are altogether innocent of any " neglect herein. As ſoon as the firſt news of the " rebellion came over, we undertook the war, not " by way of ſupply and aid, as in former rebel- " lions the ſubjects uſed to do, but we undertook " the whole charge of it, and we ſuffered not

(1) That is to ſay, from the King, Queen, and miniſtry. Rapin.

twenty-

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" twenty-four hours to paſs before we agreed to a " great levy of money and men, to be imployed " againſt the rebels, even in a larger proportion " than the lords-juſtices and council there did deſire; " and from time to time we have done all for the " fartherance thereof, tho' in the midſt of many " diſtractions and diverſions; but the want of com- " miſſion for levying men, for iſſuing arms, and " diverſe other impediments have been the cauſes " of that obſtruction; and I wiſh we had not only " found impediments to ourſelves, but alſo in- " couragements to them. Many of the chief com- " manders, now in the head of the rebels, after " we had, with your lordſhips concurrence, ſhut " up the ports againſt Iriſh Papiſts, have been " ſuffered to paſs, by his Majeſty's immediate " warrant, much to the diſcouragement of the " lords-juſtices and the council there, and this " procured, as we believe, by ſome evil inſtru- " ment too near his regal perſon, without his Ma- " jeſty's knowledge and intentions.

" 4. The obſtruction in proſecution of delin- " quents: many we have already brought unto your " lordſhips; diverſe others we have been diſ- " couraged to tranſmit; ſuch difficult proceedings " have we met withal; ſuch terrors and diſcoun- " tenance have been caſt upon ourſelves and our " witneſſes, and thoſe who have ſhewed themſelves " their friends and patrons, have found it the moſt " ready way to preferment (1); yea his Majeſty's " own hand hath been obtained, his Majeſty's ſhips " been imployed for tranſporting diverſe of thoſe " who have fled from the juſtice of this par- " liament (2).

" 5. A general obſtruction and interruption of " the proceedings of parliament, by thoſe manifold " deſigns of violence (which thro' God's mercy we " have eſcaped) by the great and frequent breaches " of privilege, by the ſubtil indeavors to raiſe parties " in our houſe, and jealouſies betwixt the two " houſes.

" 6. The obſtruction in providing for the de- " fenſe of the kingdom, that we might be inabled " to reſiſt a foreign enemy, to ſuppreſs all civil in- " ſurrections; and what a preſſing neceſſity there " is of this, the exceeding great decays in the navy, " in the forts, in the power of ordering the militia " of the kingdom, and means of furniſhing them " with munition, are ſufficient evidences, known " to none better than to your lordſhips; and what " indeavor we have uſed to remove them (but " hitherto without the ſucceſs and concurrence " which we expect) and where the ſtop hath been, " and upon what good grounds, we may claim our " own innocency and faithfulneſs in this; we deſire " no other witneſſes but yourſelves.

" Laſtly, I come to the evil influences which " have cauſed this diſtemper, and I ſhall content " myſelf to mention ſome few of thoſe which are " moſt apparent and important.

" 1. In the firſt place, I ſhall remember the evil " counſels about the King, whereof we have often " complained. Diſeaſes of the brain are moſt " dangerous; becauſe from thence ſenſe and motion " are derived to the whole body. The malignity " of evil counſels will quickly be infuſed into all " parts of the ſtate. None can doubt but we have " exceedingly labored under moſt dangerous and " miſchievous counſels. This evil influence hath " been the cauſe of the preparation of war with " Scotland, of the procuring a rebellion in Ireland, " of corrupting religion, ſuppreſſing the liberty of " this kingdom, and of many fearful and horrid " attempts, to the ſubverting the very being of " parliaments, which was the only hopeful means " of oppoſing and preventing all the reſt; and " this doth appear to be a moſt predominant evil " of the time; whereat we need not wonder, when " we conſider how counſellors have been prefered " and prepared: and I appeal to your lordſhips " own conſciences, whether the giving, and the " countenancing of evil counſels have not been " almoſt the only way to farther advancement.

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" 2. The diſcouragement of good counſels. " Diverſe honeſt and approved counſellors have " been put from their places; others ſo diſcoun- " tenanced, as that the way of favor hath been ſhut " againſt them, and that of danger and deſtruction " only open to them.

" 3. The great power which a factious and in- " tereſted party hath in the parliament, by the con- " tinuance of the votes of biſhops and Popiſh lords " in your lordſhips houſe; and the taking in of " others, both out of the houſe of commons, and " otherwiſe, to increaſe their ſtrength.

" 4. The fomenting and cheriſhing a malignant " party throughout the whole kingdom.

" 5. The manifold jealouſies betwixt the King, " his parliament, and good ſubjects, whereby his " protection and favor have in a great meaſure been " with-held from them; their inclinations and re- " ſolution to ſerve and aſſiſt him, have been very " much hindered and interrupted. We have often " ſuffered under the miſinterpretation of good " actions, and falſe imputation of evil, which we " never intended: ſo that we may juſtly purge " ourſelves from all guilt of being authors of this " jealouſy and miſunderſtanding. We have been " and are ſtill ready to ſerve his Majeſty with our " lives and fortunes, with as much chearfulneſs and " earneſtneſs of affection as ever any ſubjects were; " and we doubt not but our proceedings will ſo " manifeſt this, that we ſhall be as clear in the " apprehenſion of the world, as we are in the " teſtimony of our own conſciences.

" I am now come to a concluſion, and I have " nothing to propound to your lordſhips, by way " of requeſt or deſire from the houſe of commons. " I doubt not but your judgments will tell you what " is to be done; your conſciences, your honors, " your intereſt will call upon you for the doing it; " the commons will be glad to have your help and " concurrence in ſaving the kingdom; but if they " ſhould fail of it, it ſhould not diſcourage them " in doing their duty. And whether the kingdom " be loſt or ſaved (as thro' God's bleſſing I hope " it will be) they ſhall be ſorry that the ſtory of " this preſent parliament, ſhould tell poſterity " that, in ſo great a danger and extremity, the " houſe of commons ſhould be inforced to ſave " the kingdom alone, and that the houſe of peers " ſhould have no part in the honor of its preſerva- " tion, you having ſuch great intereſt in the good " ſucceſs of thoſe indeavors, in reſpect of your great " eſtates, and high degrees of nobility.

" My lords, conſider what the preſent neceſſities " and dangers of the commonwealth require; what " the commons have reaſon to expect; to what in- " deavors and counſels the concurrent deſires of all " the people do invite you: ſo that applying your- " ſelves to the preſervation of the King and king- " dom, I may be bold to aſſure you, in the name " of all the commons of England, that you ſhall " be bravely ſeconded."

Remarks on this ſpeech.

This ſpeech I judged proper to give intire, becauſe the commons reſolution of diveſting Charles of great part of his prerogatives, which they termed ſaving the kingdom, therein manifeſtly appears. Next is here ſeen the plan they were forming, under color of applying a cure to the epidemical diſeaſe, the dangers, cauſes and evil influences whereof were by Pym methodically deſcribed. Tho' he did not explain the manner of cure, it was eaſy to infer from his diſcourſe, that it was neceſſary to prevent the dangers, remove the cauſes, and apply ſtrong antidotes againſt the evil influences which inflamed the malady.

The firſt remark I ſhall make on this ſpeech is, that it was a preparative to diſpoſe the people to ſee, without ſurpriſe, the violent remedies deſigned for the removal of a diſeaſe which was induſtriouſly repreſented as almoſt incurable. Were I not apprehenſive it would lead me too far, I could readily make appear, that all the commons ſubſequent proceedings were intimated in this long harangue.

I ſhall add another remark, no leſs important and requiſite: and that is; had the commons ſchemes been founded only upon idle notions and chimeras, they would never have met with ſo many adherents ready and eager to accompliſh them. Had the people of England been never oppreſſed, vain would have been the indeavors to perſuade them to think ſo. Had not King Charles attempted to eſtabliſh deſpotiſm, had not his miniſters, his counſellors, all perſons in public offices, helped to execute this deſign, how would it have been poſſible to convince the people of its reality? Had not the prelates and high-commiſſion abuſed their power; if, in order to be farther removed from the Preſbyterians, they had not introduced ceremonies and innovations, wherein there was but too much affectation of mimicking the Romiſh rituals, never could the people have been perſuaded there was a deſign to introduce Popery. Had the King always ſtrictly obſerved his word, how would it have been practicable to inſpire the people with ſo great a diſtruſt of him? By what band would the members of parliament have been united in the deſign of extenuating the regal power? How ſhould ſuch a notion have entered their minds? It may therefore be affirmed, that theſe projects were founded on very real and true facts, but which the Preſbyterians artfully improved, to the accompliſhment of their private ends: nevertheleſs, it muſt be owned, that moſt of theſe facts were agravated, miſinterpreted, and even inflamed with groundleſs inſinuations.

Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 888, &c.

I ſhall farther obſerve, that they who ſay theſe petitions, preſented to the houſe of commons, were all begged, ſeem to ſay it very juſtly, or at leaſt, with great probability. It is difficult to believe, that thoſe to whom theſe petitions were aſcribed could have uſed a language ſo agreeable to the aim and intentions of the commons, if they had not been drawn up by perſons fully informed of their deſigns. Indeed, in anſwer to this objection, it is alleged, that theſe petitions were not formed upon the views of the commons, but that the houſe framed their reſolutions upon theſe petitions, which informed them of the nation's deſire: but we do not find they ever framed their reſolutions upon other petitions directly contrary to theſe, which were alſo preſented them from time to time, and which agreed not with their principles. On the contrary, we ſee that, for the moſt part, theſe latter were rejected or not regarded by the houſe.

The commons thank mr. Pym. Jan. 25.

The commons were ſo pleaſed with mr. Pym's ſpeech, that mr. Speaker was ordered to give him thanks for it, and deſired him to print it, that it might be diſperſed among the people. But Charles took great offenſe at it, particularly, at what mr. Pym ſaid concerning paſſes granted for Ireland, "That ſince the ſtop upon the ports againſt all Iriſh "Papiſts, by both houſes, many of the chief com- "manders, now in the head of the rebels, have "been ſuffered to paſs, by his Majeſty's immediate "warrant." His Majeſty ſaid, it was a black calumny, and by a meſſage demanded, that the houſe ſhould make him a ſolemn reparation, and diſavow what Pym had aſſerted; but the commons, who were not then diſpoſed to oblige this Prince, anſwered; That what mr. Pym had ſaid was agreeable to the ſenſe of the houſe: that it was true, ſince the ſtop upon the ports by both houſes, ſeveral perſons, who were now commanders among the rebels, had paſſed into Ireland with his Majeſty's immediate warrant, ſome of whom they named. Charles replied, that theſe paſſes were obtained while he was in Scotland, and before he knew of the order of parliament, and inſiſted upon the vindication he had already required. The commons anſwered, by a declaration, maintaining what they had advanced, and adding, that his Majeſty's paſſes were not only for thoſe they had before named, but alſo "for ſuch a one and his company, for "ſuch a one and four other perſons." The King replied, theſe were only inferences drawn from the paſs-ports, which could not ſerve for foundation to Pym's aſſertion in his ſpeech. He inſiſted again upon reparation: but the commons thought not proper to return any anſwer.

But this diſpute between King Charles and his parliament was of little importance, in compariſon of another, which alſo then occurred, about the militia and command of the forts. But for the better underſtanding this matter, which is one of the principal affairs of this reign, it is abſolutely neceſſary to know what had paſſed about it already.

Difference between the King and parliament about the militia. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 516, &c. Clarendon, p. 304.

After King Charles's return from Scotland, it was eaſy for him to perceive that the commons intended to deprive him of great part of his authority. The remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom, preſented him at a time when, without ſuch a deſign, it ſeemed very needleſs, was as the ſignal of the war preparing againſt him. Whatever had been ſince done, tended to the ſame end, i. e. to diſcredit his government, and to impute to him ſundry deſigns, under the name of his counſellors, the Papiſts, and of a diſaffected party. It is not ſurpriſing that, finding himſelf in this ill ſituation, he thought betimes of providing againſt the attacks to which he was likely to be ſoon expoſed. But who can affirm that, if he had ſucceeded in puting himſelf in a condition to reſiſt, he would have remained upon the defenſive? However this be, the precautions he would have taken againſt his enemies ſerved but to render their accuſations more plauſible.

In January 1641-2, when the affair of the members accuſed and breach of privileges was warmly debating, Charles, not knowing how it might end, formed the deſign of ſecuring Hull. This place was very conſiderable, as well by its ſituation, as a large magazine of arms and ammunition (1), which could procure a great advantage to that party who ſhould have it in his power, in caſe of a rupture. To this end, the earl of Newcaſtle, by his Majeſty's order, repaired to Hull under a counterfeit name, to conſult with ſome of the King's friends, and among others with captain Legg, how to oblige the mayor to deliver to him the town and magazine, or to obtain it by force, if the mayor would not give his conſent. This taking vent, their lordſhips ordered Newcaſtle to attend the ſervice of the houſe, which he did, after receiving his Majeſty's pleaſure, without being aſked at his return, whence he came.

p. 304. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 564.

(1) Upon the diſbanding the late army in the north, all the artillery, arms, and ammunition, provided for that ſervice, had been, by the King's command, ſent to Hull, where it ſtill remained. Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 304.

But

CHARLES I. AN' 1641.

But ſome days after, the commons, as I have obſerved, moved that ſir John Hotham might be ſent to Hull, to which the lords agreed the more readily, as they were not ignorant upon what deſign the earl of Newcaſtle had been diſpatched thither. Orders to take the command of Hull were therefore given to Hotham, by both houſes, without his Majeſty's being therewith acquainted.

January 11. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 833.

Soon after, the militia affair being now commenced, Charles again formed the deſign of ſecuring Hull and Portſmouth. To that purpoſe, colonel Goring, governor of Portſmouth, whom this Prince had ſecretly gained, was to receive the Queen into Portſmouth, after which, he had orders to depart for Hull and take the command of that place. Probably, there was ſome courſe taken for its ſurrender to him. This deſign was diſcovered, tho' it was communicated to only three perſons, and the King thought not proper to purſue it, for fear of a diſappointment.

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 496. Clarendon, p. 326.

If hereto are ſubjoined the ſuſpicions entertained by the parliament, that the late aſſembly at Kingſton was in order to ſurpriſe Portſmouth, and the Queen's intended journey thither had the ſame motive: that the lieutenancy of the Tower given to Lunsford might be in purſuance of the King's deſign to ſecure at once the three ſtrongeſt places in the kingdom, it will not be ſurpriſing to ſee the parliament henceforwards full of fears and jealouſies. For tho' the commons had given King Charles but too much reaſon to take precautions for his defenſe, theſe very precautions, had they ſucceeded, would have been no leſs prejudicial to the public than if they had been without a plauſible foundation. So, as his Majeſty had reaſon to fear that the parliament intended to deprive him of his authority, the parliament had no leſs cauſe to ſuſpect that Prince was privately laboring their ſubjection. In this diſpoſition, neither the one nor the other took any ſtep which was not ſuſpected to cover ſome ill deſign. Conſequently every thing tended to a rupture. The ſole concern of both parties was to gain the public to their intereſt. The parliament ſtrenuouſly indeavored it by rendering the King odious, and cheriſhing thoſe fears and ſuſpicions already infuſed into the people: their aim was to convince the nation of the neceſſity of extraordinary proceedings, in a caſe ſo uncommon. The King, on his part, ſedulouſly repreſented, that the parliament did nothing but violate the laws, and ſubvert the government's conſtitution, under color of maintaining them. Thus much it was neceſſary to premiſe, before I entered on the militia affair, to facilitate a reader's comprehending the motives of this Prince's and the parliament's conduct and procedure.

Eight days after young Hotham's ſeting out for Hull (whither his father, ſir John, alſo arrived within a few weeks) Charles ſent to both houſes this propoſal:

Charles's meſſage to both houſes. January 20. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 516. Clarendon, p. 309.

"That they will, with all ſpeed, fall into a "ſerious conſideration of all thoſe particulars which "they ſhould hold neceſſary, as well for the up"holding and maintaining his Majeſty's juſt and "regal authority and for ſetling his revenue, as "for the preſent and future eſtabliſhment of their "privileges, the free and quiet injoyment of their "eſtates and fortunes, the liberties of their perſons, "the ſecurity of the true religion now profeſſed in "the church of England, and the ſetling of cere"monies in ſuch a manner as may take away all "juſt offenſe; which, when they ſhall have digeſted "and compoſed one intire body, that ſo his Ma"jeſty and themſelves may be able to make the "more clear judgment of them, it ſhall then appear, "by what his Majeſty ſhall do, how far he hath "been from intending, or deſigning any of thoſe "things, which the too great fears and jealouſies "of ſome perſons ſeem to apprehend, and how "ready he will be to exceed the greateſt examples "of the moſt indulgent Princes in their acts of "grace and favor to their people."

CHARLES I. AN' 1641.

His views in this meſſage.

It manifeſtly appears that Charles had three views in making this propoſition. The firſt, to find the houſes imployment, and procure himſelf time to prepare. The ſecond was, to know at once the utmoſt extent of his enemies deſigns, which could not but be advantageous to him and injurious to them, with regard to the public. His third view was, to ſhew his ſubjects how willing he was to conſent to whatever ſhould be capable of procuring a perfect reconciliation between him and his parliament. As to his ſaying, "How ready he "ſhould be, &c." it was only a general promiſe, liable to numberleſs reſtrictions and explications, and which properly laid him not under any obligation.

The commons perfectly well perceived the ſnare Charles laid for them: but they perplexed him no leſs by their anſwer to his propoſition. They, in a petition, gave him to underſtand; "That they re"turned to his Majeſty their moſt humble thanks, "reſolving to take this meſſage into ſpeedy and "ſerious conſideration; and to inable them, with "ſecurity, to diſcharge their duties therein, they "deſired the peers to join with them, in humbly "beſeeching his ſacred Majeſty, to raiſe up unto "them a ſure ground of ſafety and confidence, by "puting the Tower and other principal forts of the "kingdom, and the whole militia thereof, into "the hands of ſuch perſons as the parliament might "confide in, and as ſhould be recommended unto "his Majeſty by both houſes of parliament (1)."

Anſwer of the commons. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 517. Nalſon, Vol. II. p. 860, 880, &c. Clarendon, p. 312.

By this anſwer, the commons made a preliminary of the moſt important point, to be ſetled between his Majeſty and the parliament, and which being granted would have put it in the parliament's power to do whatever they pleaſed. They moreover inſinuated to the people, that the parliament's diſtruſt of their Sovereign muſt have been grounded on ſtrong preſumptions, ſince there was no way to labor a reconciliation, and ſettle the nation's right ſo long as the King ſhould be maſter of the forts and militia.

Their views.

Concerning the Tower of London, Charles replied; "That having prefered a perſon of a "known fortune, and unqueſtionable reputation to "that truſt, he did not expect he ſhould be preſſed "to remove him, without any particular charge "againſt him: that notwithſtanding, if upon due "examination any particular ſhould be preſented "to his Majeſty, whereby it might appear, that "he was miſtaken in his opinion of Byron, and "that he was unfit for the truſt commited to him, "he would make no ſcruple of diſcharging him; "but otherwiſe, he was obliged, in juſtice to him"ſelf, to preſerve his own work, leſt his favor "and good opinion might prove a diſadvantage "and misfortune to his ſervants, without any other "accuſation.

Remark thereon.

Such a general anſwer was not ſufficient to ſatisfy the commons: nay, it rather ſeemed very plainly to intimate that his Majeſty would not concede to what was intended to be aſked. However he removed ſir John Byron from the Tower, and gave the lieutenancy thereof to ſir John Conyers, recommended to him by the commons: but this was a favor he readily granted, as it prejudiced not his rights. Nevertheleſs, ſome few days after, the following petition was preſented him by both houſes.

To the King's moſt excellent Majeſty; the humble petition of the lords and commons aſſembled in parliament.

Moſt gracious Sovereign,

Petition of both houſes to his Majeſty. Feb. 2. Clarendon, p. 328. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 518.

" THE preſent evils and calamities wherewith " your kingdoms are moſt miſerably in- " tangled; the imminent dangers which threaten " your royal perſon, and all your people, have " cauſed us, your moſt faithful and obedient ſub- " jects, the lords and commons in this preſent par- " liament, with thankfulneſs to entertain, and with " all earneſtneſs of affection and indeavors to purſue " the gracious propoſition and direction which, not " long ſince, we have received from your Majeſty. " And we have thereupon taken into our moſt " ſerious conſideration the ways and means of ſe- " curing the ſafety of your royal perſon; preſerving " the honor and authority of your crown; re- " moving all jealouſies betwixt your Majeſty and " your people; ſuppreſſing the rebellion in Ireland; " preventing the fears and dangers of this kingdom, " and the miſchievous deſigns of thoſe who are " enemies to the peace of it. And that we may, " with more comfort and ſecurity, accompliſh our " duties herein, we moſt humbly beſeech your " Majeſty, that you will be pleaſed forthwith to " put the Tower of London, and all other forts, " and the whole militia of the kingdom, into the " hands of ſuch perſons as ſhall be recommended to " your Majeſty by both houſes of parliament*: " which, they aſſure themſelves, will be a hopeful " entrance into thoſe courſes, which (thro' God's " bleſſing) ſhall be effectual for the removing all " diffidence and miſapprehenſion betwixt your Ma- " jeſty and your people, and for eſtabliſhing and " inlarging the honor, greatneſs and power of your " Majeſty and royal poſterity, and for reſtoring " and confirming the peace and happineſs of your " loyal ſubjects in all your dominions. And to " this our moſt neceſſary petition, we, in all " humility, expect your Majeſty's ſpeedy and gra- " cious anſwer, the great diſtractions and diſtempers " of the kingdom not admiting any delay."

* This was before ſir John Conyers was made lieutenant.

Charles I An' 1641.

The parliament conſtantly ſuppoſed the kingdom to be in extreme danger, and the Papiſts and diſaffected party, or rather the King himſelf, to have ill deſigns; tho' after all, their ſuppoſition was founded merely on conjectures, of which Charles had given ſome occaſion, by attempting to ſecure Hull, as the houſe had been well informed. His Majeſty's anſwer to this petition ran thus; viz.

" His Majeſty having well conſidered of this " petition, and being deſirous to expreſs how " willing he is to apply a remedy, not only to your " dangers, but even to your doubts and fears, he " therefore returns this anſwer; That when he " ſhall know the extent of power which is intended " to be eſtabliſhed in thoſe perſons whom you de- " ſire to be commanders of the militia, in the ſeveral " counties, and likewiſe to what time it ſhall be " limited that no power ſhall be executed by his " Majeſty alone, without the advice of parliament, " then he will declare, that (for the ſecuring you " from all dangers or jealouſies, if any) his Majeſty " will be content to put in all the places, both of " forts and militia in the ſeveral counties, ſuch " perſons as both the houſes of parliament ſhall " either approve or recommend unto him, ſo that " you declare before unto his Majeſty the names of " the perſons whom you approve or recommend, " unleſs ſuch perſons ſhall be named, againſt whom " he ſhall have juſt and unqueſtionable exception.

p. 519. Clarendon, p. 328.

Obſervations on this anſwer.

Charles hereby ſeemed to grant intirely the deſire of both houſes, and yet the ſequel ſhewed it was neither his thought nor intention. For the better underſtanding this anſwer, it will be neceſſary to know how this Prince ſtood diſpoſed. His deſign was to withdraw to York and levy troops in thoſe parts, in order to ſeize Hull, with its magazine: ſo that, to all appearance, from that time he thought of war, whether defenſive or offenſive; and therefore he had determined to ſend the Queen to Holland, under color of conducting thither Princeſs Mary, her daughter, who had eſpouſed the Prince of Orange, and of going to Spa: but withal, he had put into her hands the crown-jewels, which were afterwards diſpoſed of to purchaſe arms and ammunition (1). When the parliament preſented him this petition, he was on the point of ſending away his Queen, w[illegible] done, he intended to retire to York. It was [illegible] therefore his intereſt abſolutely to reject the parliament's requeſt, at ſuch a juncture, for fear of accelerating a ſtorm which might have obſtructed the execution of his two deſigns, and eſpecially that relating to Hull. For this reaſon, he returned the parliament that ſeemingly ſatisfactory anſwer, but which however was not an abſolute conſent, becauſe of ſome additional reſtrictions, whence he deſigned afterwards to draw a pretenſe to render ineffectual his ingagement. Nevertheleſs, the terms of this ingagement were ſo well choſen, that tho' of themſelves they ſignified not Charles's having reſerved to himſelf a power to recede from his word, yet might ſuch a ſenſe be fixed on them by inference. So, in King Charles's intention, this anſwer was ſolely deſigned to gain time. A few days after, he gave the lieutenancy of the Tower to ſir John Conyers, the better to perſuade both houſes he intended to give them ſatisfaction.

Annals, p. 909. Whitlock, p. 54, 55. Ludlow. Clarendon, p. 327.

The parliament preſents Charles a form of ordinance for the militia.

The parliament doubted not Charles's being reſolved to put the militia into the hands of ſuch as they ſhould recommend: and therefore they ordered the draught of an ordinance for regulating the militia to be prepared, with the names of the commanders in each county, on a ſeparate paper, and preſented it to his Majeſty, with a petition deſiring his conſent.

Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 519.

The King's anſwer. p. 521.

Charles replied; the Queen and Princeſs being on their departure for Holland, he had not time to conſider of ſo important an affair, but would ſend an anſwer at his return. He was then on the road, accompanying her Majeſty to Dover.

Mean while the parliament, believing they had reaſon to ſuſpect his Majeſty only ſought to amuſe them, and fearing he had formed ſome private deſign, which he intended to execute before the regulation of the militia, addreſſed him with this other petition:

May it pleaſe your moſt excellent Majeſty;

Petition of both houſes to the King. Feb. 22. Ibid. Clarendon, p. 339.

"YOUR humble and loyal ſubjects, the lords and commons, have with a great deal of grief received your Majeſty's anſwer to their juſt and neceſſary petition, concerning the militia of this kingdom; which your Majeſty, by a gracious meſſage formerly ſent unto them, was pleaſed to promiſe ſhould be put into ſuch hands as your parliament ſhould approve of, or recommend unto you: the extent of their power, and the time of their continuance being likewiſe declared. That being done, and the perſons by both houſes nominated, your Majeſty, nevertheleſs, refers your reſolution herein to a longer and very uncertain time, which (the preſent dangers and diſtractions ſo great and preſſing) is as unſatisfactory and deſtructive as an abſolute denial.

"Therefore we once again beſeech your Majeſty, to take our deſire into your royal thoughts, and to give us ſuch anſwer as may raiſe in us a confidence, that we ſhall not be expoſed to the practiſes of thoſe who thirſt after the ruin of this kingdom, and the kindling of that combuſtion in England, which they have in ſo great a meaſure effected in Ireland; from whence (as we are daily informed) they intended and indeavored to invade us, with the aſſiſtance of the Papiſts here among us.

"Nothing can prevent theſe evils, nor inable us to ſuppreſs the rebellion in Ireland, and ſecure ourſelves, but the inſtant granting of that humble petition, which we hope your Majeſty will not deny to thoſe who muſt, in the diſcharge of their duties both to your Majeſty and the commonwealth, repreſent unto your Majeſty what they find ſo abſolutely neceſſary for the preſervation of both, which the laws both of God and man injoin them to ſee put in execution, as ſeveral counties by their daily petitions have deſired of us, and in ſome places begun already to do it of themſelves."

Remark.

The parliament wiſhed to have his Majeſty's conſent to this regulation of the militia. This would have been advantageous to them, on all accounts: but however, in the caſe they ſuppoſed the kingdom to be, they did not think the King's conſent was ſo abſolutely neceſſary, that this regulation could not be ſetled and executed without his concurrence. Wherefore to ſhew him it would be in vain to make oppoſition, they had ſo ordered matters, that in ſome places the people had, of their own accord, divided themſelves into companies, choſen officers and, in ſhort, had begun to regulate the militia, without waiting for the royal order. There is no probability that the people would have ventured on taking ſuch a ſtep had they not been ſecure of the parliament's approbation.

King Charles, finding himſelf thus preſſed, ſought other evaſions to amuſe the parliament, yet without openly declaring that his intention was to deny the deſire of both houſes. Here follows his anſwer to the laſt petition.

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

Charles's anſwer. Feb. 28. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 521. Clarendon, P. 341.

"His Majeſty having, with his beſt care and underſtanding, peruſed and conſidered that which was ſent him from both houſes, for the ordering of the militia, preſented unto him to be made an ordinance of parliament, by the giving of his royal aſſent; as he can by no means do it, for the reaſons hereafter mentioned, ſo he doth not conceive himſelf obliged, by any promiſe made in his anſwer, of the ſecond of this month, to the petition of both houſes, to yield the ſame.

"His Majeſty finds great cauſe to except againſt the preface or introduction to that order, which confeſſeth a moſt dangerous and deſperate deſign upon the houſe of commons, of late ſuppoſed to be an effect of the bloody counſels of Papiſts and other ill-affected perſons, by which many may underſtand (looking upon other printed papers to that purpoſe) his coming in perſon to the houſe of commons, on the fourth of January, which begat ſo unhappy a miſunderſtanding between him and his people; and for that, tho' he believes it, upon the information ſince given, to be an apparent breach of their privilege, and hath offered to repair the ſame for the future, by any act which ſhall be deſired of his Majeſty, yet he muſt declare, and require to be believed, that he had no other deſign upon that houſe, or any member of it, than to require (as he did) the perſons of thoſe five gentlemen his Majeſty had the day before accuſed of high-treaſon; and to declare, that he meaned to proceed againſt them legally and ſpeedily, upon which he believes that houſe would have delivered them up; and his Majeſty calls the Almighty God to witneſs, that he was ſo far from any intention or thought of force or violence, altho' that houſe had not delivered them according to his demand, or in any caſe whatſoever, that he gave thoſe his ſervants, and others, who waited on his Majeſty, expreſs charge and command, that they ſhould give no offenſe to any man; nay, if they received any provocation or injury, that they ſhould bear it without return; and his Majeſty neither ſaw or knew that any perſon of his train had any other weapons, but his penſioners and guards thoſe with which they uſually attend his Majeſty, and the other gentlemen ſwords. And therefore his Majeſty doubts not, but his parliament will be regardful of his honor herein, that he ſhall not undergo any imputation, by the raſh or indiſcreet expreſſions of any young men then in his train, or by any deſperate words uttered by others, who might mingle with them without his conſent or approbation.

"For the perſons nominated to be lieutenants of the ſeveral counties of England and Wales, his Majeſty is contented to allow that recommendation; only concerning the city of London, and ſuch corporations as, by ancient charters, have granted unto them the power of the militia, his Majeſty doth not conceive that it can ſtand with juſtice, or polity, to alter their government in that particular.

"And his Majeſty is willing forthwith to grant every of them (that of London, and thoſe other corporations excepted) ſuch commiſſions, as he hath done during this parliament, to ſome lord-lieutenants by your advice; but if that power be not thought enough, but that more ſhall be thought fit to be granted to thoſe perſons named, than by the law is in the crown itſelf; his Majeſty holds it reaſonable, that the ſame be by law firſt veſted in him, with power to transfer it to thoſe

Charles I An' 1641.

" perſons, which he will willingly do; and what" ever that power ſhall be, to avoid all future
" doubts and queſtions, his Majeſty deſires, it
" may be digeſted into an act of parliament rather " than an ordinance; ſo that all his loving ſub-
" jects may thereby particularly know, both what
" they are to ſuffer, and what they are not to ſuffer,
" for their neglect, that there be not the leaſt lati-
" tude for his good ſubjects to ſuffer under any
" arbitrary power whatever.

" As to the time deſired for the continuance of " the powers to be granted, his Majeſty giveth
" this anſwer; that he cannot conſent to diveſt
" himſelf of the juſt power which God and the " laws of this kingdom have placed in him, for the
" defenſe of his people, and to put it into the hands
" of any other, for any indefinite time. And,
" ſince the ground of this requeſt from his parlia-
" ment, was to ſecure their preſent fears and jea-
" louſies, that they might with ſafety apply them-
" ſelves to the matter of his meſſage of the twentieth
" of January, his Majeſty hopeth, that his grace
" to them, ſince that time, in yielding to ſo many " of their deſires, and in agreeing to the perſons
" now recommended to him by his parliament,
" and the power before expreſſed to be placed in
" them, will wholly diſpel thoſe fears and jealouſies;
" and aſſureth them that, as his Majeſty hath now
" applied this unuſual remedy to their doubts, ſo
" (if there ſhall be cauſe) he will continue the ſame,
" to ſuch time as ſhall be agreeable to the ſame
" care he now expreſſeth toward them.

" And in this anſwer, his Majeſty is ſo far from " receding from any thing he promiſed, or intended
" to grant in his anſwer to the former petition,
" that his Majeſty hath hereby conſented to all
" was then aſked of him, by that petition concern" ing the militia of the kingdom (except that of " London, and thoſe other corporations) which " was to put the ſame into the hands of ſuch
" perſons as ſhould be recommended unto him by
" both houſes of parliament: and his Majeſty
" doubteth not, but the parliament, upon well
" weighing the particulars of this his anſwer, will " find the ſame more ſatisfactory to their ends,
" and the peace and welfare of all his good ſub-
" jects, than the way propoſed by this intended
" ordinance, to which, for theſe reaſons, his Ma-
" jeſty cannot conſent.

" And whereas his Majeſty obſerveth, by the " petition of both houſes, preſented to him by the " earl of Portland, ſir Thomas Heal, and ſir
" William Savile, that in ſome places certain
" perſons begin already to intermeddle of them-
" ſelves with the militia, his Majeſty expecteth
" that his parliament ſhould examine the particulars
" thereof, it being a matter of high concernment
" and very great conſequence.

" And his Majeſty requireth that, if it ſhall
" appear to his parliament, that any perſons what-
" ſoever have preſumed to command the militia
" without lawful authority, they may be proceeded
" againſt according to law."

In this anſwer were diverſe particulars which could not but diſguſt the parliament. 1. The exception of London, and ſuch other corporations as, by Charles, had the power of the militia, which was taking away with one hand what he ſeemed to give with the other, ſince very few towns of any note were without ſuch charters: beſide, it appeared not that either London or any other corporation deſired to be maintained in this privilege; Charles ſuppoſed it without conſulting them. 2. In complaining, there was no fixed time for the continuance of the powers of the lieutenants, he offered none himſelf: ſo it was a point to be debated which might long amuſe. 3. As to his promiſing to prolong the time, if there ſhould be cauſe, it was properly nothing, ſince it is certain his general promiſes were not relied on, eſpecially when attended with ſuch reſtrictions. 4. His Majeſty mentioned not the government of the forts, tho' a moſt important article. 5. He abſolutely rejected the ordinance, and in perſuading the parliament to change it into an act, he would have indirectly obliged them to acknowledge they had no power to make it, which was intirely contrary to the pretenſions of both houſes. 6. In ſuppreſſing the ordinance and converting it into an act, the bill muſt have been drawn his own way, otherwiſe, he tacitely reſerved to himſelf the power of rejecting it, a power which 'till now had been indiſputable. It was therefore very eaſy to perceive that, by all theſe reſtrictions, Charles ſought only to gain time, and put off the parliament with words only. Accordingly both houſes, having taken his anſwer into conſideration, voted that it was not ſatisfactory, and preſented him a third petition at Theobalds, where he then was.

Charles I An' 1641.

Moſt gracious Sovereign,

Petition of both houſes to the King. March 1. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 523. Clarendon, P. 343.

" YOUR Majeſty's moſt loyal and obedient
" ſubjects, the lords and commons in parlia" ment, do find their juſt apprehenſions of ſorrow
" and fear, in reſpect of the public dangers and " miſeries like to fall upon your Majeſty and the " kingdom, to be much increaſed, upon the re" ceipt of your unexpected denial of their moſt
" humble and neceſſary petition, concerning the " militia of the kingdom; eſpecially grieving,
" that wicked and miſchievous counſellors ſhould
" ſtill have that power with your Majeſty as, in
" this time of imminent and approaching ruin,
" rather to incline your reſolutions to that which " is apt to farther the accompliſhment of the de-
" ſires of the moſt malignant enemies of God's " true religion, and the peace and ſafety of your-
" ſelf and your kingdom, than to the dutiful and " faithful counſel of your parliament. Wherefore
" they are inforced in all humility to proteſt that,
" if your Majeſty ſhall perſiſt in that denial, the " dangers and diſtempers of the kingdom are ſuch
" as will indure no longer delay; but unleſs you
" ſhall be graciouſly pleaſed to aſſure them by
" theſe meſſengers, that you will ſpeedily apply
" your royal aſſent to the ſatisfaction of their for" mer deſires, they ſhall be inforced, for the ſafety
" of your Majeſty and your kingdom, to diſ-
" poſe of the militia by the authority of both
" houſes, in ſuch manner as hath been propounded
" to your Majeſty, and they reſolve to do it ac-
" cordingly.

" They likewiſe moſt humbly beſeech your Ma-
" jeſty to believe, that the dangerous and deſperate
" deſign upon the houſe of commons, mentioned in " their preamble, was not inſerted with any in" tention to caſt the leaſt aſperſion upon your Ma-
" jeſty, but herein they reflected upon that malig-
" nant party, of whoſe bloody and malicious
" practiſes they have had ſo often experience, and
" from which they can never be ſecure, unleſs
" your Majeſty will be pleaſed to put from you

"must needs be a cauſe of great danger and "diſtraction (1).

"That your Majeſty will likewiſe be graciouſly "pleaſed to continue the Prince his Highneſs in "theſe parts at St. James's, or any other of your "houſes near London (2), whereby the deſigns "which the enemies of the religion and peace of "this kingdom may have upon his perſon, and "the jealouſies and fears of your people, may be "prevented. And they beſeech your Majeſty to "be informed by them that, by the laws of the "kingdom, the power of raiſing, ordering and "diſpoſing of the militia, within any city, town, "or other place, cannot be granted to any cor-"poration by charter, or otherwiſe, without the "authority and conſent of parliament; and that "thoſe parts of the kingdom which have put "themſeves in a poſture of defenſe againſt the "common danger, have therein done nothing but "according to the declaration and direction of "both houſes, and what is juſtifiable by the laws "of the kingdom.

"All which, their moſt humble counſel and "deſires, they pray your Majeſty to accept, as "the effect of that duty and allegiance which they "owe unto you, and which will not ſuffer them "to admit of any thoughts, intentions, or in-"deavors, but ſuch as are neceſſary and advan-"tageous for your Majeſty's greatneſs and honor, "and the ſafety and proſperity of the kingdom, "according to that truſt and power which the "laws have repoſed in them."

Before I give his Majeſty's anſwer, it will not be improper to make ſome remarks on this petition. As my deſign is, in this ſecond part of Charles I's reign, to give my readers a true idea of the differences between that Prince and his parliament, that they may with more readineſs comprehend the real grounds of the inſuing civil wars, it will not, I hope, be taken amiſs that, by remarks on the papers on both ſides, I point out certain particulars which might poſſibly have eſcaped general obſervation.

Remarks on this petition.

Firſt, the imminent danger, the approaching ruin ſo much talked of by the parliament, was not ſo evident as they pretended. But they conſtantly ſuppoſed, there was a Popiſh and malignant party, who had formed a deſign to ruin the kingdom and the Proteſtant religion, and that the King's evil counſellors adviſed him to whatever could be advantageous to that party. I do not aſſert this ſuppoſition to have been abſolutely groundleſs: but it may be ſaid at leaſt to be grounded upon bare conjectures; beſide, theſe were only generals, under which the parliament concealed the real cauſe of their apprehenſions. They were in dread that the King, by ſecret practiſes, would ſecure the forts and magazines, as it was well known he intended it, and raiſe an army; nay, it could not be doubted that, conſidering his preſent ſtate, he would have done it, had it been in his power. It will hereafter appear that he had thought of it before the time I am ſpeaking of: but when this petition was preſented him, he was only ſuſpected to have ſome great deſign in hand. He was therefore to be prevented by diſpoſing of the militia, by the authority of both houſes, in order to be ready to cruſh thoſe who ſhould declare for him, or to hinder them from declaring. But all this was colored with the pretenſe of puting the kingdom in a poſture of defenſe againſt the malignants machinations. For this reaſon, the pretended deſign of this malignant party was always expreſſed in general terms, without mention of any particulars, and great care was taken to refer to it all the King's actions, and all the events which could have any relation thereto. But it muſt be remembered, as I have often ſaid, that the parliament's intention was to diveſt the King of the greateſt part of his authority, and that Charles's deſign was to ſcreen himſelf from the impending misfortunes, and in ſo doing, he would have put himſelf alſo in a ſtate of attacking, had he been ſuffered to do it. This is properly the key to ſuch papers as were publiſhed on both ſides, concerning the militia, tho' both King and parliament indeavored to varniſh their reſpective proceedings with pretenſes capable of dazzling the people.

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

I ſhall next remark that the parliament, in this petition, took no notice of the reaſons alleged by King Charles in his former anſwer. They were contented with always ſuppoſing the deſign of ſubverting religion and the laws, and with refering to that deſign the removal of the Prince of Wales, and the King's abſenſe from his parliament, to inſinuate, that Charles's reſtrictions to his promiſe were intended only to gain time, in order to favor the malignants.

Laſtly, the parliament's fears that his Majeſty's abſenſe concealed ſome hidden deſign, were not groundleſs, as I ſaid, and as will appear in the ſequel.

All this manifeſts that both King and parliament had but too much cauſe for their mutual diſtruſt. If the parliament, under color of imminent danger to the kingdom, deemed it incumbent on them to require the militia's being put into ſuch hands as they could confide in, King Charles had no leſs reaſon to indeavor hindering both houſes from uſurping a power which muſt ſerve to oppreſs him.

To the parliament's laſt petition his Majeſty returned this anſwer.

Charles's anſwer. March 2. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 524. Clarendon, p. 344.

"I am ſo much amazed at this meſſage, that I "know not what to anſwer. You ſpeak of "jealouſies and fears: lay your hands to your hearts, "and aſk yourſelves, whether I may not likewiſe "be diſturbed with fears and jealouſies: and if ſo, "I aſſure you this meſſage hath nothing leſſened "them.

"For the militia, I thought ſo much of it before "I ſent that anſwer, and am ſo much aſſured "that the anſwer is agreeable to what, in juſtice or "reaſon, you can aſk, or I in honor grant, that I "ſhall not alter it in any point.

"For my reſidence near you, I wiſh it might "be ſo ſafe and honorable that I had no cauſe to "abſent myſelf from Whitehall; aſk yourſelves "whether I have not.

"For my ſon, I ſhall take that care of him "which ſhall juſtify me to God as a father, and "to my dominions as a King.

"To conclude, I aſſure you upon my honor, "that I have no thought but of peace and juſtice "to my people, which I ſhall by all fair means "ſeek to preſerve and maintain, relying upon the "goodneſs and providence of God, for the pre-"ſervation of myſelf and rights."

Remark on this anſwer.

1. It muſt upon this anſwer be obſerved, that

(1) Before the King left London, ſir Richard Gurney lord-mayor, and ſome of the principal citizens, waited on him, and ingaged, if he would ſtay, to guard him with ten thouſand men, if occaſion were; and told him, if he went, he would leave the city open for the members to do as they pleaſed, and that they were ſure to be firſt undone; the King told them, he was reſolved. Coke, p. 341.

(2) The King, upon his coming to Greenwich, had ſent to William Seymour, marquis of Hertford (lately made governor to the Prince, in the room of the earl of Newcaſtle) to bring the Prince to him; at which the parliament, it ſeems, took exception. Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 332, 340.

the

the reaſon Charles alleged to juſtify his abſenſe from Whitehall, viz. the riotous aſſemblies of the London populace, was not unplauſible; but it was withal of very little force to prove the neceſſity of his reſiding at York. However, he artfully confounded, under one and the ſame reaſon, his removal to York, and his abſenſe from London. We ſhall inſtantly be appriſed of his real motive for retiring to York.

2. Very poſſibly, Charles wiſhed for peace, provided his prerogatives were untouched. But the parliament were of opinion that, in order to a laſting peace, the regal power was to be abridged.

It was therefore reſolved by the houſe of commons:

Votes of the commons. Clarendon, p. 343. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 524.

" 1. That this anſwer of his Majeſty is a denial " to the deſires of both houſes of parliament, con- " cerning the militia.

" 2. That thoſe who adviſed his Majeſty to " give this anſwer, are enemies to the ſtate, and " miſchievous projectors againſt the defenſe of the " kingdom.

" 3. That this denial is of that dangerous con- " ſequence, that, if his Majeſty ſhall perſiſt in it, it " will hazard the peace and ſafety of all his king- " doms, unleſs ſome ſpeedy remedy be applied, by " the wiſdom and authority of both houſes of par- " liament.

" 4. That ſuch parts of this kingdom as have " put themſelves into a poſture of defenſe againſt " the common danger, have done nothing but what " is juſtifiable, and is approved by the houſe.

" 5. That if his Majeſty ſhall remove into any re- " mote parts from his parliament, it will be a great " hazard to the kingdom, and highly prejudicial " to the proceedings of the parliament.

" 6. That this houſe holds it neceſſary, his " Majeſty may be deſired, that the Prince may " come to St. James's, or to ſome other convenient " place, near or about London, and there to con- " tinue.

" 7. That the lords be deſired to join with this " houſe in humbly requeſting his Majeſty, that he " will be pleaſed to reſide near his parliament, that " both houſes may have a convenience of acceſs unto " him, upon all occaſions.

" 8. That the lords be moved to join with this " houſe in ſome fit courſe of examination, to find " who were the perſons who gave his Majeſty this " advice, that they may be removed from his Ma- " jeſty, and brought to condign puniſhment.

" 9. That no charter can be granted by the " King, to create a power in any corporation over " the militia of that place, without conſent of par- " liament.

" 10. That the lords ſhall be moved to join with " this houſe in theſe votes.

" 11. That the lords ſhall be deſired to appoint " a ſelect commitee, who may join with a com- " mitee of a proportionable number of this houſe, " to conſider and prepare what is fit to be done " upon theſe votes, or upon any thing elſe which " may ariſe on this anſwer of his Majeſty concern- " ing the militia, and concerning the Prince.

The ſame day it was reſolved in the houſe of commons;

" That the kingdom be forthwith put into a " poſture of defenſe, by authority of both houſes, " in ſuch a way as is already agreed upon by both " houſes of parliament."

In purſuance of this reſolution, both houſes publiſhed the following ordinance for ſetling the militia:

" Whereas there hath been of late a moſt dan- " gerous and deſperate deſign upon the houſe of " commons, which we have juſt cauſe to believe to " be an effect of the bloody counſels of Papiſts, " and other ill-affected perſons, who have raiſed a " rebellion in the kingdom of Ireland; and, by " reaſon of many diſcoveries, we cannot but fear " they will proceed not only to ſtir up the like re- " bellion and inſurrections in this kingdom of Eng- " land, but alſo to back them with forces from " abroad.

CHARLES I An' 1641.

" For the ſafety therefore of his Majeſty's per- " ſon, the parliament and kingdom, in this time " of imminent danger; it is ordained, by the lords " and commons now in parliament aſſembled, " That Henry, earl of Holland, ſhall be lieute- " nant of the county of Berks, Oliver earl of Bo- " lingbroke ſhall be lieutenant of the county of " Bedford, &c. and the ſaid lord-lieutenants ſhall " ſeverally and reſpectively have power to aſſemble " and call together all and ſingular his Majeſty's " ſubjects, within the ſaid ſeveral and reſpective " counties and places, as well within liberties as " without, who are meet and fit for the wars, and " them to train and exerciſe, and put in readineſs; " and them, after their abilities and faculties, well " and ſufficiently, from time to time, to cauſe to " be arrayed and weaponed, and to take the muſter " of them in places fit for that purpoſe: and that " they ſhall ſeverally and reſpectively have power, " within the ſeveral and reſpective counties and " places aforeſaid, to nominate and appoint ſuch " perſons of quality as to them ſhall ſeem meet, to " be their deputy-lieutenants, to be approved of by " both houſes of parliament. And be it farther " ordained, that ſir John Gayre, ſir Jacob Garret, " knights, ſhall have ſuch power and authority " within the city of London, as any of the lieute- " nants before-named are authoriſed to have, by " this ordinance, within the ſaid ſeveral and reſ- " pective counties, the nomination and appoint- " ment of deputy-lieutenants only excepted. And " it is farther ordained, That ſuch perſons as ſhall " not obey in any of the premiſes, ſhall anſwer their " neglect and contempt to the lords and commons " in a parliamentary way, and not otherwiſe, nor " elſewhere, and that every the powers, granted " as aforeſaid, ſhall continue until it be otherwiſe " ordered or declared by both houſes of parliament, " and no longer."

What this ordinance hints about forces from abroad, was no other than chimera, framed purely to amuſe the people, and make them believe Charles deſigned to have the kingdom invaded by foreigners: for tho', very probably, the Pope and cardinal Richlieu countenanced the Iriſh rebellion, yet could it not be aſſerted they had formed a deſign to invade England in this Prince's favor.

March the ninth, King Charles being at Newmarket, both houſes preſented him the following declaration, which ſerved for reply to his anſwer.

Declaration of both houſes, preſented to the King at New-market, March 9, 1641-2.

May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

" ALtho' the expreſſions in your Majeſty's meſ- " ſage, of the ſecond of this inſtant March, " do give juſt cauſe of ſorrow to us your faithful " ſubjects, the lords and commons in parliament, " yet it is not without ſome mixture of confidence " and hope, conſidering they proceeded from the " miſ-apprehenſion of our actions and intentions, " which, having no ground of truth or reality, " may, by your Majeſty's juſtice and wiſdom, be " removed, when your Majeſty ſhall be fully in- " formed, that thoſe fears and jealouſies of ours, " which your Majeſty thinks to be cauſeleſs and " without any juſt ground, do neceſſarily and clear- " ly ariſe from thoſe dangers and diſtempers, into " which the miſchievous and evil councils about " you have brought this kingdom; and that thoſe

" other

Charles I An' 1641.

" other fears and jealouſies, by which your favor, " your royal preſenſe and confidence have been " withdrawn from your parliament, have no foun- " dation or ſubſiſtance in any action, intention, or " miſcarriage of ours, but are merely grounded " upon the falſhood and malice of thoſe who, for " the ſupporting and fomenting their own wicked " deſigns againſt the religion and peace of the " kingdom, do ſeek to deprive your Majeſty of " the ſtrength and affection of your people, them " of your grace and protection, and thereby to " ſubject both your royal perſon and the whole " kingdom to ruin and deſtruction.

" To ſatisfy your Majeſty's judgment and con- " ſcience in both theſe points, we deſire to make a " clear and free declaration of the cauſes of our " fears and jealouſies, which we offer to your Ma- " jeſty in theſe particulars:

" 1. That the deſign of altering religion in this, " and in your other kingdoms, hath been potently " carried on by thoſe in greateſt authority about " you, for diverſe years together: the Queen's " agent at Rome, and the Pope's agent or nuncio " here, are not only evidences of this deſign, but " have been great actors in it.

" 2. That the war with Scotland was procured " to make way for this intent, and chiefly invited " and fomented by the Papiſts, and others Popiſhly " affected, whereof we have many evidences, eſpe- " cially their free and general contribution to it.

" 3. That the rebellion in Ireland was framed " and contrived here in England, and that the " Engliſh Papiſts ſhould have riſen about the ſame " time, we have ſeveral teſtimonies and advertiſe- " ments from Ireland; and that it is a common " ſpeech among the rebels, wherewith concur " other evidences and obſervations of the ſuſpicious " meetings and conſultations, the tumultuary and " ſeditious carriage of thoſe of that religion, in " diverſe parts of this kingdom, about the time of " the Iriſh rebellion's breaking out; the depoſition " of O Conelly; the information of mr. Cole, " miniſter; the letter of Triſtram Whitecombe; " the depoſition of Thomas Grant, and many " others, which we may produce, do all agree in " this: the public declaration of the lords, gentle- " men, and others of the Pale, that they would " join with the rebels, whom they call the Iriſh " army, or any other, to recover unto his Majeſty " his royal prerogative, wreſted from him by the " Puritan faction in the houſes of parliament in " England, and to maintain the ſame againſt all " others, as alſo to maintain epiſcopal juriſdiction, " and the lawfulneſs thereof: theſe two being quar- " rels upon which his Majeſty's late army in the " north ſhould be inſenſed againſt us.

" The great cauſe we have to doubt, that the " late deſign, ſtiled the Queen's pious intention, " was for the alteration of religion in this king- " dom; for ſucceſs whereof the Pope's nuncio, " count Roſetti, injoined faſting and praying to be " obſerved every week by the Engliſh Papiſts, " which appeared to us by one of the original " letters, directed by him to a prieſt in Lanca- " ſhire.

" The boldneſs of the Iriſh rebels in affirming, " they do nothing but by authority from the King; " that they call themſelves the Queen's army; " that the prey or booty which they take from the " Engliſh they mark with the Queen's mark; that " their purpoſe was to come to England after they " had done in Ireland, and ſundry other things of " this kind, proved by O Conelly, and diverſe " others, eſpecially in the fore-mentioned letters " from Triſtram Whitecombe, mayor of Kingſale, " to his brother Benjamin Whitecombe, wherein " there is this paſſage, " that many other ſtrange " ſpeeches they utter, about religion and our court " of England, which he dares not commit to " paper.'

Charles I An' 1641.

" The manifold attempts to provoke your Ma- " jeſty's late army, and the army of the Scots, " and to raiſe a faction in the city of London, " and other parts of this kingdom; that thoſe " who have been actors in thoſe buſineſſes have " had their dependance, their countenance and in- " couragement from the court; witneſs the treaſon " whereof mr. Jermin and others ſtand accuſed, " who was tranſported beyond ſea, by warrant un- " der your Majeſty's hand, after your Majeſty had " given aſſurance to your parliament, that your " Majeſty had laid a ſtrict command upon all your " ſervants, that none of them ſhould depart from " court; and that dangerous petition delivered to " captain Legg by your Majeſty's own hand, ac- " companied with a direction ſigned with C. R.

" The falſe and ſcandalous accuſation againſt " lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the " houſe of commons, tendered to the parliament " by your Majeſty's own command, indeavored to " be juſtified in the city by your own preſenſe and " perſuaſion, and to be put in execution upon their " perſons by your Majeſty's demand of them in " the houſe of commons, in ſo terrible and violent " a manner, as far exceeded all former breaches of " privileges of parliament acted by your Majeſty, " or any of your predeceſſors; and whatſoever " your intentions were, diverſe bloody and deſpe- " rate perſons, who attended your Majeſty, diſco- " vered their affections and reſolutions to have maſ- " ſacred and deſtroyed the members of that houſe, " if the abſenſe of thoſe perſons accuſed had not, " by God's providence, ſtoped the giving of that " word which they expected, for the ſeting them " upon that barbarous and bloody act; the liſting " of ſo many officers and ſoldiers, and others, put- " ing them into pay, and under command of co- " lonels; feaſting and careſſing them in an unuſual " manner at Whitehall, thereby maintaining them " in the violent aſſaults and other injuries which " they offered to diverſe of your ſubjects coming " that way in a lawful and peaceable manner; the " carrying them out of town, after which they " were told by lord Digby, that the King removed " on purpoſe that they might not be trampled in " the dirt; and keeping them ſo long in pay; in- " deavoring to ingage the gentlemen of the inns " of court in the ſame courſe; the ploting and " deſigning of a perpetual guard about your Ma- " jeſty; the laboring to infuſe into your Majeſty's " ſubjects evil opinions of the parliament thro' the " whole kingdom, and other ſymptoms of a diſpo- " ſition of raiſing arms, and dividing your people " by a civil war; in which combuſtion Ireland " muſt needs be loſt, and this kingdom miſerably " waſted and conſumed, if not wholly ruined and " deſtroyed.

" That, after a vote had paſſed in the houſe of " commons, declaring, that lord Digby had ap- " peared in a warlike manner at Kingſton upon " Thames, to the terror and fright of your Ma- " jeſty's good ſubjects, and diſturbance of the pub- " lic peace of the kingdom; and that therefore the " lords ſhould be moved to require his attendance, " he ſhould nevertheleſs be of that credit with your " Majeſty, as to be ſent away by your own " warrant to ſir John Pennington, to land him be- " yond the ſea, from whence he vented his own " traiterous conceptions, that your Majeſty ſhould " declare yourſelf, and retire to a place of ſtrength " in this kingdom, as if your Majeſty could not be " ſafe among your people; and withal took that " tranſcendent boldneſs to write to the Queen, offer- " ing to entertain correſpondence with her Majeſty

CHARLES I An° 1641.

" by cyphers, intimating ſome ſervice which he " might do in thoſe parts, for which he deſired " your Majeſty's inſtructions, whereby in pro- " bability he intended the procuring of ſome fo- " reign force to ſtrengthen your Majeſty in that " condition into which he would have brought " you; which falſe and malicious counſel and ad- " vice, we have great cauſe to doubt, made too " deep impreſſion in your Majeſty, conſidering the " courſe you are pleaſed to take of abſenting your " ſelf from your parliament, and carrying the Prince " with you, which ſeems to expreſs a purpoſe in " your Majeſty to keep yourſelf in a readineſs for " the acting of it.

" The manifold advertiſements which we have " had from Rome, Venice, Paris, and other parts, " that they ſtill expect your Majeſty has ſome " great deſign in hand, for the altering religion " and breaking the neck of your parliament; that " you will find means to compaſs that deſign; that " the Pope's nuncio had ſollicited the Kings of " France and Spain, to ſend your Majeſty four " thouſand men each, to help maintain your roy- " alty againſt the parliament: and this foreign " force, as it is the moſt pernicious and malignant " deſign of all the reſt, ſo we hope it is, and ſhall " always be fartheſt from your Majeſty's thoughts, " becauſe no man can believe you will give up your " people and kingdom to be ſpoiled by ſtrangers, " if you did not likewiſe intend to change both " your own profeſſion in religion, and the public " profeſſion of the kingdom, that ſo you might " ſtill be more aſſured of thoſe foreign ſtates of the " Popiſh religion for your future ſupport and de- " fenſe.

" Theſe are ſome of the grounds of our fears " and jealouſies, which make us ſo earneſtly to im- " plore your royal authority and protection for our " defenſe and ſecurity, in all the ways of humility " and ſubmiſſion, which being denied by your Ma- " jeſty, ſeduced by evil counſel, we do, with ſor- " row for the great and unavoidable miſery and " danger which thereby is like to fall upon your " own perſon, and your kingdoms, apply ourſelves " to the uſe of that power for the ſecurity and de- " fenſe of both which, by the fundamental laws " and conſtitutions of this kingdom, reſides in us; " yet ſtill reſolving to keep ourſelves within the " bounds of faithfulneſs and allegiance to your ſa- " cred perſon, and your crown; ſo as to the ſecond " ſort of jealouſies and fears of us expreſſed by " your Majeſty, we ſhall give a ſhorter, but as " true and as faithful an anſwer.

" Whereas your Majeſty is pleaſed to ſay, that " for your reſidence near the parliament, you wiſh " it may be ſo ſafe and honorable that you had no " cauſe to abſent yourſelf from Whitehall; this we " take as the greateſt breach of privilege of parlia- " ment can be offered, as the heavieſt miſery to " yourſelf, and imputation upon us can be ima- " gined, and the moſt miſchievous effects of evil " counſels: it roots up the ſtrongeſt foundation of " the ſafety and honor which your crown affords; " it ſeems, as much as may be, to caſt upon the " parliament ſuch a charge as is inconſiſtent with " the nature of that great council, being the body " whereof your Majeſty is the head; it ſtrikes at " the very being both of King and parliament, " depriving your Majeſty, in your own apprehen- " ſions, of their fidelity, and them of your pro- " tection, which are the mutual bands and ſupports " of government and ſubjection.

" We have, according to your Majeſty's deſire, " laid our hands upon our hearts; we have aſked " ourſelves in the ſtricteſt examination of our con- " ſciences; we have ſearched our affections, our " thoughts; conſidered our actions; and we find " none can give your Majeſty any juſt occaſion to " abſent yourſelf from Whitehall and the parlia- " ment; but that you may with more honor and " ſafety continue there, than in any other place.

CHARLES I An° 1641.

" Your Majeſty lays a general tax upon us. If " you will be graciouſly pleaſed to let us know the " particulars, we ſhall give a clear and ſatisfactory " anſwer: but what hope can we have of ever " giving your Majeſty ſatisfaction, when thoſe " particulars which you have been made to believe " were true, yet being produced and made known " to us, appeared to be falſe? and your Majeſty, " notwithſtanding, will neither puniſh nor produce " the authors, but go on to contract new jealouſies " and fears upon general and uncertain grounds, " affording us no means or poſſibility of particular " anſwer, to the clearing ourſelves: for proof " whereof, we beſeech your Majeſty to conſider " theſe inſtances:

" The ſpeeches alleged to be ſpoken in a meeting " of diverſe members of both houſes at Kenſington, " concerning a purpoſe of reſtraining the Queen " and Prince, which after it was denied and diſ- " avowed, yet your Majeſty refuſed to name the " authors, tho' humbly deſired by both houſes.

" The report of articles framed againſt the " Queen's Majeſty, given out by ſome of near rela- " tion of the court; but when it was publicly and " conſtantly diſclaimed, the credit ſeemed to be " withdrawn from it; but the authors being kept " ſafe will always be ready for exploits of the ſame " kind, wherewith your Majeſty and the Queen " will be often troubled, if this courſe be taken to " cheriſh and ſecure them in ſuch wicked and ma- " licious ſlanders.

" The heavy charge and accuſation of lord Kim- " bolton, and the five members of the houſe of " commons, who refuſed no trial or examination " which might ſtand with the privilege of parlia- " ment; yet no authors, no witneſſes produced, " againſt whom they may have reparation for the " great injury and infamy caſt upon them; not- " withſtanding three ſeveral petitions of both houſes, " and the authority of two acts of parliament, " vouched in the laſt of thoſe petitions.

" We beſeech your Majeſty to conſider in what " ſtate you are; how eaſy and fair a way you have " to happineſs, honor, greatneſs, plenty and ſe- " curity, if you will join with the parliament, and " your faithful ſubjects, in defenſe of the religion " and public good of the kingdom. This is all " we expect from you, and for this we ſhall return " to you our lives, fortunes and uttermoſt indeavors " to ſupport your Majeſty, your juſt ſovereignty and " power over us; but it is not words which can " ſecure us in theſe our humble deſires: we cannot " but too well and ſorrowfully remember, what " gracious meſſages we had from you this ſummer, " when with your privity the bringing up the " army was in agitation; we cannot but with the " like affections recal to our minds how, not two " days before you gave directions for the above- " mentioned accuſation, and your own coming to " the commons houſe, that houſe received from " your Majeſty a gracious meſſage, that you would " always have a care of their privileges, as of your " own prerogative; of the ſafety of their perſons, " as of your own children. That which we ex- " pect, which will give us aſſurance that you have " no thought but of peace and juſtice to your " people, muſt be ſome real effect of your good- " neſs to them, in granting thoſe things which the " preſent neceſſity of the kingdom doth inforce us " to deſire: and, in the firſt place, that your Ma- " jeſty will be graciouſly pleaſed to put from you " thoſe wicked and miſchievous counſellors, who " have cauſed all theſe dangers and diſtractions,

" and

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

" and to continue your own reſidence, and the " Prince's, near London and the parliament, which " we hope will be a happy begining of content- " ment and confidence betwixt your Majeſty and " your people, and be followed with many ſuc- " ceeding bleſſings of honor and greatneſs to your " Majeſty, and of ſecurity and proſperity to them.

" The lords and commons have commanded us " to preſent unto your Majeſty this farther addition " to their former declaration.

" That your Majeſty's return, and continuance " near the parliament, is a matter in their appre- " henſion of ſo great neceſſity and importance, " toward the preſervation of your royal perſon and " your kingdoms, that they cannot think they " have diſcharged their duties, in the ſingle ex- " preſſion of their deſire, unleſs they add ſome far- " ther reaſons to back it with.

" 1. Your Majeſty's abſenſe will cauſe men to " believe, that it is out of deſign to diſcourage the " undertakers, and hinder the other proviſions for " raiſing money for defenſe of Ireland.

" 2. It will very much hearten the rebels there, " and diſaffected perſons in this kingdom, as being " an evidence and effect of the jealouſies and " diviſions betwixt your Majeſty and your people.

" 3. That it will much weaken and withdraw " the affection of the ſubjects from your Majeſty, " without which a Prince is deprived of his chiefeſt " ſtrength and luſter, and left naked to the greateſt " dangers and miſeries can be imagined.

" 4. That it will invite and incourage the ene- " mies of our religion, and the ſtates in foreign " parts, to the attempting and acting their evil " deſigns and intentions towards us.

" 5. That it cauſeth a great interruption in the " proceedings of parliament.

" Theſe conſiderations threaten ſo great danger " to your Majeſty's perſon, and to all your domi- " nions, that, as your Majeſty's great council, " they hold it neceſſary to repreſent to you this " their faithful advice, that ſo, whatſoever fol- " loweth, they may be excuſed before God and " man."

It is needleſs to make any particular remarks on this declaration. The following anſwers and replies will beſt explain the nature of the quarrel between King Charles and his parliament, and the arguments of both. We muſt only obſerve in general that, according to the cuſtom of contending parties, each inſiſted largely upon points which were favorable, and lightly touched on ſuch as were diſadvantageous, or even quite paſſed them over, in their anſwers and replies.

Thus much is certain that, in the then ſituation of affairs, both King and parliament had but too much reaſon for miſtruſt, and that each labored to procure ſuch advantages as might inable them to attack or defend. As for the declarations, meſſages, anſwers, replies, theſe were only for the people, it being the intereſt of each to gain and amuſe them: but herein the parliament had a great advantage, by reaſon of the peoples prejudice againſt their Sovereign, to which he oppoſed only general promiſes, whereof he could give no aſſurance. This was extremely advantageous to the parliament, who pretended that, in order to confide in ſuch promiſes, it was neceſſary, his Majeſty ſhould begin with diveſting himſelf of what inabled him to break them. Hence becomes obvious the perplexing intricacy of this affair.

When the commitees of both houſes preſented to Charles the above declaration, and after its being read over in his preſenſe, he returned this general anſwer, extempore.

CHARLES I AN' 1641.

The King's anſwer given extempore. March 9. Clarendon, p. 352. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 532.

" I Am confident that you expect not I ſhould " give you a ſpeedy anſwer to this ſtrange and " unexpected declaration; and I am ſorry (in the " diſtraction of this kingdom) you ſhould think " this way of addreſs to be more convenient than " that propoſed by my meſſage, of the twentieth " of January laſt, to both houſes.

" As concerning the grounds of your fears and " jealouſies, I will take time to anſwer particu- " larly, and doubt not but I ſhall do it to the ſatiſ- " faction of all the world. God in his good time " will, I hope, diſcover the ſecrets and bottoms " of all plots and treaſons; and then I ſhall ſtand " right in the eyes of my people: in the mean " time I muſt tell you, that I rather expected a " vindication for the imputation laid on me in " mr. Pym's ſpeech, than that any more general " rumors and diſcourſes ſhould get credit with " you.

" For my fears and doubts, I did not think " they ſhould have been thought ſo groundleſs or " trivial, while ſo many ſeditious pamphlets and " ſermons are looked upon, and ſo great tumults " are remembered, unpuniſhed, uninquired into: " I ſtill confeſs my fears, and call God to witneſs, " that they are greater for the true Proteſtant pro- " feſſion (1), my people and laws, than for my " own rights or ſafety; tho' I muſt tell you, I " conceive that none of theſe are free from danger.

" What would you have? Have I violated your " laws? Have I denied to paſs any bill for the " eaſe and ſecurity of my ſubjects? I do not aſk " you, what you have done for me.

" Have any of my people been tranſported with " fears and apprehenſions? I have offered as free " and general pardon, as yourſelves can deviſe. " All this conſidered, there is a judgment from " Heaven upon this nation, if theſe diſtractions " continue.

" God ſo deal with me and mine, as all my " thoughts and intentions are upright, for the " maintenance of the true Proteſtant profeſſion, " and for the obſervation and preſervation of the " laws of this land; and I hope God will bleſs and " aſſiſt thoſe laws for my preſervation.

" As for the additional declaration, you are to " expect an anſwer to it, when you ſhall receive " the anſwer to the declaration itſelf."

Next day, his Majeſty gave the commitee, in writing, that general anſwer which he had delivered verbally the day before.

He gives the deputies this anſwer in writing. P. 533.

After that, the earl of Pembroke, one of the commitee, aſking him, whether he would grant the militia, as was deſired by the parliament, for a time? " No (replied he) by God, not for an " hour (2)." This did him a vaſt prejudice. His principal concern was to ſatisfy the people, that his word might be relied on, and yet he manifeſted he had no intention to keep his promiſe made the parliament, " to grant the militia, when he ſhould know " for how long a term," ſince he refuſed granting it even for one hour.

His raſh reply to the earl of Pembroke. Ibid. Clarendon, 352.

If the parliament had thitherto repoſed but little confidence in King Charles's promiſes, this helped not to increaſe it. Contrariwiſe, the harſh and diſreſpectful treatment of that Prince by both houſes, in their declaration, highly irritated him, and rendered a rupture unavoidable. As to myſelf, I really believe, that the parliament's hard expreſſions to his Majeſty, in their declaration, were purpoſely inſerted by the direction of ſome of his leading opponents, to widen the breach, and make a reconciliation impracticable. For, it may be preſumed, if Charles had then granted the militia for two or three months, both houſes would ſcarcely have known what uſe they ſhould put it to. They would not have had any pretenſe to imploy it againſt him, ſince he would have clearly demonſtrated it was not his fault their fears were not removed: but it is certain, he had to deal with heads abler than his own and thoſe of his council; beſide, he was then full of his deſign to ſeize Hull, which doubtleſs hindered him from ſeriouſly attending to what was moſt for his advantage.

Charles acquaints the houſe with his deſign to reſide at York. Clarendon, p. 353. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 533.

March fifteen, his Majeſty, being at Huntington, ſent a meſſage to both houſes, to inform them, that he intended to reſide at York for ſome time: he withal recommended to them the affairs of Ireland. As to the militia, he told them, "That, "he had always been ſo tender of the privileges of "parliament, that he had been ready and forward to retract any act of his own, which he "had been informed had trenched upon their "privileges; ſo he expected an equal tenderneſs in "them of his known and unqueſtionable privileges; "among which, he was aſſured it is a fundamental "one, 'that his ſubjects cannot be obliged to obey "any act, order, or injunction, to which his Majeſty hath not given his conſent:' that therefore, "he expected and required obedience from all his "ſubjects, to the laws eſtabliſhed, being reſolved "to keep the laws himſelf, and to require obedience to them from all his ſubjects."

Next day, the commons paſſed the following votes, which were approved by their lordſhips, viz.

Votes of the houſe of commons. March 16. p. 534.

"That the houſe ſhould inſiſt upon their former "votes concerning the militia.

"That the King's abſenſe, ſo far remote from "his parliament, was not only an obſtruction, but "might be a deſtruction to the affairs of Ireland.

"That when the lords and commons in parliament, which is the ſupream court of judicature "in the kingdom, ſhall declare what the law of "the land is, to have this not wholly queſtioned "and controverted, but contradicted, and a command, that it ſhould not be obeyed, is a high "breach of the privilege of parliament. (1)

Remark (1) The commons here uſed the equivocal word Parliament improperly (a). It is true, the parliament, which conſiſts of the two houſes, has a right to declare what is law; to make new and repeal old laws, becauſe the authority of both houſes, with the royal aſſent, is deemed the authority of the whole kingdom: but before now, the two houſes alone had never injoyed this right; nay, in ſtrictneſs, the two houſes cannot be called the parliament, becauſe the parliament is a body compoſed of three members †, and not two only.

"That thoſe perſons who did adviſe his Majeſty "to abſent himſelf from the parliament, are enemies to the peace of this kingdom, and juſtly "ſuſpected to be favorers of the rebellion in Ireland, as are alſo thoſe who adviſed his Majeſty "to this meſſage.

It was alſo then unanimouſly reſolved upon the queſtion, by the peers in parliament,

"That the ordinance of the lords and commons "in parliament, for the ſafety and defenſe of the "kingdom of England and dominions of Wales, "is not any way againſt the oath of allegiance.

Charles I An' 1641.

"That the ſeveral commiſſions, granted under "the great-ſeal to the lieutenants of the ſeveral "counties, are illegal and void.

"That whoſoever ſhall execute any power over "the militia of this kingdom and dominion of "Wales, by color of any commiſſion of lieutenancy, without conſent of both houſes of parliament, ſhall be accounted a diſturber of the "peace of this kingdom.

Moreover, both houſes voted, with one common conſent, "That the kingdom had been of late, and "ſtill is in ſo evident and imminent danger, both "from enemies abroad, and a Popiſh party at "home, that there is a moſt urgent and inevitable "neceſſity of puting his Majeſty's ſubjects into a "poſture of defenſe, for the ſafeguard both of his "Majeſty and his people.

"That the lords and commons, fully apprehending this danger, and being ſenſible of their "own duty to provide a ſuitable prevention, have "in ſeveral petitions addreſſed themſelves to his "Majeſty, for the ordering and diſpoſing of the "militia of the kingdom, in ſuch a way as was "agreed upon by the wiſdom of both houſes to "be moſt effectual and proper for the preſent "exigents of the kingdom; yet could not obtain "it, but his Majeſty did ſeveral times refuſe to "give his royal aſſent thereunto.

"That, in this caſe of extreme danger and of "his Majeſty's refuſal, the ordinance agreed on "by both houſes for the militia, doth oblige the "people, and ought to be obeyed by the fundamental laws of this kingdom.

"That ſuch perſons as ſhall be nominated deputy-lieutenants, and approved of by both houſes, "ſhall receive the commands of both houſes to "take upon them to execute their offices."

Theſe reſolutions were very precipitately taken, the houſes had not yet received Charles's anſwer to their declaration of the ninth of March. But as, by his laſt meſſage, he had ſufficiently manifeſted he intended not to depart from his right concerning the militia, they thought it needleſs to wait for a more particular notification. Some time after, his Majeſty ſent them this anſwer, in form of declaration.

The King's declaration to both houſes of parliament, in anſwer to that preſented him at Newmarket, March 9, 1641-2. (b)

"THO' the declaration lately preſented to us, "at Newmarket, from both our houſes of "parliament, be of ſo ſtrange a nature, in re- "ſpect of what we expected (after ſo many acts of "grace and favor to our people) and ſome expreſſions in it ſo different from the uſual language "to Princes, that we might well take a very long "time to conſider it; yet the clearneſs and uprightneſs of our conſcience to God, and love to "our ſubjects, have ſupplied us with a ſpeedy anſwer, and our unalterable affection to our people "prevailed with us to ſuppreſs that paſſion, which "might well enough become us upon ſuch an invitation. them

Charles I An' 1641.

" them in an act we conceived prejudicial and " dangerous to us and the whole kingdom, they " would make a law without us, and impose it " upon our people) will not think that a sudden an- " swer can be excepted to.

" We have little incouragement to replies of " this nature, when we are told, of how little " value our words are like to be with you; tho' " they come accompanied with all the actions of " love and justice (where there is room for actions " to accompany them) yet we cannot but disavow " the having any such evil council and counsellors, " to our knowledge, as are mentioned; and if " any such be discovered, we will leave them to " the censure and judgment of our parliament. " In the mean time, we could wish, that our own " immediate actions, which we avow, and our " honor might not be so roughly censured and " wounded, under that common stile of evil coun- " sellors.

" For our faithful and zealous affection for the " true Protestant profession, and our resolution to " concur with our parliament in any possible course " for the propagation of it, and the suppression of " Popery, we can say no more than we have " already expressed in our declaration to all our " loving subjects, published in Ireland by the ad- " vice of our privy-council, in which we indea- " vored to make as lively a confession of ourself " in this point as we were able, being most assured, " that the constant practise of our life hath been " answerable thereunto; and therefore we did " rather expect a testimony and acknowledgment " of such our zeal and piety, than those expressions " we met with in this declaration, of any design " of altering religion in this kingdom; and we " do (out of the innocence of our soul) wish, that " the judgments of heaven may be manifested upon " those who have, or had any such design. (1)

Remark (1) This article of his Majesty's an- swer seems very weak. For the parliament having, in their declaration, specified the reasons why they believed there was a settled design to alter religion in England, and his Majesty incouraged the authors, Charles only answers in generals.

" As for the Scotish troubles, we had well " thought, that those unhappy differences had " been wraped up in perpetual silence, by the act " of oblivion, which, being solemnly passed in the " parliaments of both kingdoms, stops our mouth " from any other reply, than to shew our great " dislike for reviving the memory thereof. (2)

Rem. (2) It is very obvious that Charles avoids entering into particulars upon this head, tho' being attacked by the parliament he might have vindicated himself, without infringing the peace between both kingdoms, or the act of oblivion.

" If the rebellion in Ireland (so odious to all " Christians) seems to have been framed and main- " tained in England, or to have any countenance " from hence, we conjure both our houses of par- " liament, and all our loving subjects whatsoever, " to use all possible means to discover and find such " out, that we may join in the most exemplary " vengeance upon them can be imagined; but we " must think ourselves highly and causelessly in- " jured in our reputation, if any declaration, action " or expression of the Irish rebels, any letters from " count Rosetti to the Papists for fasting and " praying, or from Tristram Whitecombe, of " strange speeches uttered in Ireland, shall beget " any jealousy, or misapprehension in our subjects, " of our justice, piety and affection; it being " evident to all understandings, that those mis- " chievous and wicked rebels are not so capable " of great advantage, as by having their false dis- " courses so far believed as to raise fears and " jealousies, to the distraction of this kingdom, " the only way to their security: and we cannot " express a deeper sense of the suffering of our " poor Protestant subjects in that kingdom, than " we have done in our often messages to both houses, " by which we have offered, and are still ready to " venture our royal person for their redemption; " well knowing that, as we are (in our own interest) " more concerned in them, so we are to make a " strict account to Almighty God for any neglect " of our duty, or their preservation. (3)

Charles I An' 1641.

Rem. (3) Here his Majesty goes on clearing himself from the suspicions conceived of him, with regard to Ireland, by generals and his own testi- mony: but these proofs, taken from his word and his other outward demonstrations, were not sufficient to satisfy all people. The parliament did not accuse him of being wanting in expressions of zeal for re- ducing Ireland, but of really neglecting it.

" For the manifold attempts to provoke our late " army, and the army of the Scots, and to raise " the faction in the city of London, and other " parts of the kingdom; if it be said, as relating " to us, we cannot without great indignation suffer " ourselves to be reproached, to have intended the " least force or threatening to our parliament, as " the being privy to the bringing up the army " would imply; whereas, we call God to witness, " we never had any such thought, or knew of any " such resolution concerning our late army. (4)

Rem. (4) We have seen, in the account of that conspiracy, what were the several projects of the conspirators, and that indeed they came to no re- solution, particularly as to bringing up the army to London. Charles certainly knew all the circum- stances of that plot; but as nothing was resolved, he artfully here confines himself to the denying that he was privy to any resolution; which is very true, there being no resolution taken. However, he knew of the design in general to gain the army, of which he mentions not a syllable.

" For the petition shewed to us by captain Legg, " we well remember the same, and the occasion of " that conference. Captain Legg being lately " come out of the north, and repairing to us at " Whitehall, we asked him of the state of our " army, and (after some relation made of it) he " told us, that the commanders and officers of the " army had a mind to petition the parliament, as " others of our people had done, and shewed us " the copy of a petition, which we read; and, " finding it to be very humble, desiring the parlia- " ment might receive no interruption in the refor- " mation of the church and state to the model of " Queen Elizabeth's days, we told him, we saw " no harm in it; whereupon he replied, that he " believed all the officers in the army would like " it, only he thought sir Jacob Ashly would be " unwilling to sign it, out of fear that it might " displease us. We then read the petition over " again, and then observing that, neither in matter " nor form, we conceived it could possibly give just " cause of offense, we delivered it to him again, " biding him give it to sir Jacob Ashly, for whose " satisfaction we had written C. R. upon it, to " testify our approbation: and we wish that the " petition might be seen and published, and then " we believe it will appear no dangerous one, not " a just ground for the least jealousies or misappre- " hension. (5)

Rem. (5) If we compare what King Charles says here of the contents of this petition, with that in- serted by lord Clarendon in his history, we shall find Clarendon's petition cannot be that which his said Majesty signed with C. R. This Prince's asseveration must be taken, to believe that this petition had nothing in it prejudicial to the parliament: for hitherto it has never appeared.

" For mr. Jermin, it is well known that he was " gone from Whitehall, before we received the " deſires of both houſes for the reſtraint of our " ſervants, neither returned he thither, or paſſed " over by any warrant granted by us after that " time. (6)

Rem. (6) It is certain, Jermin went beyond ſea by Charles's warrant. Poſſibly, his Majeſty had granted the warrant before he received the parliament's petition: but the parliament pretended the warrant was antedated.

" For the breach of privilege in the accuſation " of lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the " houſe of commons, we thought we had given ſo " ample ſatisfaction in our ſeveral meſſages to that " purpoſe, that it ſhould be no more preſſed againſt " us; being confident, if the breach of privilege " had been greater than was ever before offered, " our acknowledgment and retraction have been " greater than ever King hath given, beſide the " not examining how many of our privileges have " been invaded in defenſe and vindication of the " other; and therefore we hoped our true and " earneſt proteſtation, in our anſwer to your order " concerning the militia, would ſo far have ſatisfied " you of our intentions then, that you would no " more have entertained any imagination of any " other deſign than we there expreſſed. (7)

Rem. (7) His Majeſty was greatly miſtaken, in imagining bare proteſtations were capable of ſatisfying the parliament of the ſincerity of his intentions: nay, the very declaration he was anſwering might have convinced him of the contrary, ſince it was there ſaid in plain terms, his word was not to be relied on.

" But why the liſting of ſo many officers, and " entertaining them at Whitehall, ſhould be miſ- " conſtrued, we much marvel; when it is noto- " rioufly known, the tumults at Weſtminſter were " ſo great, and their demeanors ſo ſcandalous and " ſeditious, that we had good cauſe to ſuppoſe our " own perſon, and thoſe of our wife and children, " to be in apparent danger, and therefore we had " great reaſon to appoint a guard about us, and to " accept the dutiful tender of the ſervices of any of " our loving ſubjects; which was all we did to " the gentlemen of the inns of court.

" For lord Digby, we aſſure you in the word " of a King, that he had not our warrant to paſs " the ſeas, and had left our court before we ever " heard of the vote of the houſe of commons, or " had any cauſe to imagine, that his abſenſe would " have been excepted againſt.

" What your advertiſements are from Rome, " Venice, Paris, and other parts, or what the " Pope's nuncio ſollicits the Kings of France or " Spain to do, or from what perſons ſuch infor- " mations come to you, or how the credit and re- " putation of ſuch perſons have been ſifted and " examined, we know not; but are confident, no " ſober honeſt man in our kingdoms can believe, " that we are ſo deſperate, or ſo ſenſeleſs to enter- " tain ſuch deſigns, as would not only bury this " our kingdom in ſudden diſtraction and ruin, but " our own name and poſterity in perpetual ſcorn " and infamy; and therefore we could have wiſhed " that, in matters of ſo high and tender a nature " (wherewith the minds of our good ſubjects muſt " needs be ſtartled) all the expreſſions were ſo " plain and eaſy, that nothing might ſtick with " them with reflection upon us, ſince you thought " fit to publiſh it all.

" And having now dealed thus plainly and freely " with you, by way of anſwer to the particular " grounds of your fears, we hope (upon a due " conſideration, and weighing both together) you " will not find the grounds to be of that moment " to beget, or longer to continue a miſunderſtand- " ing betwixt us, or force you to apply yourſelves " to the uſe of any other power than what the law " hath given you, the which we always intend " ſhall be the meaſure of our own power, and " expect it ſhall be the rule of our ſubjects obe- " dience.

Charles I An' 1641.

" Concerning our fears and jealouſies; as we had " no intention of accuſing you, ſo are we ſure no " words ſpoken by us (on the ſudden) at Theobalds, " will bear that interpretation. We ſaid, for our " reſidence near you, we wiſh it might be ſafe and " honorable, that we had no cauſe to abſent ourſelf " from Whitehall; and how this can be a breach " of privilege of parliament we cannot underſtand. " We explained our meaning in our anſwer at " Newmarket, at the preſentation of this declara- " tion, concerning the printed ſeditious pamphlets " and ſermons, and the great tumults at Weſt- " minſter; and we muſt appeal to you and all the " world, whether we might not juſtly ſuppoſe our- " ſelf in danger of either: and if we were now at " Whitehall, what ſecurity have we, that the like " ſhall not be again, eſpecially if any delinquents " of that nature have been apprehended by the " miniſters of juſtice, and been reſcued by the " people, and ſo as yet eſcape unpuniſhed? If you " have not been informed of the ſeditious words " uſed in, and the circumſtances of thoſe tumults, " and will appoint ſome way for the examination " of them, we will require ſome of our learned " council to attend with ſuch evidence as may ſatisfy " you; and, 'till that be done, or ſome other courſe " be taken for our ſecurity, you cannot (with " reaſon) wonder that we intend not to be where " we moſt deſire to be.

" And can there yet want evidence of our " hearty and importunate deſire to join with our par- " liament, and all our faithful ſubjects, in defenſe of " the religion and public good of the kingdom? " Have we given you no other earneſt but words, " to ſecure you of theſe deſires? The very remon- " ſtrance of the houſe of commons (publiſhed in " November laſt) of the ſtate of the kingdom, " allows us a more real teſtimony of our good " affections, than words. That remonſtrance " valued our acts of grace and juſtice (8) at ſo " high a rate, that it declared the kingdom to be " then a gainer, tho' it charged itſelf, by bills of " ſubſidies and poll-money, with the levy of " ſix hundred thouſand pounds, beſide the con- " tracting of a debt to our Scotiſh ſubjects of two " hundred and twenty thouſand pounds. (9)

Rem. (8) Charles had hitherto ſpoken of his aſſent to the acts of this parliament, but as acts of grace. He began in this paper to add, of juſtice.

Rem. (9) In reality, the nation had been great gainers by theſe acts of grace and juſtice. But his Majeſty could not repreſent as a convincing proof of love for his people, his conſent that the illegal taxes, of his own impoſing, ſhould be aboliſhed, and the monopolies, authoriſed by himſelf, ſuppreſſed; eſpecially as it was not intirely in his power to refuſe aſſenting.

" Are the bills for the triennial parliament; " relinquiſhing our title of impoſing upon mer- " chandiſe, and power of preſſing ſoldiers; for " the taking away the ſtar-chamber, and high- " commiſſion courts; for the regulating of the " council-table, but words? Are the bills for the " foreſts, the ſtannary-courts, the clerk of the " market, and the taking away the votes of the " biſhops out of the lords houſe, but words? " Laſtly, what greater earneſt of our truſt and " reliance

Charles I An' 1641.

" reliance on our parliament could or can we give, " than the paſſing a bill for the continuance of this " preſent parliament? The length of which we " hope will never alter the nature of parliaments, " and the conſtitution of this kingdom, or invite " our ſubjects ſo much to abuſe our confidence, as " to eſteem any thing fit for this parliament to do, " which was not, if it were in our power to diſ- " ſolve it to-morrow. And after all theſe, and " many other acts of grace on our part (that we " might be ſure of a perfect reconciliation betwixt " us and all our ſubjects) we have offered, and are " ſtill ready to grant, a free and general pardon, " as ample as yourſelves ſhall think fit. Now if " theſe be not real expreſſions of the affection of " our ſoul, for the public good of our kingdom, " we muſt confeſs, that we want ſkill to manifeſt " them (10)

Rem. (10) A ſort of ſophiſtry runs quite thro' this article, conſiſting in the ſuppoſition that Charles had conſented to all theſe acts purely thro' love and affection for his people, which few perſons believed. Beſide, all theſe acts having been made only to ſuppreſs the abuſes introduced by this Prince himſelf, there was not ſeemingly any occaſion for thus expatiating on the matter.

" To conclude (altho' we think our anſwer al- " ready full to that point) concerning our return " to London; we are willing to declare, that we " look upon it as a matter of ſo great weight, as " with reference to the affairs of this kingdom, " and our own inclinations and deſires, that if all " we can ſay or do can raiſe a mutual confidence " (the only way with God's bleſſing to make us all " happy) and, by your incouragement, the laws " of the land, and the government of the city of " London, may recover ſome life for our ſecurity, " we will overtake your deſires, and be as ſoon " with you as you can wiſh; and in the mean time " we will be ſure that neither the buſineſs of Ire- " land, or any other advantage for this kingdom " ſhall ſuffer thro' our default, or by our abſenſe; " we being ſo far from repenting the acts of our " juſtice and grace, which we have already per- " formed to our people, that we ſhall with the " ſame alacrity be ſtill ready to add ſuch new ones, " as may beſt advance the peace, honor, and proſ- " perity of this nation."

Before the parliament received this anſwer, they ſent the King another petition, in reply to his ſudden anſwer to the declaration delivered at New-Market. Tho' theſe anſwers and replies be long and abound with repetitions, yet I think it neceſſary to inſert them at large, that the reader may be able to paſs impartial judgment upon this quarrel: for in affairs of this nature, and eſpecially in this which has given birth to two parties ſtill ſubſiſting in England, there is great danger of being miſled, if the ſincerity and prejudices of the hiſtorians, who are all of one or other party, be relied on. It will be therefore better to leave the reader at liberty to judge upon the parties own papers. Here follows the parliament's petition.

May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

An' 1642. Reply of both houſes to the King's anſwer given to their declaration. March 26. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 538. Clarendon. p. 367.

" YOUR Majeſty's loyal ſubjects, the lords " and commons in parliament, cannot " conceive, that the declaration, which your " Majeſty received from us at New-market, was " ſuch as did deſerve that cenſure your Majeſty " was pleaſed to lay upon us in that ſpeech, which " your Majeſty made to our commitees there, and " ſent in writing to both houſes; our addreſs there- " in being accompanied with plaineſs, humility " and faithfulneſs, we thought more proper for " removing the diſtraction of the kingdom, than " if we had then proceeded according to your Ma- " jeſty's meſſage of the 20th of January, by which your Majeſty was pleaſed to deſire, that " we would declare, what we intended to do for " your Majeſty, and what we expected to be done " for ourſelves: in both which we have been " very much hindered by your Majeſty's denial " to ſecure us, and the whole kingdom, by diſ- " poſing the militia, as we had diverſe times moſt " humbly petitioned; and yet we have not been " altogether negligent of either, having lately " made good proceedings, in preparing a book of " rates, to be paſſed in a bill of tonage and poun- " dage; and likewiſe the moſt material heads of " thoſe humble deſires, which we intended to " make to your Majeſty, for the good and con- " tentment of your Majeſty, and your people; but " none of theſe could be perfected before the king- " dom be put into ſafety, by ſettling the militia: " and until your Majeſty ſhall be pleaſed to con- " cur with your parliament in theſe neceſſary " things, we hold it impoſſible for you to give the " world, or your people ſuch ſatisfaction, con- " cerning the fears and jealouſies which we have " expreſſed, as we hope your Majeſty hath al- " ready received, touching that exception which " you were pleaſed to make to mr. Pym's ſpeech.

" As for your Majeſty's fears and doubts, the " ground whereof is from ſeditious pamphlets and " ſermons, we ſhall be as careful to indeavor the " removal, as ſoon as we ſhall underſtand what " pamphlets and ſermons are by your Majeſty in- " tended, as we have been to prevent all dange- " rous tumults. And if any extraordinary con- " courſe of people out of the city of Weſtminſter, " had the face and ſhew of tumult and danger, in " your Majeſty's apprehenſion, it will appear to " be cauſed by your Majeſty's denial of ſuch a " guard to your parliament as they might have " cauſe to confide in; and by taking into White- " hall, ſuch a guard for yourſelf, as gave juſt " cauſe of jealouſy to the parliament, and of ter- " ror and offenſe to your people. We ſeek no- " thing but your Majeſty's honor, and the peace " and proſperity of your kingdoms; and we are " heartily ſorry we have ſuch plentiful matter of " anſwer to that queſtion, Whether you had violat- " ed our laws?

" We beſeech your Majeſty to remember, that " the government of this kingdom, as it was in a " great part managed by your miniſters, before the " begining of this parliament, conſiſted of many con- " tinued and multiplied acts of violation of the " laws; the wounds whereof were ſcarcely healed, " when the extremity of all thoſe violations was " far exceeded, by the late ſtrange and unheard-of " breach of our Laws, in the accuſation of lord " Kimbolton, and five members of the commons " houſe, and in the proceedings thereupon, for " which we have received no full ſatisfaction,

" To your Majeſty's next queſtion, Whether " you had denied any bill for the eaſe and ſecurity " of your ſubjects? We wiſh we could ſtop in the " midſt of our anſwer, that with much thankful- " neſs we acknowledge, that your Majeſty hath " paſſed many good bills, full of contentment and " advantage to your people; but truth and neceſſi- " ty inforce us to add this, that, even in or a- " bout the time of paſſing thoſe bills, ſome deſign " or other hath been on foot; which if it had taken " effect, would not only have deprived us of the " fruit of thoſe bills, but have reduced us to a worſe " condition of confuſion, than that wherein the " parliament found us.

" And if your Majeſty had aſked us the third " queſtion, intimated in that ſpeech, What we had " done for yourſelf? Our anſwer would have been " much more eaſy; that we had payed two armies,

" where-

" wherewith the kingdom was burdened laſt year; " and have undergone the charge of the war in " Ireland, at this time when, thro' the many o- " ther exceſſive charges and preſſures, your ſub- " jects have been exhauſted, and the ſtock of the " kingdom very much diminiſhed; which great " miſchiefs, and the charges thereupon inſuing, " have been occaſioned by the evil counſels ſo pow- " erful with your Majeſty, which have, and will, " coſt this kingdom more than two millions, all " which, in juſtice, ought to have been borne by " your Majeſty.

" As for that free and general pardon your Ma- " jeſty has been pleaſed to offer, it can be no ſe- " curity to our fears and jealouſies, for which your " Majeſty ſeems to propound it, becauſe they ariſe " not from any guilt of our own actions, but from " the evil deſigns and attempts of others.

" To this our humble anſwer to that ſpeech, we " deſire to add an information, which we lately " received from the deputy-governor of the mer- " chant-adventurers at Rotterdam, in Holland, that " an unknown perſon, appertaining to lord Digby, " did lately ſollicit one James Henley, a mariner, " to go to Elſenore, and to take charge of a ſhip " in the fleet of the King of Denmark, there pre- " pared, which he ſhould conduct to Hull; in " which fleet likewiſe, he ſaid, a great army was " to be tranſported: and altho' we are not apt to " give credit to informations of this nature, yet we " cannot altogether think it fit to be neglected, but " that it may juſtly add ſomewhat to the weight " of our fears and jealouſies, conſidering with " what circumſtances it is accompanied, with lord " Digby's preceding expreſſions in his letter to her " Majeſty and ſir Lewis Dives, and your Majeſty's " ſucceeding courſe of withdrawing yourſelf north- " wards from your parliament, in a manner very ſuit- " able and correſpondent to that evil counſel, which " we doubt will make much deeper impreſſion in " the generality of your people; and therefore, we " moſt humbly adviſe and beſeech your Majeſty, " for the procuring and ſetling the confidence of " your parliament, and all your ſubjects, and for " other important reaſons concerning the recovery " of Ireland, and ſecuring this kingdom, which " have been formerly preſented to your Majeſty; " you will be graciouſly pleaſed (with all conve- " nient ſpeed) to return to theſe parts, and to cloſe " with the counſel and deſire of your parliament, " where you ſhall find their dutiful affections and " indeavors ready to attend your Majeſty with " ſuch entertainment, as ſhall not only give your " Majeſty juſt cauſe of ſecurity in their faithfulneſs, " but other manifold evidences of their earneſt " intentions and indeavors to advance your Ma- " jeſty's ſervice, honor and contentment, and to " eſtabliſh it upon the ſure foundation of the peace " and proſperity of all your kingdoms."

This petition was preſented to his Majeſty at York, the twenty ſixth of March. He had already ſent his anſwer to the declaration of both houſes, and therefore mentions it in his anſwer to this laſt petition.

King Charles's anſwer *.

* It bears no date. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 539.

" IF you would have had the patience to have " expected our anſwer to your laſt declaration " (which, conſidering the nature of it, hath not " been long in coming) we believe you would have " ſaved your ſelves the labor of ſaying much of " this meſſage; and we could wiſh, that our " privileges in all parts were ſo ſtated, that this " way of correſpondence might be preſerved with " that freedom which hath been uſed of old; for " we muſt tell you, that if you may aſk any " thing of us by meſſage or petition, and in what " language (how unuſual ſoever) you think fit, " and we muſt neither deny the thing you aſk, " nor give a reaſon why we cannot grant it, with- " out being taxed with breaking your privileges, " or being counſeled by thoſe who are enemies of " the peace of the kingdom, and favorers of the " Iriſh rebellion (for we have ſeen your printed " votes, upon our meſſage from Huntington) you " will reduce all our anſwers hereafter into a very " little room. In plain Engliſh, it is to take away " the freedom of our vote, which were we but a " ſubject were high injuſtice; but being your " King, we leave all the world to judge what it " is. (1)

Charles I An' 1642.

Remark (1) The parliament ſuppoſed imminent danger, which obliged them to act after a manner unuſual, and King Charles ſuppoſed the government to be in its uſual and natural ſtate. This miſ-underſtanding continually returns in the papers of both ſides.

" Is this the way to compoſe all miſ-under- " ſtandings? We thought we ſhewed you one, " by our meſſage of the twentieth of January: if " you have a better, or a readier, we ſhall willingly " hearken to it, for hitherto you have ſhewed us " none. But why the refuſal to conſent to your " orders (which you call a denial of the militia) " ſhould be any interruption to it, we cannot un- " derſtand; for the militia (which we always " thought neceſſary to be ſetled) we never denied " the thing (as we told you in our anſwer of " the twenty eighth of January, to the petition of " the houſe of commons) for we accepted the per- " ſon (except for corporations) we only denied " the way: you aſk it by way of ordinance, and " with ſuch a preface, as we can neither with ju- " ſtice to our honor, or innocence, conſent to. You " exclude us from any power in the diſpoſition, or " execution of it together with you, and for a " time utterly unlimited. We tell you, we would " have the thing done; allow the perſons with " that exception; deſire a bill, the only good old " way of impoſing on our ſubjects; we are ex- " tremely unſatisfied what an ordinance is; but " well ſatisfied that, without our conſent it is no- " thing, not binding; and it is evident, by the " long time imployed in this argument, the ne- " ceſſity and danger were not ſo imminent, but a " bill might have well been prepared; which, " if it ſhall yet be done, with that due regard to us, " and care of our people, in the limitation of the " power and other circumſtances, we ſhall recede " from nothing we formerly expreſſed in that an- " ſwer to your order; otherwiſe, we muſt declare " to all the world, that we are not ſatisfied with, " or ſhall ever allow our ſubjects to be bound by " your printed votes, of the fifteenth or ſixteenth of " this month, or that, under pretenſe of declaring " what the law of the land is, you ſhall without " us make a new law, which is plainly the caſe of " the militia; and what is this, but to introduce " an arbitrary way of government? (2)

Rem. (2) It is no wonder this Prince and the parliament could not agree upon any one point, ſince they reaſoned upon different principles. His Majeſty ſuppoſed, that this ordering the militia, deſired by both houſes, ought to be done after the uſual manner; whereas the parliament pretended, that the danger the kingdom was in, and whereof his Majeſty was the cauſe, gave them a right to demand ſome extraordinary regulation, wherein the King ſhould not be concerned. Contrariwiſe, it is manifeſt, the reſtrictions propoſed by King Charles, in this article, left him at liberty to diſpute eternally, and to refuſe the bill which ſhould be preſented him, except it was abſolutely ineffectual for the parliament's purpoſes.

Concerning

CHARLES I AN' 1642.

" Concerning Pym's ſpeech, you will have found, " by what lord Compton, and mr. Bainton " brought from us, in anſwer to that meſſage " they brought us, that as yet we reſt nothing " ſatisfied in that particular.

" As for the ſeditious pamphlets and ſermons, " we are both ſorry and aſhamed in ſo great variety, " and in which our rights, honors and authority " are ſo inſolently ſlighted and vilified, and in " which the dignity and freedom of parliament is " ſo much invaded and violated, it ſhould be " aſked of us to name any; the mentioning the " Proteſtation Proteſted, the Apprentices Pro- " teſtation, To your Tents, O Iſrael! or any " other, would be too great an excuſe for the reſt. " If you think them not worth your inquiry, we " have done: but we think it moſt ſtrange to be " told, that our denial of a guard (which we yet " never denied, but granted in another manner, " and under a command at that time moſt ac- " cuſtomed in the kingdom) or the denial of any " thing elſe (which is in our power legally to deny) " which in our underſtanding (of which God hath " ſurely given us ſome uſe) is not fit to be granted, " ſhould be any excuſe for ſo dangerous a con- " courſe of people; which, not only in our appre- " henſion, but (we believe) in the interpretation of " the law itſelf, hath been always held moſt tumul- " tuous and ſeditious. And we moſt wonder what, " and from whence come the inſtructions and in- " formations which thoſe people have, who can ſo " eaſily think themſelves obliged by the proteſta- " tion, to aſſemble in ſuch a manner, for the de- " fenſe of privileges, which cannot be ſo clearly " known to any of them, and ſo negligently paſs " over the conſideration and defenſe of our rights, " ſo beneficial and neceſſary for themſelves, and " ſcarce unknown to any of them, which by their " oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy (and even by " the ſame proteſtation) they are at leaſt equally " obliged to defend. And what interruptions ſuch " kind of aſſemblies may be to the freedom of " future parliaments (if not ſeaſonably diſcoun- " tenanced and ſuppreſſed) we muſt adviſe you to " conſider, as likewiſe whether both our powers " may not by ſuch means be uſurped, by hands " not truſted by the conſtitution of this kingdom. " For our guard, we refer you to our anſwer to " that declaration.

" By that queſtion of violating your laws, by " which we indeavored to expreſs our care and " reſolution to obſerve them; we did not expect " you would have been invited to have looked " back ſo many years, for which you have had ſo " ample reparation: neither looked we to be re- " proached with the actions of our miniſters (then " againſt the laws) while we expreſs ſo great a " zeal for the preſent defenſe of them; it being " our reſolution, upon obſervation of the miſchief " which then grew by arbitrary power (tho' made " plauſible to us by the ſuggeſtions of neceſſity and " imminent danger; and take you heed you fall " not into the ſame error upon the ſame ſuggeſtions) " hereafter to keep the rule ourſelf, and to our " power require the ſame from all others (3): but " above all, we muſt be moſt ſenſible of what " you caſt upon us, for requital of thoſe good bills " you cannot deny. We have denied any ſuch " deſign, and as God Almighty muſt judge " in that point between us, who knows our upright " intentions at the paſſing thoſe laws; ſo, in the " mean time, we defy the devil to prove, that " there was any deſign (with our knowledge or " privity) in or about the time of paſſing thoſe bills, " which, had it taken effect, could have deprived " our ſubjects of the fruit of them: and therefore " we demanded full reparation in this point, that " we may be cleared in the ſight of all the world, " and chiefly in the eyes of our loving ſubjects, " from ſo notorious and falſe an imputation as " this is.

REM. (3) Thoſe who undertake juſtifying King Charles's government, during the firſt fifteen years of his reign, do more than ever he pretended to do himſelf, as appears by this clauſe of his anſwer.

" We are far from denying what you have done; " for we acknowledge the charge our people have " ſuſtained in keeping the two armies, and in " relieving Ireland, of the which we are ſo ſenſible " that, in regard of thoſe great burdens our " people have undergone, we have and do patiently " ſuffer thoſe extreme perſonal wants, as our pre- " deceſſors have been ſeldom put to, rather than " we would preſs upon them; which we hope (in " time) will be conſidered on your parts. (4)

REM. (4) His Majeſty gloried in having ſuffered patiently, ſince this parliament, perſonal wants, which it had not been in his power to remedy or prevent.

" In our offer of a general pardon, our intent " was to compoſe and ſecure the general condition " of our ſubjects, conceiving that, in theſe times of " great diſtractions, the good laws of the land " have not been enough obſerved: but it is a " ſtrange world, when Princes proffered favors " are accounted reproaches. Yet if you like not " this our offer, we have done.

" Concerning any diſcourſe of foreign forces, " tho' we have given you a full anſwer in ours to " your laſt declaration, yet we muſt tell you, we " have neither ſo ill an opinion of our own merit, " or the affections of our good ſubjects, as to think " ourſelf in need of any foreign force to preſerve " us from oppreſſion (and we ſhall not need for " any other purpoſe) but are confident (thro' God's " providence) not to want the good wiſhes and " aſſiſtance of the whole kingdom, being reſolved " to build upon that ſure foundation, the law of " the land. We take it very ill, that any general " diſcourſes between an unknown perſon and a " mariner, or inferences upon letters, ſhould be " able to prevail in matters ſo improbable in them- " ſelves, and ſcandalous to us; for which we can- " not but likewiſe aſk reparation, not only for " the vindicating our own honor, but alſo thereby " to ſetle the minds of our ſubjects, whoſe fears " and jealouſies would ſoon vaniſh, were they not " fed and maintained by ſuch falſe and malicious " rumors as theſe.

" For our return to our parliament, we have " given you a full anſwer in ours to your declara- " tion, and you ought to look on us as not gone, " but driven (we ſay not by you, yet) from you. " And if it be not ſo eaſy for you to make our " reſidence in London ſo ſafe as we could deſire, " we are, and will be contented, that our parlia- " ment be adjourned to ſuch a place, where we may " be fitly and ſafely with you: for altho' we are " not pleaſed to be at this diſtance, yet ye are not " to expect our preſenſe, until ye ſhall both ſecure " us concerning our juſt apprehenſions of tumul- " tuary inſolencies, and likewiſe give us ſatisfaction " for thoſe inſupportable and inſolent ſcandals " which are raiſed upon us. (5)

REM. (5) Charles took care not to return to London, at a time when he was going to attempt ſecuring Hull. The terms he required for his re- turn were ſo undeterminate, that they would have furniſhed matter for a tedious diſpute.

" To conclude, as we have or ſhall not refuſe " any way agreeable to juſtice or honor, which " ſhall be offered to us for the begeting a right " underſtanding between us; ſo we are reſolved, " that no ſtraits or neceſſities (to which we may

Charles I An' 1642.

" be driven) ſhall ever compel us to do that which " the reaſon and underſtanding God hath given " us, and our honor and intereſt with which God " hath truſted us, for the good of our poſterity " and kingdom, ſhall render unpleaſant and grie- " vous unto us.

" And we aſſure you that (how meanly ſoever " you are pleaſed to value the diſcharge of our " public duty) we are ſo conſcious to ourſelf of " having done our part ſince this parliament, that, " in whatſoever condition we now ſtand, we are " confident of the continued protection of Almighty " God, and the conſtant gratitude, obedience and " affection of our people, and we ſhall truſt God " with all."

Theſe papers ſufficed not to induce either King or parliament to alter their meaſures. The parliament was reſolved to diveſt King Charles of having the militia at his diſpoſal, and his ſaid Majeſty was as fully determined not to give up that point.

Both houſes name the earl of Warwick to command the fleet. March 28. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 543. Clarendon, p. 375.

On this anſwer, both houſes ſent Charles a meſſage, directing the lord-keeper to incloſe it in a letter to the ſecretary attending his Majeſty at York, to inform him, that the lord admiral's indiſpoſition diſabling him from perſonally commanding the fleet, they had recommended to his lordſhip the earl of Warwick, to ſupply his place: but underſtanding ſince, that his Majeſty had appointed ſir John Pennington for that charge, they intreated him not to prefer this latter to the earl of Warwick.

He is received againſt the King's will. March 31.

King Charles was highly inſenſed at this meſſage, which was not by way of petition or declaration, and ſent the lord-keeper word, that his reſolution was not to alter the perſon whom he had appointed. But he was not maſter: for, by the connivance of the earl of Northumberland, lord admiral, the earl of Warwick was acknowledged commander of the fleet; contrary to his Majeſty's will and without his conſent.

Papers touching the militia. Ruſhworth. Ibid.

Alſo about this time was diſperſed a paper, wherein the author examined, " How laws are to " be underſtood, and obedience yielded? A queſtion " neceſſary for the preſent ſtate of things touching " the militia. His Majeſty (ſays he) is intruſted " by law with the militia; but it is for the good " and preſervation of the people, and not againſt " them: ſo that when there is a well-grounded " ſuſpicion that the King intends to imploy the " militia againſt his people, he is not to be obeyed; " for it is not likely that the intent of the law is, " to inveſt the King with a power to be uſed " againſt his ſubjects." Such is the ſum of this writer's reaſoning, which was properly that of both houſes. Charles, having peruſed this paper, ſent the peers a meſſage, requiring them to find out the author of ſo pernicious a doctrine, and chaſtiſe him anſwerably to his demerits: yet did he not make any particular objections againſt the writer's principles and arguments.

April 22. P. 543.

P. 567.

While the militia affair was in agitation, Charles came to the gates of Hull with ſome troops; but ſir John Hotham denied him admitance, as will be ſeen preſently. It is eaſy to judge, this procedure of the King's ſerved not to remove the parliament's fears and ſuſpicions, and the rather as having paſſed a bill for ſetling the militia, as his Majeſty deſired, this bill had been rejected. The affair of Hull happening very ſoon after, the parliament thought no farther ceremony was to be uſed, imagining the King ſought only to amuſe and make them loſe time. However Charles, five or ſix days after his diſappointment at Hull, ſent a meſſage to the parliament, dated April twenty-eight, containing his reaſons for not conſenting to the militia bill, which had been preſented him. This meſſage ran thus: viz.

Charles rejects the militia bill.

Charles I An' 1642.

His meſſage to both houſes. April 28. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 554. Clarendon, p. 394.

" WE have, with great deliberation and " patience, weighed and conſidered (it con- " cerning us much to weigh the conſequences of " every law before we paſs it) your bill lately ſent " to us, for the ſetling of the militia; and tho' it " hath not been uſual to give any reaſons for our " refuſal to paſs any bill (it being abſolutely in our " power to paſs or not paſs any act ſent unto us " by you, if we conceive it prejudicial to ourſelf, " or inconvenient for our ſubjects, for whom we " are truſted, and muſt one day give an account) " yet in this buſineſs of the militia which, being " miſunderſtood among our good ſubjects, hath " been uſed as an argument, as if we were not " vigilant enough for the public ſafety: and leſt " we ſhould be thought leſs conſtant in our reſo- " lutions, and this bill to be the ſame we ſent unto " you; we have thought fit to give you and all " the world particular ſatisfaction, why we muſt " not, ought not, cannot paſs this bill, being the " firſt public bill, to our remembrance, we have " refuſed this parliament; and therefore we muſt " complain that, having expreſſed ourſelf ſo clearly " and particularly to you in this point, you ſhould " preſs any thing upon us which you could not " but foreſee that we muſt refuſe, except we de- " parted from thoſe reſolutions, grounded upon ſo " much reaſon, which we had ſo earneſtly before " acquainted you with, and againſt which you " have not given one argument to ſatisfy our " judgment.

" We are pleaſed that you have declined the " unwarrantable courſe of your ordinance (to the " which we are confident our good ſubjects would " never have yielded conſent) and choſen this only " right way of impoſing on our people, which we " would have allowed, but for the reaſons hereafter " mentioned.

" We refuſed to conſent to your ordinance, as " for other things, ſo for that the power was put " into the perſons nominated therein, by direction " of both houſes of parliament, excluding us from " any power in the diſpoſition or execution of it " together with you. We then adviſed you, for " many reaſons, that a bill ſhould be prepared, " and after, in our anſwer, of the twenty-ſixth of " March laſt, to the petition of both houſes, we " told you, if ſuch a bill ſhould be prepared with " that due regard to us, and care of our people, " in the limitation of the power and other cir- " cumſtances, we ſhould recede from nothing we " formerly expreſſed. (1)

Remark (1) Whether King Charles was right or wrong concerning the militia affair, it is certain his deſign at firſt was only to amuſe the parliament; and this is what he ſtrives to conceal in this article.

" What paſſed (enough to have diſcouraged us " from being farther ſollicitous in that argument) " after our full and gracious anſwers, we are con- " tent to forget. When we reſolved on our journey " into Ireland (ſo that by reaſon of our abſenſe " there might be no want of ſetling that power) " beſide complying with your fears, we ſent, to- " gether with a meſſage of that our purpoſe, a bill " for the ſetling that power for a year, hoping in " that time to return to you; and being ſure that " in much leſs time you might do the buſineſs for " which you ſeemed at firſt to deſire this, which " was, that you might ſecurely conſider our miſ- " ſage of the twentieth of January laſt. By that " bill, we conſented to thoſe names which were " propoſed in your ordinance, and in the limitation " of the power, provided that ourſelf ſhould not " be able to execute any thing but by your advice; " and when we ſhould be out of the kingdom, the " ſole execution to be in you; with many other " things

CHARLES I An' 1642.

" things of ſo arbitrary and uncircumſcribed a " power, that we ſhould not have conſented to, " but with reference to the abſenſe of our own " perſon out of the kingdom, and thought it the " more ſufferable, in reſpect the time was but for " a year. Whether this be the bill you have now " ſent us to paſs, let all the world judge. (2)

REM. (2) Lord Clarendon frankly acknowledges Charles's offer of paſſing over to Ireland was all a ſtratagem. Since therefore that Prince had no deſign of going thither, it follows, that the bill he had ſent to both houſes, and which he pretended he ſhould not have conſented to but with reference to his abſenſe, was no other than a mere amuſement. We ſee here, that the general limitations he had annexed to his former ingagement, were not without deſign. He knew how to particulariſe them in the bill he ſent the parliament, and was very ſenſible it would not be received with all theſe reſtrictions. Thus his aim, in this clauſe, was only to color the pretenſe he had uſed in his original promiſe with reſpect to the militia.

" You have, by this bill now tendered to us " (without taking notice of us) put the power of " the whole kingdom, the life and liberty of the " ſubjects, of all degrees and qualities, into the " hands of particular men, for two years. Can you " imagine we will truſt ſuch an abſolute power in " the hands of particular perſons, which we refuſe " to commit to both houſes of parliament? Nay, " is not the power itſelf too abſolute, too unlimited " to be commited to any private hands? Hath not " ſir John Hotham's high inſolence ſhewed us what " we may expect from an exorbitant legal power, " when he, by a power not warranted by law, dares " venture upon a treaſonable diſobedience (3)? " But we would willingly know (and indeed ſuch " an account in ordinary civility we might have " expected) why we are, by this act, abſolutely " excluded from any power or authority in the " execution of this militia. Sure your fears and " jealouſies are not of ſuch a nature as are capable " of no other remedy, than by leaving us no " power in a point of the greateſt importance, in " which God and the law have truſted us ſolely, " and which we are contented to ſhare with you by " our bill, by puting it, and a greater, into the " hands of particular ſubjects? What would all " Chriſtian Princes think of us, after we had paſſed " ſuch a bill? How would they value our ſove- " reignty? And yet, ſure our reputation with foreign " Princes is ſome ground of your ſecurity: nay, " we are confident, by that time you have " thoroughly conſidered the poſſible conſequence of " the bill upon yourſelves, and the reſt of our " good ſubjects, you and they will give us thanks " for not conſenting to it, finding their condition " (had it paſſed) not to have been ſo pleaſing unto " them. We hope this animadverſion will be no " breach of your privileges, in this throng of " buſineſs and diſtemper of affections; it is poſſible " that ſecond thoughts may preſent ſomething to " your conſideration, which eſcaped you before.

REM. (3) It was but five or ſix days ſince ſir John Hotham denied him entrance into Hull (a).

" We paſſed this parliament, at your intreaty, " a bill concerning the captives of Algiers, and " waved many objections of our own to the con- " trary, upon information, that the buſineſs had " been many months conſidered by you. Whether " it prove ſuitable to your intentions, or whether " you have not by ſome private order ſuſpended " that act of parliament, upon view of the " miſtakings, you beſt know; as likewiſe, what " other great alterations you have made in other " bills paſſed this ſeſſion. We cannot paſs over " the puting their names out of this bill, whom " before you recommended to us in your ordinance, " it ſeems, not thinking fit to truſt thoſe who " would obey no guide but the law of the land " (we imagine you would not wiſh we ſhould, in " our eſtimation of others, follow that your rule) " and the leaving out, by ſpecial proviſion, the " preſent lord-mayor of London, as a perſon in " your diſfavor; whereas we muſt tell you, his " demeanor hath been ſuch, that the city and the " whole kingdom are beholding to him for his ex- " ample. (4)

CHARLES I An' 1642.

REM. (4) It was ſir Richard Gurney who was then lord-mayor of London, and intirely devoted to his Majeſty.

" To conclude, we do not find ourſelf poſſeſſed " with ſuch an exceſs of power, that it is fit to " transfer, or conſent it ſhould be in other perſons, " as is directed by the bill; and therefore we ſhall " rely upon that royal right and juriſdiction which " God and the law have given us, for the ſup- " preſſion of rebellion, and reſiſting foreign in- " vaſion, which have preſerved this kingdom in " the time of all our anceſtors, and which, we " doubt not, but we ſhall be able to execute; and, " not mere for our own honor and right, than for " the liberty and ſafety of our people, we cannot " conſent to paſs this bill.

Declaration of the lords and commons, concerning his Majeſty's laſt meſſage about the militia.

" THE lords and commons, holding it neceſ- " ſary, for the peace and ſafety of this king- " dom, to ſetle the militia thereof, did, for that " purpoſe, prepare an ordinance of parliament, " and with all humility did preſent the ſame to his " Majeſty, for his royal aſſent; who, notwith- " ſtanding the faithful advice of his parliament, " and the ſeveral reaſons offered by them of the " neceſſity thereof, for the ſecuring of his Ma- " jeſty's perſon, and the peace and ſafety of his " people, did refuſe to give his conſent; and there- " upon they were neceſſitated, in diſcharge of the " truſt repoſed in them, as the repreſentative body " of the kingdom, to make an ordinance, by au- " thority of both houſes, to ſetle the militia, war- " ranted thereunto by the fundamental laws of the " land: (1)

Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 545. May 5. Clarendon, p. 406.

REMARK (1) This fundamental law was no other than the law of nature, which allows every man to provide for his own defenſe when he ſees himſelf expoſed to danger, and ſuch was the caſe the parliament ſuppoſed themſelves in: for, otherwiſe, there was no poſitive law which gave the two houſes of parliament ſuch a power.

" His Majeſty, taking notice thereof, did by ſe- " veral meſſages invite them to ſetle the ſame by " act of parliament; affirming, in his Majeſty's " meſſage ſent in anſwer to the petition of both " houſes, preſented to his Majeſty at York, March " twenty-ſix, that he always thought it neceſſary the " ſame ſhould be ſetled, and that he never denied " the thing, only denied the way; and for the " matter of it, took exceptions only to the preface, " as a thing not ſtanding with his honor to conſent " to, and that himſelf was excluded in the execu- " tion, and for a time unlimited. Whereupon the " lords and commons, being deſirous to give his " Majeſty all ſatisfaction that might be, even to " the leaſt tittle of form and circumſtance; and " when his Majeſty was pleaſed to offer them a bill " ready drawn, did, for no other cauſe than to

(a) Lord Clarendon places this meſſage before the King's going to Hull. See Vol. I. p. 396.

" manifeſt

Charles I An' 1642.

" manifeſt their hearty affection to comply with his " Majeſty's deſires, and obtain his conſent, enter- " tain the ſame, in the mean time no way de- " clining their ordinance, and to expreſs their " earneſt zeal to correſpond with his Majeſty's " deſire (in all things which might conſiſt with " the peace and ſafety of the kingdom, and " the truſt repoſed in them) did paſs that bill, " and therein omited the preamble inſerted before " the ordinance, limited the time to leſs than two " years, and confined the authority of the lieute- " nants to theſe three particulars, namely, rebel- " lion, inſurrection and foreign invaſion, and re- " turned the ſame to his Majeſty for his royal aſ- " ſent. But all theſe expreſſions of affection and " loyalty, all theſe deſires and earneſt indeavors to " comply with his Majeſty, have (to their great " grief and ſorrow) produced no better affect than " an abſolute denial, even of that which his Ma- " jeſty by his former meſſages, as we conceive, " had promiſed; the advice of evil and wicked " councils receiving ſtill more credit with him than " that of his great council of parliament, in a mat- " ter of ſo high importance that the ſafety of his " kingdom, and the peace of his people depend " upon it. (2)

Rem. (2) If Charles, on his part, ſuppoſed the government to be in its natural ſtate, and that conſequently he ought to injoy all his prerogatives, the parliament made here a ſuppoſition which was not liable to fewer objections: viz. That, in the preſent juncture, his Majeſty ought to conſider them as his great council, and be guided by their directions.

" But now what muſt be the exceptions to this " bill? Not any ſure which were to the ordinance: " for a care was taken to give ſatisfaction in all " theſe particulars. Then the exception was, be- " cauſe that the diſpoſing and execution thereof " was refered to both houſes of parliament, and his " Majeſty excluded; and now that, by the bill, " the power and execution is aſcertained, and re- " duced to particulars, and the law of the realm " made the rule thereof, his Majeſty will not truſt " the perſons. The power is too great, too unli- " mited to truſt them with. (3)

Rem. (3) The parliament here pretends to ſhew, that they had regarded the King's complaints, and yet his Majeſty had refuſed to paſs the bill. They own that one of his complaints againſt the ordinance was, his being wholly excluded from having any thing to do in ſetling the militia. To demonſtrate therefore that Charles had reaſon to be ſatisfied with the bill, it ſhould have been ſaid, " And now that, by the bill, he is joined in the " execution with the two houſes." But inſtead of this, they ſay, " And now that the execution is " aſcertained, and the law of the realm made the " rule." It is eaſy to perceive that this is the direct contrary to his Majeſty's complaint.

" But what is that power? Is it any other, but " in expreſs terms to ſuppreſs rebellion, inſur- " rection and foreign invaſion? And who are " thoſe perſons? Are they not ſuch as were nomi- " nated by the great council of the kingdom, and " aſſented to by his Majeſty? And is it too great " a power to truſt thoſe perſons with the ſuppreſ- " ſion of rebellion, inſurrection and foreign in- " vaſion? Surely the moſt wicked of them who " adviſed his Majeſty to this anſwer cannot ſug- " geſt, but that it is neceſſary for the ſafety of his " Majeſty's royal perſon, and the peace of the " kingdom, ſuch a power ſhould be put in ſome " hands, and there is no pretenſe of exception to " the perſons: his Majeſty, for the ſpace of above " fifteen years together, thought not a power far " exceeding this to be too great to intruſt particular " perſons with, to whoſe will the lives and liberties " of his people by martial laws were made ſubject; " for ſuch was the power given to lord-lieutenants " and deputy-lieutenants, in every county of this " kingdom, and that without the conſent of his " people, or authority of law: but now, in caſe " of extreme neceſſity, upon advice of both houſes " of parliament for no longer ſpace than two years, " a leſſer power, and that for the ſafety of the " King and people, is thought too great to truſt " particular perſons with, tho' named by both " houſes of parliament, and approved of by his " Majeſty himſelf. And ſurely, if there be a ne- " ceſſity to ſetle the militia (which his Majeſty " was pleaſed to confeſs) the perſons cannot be " truſted with leſs power than this, to have it at all " effectual: and the precedents of former ages, " when there happened a neceſſity to raiſe ſuch a " power, never ſtraitened that power to a narrow " compaſs; witneſs the commiſſions of array in " ſeveral Kings reigns, and often iſſued out by the " conſent and authority of parliament. The lords " and commons therefore, intruſted with the ſafety " of the kingdom, and peace of the people (which " they call God to witneſs is their only aim) find- " ing themſelves denied theſe their ſo neceſſary " and juſt demands, and that they can never be " diſcharged before God and man, if they ſhould " ſuffer the ſafety of the kingdom, and peace of the " people, to be expoſed to the malice of the ma- " lignant party at home, or the fury of enemies a- " broad; and knowing no other way to incounter " the imminent and approaching danger, but by " puting the people into a fit poſture of defenſe, " do reſolve to put their ſaid ordinance in preſent " execution, and do require all perſons in authority, " by virtue of the ſaid ordinance, forthwith to " put the ſame in execution, and all others to " obey it, according to the fundamental laws of the " kingdom in ſuch caſes, as they tender the up- " holding of the true proteſtant religion, the ſafety " of his Majeſty's perſon, and his royal poſterity, " the peace of the kingdom, and the being of this " common-wealth.

Charles I An' 1642.

His Majeſty's anſwer to the parliament's declaration *.

" WE very well underſtand how much it " is below the high and royal dignity " (wherein God hath placed us) to take notice, " much more to trouble ourſelf with anſwering " thoſe many ſcandalous, ſeditious pamphltes, and " printed papers, which are ſcattered with ſuch " great licenſe throughout the kingdom (notwith- " ſtanding our earneſt deſire ſo often, in vain, preſ- " ſed for a reformation) tho' we find it evident, that " the minds of many of our weak ſubjects have " been, and ſtill are poiſoned by thoſe means, " and that ſo general a terror hath poſſeſſed the " minds and hearts of all men, that while the preſſes " ſwarm (and every day produceth new tracts " againſt the eſtabliſhed government of the church " and ſtate) moſt men want the courage, or the con- " ſcience to write, or the opportunity and incou- " ragement to publiſh ſuch compoſed, ſober ani- " madverſions as might either preſerve the minds " of our good ſubjects from ſuch infection, or re- " ſtore and recover them when they are ſo infected; " but we are contented to let ourſelf fall to any of- " fice which may undeceive our people, and to " take more pains this way, by our own pen, than " ever King hath done, when we find any thing " which ſeems to carry the authority or reputation of " either or both houſes of parliament, and will not " have the ſame refuted, or diſputed by common " and vulgar pens, 'till we are thoroughly inform- " ed, whether thoſe acts have in truth that coun- " tenance

" tenance and warrant they pretend; which re" gard of ours we doubt not but, in time, will re" cover that due reverence (the abſenſe whereof we " have too much reaſon to complain of) to our
" perſon, and our meſſages, which in all ages hath
" been paid (and no doubt is due) to the crown of " England.

" We have therefore taken notice of a printed
" paper, intitled, A Declaration of both Houſes of
" of Parliament, in anſwer to our laſt meſſage con" cerning the militia, publiſhed by command; the
" which we are unwilling to believe (both for the " matter of it, the expreſſions in it, and the man" ner of publiſhing it) can reſult from the con-
" ſent of both houſes; neither do we know by
" what lawful command ſuch uncomely, irreverent
" mention of us, can be publiſhed to the world.
" And tho' declarations of this kind have of late
" (with too much boldneſs) broken in upon us, and " the whole kingdom, when one or both houſes
" have thought fit to communicate their counſels
" and reſolutions to the people; yet we are unwil-
" ling to believe, that ſuch a declaration as this
" ſhould be publiſhed in anſwer to our meſſage,
" without vouchſafing at leaſt to ſend it to us as " their anſwer: their buſineſs, for which they " are met by our writ and authority, being to
" counſel us, for the good of our people, not to
" write againſt us to our people, and no conſent
" of ours for their long continuing together ina-
" bling them to do any thing, but what they were
" firſt ſummoned by our writ to do: at leaſt we " will believe, tho' miſ-underſtanding and jealouſy
" (the juſtice of God will overtake the fomenters
" of that jealouſy, and the promoters and contri-
" vers of that miſ-underſtanding) might produce
" (to ſay no worſe) thoſe very untoward expreſ-
" ons, that if thoſe houſes had contrived that de" claration, as an anſwer to our meſſage, they " would have vouchſafed ſome anſwer to the " queſtion propoſed in ours; which we profeſ-
" ſed did, and muſt evidently prevail over our
" underſtanding; and, in their wiſdom and gra-
" vity, they would have been ſure to have ſtated
" the matters of fact, as (at leaſt to ordinary un-
" derſtandings) might be unqueſtionable; neither of " which is done by that declaration.

" We deſire to know, why we were, by that
" act, abſolutely excluded from any power or au" thority in the execution of the militia; and we
" muſt appeal to all the world, whether ſuch an " attempt be not a greater and juſter ground for " fear and jealouſy in us, than any one which is a-
" vowed for thoſe deſtructive fears and jealouſies,
" which are ſo publicly owned, almoſt to the ruin
" of the kingdom. But we have been told, That " we muſt not be jealous of our great council of " both houſes of parliament: we are not, no more " than they are of us, their King; and as hitherto
" they have not avowed any jealouſy of, or diſaf-
" fection to our perſon, imputed all to our evil
" counſellors, to a malignant party, who are not
" of their minds; ſo we do (and we do it from our " ſoul) profeſs no jealouſy of our parliament, but
" ſome turbulent, ſeditious and ambitious natures,
" which (being not ſo clearly diſcerned) may have
" an influence even upon the actions of both houſes.
" And if this declaration hath paſſed by ſuch con-
" ſent (which we are not willing to believe) it is
" not impoſſible but that the apprehenſion of ſuch
" tumults, which have driven us from the city of
" of London, for the ſafety of our perſon, may " make ſuch an impreſſion in other men (not able " to remove from the danger) to make their con-
" ſent, or not own a diſſent in matters not agree-
" able to their conſcience or underſtanding.

" We mentioned, in that our anſwer, our diſ-
" like of the puting their names out of the bill,
" whom before they recommended to us, in their
" pretended ordinance; and the leaving out,
" by ſpecial proviſion, the preſent lord-mayor of " London; to all which the declaration affords no
" anſwer to that our meſſage, and therefore we can-
" not ſuppoſe it was intended for an anſwer to that
" our meſſage; which whoſoever looks upon, will " find to be in no degree anſwered by that decla" ration.

CHARLES I AN' 1642.

" But it informs all our ſubjects, after the mention
" with what humility the ordinance was prepared
" and preſented to us (a matter very evident in the " petitions and meſſages concerning it) and our re-
" fuſal to give our conſent, notwithſtanding the ſeve-
" ral reaſons offered of the neceſſity thereof, for the " ſecuring of our perſon, and the peace and ſafety
" of our people (whether any ſuch reaſons were " given, the weight of them, and whether they " were not clearly and candidly anſwered by us,
" the world will eaſily judge) and that they were at
" laſt neceſſitated to make an ordinance, by autho" rity of both houſes, to ſetle the milita, warranted
" thereunto by the fundamental laws of the land:
" but, if that declaration had indeed intended to " have anſwered us, it would have told our good
" ſubjects what thoſe fundamental laws of the land
" are, and where to be found; and would at leaſt
" have mentioned one ordinance, from the firſt be-
" gining of parliaments to this preſent parliament,
" which indeavored to impoſe any thing upon the
" ſubjects without the King's conſent; for of ſuch,
" all the inquiry we can make could never pro-
" duce us one inſtance. (1)

REMARK (1) Both King and parliament equally abuſed the term, " fundamental law." The parliament gave the name of fundamental law to the truſt placed in them by the people, which obliged the two houſes to take care of the public ſafety, when the kingdom was in danger, which was not properly a law. The King, on his ſide, would not own for fundamental, any but poſitive expreſs, and particular laws upon the caſe in queſtion, and required ſuch to be produced. It is eaſy for unbiaſſed perſons to ſolve this difficulty. If it is ſuppoſed, with the parliament, that King Charles intended to eſtabliſh arbitrary government, it is certain the parliament had a right to oppoſe it, by virtue of the truſt given them by the people, and as the repreſentative body of the nation; and in ſuch caſe it might be ſaid, they were ſupported by a fundamental law, or ſomething equivalent. But if, with this Prince, it is ſuppoſed, that the government was in its ordinary and natural ſtate, and there was no reaſon to ſuſpect him, it is certain, the parliament had no right to meddle with the militia, without his Majeſty's conſent. The whole conſiſts therefore in the truth or falſehood of theſe two ſuppoſitions.

" And if there be ſuch a ſecret of the law, which " hath lain hid from the begining of the world to
" this time, and now is diſcovered, to take away
" the juſt, legal power of the King, we wiſh
" there be not ſome other ſecret (to be diſcovered
" when they pleaſe) for the ruin and deſtruction
" of the liberty of the ſubject: for, no doubt, if
" the votes of both houſes have any ſuch autho" rity to make a new law, it hath the ſame autho" rity to repeal the old, and then what will be" come of the long eſtabliſhed rights and liberties
" of the King and ſubject, and particularly of " Magna Charta, will be eaſily diſcerned by the
" moſt ordinary underſtanding. (2)

REM. (2) Never were the peoples liberties in more danger of being deſtroyed than in the reign of Charles I, notwithſtanding Magna Charta, and the national laws. So, whatever his ſaid Majeſty alleged againſt the parliament, was no leſs ſtrong against himself. Beside, his reasoning could subsist but in virtue of the supposition mentioned in the preceding article, which was very far from being proved.

CHARLES I An' 1642.

" It is true, we did (out of the tenderness of the " constitution of the kingdom, and care of the " law which we are bound to defend, and being " most assured of the unjustifiableness of the pre- " tended ordinance) invite and desire both our " houses of parliament to setle whatsoever should " be fit, of that nature, by act of parliament. " But were we therefore obliged to pass whatso- " ever should be brought to us of that kind? We " did say, in our answer to the petition of both " houses, presented to us, at York, the twenty sixth " of March last (and we have said the same in " other messages before) that we always thought " it necessary, the business of the militia should " be setled, and that we never denied the thing, " only denied the way; and we say the same still, " since the many disputes and votes upon lord- " lieutenants and their commissions (which were " begun by us or our father) had so discountenanced " that authority, which, for many years together, " was happily looked upon with reverence and " obedience for the people. We did, and do " think it very necessary, that some wholsome " law be provided for that business; but we " declared, in our answer to the pretended ordi- " nance, we expected that necessary power should " be first invested in us, before we consented to " transfer it to other men (3): neither could it " ever be imagined we could consent, that a " greater power should be in the hands of a " subject, than we were thought worthy to be " trusted with ourself. And if it shall not be " thought fit to make a new act or declaration in " this point, we doubt not but we shall be able " to grant such commissions, which shall very le- " gally inable those we trust, to do all offices " for the peace and quiet of the kingdom, if any " disturbance shall happen.

Rem. (3) There was no occasion to invest the King with power to suppress rebellions and insurrections, and repel invasions, in order to his transfering that power to others, since he was of course invested with it. But King Charles indeavors to color his denial, by representing that power as exorbitant.

" But that declaration saith, we were pleased to " offer them a bill ready drawn; and that they " (to express their earnest zeal to correspond " with our desire) did pass that bill; yet all that " expression of affection and loyalty, all that " earnest desire of theirs to comply with us, pro- " duced no better effect than an absolute denial, " even of what by our former messages (as that " declaration conceives) we had promised; and " so proceeds under the pretense of mentioning " evil and wicked councils, to censure and re- " proach us, in a dialect which, we are confi- " dent, our good subjects will read with much " indignation on our behalf. But sure, if that decla- " ration had passed the examination of both houses " of parliament, they would never have affirmed, " that the bill we refused to pass was the same " we sent to them, or have thought that our " message, wherein the difference and contra- " riety between the two bills is so particularly " set down, would be answered with the bare " avering them to be one and the same bill; no " more would they have declared (when our ex- " ceptions to the ordinance and the bill are so no- " toriously known to all our people) that, care be- " ing taken to give satisfaction in all the particu- " lars we had excepted against in the ordinance, " we had found new exceptions to the bill: and " yet this very declaration confesses, that our ex- " ception to the ordinance was that, in the dis- " posing and execution thereof, we were exclud- " ed; and was not this an express reason in our " answer for refusal of the bill, which this decla- " ration will needs confute? But the power was " no other than to suppress rebellion, insurrection " and foreign invasion; and the persons trusted, no " other than such as were nominated by the great " council of the kingdom, and assented to by us; " and that declaration asks, if that be too great a " power to trust these persons with? Indeed, while " so great liberty is used in voting and declaring " men to be enemies to the commonwealth (an " English phrase we scarcely understand) and in " censuring men for their service and attendance " upon our person, and in our lawful commands, " great heed must be taken into what hands we " commit such a power to suppress insurrection " and rebellion; and if insurrection and rebellion " have found other definitions than what the law " hath given them, we must be sure that no law- " ful power shall justify those definitions; and if " there be learning found out to make sir John " Hotham's taking arms against us, and keeping " our town and fort from us, no treason and re- " bellion, we know not whether a new discovery " may not find it rebellion in us to defend our- " selves from such arms, and so indeavor to reco- " ver what is so taken from us; (4) and therefore " it concerns us ('till the known law of the land " be allowed to be judge between us) to take heed " into what hands we commit such power.

Rem. (4) His Majesty always reasoned upon the supposition, that the government was in its natural state, and that there was no cause to suspect him; a supposition which was not granted.

" Beside, can it be thought that, because we are " willing to trust certain persons, we are obliged " to trust them in whatsoever they are willing " to be trusted? We say, no private hands are fit " for such a trust; neither have we departed from " any thing (in the least degree) we offered, or " promised before; tho' we might, with as much " reason, have withdrawn our trust from some " persons we before had excepted, as they did " from others whom they recommended. For the " power which we are charged to have commited " to particular persons, for the space of fifteen " years, by our commissions of lieutenancy, it is " notoriously known, that it was not a power " created by us, but continued very many years, " and in the most happy times this kingdom hath " injoyed; even those of our renowned predecessors " Queen Elizabeth, and our father of happy me- " mory, (5) and whatever authority was granted " by those commissions, which were kept in old " forms, the same was determined at our plea- " sure, and we know not, that they produced any " of those calamities, which might give our good " subjects cause to be so weary of them, as to run " the hazard of so much mischief, as that bill we " refused might possibly have produced.

Rem. (5) The example of King James I, is no good evidence. I very much question if, in times of peace, Queen Elizabeth ever made her subjects liable to be tried by martial law.

" For the precedents of former ages in the com- " missions of array, we doubt not but, when any " such are issued out, that the King's consent was " always obtained, and the commissions deter- " minable at his pleasure, and then what the extent " of power was will be nothing applicable to this " case of the ordinance.

" But whether that declaration hath refuted our " reasons for our refusal to pass the bill, or no, it " hath resolved and required all persons in authority " thereby to put the ordinance in present execution,

" and

Charles I An' 1642.

" and all others to obey it, according to the fundamental laws of the land. But we, whom " God hath truſted to maintain and defend thoſe " fundamental laws (which, we hope, he will bleſs " to ſecure us) do declare, that there is no legal " power in either or both houſes, upon any pretenſe whatſoever, without our conſent, to command any part of the militia of this kingdom; " nor hath the like ever been commanded by either " or both houſes, ſince the firſt foundation of the " laws of the land; and that the execution of, or " the obedience to that pretended ordinance is " againſt the fundamental laws of the land, againſt " the liberty of the ſubject, and the right of parliaments, and a high crime in any who ſhall " henceforth execute the ſame. And we do therefore charge and command all our loving ſubjects, " of what degree or quality ſoever, upon their " allegiance, and as they tender the peace of this " kingdom, from henceforth not to muſter, levy, " array, ſummon, or warn any of our trained-" bands, to riſe, muſter, or march, by virtue, or " under color of that pretended ordinance. And " to this declaration and command of ours we expect and require full ſubmiſſion and obedience " from all our loving ſubjects, upon their allegiance, " as they will anſwer the contrary at their perils; " and as they tender the upholding of the true Proteſtant religion, the ſafety of our perſon, our " royal poſterity, and the peace and being of this " kingdom."

Having given moſt of the papers, publiſhed on both ſides, concerning the militia, I ſhall, for the reader's better information, indeavor ſomewhat more fully to illuſtrate the ground of the rupture between King Charles and his parliament, which, in my brief remarks on ſundry paſſages of theſe papers, could not be done but very ſuccinctly.

State of the queſtion between King and parliament.

The parliament denied not that, in the ordinary courſe of government, the right of ſetling the militia, and appointing thoſe who were to command it under him, was ſolely in his Majeſty (1): but they affirmed that, in the preſent extraordinary caſe, it was incumbent on them to take care the kingdom periſhed not by the King's fault. The caſe they ſuppoſed was this: King Charles, for the ſpace of fifteen years, had labored to eſtabliſh abſolute power, and had actually eſtabliſhed it on diverſe occaſions. He had pretended, that he might govern without parliaments, and accordingly had not in twelve ſucceſſive years called any; during which interval, he had violated ſundry laws, and ruled deſpotically. Being, by the neceſſity of his affairs, conſtrained to call this preſent parliament, he had ſeemed to acknowledge the injuſtice of his former conduct, by giving his conſent to the good acts made for the redreſs of paſſed, and the prevention of future grievances: but at the very time he expreſſed ſuch extraordinary condeſcenſion for his ſubjects, and outward repentance for his faults, he ceaſed not deviſing means to render himſelf abſolute as before. The parliament from this procedure infered, that his condeſcenſion was mere external appearance; that, the firſt opportunity, he would revoke the acts he had conſented to, and which he conſtantly affected to term acts of grace, tho' they were really acts of juſtice: conſequently, it was neceſſary to put it out of his power to recede from what he had done, if he ſhould be ſo diſpoſed. The ſole method to prevent ſuch a deſign, was to put the realm's militia into ſafe hands, ſuch as ſhould not depend on the King, and hinder his having any power over the militia, leſt this power, either in him alone, or jointly with the two houſes, might inable him to break all the meaſures which ſhould be taken to obſtruct the execution of his deſigns. Charles I An' 1642.

It is evident the parliament did right or wrong, according as their ſuppoſition was true or falſe. Admit, for a moment, that their ſuppoſition was well-grounded, and that King Charles had really a deſign to render himſelf abſolute; ought the parliament, thro' pure regard for the ancient laws, to leave the Sovereign a power which inabled him to alter the government's conſtitution, and ſubvert once more thoſe very laws, wherein the ſubjects ſafety intirely conſiſted? Is it not obvious that, in ſuch a caſe, it was neceſſary to violate theſe laws, in order to eſtabliſh them more firmly? When therefore his ſaid Majeſty objected to the parliament ſuch laws as gave the Kings of England certain prerogatives, he manifeſtly ſuppoſed the government to be in its natural ſtate; but this parliament ſuppoſed the contrary. Conſequently, Charles's arguments could not make any impreſſion, becauſe they were not applicable to the caſe ſuppoſed by the parliament. Unfortunately, this Prince was forced to uſe againſt his parliament the very reaſons before alleged by the parliament and people againſt him, when he uſurped a deſpotic power. He complained, that the parliament founded their right on a pretended neceſſity which was never proved, and himſelf had formerly made uſe of a neceſſity ſtill more imaginary, to impoſe arbitrary taxes without conſent of parliament, contrary to the national laws.

But if, contrariwiſe, we ſuppoſe the parliament's ſuſpicion to be chimerical, and that King Charles never gave any room for them, at leaſt ſince the begining of this parliament, and that his profeſſions of governing according to law were ſincere, it is certain his arguments from the laws, cuſtoms and royal prerogatives were invincible; becauſe, in that caſe, there would not have been any the leaſt juſt pretenſe to diveſt him of his rights. The whole queſtion therefore was reduced to this ſingle point; Whether the King was ſincere, and his word to be relied on? But, unhappily for him, a fifteen years experience had convinced moſt of his ſubjects, that he would have eſtabliſhed a deſpotic government; the motives of his condeſcenſion, in the acts paſſed this parliament, were dubious, and his proteſtations, with regard to the future, uncertain. Thus the parliament had a great advantage over him, becauſe they had what was paſſed for warrant of their ſuſpicions, which was but too certain; whereas he could only offer the future, which had not a like certainty.

It was time for the declarations, anſwers and replies, concerning the militia, to end, ſince there was nothing new to be ſaid on that ſubject. Beſide, the parliament's ordinance was now executing in all places, where the people were willing to obey it. At length, May twenty-ſeven, Charles iſſued a proclamation, forbiding to execute the ordinance of the parliament, on pain to offenders of being declared diſturbers of the public peace (2). The parliament on their part, publiſhed a declaration, inhibiting

Proclamation againſt the ordinance. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 550.

Declaration of both houſes againſt it. Ib. p. 551.

(1) The commons were divided in their opinions about this point: ſome affirming, " That the power of the militia was " ſolely in the King, and ought to be left to him, and that the parliament never did, nor ought, to meddle with the ſame." And others, " That the King had not this power in him, but that it was ſolely in the parliament; and that if the King " refuſed to order the ſame according to the advice of the parliament, that then they, by the law, might do it without him." Whitelock, p. 55.

(2) Charles grounded this proclamation on a ſtatute, made in the ſeventh of Edward I, whereby it was inacted, " That " to the King it belongeth, by his royal ſeigniory, ſtreightly to defend wearing of armor, and all other force, againſt the " peace, at all times, when it ſhall pleaſe him, and to puniſh them who ſhall do contrary." See Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 550.

inhibiting all perſons to obey the King's proclamation, as being contrary to law. As this procedure might ſeem ſtrange, both houſes grounded their inhibition upon reaſons whereof I ſhall only relate the ſubſtance, ſince they may be readily conceived, as flowing from the above-ſpecified principles. They urged:

"That the queſtion is not, Whether it belongs "to the King or no, to reſtrain levying the militia? "but, if the King ſhall refuſe to diſcharge that "duty and truſt, Whether there be not a power "in the two houſes to provide for the ſafety of "the parliament, and peace of the kingdom? "That tho' the law affirms that power to be in "the King, it does not exclude thoſe in whom the "law hath placed a power for that purpoſe, as in "the courts of juſtice; yet can it not be reſtrained "by his Majeſty's command, by his great ſeal, "or otherwiſe; much leſs can the power of par-"liament be concluded by his Majeſty's com-"mand.

"That tho' the King is the fountain of juſtice "and protection, yet the acts of juſtice and pro-"tection are not exerciſed in his own perſon, but "by his courts and his miniſters; who muſt do "their duty therein, tho' the King, in his own "perſon, ſhould forbid them; and therefore, if "judgments ſhould be given by them againſt the "King's will, and perſonal command, yet are "they the King's judgments. Thus alſo, the "high court of parliament declares the King's "pleaſure in thoſe things which are requiſite there-"unto, and what they do herein hath the ſtamp "of royal authority, altho' his Majeſty do in his "own perſon oppoſe or interrupt the ſame: for "the King's ſupreme and royal pleaſure is ex-"erciſed and declared in this high court of law "and council, after a more eminent and obligatory "manner, than it can be by any perſonal act or "reſolution of his own.

"That, by the conſtitution and policy of this "kingdom, the King by his proclamation cannot "declare the law, contrary to the judgment and "reſolution of any of the inferior courts of juſtice, "much leſs againſt the high court of parliament; "for if it were admited that the King, by his pro-"clamation, may declare a law, thereby his pro-"clamations will in effect become laws, which "would turn to the ſubverting of the law of the "land, and the rights and liberties of the ſub-"jects."

Defect in the two houſes reaſoning.

Theſe are the main arguments alleged by the parliament, to ſhew that the King's proclamation was illegal. But there was a very manifeſt defect in this reaſoning. They repreſented the two houſes as alone compoſing the parliament, whereas it is certain, parliaments are compoſed of the King and both houſes, joined together and making but one body. What the parliament ſaid is therefore ſtrictly true, if the word parliament be underſtood in the ſenſe I mentioned, as a body conſiſting of King and two houſes. For, the King cannot, by his ſole will, ſubvert what has been ordained by the parliament, becauſe himſelf making a part, and the nobleſt part of the parliament, he would contradict himſelf, in forbiding a thing he had already ordained. But if, by parliament, the two houſes alone be underſtood, excluſive of the King, it cannot be ſaid that their declarations are the King's, or that they are more ſolemn and obligatory than the King's private will: for if they were, the government's conſtitution would be utterly ſubverted. This is ſo true, that, by retorting the argument alleged by both houſes againſt the King, it might, by that very reaſon, be demonſtrated, that they have power to make laws without the King's concurrence, which would be full as true as their ſaying, that the King's proclamations would be ſo many laws. It is therefore certain that, by the arguments they alleged againſt King Charles's proclamation, they furniſh invincible reaſons againſt their own ordinance: nevertheleſs, upon this ſophiſtry it was that they grounded all the authority they aſſumed to themſelves afterwards. They therefore greatly prejudiced themſelves by relying on ſuch weak arguments. Their right ſolely conſiſted in the ſuppoſition, that his Majeſty would have altered the government's conſtitution, which they had a lawful power to oppoſe by extraordinary methods, ſince the national laws, inſtead of affording them effectual remedies, did rather countenance Charles's deſigns. That Prince, on his part, founded his right upon the contrary ſuppoſition, i. e. that there was no danger from him; but that the parliament had undertaken to ſubvert the conſtitution of church and ſtate. Such was then the melancholy ſituation of England.

Charles I An' 1642.

I have related without interruption the militia buſineſs, which laſted however ſeveral months, that I might not be obliged to break the thread of my narrative; this affair being of the utmoſt importance, ſince it was the moſt immediate cauſe of the civil war which quickly inſued: but it was not the ſole tranſaction of this juncture. Wherefore, it will be requiſite we return to the time when I began to ſpeak of the militia, to take a view of other paſſages, no leſs material, and whereof ſome were not leſs conducive to the rupture.

Bills for excluding the biſhops and preſſing ſoldiers, paſſed.

Charles, having in February paſſed the two acts, ſo earneſtly deſired by the commons, viz. for the excluſion of the biſhops, and for preſſing of ſoldiers, ſent the following meſſage to both houſes:

The King's meſſage to both houſes, Feb. 14. 1641-2. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 553.

"That his having paſſed theſe two bills, being "of ſo great importance, and ſo earneſtly deſired "by both houſes, will ſerve to aſſure his parlia-"ment, that he deſires nothing more than the "ſatisfaction of his kingdom; yet, that he may "farther manifeſt to both houſes how impatient "he is, 'till he find out a full remedy to compoſe "the preſent diſtempers, he is pleaſed to ſignify:

"That he will by proclamation require, that all "ſtatutes made concerning recuſants be, with all "care, diligence and ſeverity, put in execution.

"That his Majeſty is reſolved, that the ſeven "condemned prieſts ſhall be immediately baniſhed, "if his parliament ſhall conſent thereunto. And "he will give preſent order, that a proclamation "iſſue, to require all Romiſh prieſts, within twenty "days, to depart the kingdom; and if any ſhall "be apprehended after that time, his Majeſty "aſſures both houſes, on the word of a King, that "he will grant no pardon to any ſuch, without "conſent of his parliament.

"And becauſe great and different troubles are "obſerved to ariſe, concerning the government and "liturgy of the church, his Majeſty declares, that "he will refer the whole conſideration to his par-"liament: but deſires not to be preſſed to any "ſingle act on his part, 'till the whole be ſo "digeſted and ſetled, by both houſes, that his "Majeſty may clearly ſee what is fit to be left, "as well as what is fit to be taken away.

"For Ireland, he will not refuſe to venture his "own perſon in that war, if his parliament ſhall "think it convenient for the reduction of that "kingdom.

"That he will moſt readily concur in any reſo-"lution their wiſdoms ſhall find out, which may "conduce to promote the trade of the kingdom."

The two houſes contented themſelves with thanking his Majeſty for paſſing the two bills, without returning any anſwer upon the other points.

The Queen being miſinformed, that there was a deſign to accuſe her of high treaſon, the parliament had had notice of it, and ſent to vindicate themſelves from this aſperſion. Her Majeſty anſwered, it was true, there was ſuch a report, but that ſhe gave little credit to it.

Letters from lord Digby intercepted. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 554. Clarendon, p. 337. Whitelock, p. 54.

Some letters of lord Digby, directed to the Queen, to ſir Lewis Dives his brother-in-law, and to ſecretary Nicholas (1) being intercepted, the parliament had them opened. It was found, that lord Digby, who was then at Middleburg in Zealand, counſeled his Majeſty to betake himſelf to a place of ſafety, and deſired the Queen to ſend him a cypher, that he might hold a correſpondence with her: there were alſo in the letters ſome ſharp expreſſions againſt the parliament. The two houſes ſent copies of theſe letters to their Majeſties, aſſuring them, that they were far from reflecting any thing upon the Queen, only they beſought her not to correſpond with lord Digby. Some days after, it was reſolved by the commons, that lord Digby ſhould be accuſed of high-treaſon.

He is accuſed of high treaſon.

Meſſage to his Majeſty concerning the Prince. Feb. 24, 1641-2.

February the twenty-fourth, a meſſage was ſent from both houſes to his Majeſty, to acquaint him with the reaſons why they deſired, that the Prince of Wales ſhould reſide at Hampton-court. The chief was, that the Prince's removal might be a cauſe to promote jealouſies and fears in the minds of his ſubjects: for the parliament miſſed no opportunity to let the people ſee there was occaſion to be alarmed. Charles in his anſwer intimated to them, that he did not think himſelf accountable for his conduct with regard to the Prince his ſon; and concluded with ſaying, "He could not imagine from what grounds theſe fears and jealouſies proceeded; but if any information had been given to that purpoſe, he deſired the ſame might be examined to the bottom; and then hoped their fears would be hereafter continued only with reference to his rights and honor."

Propoſals about Ireland. p. 557. Clarendon, p. 355, 356.

About the ſame time, propoſals were made the parliament, for the ſpeedy raiſing money for the reduction of Ireland. Theſe propoſals were, That, to ſuch perſons as ſhould be willing to advance money for that ſervice, ſhould be alloted, according to a certain proportion, the rebels lands which ſhould be confiſcated. This was approved by both houſes, and an act paſſed accordingly; whereto his Majeſty gave the royal aſſent (2).

The Queen goes to Holland.

The Queen departed for Holland about the end of February.

Charles iſſues a proclamation againſt Papiſts. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 558.

March ſixteen, Charles, being at Stanford in his way to York, iſſued a proclamation for ſtrictly executing the laws againſt Papiſts. This proclamation was very needleſs, and ſerved only to ſhew that hitherto theſe laws had been ill executed. But thereby this Prince was deſirous to repel the imputation of his protecting and countenancing the Catholics, ſo much inſiſted on by his adverſaries among the people, as if this protection was a proof of his deſign to introduce Popery (3).

He informs the parliament of his deſign to paſs into Ireland. April 8. p. 560. Clarendon, p. 385.

Charles, as I obſerved, would fain have ſecured Hull, with the magazine there; but his deſign was yet a ſecret, and means were deviſing to put it in practiſe. To this end, very ſeemingly, he ſent the parliament a meſſage to acquaint them, that he had firmly reſolved on paſſing over to Ireland, to head the Engliſh troops: that therefore he intended to raiſe, by his commiſſions, in the counties near Weſt-Cheſter, a guard for his own perſon (when he ſhould be in Ireland) conſiſting of two thouſand foot, and two hundred horſe †; the charge of paying whereof he deſired them to take upon them. It was eaſy to foreſee that this propoſition would not then be accepted; for it was at the very juncture when the militia affair was moſt warmly debating: but his Majeſty hoped to reap ſome advantage, either from the approbation, or the denial. If the parliament conſented to it, Charles found he ſhould be able to imploy his pretended guard of two thouſand two hundred men, to render himſelf maſter of Hull: at leaſt, one can ſcarcely help thinking he had ſuch a deſign, conſidering what paſſed very ſuddenly after. If his propoſition was rejected, he flattered himſelf, that at leaſt he ſhould thereby convince the people of his ſincere deſire to reduce Ireland, and diſpel the rumors ſpread on that head, which would afford him occaſion to caſt the whole blame on the parliament. Accordingly, ſuch was the ſole uſe he afterwards made of this offer, which was but a ſtratagem, as lord Clarendon, in his hiſtory, acknowledges. But whether both houſes conſidered this propoſition of his Majeſty's as a ſnare, or as a real and ſincere offer, they thought not fit to give their conſent. Indeed, as matters then ſtood, it was no way proper to ſet this Prince at the head of an army in Ireland, and ſtill leſs, that he ſhould raiſe in England a guard of two thouſand two hundred men, when they were laboring with all their power to take from him all command of the militia, upon the foundation of the jealouſies conceived of him: for tho' hitherto they had been contented to accuſe only his counſellors, and a malignant party, of forming conſpiracies againſt the ſtate, it was nevertheleſs no other than a mere artifice to accuſe him himſelf. So, as they neither could nor would approve Charles's propoſition, they preſented him a petition, alleging:

CHARLES I AN' 1642.

† To be armed from his magazine of Hull.

p. 393.

Both houſes petition the King. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 561. Clarendon, p. 387.

"That, having duly conſidered his Majeſty's meſſage, concerning his purpoſe of going into Ireland, to proſecute the war, which he was pleaſed to propound to them, not as a matter wherein he deſired the advice of the parliament, but as already firmly reſolved on, and forthwith to be put in execution, by granting out commiſſions for the levying of two thouſand foot and two hundred horſe, for a guard for his perſon; they could not but wonder, that a buſineſs of ſo great importance, and wherein they had a ſpecial intereſt, by thoſe great ſums which they had diſburſed, and for which they ſtood ingaged, ſhould be concluded and undertaken without their advice. And therefore they held it their duty to declare, that his going into Ireland would very much indanger the ſafety of his royal perſon and kingdoms, for the following reaſons.

"1. Becauſe his royal perſon would be ſubject not only to the caſualty of war, but to the ſecret practiſes and conſpiracies of the Papiſts.

"2. It would exceedingly incourage the rebels, who did generally profeſs and declare, that his Majeſty countenanced their proceedings, and that this inſurrection was undertaken by the warrant of his commiſſion.

(1) They were all incloſed in a cover to ſecretary Nicholas. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 554.

(2) It was propoſed, that two millions and a half of thoſe acres might be aſſigned, and divided among the adventurers, after this proportion; viz. For each adventure of 200 l. 1000 acres in Ulſter; of 300 l. 1000 acres in Conaught; of 450 l. 1000 acres in Munſter; of 600 l. 1000 acres in Leinſter. All according to the Engliſh meaſure, conſiſting of meadow, arable, and paſture, the bogs, woods and barren mountains being caſt in over and above, to be holden in free and common ſoccage of the King, with the conſtant rent of one penny each acre in Ulſter, one penny half penny in Conaught, two pence farthing in Munſter, three pence in Leinſter. Id. p. 556.

(3) The King, upon his coming to York, iſſued out a proclamation for the payment of tonage and poundage, tho' the act, whereby they were granted, was expired. Id. p. 559, 688.

CHARLES I An' 1642.

" 3. It would much increaſe the charge of the " war, and hinder the advance of money for ſup- " porting it; many of the adventurers, who had " already ſubſcribed, upon hearing his Majeſty's " intention, declaring their reſolution not to pay " in their money; and others, who were willing " to have ſubſcribed, now profeſſing the contrary.

" 4. His abſenſe would very much interrupt " the good proceedings of parliament.

" 5. It would exceedingly increaſe, and render " more probable, the jealouſies and fears of his " people, of ſome force intended by evil counſels " near his Majeſty, in oppoſition of the par- " liament.

" 6. It would bereave the parliament of that " advantage, whereby they were induced to under- " take that war, upon his Majeſty's promiſe, that " it ſhould be managed by their advice; which " could not be done, if his Majeſty, contrary to " their counſels, ſhould undertake to order and " govern it in his own perſon.

" Upon which reaſons both houſes declared, " that they could not conſent to any levies of " ſoldiers to be made by his Majeſty for his in- " tended expedition into Ireland, or to the pay- " ment of any army or ſoldiers there, but ſuch " as ſhould be imployed and governed according " to their advice and direction: that if any ſuch " levies ſhould be made, by any commiſſion of " his Majeſty (not agreed to by both houſes of " parliament) they ſhould be forced to interpret " the ſame to be raiſed to the terror of the people, " and diſturbance of the public peace, and hold " themſelves bound, by the laws of the kingdom, " to apply the authority of parliament to ſuppreſs " the ſame. And they farther declared, that if " his Majeſty ſhould, by ill counſel, be perſuaded " to go contrary to this advice of his parliament, " they ſhould not in that caſe hold themſelves " bound to ſubmit to any commiſſioners which " his Majeſty ſhould chuſe; but did reſolve to " preſerve and govern the kingdom by the counſel " and advice of parliament, for his Majeſty and " his poſterity, according to their allegiance and " the laws of the land (1)."

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 561.

To this petition Charles returned a long anſwer, and confuted all the parliament's reaſons, which indeed, conſidered in themſelves, were very weak. But if it is obſerved, that it was only ſix days ſince this Prince would have ſeized Hull, when the parliament preſented him their petition, it will not be thought ſtrange that they rejected his offer. Wherefore they loſt no time in replication, and the buſineſs reſted there, without any farther mention of Charles's pretended expedition into Ireland: only he made of it this advantage, he could ſay, he had offered to go in perſon, and indeavor the reduction of Ireland, but that his offer was rejected.

Extreme diſtruſt betwixt the King and parliament.

Hitherto we have ſeen how the breach between King and parliament widened daily. The diſtruſt was ſo great on both ſides, that it was ſcarcely poſſible they ſhould come to any tolerable accommodation. His Majeſty had no room for doubt there was a deſign to deprive him of great part of his authority; and the parliament, perceiving him not ignorant of this deſign, could not well queſtion he would privately take all poſſible meaſures to prevent the execution thereof: but this was not all. The parliament had alſo reaſon to apprehend that Charles would not confine himſelf to the defenſive, but, under color of ſtanding upon his guard, would put himſelf in a condition to attack. Before his accuſing the members of parliament, while the reſolution of depriving him of his power was not abſolutely taken, and many members were yet wavering, it would not perhaps have been impoſſible to find expedients for a pacification: but, by this fatal procedure, and his coming to the houſe of commons, he gave ſuch advantage to his enemies, who knew but too well how to improve it, that it was no longer practicable for him to recover the confidence of thoſe who 'till then had preſerved for him ſome favorable ſentiments. Beſide this, the deſign of diveſting him of his authority was a ſecret among ſome of the leaders of the party, who were laboring to accompliſh it gradually, without daring to be too open, ſo that it was not eaſy to be perfectly ſure they had really ſuch a deſign. But it was not ſo eaſy to deceive King Charles, who was chiefly concerned. He ſaw, that his authority was undermining by degrees, and readily perceived where this mine would finally terminate, if ſuffered to proceed. In this perplexity, he found it incumbent on him to take precautions, in order to oppoſe his adverſaries. But, on the other hand, he was ſenſible he ſhould ſully his cauſe if he fell upon the parliament itſelf, ſeduced by theſe able leaders, and thereby ſet the whole nation againſt him. This conſideration did, very ſeemingly, induce him to attack in particular lord Kimbolton, with five of the moſt powerful commoners, imagining they would be ſent to the Tower upon his accuſation, and then the parliament, as being no longer directed by theſe men, would be better diſpoſed to favor his purpoſes. He was not only deceived in his conjecture, but alſo injured himſelf irretrievably, in that the precaution he would have taken, to ſecure himſelf from the ſecret practiſes of certain particular perſons, paſſed for a ſetled deſign upon the whole parliament. He thereby confirmed the ſuſpicions which were infuſing into the people, that he was laboring to render himſelf abſolute, as he had formerly been; and thence naturally followed a neceſſity of diſabling him to execute this deſign.

CHARLES I An' 1642.

Then it was that this reſolution, taken firſt by ſome few, was approved by the majority, and indeavored to be effectually executed, by begining with the important affair of the militia: for, depriving this Prince of all power to command the militia, and lodging this power in the hands of perſons devoted to the parliament, was properly diſarming him intirely. King Charles's condition growing much worſe, he eaſily perceived that, as his enemies managed, there was not for him any medium between abſolute bondage, or rendering himſelf maſter. He was unwilling to be a ſlave, and it was difficult to become maſter, in his circumſtances, and eſpecially having to deal with very able and vigilant adverſaries. Very probably, in a belief of the impoſſibility to free himſelf from his preſent danger but by a war, he concluded on ſending his Queen into Holland to buy arms and ammunition; on withdrawing himſelf to York, and attempting to ſecure Hull, tho' he colored his deſigns with other pretenſes. He found this parliament reckoned among the pretended malignants, not only ſuch as openly appeared for him, but alſo thoſe who were for obſerving any moderation, and that many ſuffered themſelves to be drawn into the ſame combination thro' fear, and becauſe they could not be ſecure of protection, in caſe they declared againſt the two houſes. He was therefore of opinion, it behoved him chiefly to indeavor making himſelf able to protect thoſe who dared to eſpouſe his cauſe openly. But moreover, as the parliament never ceaſed infuſing ſuſpicions into the people, it was abſolutely requiſite he ſhould try to efface theſe impreſſions

impreſſions to him ſo detrimental. Hence, in all the papers he put forth relating to the militia, flowed thoſe reiterated expreſſions of his affection for his people, and his attachment to the laws. His aim was to convince the public, that the parliament acted directly contrary to law, in uſurping an authority which belonged not to them. As that was the very individual whereby King Charles had given his people occaſion to be prejudiced againſt him, he hoped the parliament's uſurpations would produce a like effect: but herein he was greatly miſtaken. The public was perſuaded that his ſaid Majeſty, without any provocation, had invaded the ſubjects privileges, during the firſt fifteen years of his reign; whereas, if the parliament had any how incroached upon their Sovereign's rights, it was in maintenance of the nation's liberties, and for revival of the laws.

Tho' it was not eaſy to prove, by unqueſtionable evidence, that King Charles had projected ſeizing, at once, the Tower of London, Portſmouth and Hull, yet was there ſo ſignal a probability of his having ſuch a project, that it would have been very imprudent in the parliament not to think of ſecuring thoſe places, in the then ſituation of affairs. Sir John Byron, lieutenant of the Tower, was a man devoted to his Majeſty. The earl of Newcaſtle had been ſent to Hull, under a borrowed name, and information was given, that he would have perſuaded the mayor to deliver him up that plaee. As for Portſmouth, the journey her Majeſty was to take thither on ſome pretenſe, and that aſſembling of officers at Kingſton, were more than ſufficient to breed ſtrong ſuſpicions on that account. Finally lord Clarendon frankly owns the King's deſigns upon Portſmouth and Hull, tho' he mentions not the Tower. Had theſe deſigns ſucceeded, Charles would have been maſter of the three chief fortreſſes in England, with the magazines of the Tower and Hull, and thereby inabled to cruſh his parliament. Theſe projects failing, as I have ſaid, his Majeſty indeavored, as beſt he could, to ſtifle them, and make them paſs for imaginary; but the two houſes had thereof quite other ſentiments. Accordingly, the commons never reſted 'till the lieutenancy of the Tower was given to one in whom they could confide, and Hotham diſpatched away to Hull. As for Portſmouth, the parliament, not miſtruſting Goring the governor, becauſe he was the perſon who diſcovered the plot to ſeduce the army, were contented with ſending him ſuch orders as they judged ſufficient for its preſervation. Thenceforwards, there was no farther mention of Portſmouth; for Charles found means to gain colonel Goring, who promiſed to declare for him at a convenient time, and performed his promiſe.

Rushworth, Vol IV. p. 564.

p. 569, &c.

Notwithſtanding Charles's bad ſucceſs in his ſecret undertaking, he perſiſted in his deſign of forcibly freeing himſelf from the ſervile condition to which it was intended to reduce him, perceiving it would be impoſſible for him to ſucceed by any other method. To this end, doubtleſs, he ſent his Queen to Holland, and having but little money, put into her hands the crown-jewels, which were imployed in buying arms and ammunition. Had her Majeſty's voyage been only to conduct over Princeſs Mary to the Prince her conſort, and to drink the Spa-waters, there would have been no occaſion to give her wherewithal to purchaſe arms and ammunition. Very ſeemingly therefore, King Charles from this time thought of war, whether offenſive, or defenſive only, cannot be aſcertained: but his attempt upon Hull, where was a magazine of arms for ſixteen thouſand men, is a ſtill clearer evidence. He himſelf had cauſed theſe arms to be brought to Hull when he had reſolved to commence war with Scotland.

Annals, Whitlock, Ludlow.

Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 564.

When the parliament diſpatched ſir John Hotham down to Hull, his Majeſty complained not of it; whether he was apprehenſive of being reproached with attempting to ſeize that place, or to amuſe the parliament, and prevent their taking greater precautions. Mean while, both houſes, finding the King at a diſtance from London, and fearing for Hull, on account of the magazine there, petitioned him, to order the magazine to be removed to the Tower of London. Charles replied; "He rather expected that both houſes would have "given him an account, why a governor and "gariſon had been placed in Hull, without his "knowledge, than to be moved to conſent for "the removal to the Tower of a magazine, which "were his own proper goods, upon ſuch general "reaſons as gave no ſatisfaction to his judgment: "that in ſhort, he would not agree to the re"moval of theſe arms, 'till he knew for what "ſervice they were intended: and if any attempt "ſhould be made in this matter, without his ap"probation, he ſhould eſteem it as the greateſt "violation of his right." Not long after, ſome Yorkſhire gentlemen petitioned his Majeſty, that the magazine might not be removed, by reaſon they conceived the kingdom, and particularly the north to be in danger. Seemingly, this petition was begged, ſince affairs were not yet in ſuch a ſituation, that private perſons ſhould preſume to addreſs the King with a petition directly contrary to that of the parliament, had they not been thereto incouraged. It is certain, Charles intended to ſeize Hull, with its magazine. He was deſirous to have a place, which would inable him to protect his partiſans, and depended upon this magazine, to arm them, when requiſite. This was the cauſe of his refuſing to remove thoſe arms to the Tower, tho' he alleged other reaſons. The parliament likewiſe, on their part, urged for ſuch removal reaſons which were not the real ones. At length, finding his Majeſty would not conſent to it, they ordered good part of that magazine's being conveyed up to the Tower, without farther ſolliciting his approbation.

Both King and parliament uſed all poſſible indeavors to make the people believe that in their whole procedure, they had no other motive than their good, and the kingdom's advantage. From theſe proteſtations it is the hiſtorians take their ſtrongeſt arguments to demonſtrate the innocence and ſincerity of the party, whoſe cauſe they undertake to ſupport: but every unbiaſſed reader muſt peruſe the maniſeſtoes, and all papers of that kind, with great caution, for fear of being drawn into error. Moſt aſſuredly, King Charles did really aim at poſſeſſing himſelf of Hull, that he might not be at the parliament's mercy: but it is not ſo certain, that herein his view was only to maintain the government's conſtitution, that the laws might be punctually executed. Contrariwiſe, the parliament had ſent Hotham to Hull, to prevent his Majeſty's ſeizing that town: but who can affirm, that their real aim was to hinder the malignant party from making uſe of it, to eſtabliſh arbitrary power, and inſlave the kingdom?

Charles's deſign took vent the twenty-third of April, when the militia affair was agitated with great heat on both ſides. The day before, he had ſent to Hull the duke of York his ſecond ſon, with the young Elector Palatine his nephew, under color of ſeeing the place; and very poſſibly thoſe two Princes were not meanly attended. Hotham and the mayor received them with all the reſpect due to their rank. Their Highneſſes were entertained the firſt day by the mayor, and invited to dine with the governor on the morrow, being St. George's-day. But the entertainment was diſturbed

CHARLES I An' 1642.

* Sir Lewis Dives.

ſturbed by a certain officer, * who came a little before dinner, and told the governor, that his Majeſty intended to dine with him, being then within four miles of the town, with a train of above three hundred horſe. Hotham, ſurpriſed at this meſſage, conſulted with ſome of his friends, and it was reſolved among them, that a meſſenger ſhould be diſpatched to the King, humbly to beſeech him to forbear coming, ſince he could not, without betraying the truſt commited to him, ſet open the gates to ſo great a guard as that wherewith he came attended. The Meſſenger, returning with a doubtful anſwer, and certifying of the King's advance to the town, Hotham drew up the bridge, ſhut the gates, and commanded the ſoldiers to ſtand to their arms round the walls. His Majeſty being come to Beverley-gate, called for the governor, who, appearing on the walls, he commanded to open the gate. Hotham replied; "He "was intruſted by the parliament for the ſecuring "of the town, for his Majeſty's honor and the "kingdom's uſe, which he intended by God's "help to do; proffering, however, that if his "Majeſty would be pleaſed to come in, with "twelve more, he ſhould be welcome, otherwiſe "he could not, without betraying his truſt to the "ſtate, admit entrance to ſo great a guard (1)." But Charles, refuſing to enter on theſe terms, repeated ſeveral times his command to open the gate, and ſtill received the ſame anſwer. Soon after, the duke of York and the Prince Elector went out of the town (2), and came to his Majeſty, who was pleaſed to give the governor one hour more, to conſider what he did. But Hotham perſiſting in his reſolution, the King offered at laſt to enter with thirty horſe only (3), which was refuſed. Finally, about five in the evening, Charles, returning to the gate, commanded Hotham once more to open it, and upon his refuſal, cauſed him to be proclaimed traitor, by two heralds he had brought with him. He then retired to Beverley, where he paſſed that night. Next morning, he ſent a herald to Hotham, to ſummon him once again to open the gates of Hull, with promiſe of pardon for what was paſſed, but could not prevail; ſo that he was obliged to return to York.

Reflection on this event. p. 396.

On reflecting that Charles had formed a deſign to ſecure Hull, from the time he reſolved on retiring to York, as lord Clarendon expreſly owns, one would imagine, that at leaſt he had contrived proper means to accompliſh this undertaking, the ſucceſs whereof was ſo very important. But one is at a loſs what to think, when this attempt is ſeen to be ſo ill managed, that it was neither plauſible nor likely. His Majeſty was not ignorant, that Hotham was member of the houſe of commons, and that this houſe had ſelected him for the government of Hull, as a perſon in whom they could confide; that Hotham knew he was to keep that place againſt the King, howſoever his commiſſion might be worded. Nevertheleſs, this Prince imagines, that this man will be awed by his preſenſe alone, and not dare to deny him entrance with three hundred horſe, beſide the two Princes numerous retinue already admited: that he will ſuffer himſelf to be deprived of his government, upon the bare ſcruple of diſobeying his King; he whom, very poſſibly, the commons had picked out as one of the leaſt ſcrupulous. In reality, I cannot conceive how Charles could be adviſed to declare himſelf ſo openly, in attempting to ſeize Hull, and indeed, from this time, all confidence intirely vaniſhed. It ſignified nothing to color this proceeding, and to ſay, he had no other deſign than to viſit the place, and examine the magazine, to know what might be taken for the ſervice of Ireland, and for arming ſuch Scots as were to ſerve in that country. This was not capable of deceiving the parliament, who ſaw but too plainly what was this Prince's deſign, and of what conſequence the execution would have been. There were no fewer papers, meſſages, anſwers and replies about this affair, than about the militia. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 567, 599.

CHARLES I An' 1642.

Charles was exceſſively vexed at this diſappointment, and ſeeing no other way to palliate his procedure, he reſolved expreſly to deny his having ever intended to ſeize Hull. By this ſuppoſition, his meaning was to repreſent ſir John Hotham's action as a manifeſt treaſon, and accordingly demanded authentic reparation from the parliament. He cited laws and ſtatutes which placed in the King the care of defending the realm, and the command of all its forts and magazines. But he conſtantly ſuppoſed the kingdom to be in a ſtate of tranquillity, as it was when theſe laws were made, which was not at all the preſent caſe. He pretended, the forts and magazines were his own proper goods; and particularly that of Hull, being purchaſed with his own money, could not be withheld from him, without rendering his condition worſe than that of his meaneſt ſubject. The King demands juſtice upon Hotham. April 24. p. 567, 569. Clarendon, p. 398, &c.

But the parliament admited not theſe ſuppoſitions. They pretended, that the forts and magazines were commited to the King, as a truſt to be imployed for the peoples preſervation, and not for their deſtruction, and that his Majeſty's claim to a property of the forts and magazines was groundleſs. It is no wonder that, upon ſuch different principles, the papers ſhould abound on both ſides, without producing any great effects. King Charles had however this advantage, that the parliament could not manifeſtly prove their aſſertions againſt him, and that the authority aſſumed by both houſes was founded only on bare ſuſpicions of his ſiniſter deſigns, which would have rendered it plauſible had they been aſcertained: but they did not think proper to wait for demonſtrations, to be aſcertained of this Prince's ſecret intentions. It was enough to have reaſons to ſuſpect him, which to them appeared ſufficiently ſtrong to oblige them to take precautions, which might come too late, in caſe more convincing proofs were expected. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 570, 578, &c.

This is the ſubſtance of all the papers publiſhed on both ſides, concerning Hull. As I have already inſerted many relating to the militia, I think it convenient to ſave my readers the trouble of peruſing thoſe publiſhed on the preſent affair, and which run upon the ſame principles and ſuppoſitions ſo often mentioned.

He attempts to get Hull by intelligence. May. p. 599, 600.

The parliament openly ſupported ſir John Hotham; ſo that, after many meſſages, declarations, anſwers and replies, Charles had no way left to poſſeſs himſelf of Hull, but by ſurpriſe or force. Of theſe ways the latter was not very practicable, becauſe he could depend but on a very ſmall number of troops, and had no artillery, arms, or ammunition. True, he expected ſome from Holland, but the time was very uncertain; and therefore he attempted to gain Hull by correſpondence. In the execution of this deſign, he made use of mr. Beckwith, a gentleman of Beverley, whose son-in-law was a military officer in Hull. But this officer discovered the plot to the governor, who was so civil as to send his Majesty word, he might save himself the trouble of carrying on the contrivance, and at the same time dispatched a courier to the parliament. Beckwith retiring to the King at York, the parliament sent a messenger to seize and bring him to London: but the messenger was not suffered to execute his orders.

Indeed it does not ſeem likely, that the King would have ſtood for eight horſe, ſince he offered to come in but with twenty. Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 397. Whitelock, p. 57.

Both King and parliament prepare for war and strive to gain the people. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 613, &c.

Thenceforwards, both King and parliament prepared for war, it being very easy to foresee, they should be at length forced to it. But as both stood in need of the people to bear the expense, so each used all possible indeavors to gain them, by demonstrating the injustice of the contrary party, and by striving to convince them, that only their good was intended. The parliament pretended, that the malignants, by whom his Majesty suffered himself to be guided, had formed a design to inslave the nation, wherein they could not succeed, but by inflaming the misunderstanding between King and parliament, in order to ingage them in a civil war, which they hoped would prove successful to their royal patron. This was the parliament's supposition, whence they infered, that therefore it was necessary to prevent, by wholesome measures, the execution of this design, and to put themselves in a posture of defense, in case his Majesty continued to be directed by these malignants.

Charles, on his side, pretended that the parliament, in feigning to have only in view the kingdom's advantage, really designed to alter the constitution of church and state: that they intended to abolish the regal power, or render the King but a shadow, while both houses should be possessed of the government. He infered from this supposition, that he ought to expose himself to the greatest hazards, rather than receive law from his subjects; his conscience, and the care of the realm with which God hath intrusted him, not permiting him to suffer the alterations projected to be made in church and state. Whatever secret motives both might have, the reasons they alleged were very plausible, and those who sought only justice were not a little imbarassed which side to espouse. But the parliament seemed to have a great advantage over his Majesty, in that their party was incomparably more numerous, and the forts and militia in their possession, with plenty of arms and ammunition, while the King was wholly unprovided. Nevertheless, Charles was not without hopes. He had, as has been observed, privately gained colonel Goring, governor of Portsmouth. The Queen was now busy in Holland in procuring artillery, arms, ammunition, and gaining several officers of the English troops in the Dutch service. Most of the gentry of Yorkshire, the largest county in England, were for him, and he did not question but, by their means, he should ingage the whole county to declare in his favor. With this assistance, he hoped to circumvent his adversaries, and raise a sufficient number of forces to reduce Hull before the parliament should be able to make opposition. He expected likewise that, when he was master of Hull and Portsmouth, and had received arms from Holland, many, who were still restrained by the fear of wanting protection, would openly side with him. Moreover, he gave private notice to all his friends, that it was time they should repair to York, and ordered letters to be sent, in his name, to such members as adhered to him, to absent themselves from the parliament, and retire to York, or to other places where they could be serviceable to him.

Charles I An' 1642.

All these measures could not be taken so privately but the parliament had some information, and therefore Charles strove to give them some color, to hinder his designs from being discovered. After his disappointment at Hull, he summoned all the Yorkshire tenants in chief, to appear at York, the twelfth of May.

Charles summons all the gentry of Yorkshire. p. 615.

Some short time after, both houses sent a commitee to York, under pretense of bringing the King a message about Hull and the militia, but in reality to be spies upon his actions. This message was the more disagreeable to him, as after having given his answer, and dismissed the commitee, they told him, they had orders to remain at York. Tho' it was easy for him to see with what view the parliament had sent this commitee, he thought not proper to use any violence to drive them from that city.

A commitee sent to York. Ibid. Clarendon, p. 403, 405.

The twelfth of May, the gentry of that county being come to York, his Majesty made a speech to them, wherein he protested, "That the injoyment of quiet was the chief cause of his coming among them in the north, and not to make that part of the kingdom a seat of war, as malice would make them believe." He added, "that both houses of parliament did, by their messengers, brave him even in York; and that, as his magazine of Hull was going, directly against his will, to be taken from him, and the militia to be put in execution against law and his consent; and lastly, as sir John Hotham's treason was countenanced, none could blame him for apprehending danger. Therefore he was resolved to have a guard, in which he desired their concurrence and assistance."

Charles's proposal to the Yorkshire gentry. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 615. Clarendon, p. 417.

The Yorkshire gentry being variously disposed, it was not possible for those to whom the King made his speech to agree in the same answer: nay, it is said, some violence was used by the court, to exclude from the debate such as were known to be the King's opposites, and that these were forced to assemble elsewhere. For this reason, Charles received four different answers to his proposition, two whereof were favorable, and the other two supplicated him to give ear to his parliament's advice. The guard was however raised, and the command thereof given to the Prince of Wales. (1)

He receives four different answers. Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 616, 617.

Charles would likewise have removed the courts of justice from Westminster to York, and even sent a proclamation to lord-keeper Littleton for that purpose, with orders to publish it: but the parliament having thereof notice, forbad him to execute the order.

The parliament hinders his removing the courts of justice to York.

Serjeant-major-general Skippon being a very able and expert officer, and his Majesty, knowing the parliament designed to imploy him, ordered his attending him at York. But the parliament injoined him the contrary, which injunction Skippon obeyed. This Charles had doubtless foreseen; but he was glad to shew that the parliament desired a breach, since they so arrogantly contradicted his orders.

He sends for Skippon; whom the parliament will not suffer to go thither. May 17. p. 622, 623, 690.

As matters stood between King and parliament, a war seemed utterly inevitable, and, very probably, it was determined on both sides. The sole concern was to amuse the public with reasons good or bad, and to labor fixing the fault on the opposite party. Mean while, King Charles's two answers, of March the ninth and the twentieth, not being replied to, the parliament apprehended their silence would produce a no good effect in peoples minds. They therefore took occasion, in answering these two messages, to publish a manifesto, under the name of remonstrance or declaration. As this manifeſto, and his Majeſty's anſwer, are very proper to bring the reader acquainted with the reaſons of both parties, or at leaſt with ſuch as they alleged to ſupport their cauſe, and vindicate their conduct, I judge it requiſite to inſert theſe two papers intire, leſt abridging them ſhould injure either.

The declaration, or remonſtrance, of the lords and commons in parliament aſſembled, May 19th, 1642.

Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 691.

" THE infinite mercy and providence of the " Almighty God have been abundantly " manifeſted ſince the begining of this parliament, " in great variety of protections and bleſſings, " whereby he hath not only delivered us from many " wicked plots and deſigns, which, if they had " taken effect, would have brought ruin and de- " ſtruction upon this kingdom; but out of thoſe " attempts have produced diverſe evident and re- " markable advantages to the fartherance of thoſe " ſervices, which we have been deſirous to perform " to our ſovereign Lord the King, and to this " church and ſtate, in providing for the public " peace and proſperity of his Majeſty, and all his " realms, which, in the preſenſe of the ſame all- " ſeeing Deity, we proteſt to have been, and ſtill " to be, the only end of all our counſels and indea- " vors, wherein we have reſolved to continue " freed and inlarged from all private aims, perſonal " reſpects, or paſſions whatſoever. (1)

REMARK (1). It may be preſumed there were, in both houſes, many members who acted with ſincerity, and believed, they really ſerved the public in whatever they did againſt the King. But it is not eaſy to conceive, how both houſes, conſiſting of ſo many members who were ignorant of each others inward ſentiments, could call God to witneſs, that they acted only by juſt motives, free from paſſion and private views.

" In which reſolution we are nothing diſcouraged, " altho' the heads of the malignant party, diſap- " pointed of that prey, the religion and liberty of " this kingdom, which they were ready to ſeize " upon and devour before the begining of this " parliament, have ſtill perſiſted, by new practiſes, " both of force and ſubtilty, to recover the ſame " again; for which purpoſe they have made ſeveral " attempts for the bringing up the army; they " afterwards projected the falſe accuſation of lord " Kimbolton and the five members of the houſe " of commons, which being in itſelf of an odious " nature, they yet ſo far prevailed with his Majeſty, " as to procure him to take it upon himſelf; but " when the unchangeable duty and faithfulneſs of " the parliament could not be wrought upon by " ſuch a fact as that, to withdraw any part of their " reverence and obedience from his Majeſty, they " have, with much art and induſtry, adviſed his " Majeſty to ſuffer diverſe unjuſt ſcandals and im- " putations upon the parliament to be publiſhed " in his name, whereby they might make it odious " to the people, and by their help to deſtroy that " which hitherto hath been the only means of their " own preſervation.

" For this purpoſe, they have drawn his Majeſty " into the northern parts, far from the parliament, " that ſo falſe rumors might have time to get " credit, and the juſt defenſes of the parliament " find a more tedious, difficult and diſadvantageous " acceſs, after thoſe falſe imputations and ſlanders " had been firſt rooted in the apprehenſion of his " Majeſty, and his ſubjects; which the more " ſpeedily to effect, they have cauſed a preſs to be " tranſported to York, from whence ſeveral papers " and writings of that kind are conveyed to all " parts of the kingdom, without the authority of " the great ſeal, in an unuſual and illegal manner, " without the advice of his Majeſty's privy council; " from the greater and better part whereof having " withdrawn himſelf, as well as from his great " council of parliament, he is thereby expoſed to " the wicked and unfaithful counſels of ſuch as " have made the wiſdom and juſtice of the parlia- " ment dangerous to themſelves; and this danger " they labor to prevent by hiding their own guilt " under the name and ſhadow of the King, infuſing " into him their own fears, and, as much as in them " lies, aſperſing his royal perſon and honor with " their own infamy, from both which it hath " always been as much the care, as it is the duty of " the parliament to preſerve his Majeſty, and fix " the guilt of all evil actions and counſels upon " thoſe who have been the authors of them.

CHARLES I An' 1642.

" Among diverſe writings of this kind, we, the " lords and commons in parliament, have taken " into our conſideration two printed papers; the " firſt containing a declaration, which they received " from his Majeſty, in anſwer of that which was " preſented to his Majeſty from both houſes of par- " liament, at Newmarket, the ninth of March " 1641. The other, his Majeſty's anſwer to the " petition of both houſes, preſented to his Majeſty, " at York, the twenty-ſixth of March 1642, both " which are filled with harſh cenſures, and cauſe- " leſs charges upon the parliament; concerning " which, we hold it neceſſary to give ſatisfaction " to the kingdom, ſeeing we find it very difficult " to ſatisfy his Majeſty, whom, to our great grief, " we have found to be ſo ingaged to, and poſſeſſed " by thoſe miſ-apprehenſions, which evil coun- " ſellors have wrought in him, that our moſt " humble and faithful remonſtrances have rather " irritated and imbittered, than any thing allayed " or mitigated the ſharp expreſſions which his " Majeſty hath been pleaſed to make in anſwer to " them; for the manifeſtation whereof, and of our " own innocency, we deſire that all his Majeſty's " loving ſubjects may take notice of theſe parti- " culars.

" We know no occaſion given by us which " might move his Majeſty to tell us, that, in our " declaration preſented at Newmarket, there were " ſome expreſſions different from the uſual language " to Princes.

" Neither did we tell his Majeſty, either in " words or in effect, that if he did not join with " us in an act, which his Majeſty conceived might " prove prejudicial and dangerous to himſelf and " the whole kingdom, we would make a law with- " out him, and impoſe it upon the people. That " which we deſired was, that, in regard of the " imminent danger of the kingdom, the militia, " for the ſecurity of his Majeſty and his people, " might be put under the command of ſuch noble " and faithful perſons as they had all cauſe to con- " fide in: and ſuch was the neceſſity of this pre- " ſervation, that we declare, that, if his Majeſty " ſhould refuſe to join with us therein, the two " houſes of parliament, being the ſupreme court " and higheſt council of the kingdom, were in- " abled, by their own authority, to provide for the " repulſing of ſuch imminent and evident danger, " not by any new law of their own making, as " hath been untruly ſuggeſted to his Majeſty, but " by the moſt ancient law of this kingdom, even " that which is fundamental and eſſential to the " conſtitution and ſubſiſtence of it.

" Altho' we never deſired to incourage his Ma- " jeſty to ſuch replies, as might produce any con- " teſtation betwixt him and his parliament, of " which we never found better effect than loſs of " time, and hindrance of the public affairs; yet " we have been far from telling him, of how little " value his words would be with us, much leſs

when

CHARLES I AN' 1642.

" when they are accompanied with actions of love " and juſtice. His Majeſty hath more reaſon to find " fault with thoſe wicked counſellors, who have ſo " often bereaved him of the honor, and his peo- " ple of the fruit, of many gracious ſpeeches which " he made to them, ſuch as thoſe in the end of " the laſt parliament; ' That, in the word of a " King, and as he was a gentleman, he would re- " dreſs the grievances of his people, as well out " of parliament as in it.' Were the ſearching " the ſtudies and chambers, yea the pockets of " ſome, both of the nobility and commons, the " very next day; the commitment of mr. Bellaſis, " ſir John Hotham, and mr. Crew; the con- " tinued oppreſſions by ſhip-money, coat and con- " duct-money; with manifold impriſonments, and " other vexations thereupon, and other inſuing vio- " lations of the laws and liberties of the king- " dom (all which were the effects of evil counſel, " and abundantly declared in our general remon- " ſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom) actions of " love and juſtice, ſuitable to ſuch words as thoſe?

" As gracious was his Majeſty's ſpeech in the " begining of this parliament! ' That he was re- " ſolved to put himſelf freely and clearly upon " the love and affection of his Engliſh ſubjects.' " Whether his cauſeleſs complaints and jealouſy; " the unjuſt imputations ſo often caſt upon his par- " liament; his denial of their neceſſary defenſe by " the ordinance of the militia; his dangerous ab- " ſenting himſelf from his great council, like to " produce ſuch a miſchievous diviſion in the king- " dom, have not been more ſuitable to other mens " evil counſels, than to his own words, will eaſily " appear to any indifferent judgment.

" Neither have his latter ſpeeches been better " uſed and preſerved by theſe evil and wicked " counſellors. Could any words be fuller of love " and juſtice, than thoſe in his anſwer to the meſ- " ſage ſent the houſe of commons, the thirty-firſt " of December, 1641? ' We do ingage unto you " ſolemnly, on the word of King, that the ſecu- " rity of all, and every one of you from violence " is, and ever ſhall be as much our care, as the " preſervation of us and our children.' And could " any actions be fuller of injuſtice and violence " than that of the attorney-general, in falſly ac- " cuſing the ſix members of parliament, and the " other proceedings thereupon, within three or " four days after that meſſage? For the full view " whereof, let the declaration made of thoſe pro- " ceedings be peruſed, and by thoſe inſtances " (we could add many more) let all the world " judge, who deſerves to be taxed with diſvaluing " his Majeſty's words; they who have, as much as " in them lies, ſtained and ſullied them with ſuch " foul counſels; or the parliament, who have " ever manifeſted, with joy and delight, their " humble thankfulneſs for thoſe gracious words " and actions of love and juſtice which have been " conformable thereunto.

" The King is pleaſed to diſavow the having " any ſuch evil council or counſellors, as are " mentioned in our declaration, to his knowledge; " and we hold it our duty humbly to avow there " are ſuch; or elſe we muſt ſay, that all the ill " things done of late in his Majeſty's name, have " been done by himſelf, wherein we ſhould neither " follow the direction of the law, nor the affection " of our own hearts, which is, as much as may " be, to clear his Majeſty from all imputation of " miſ-government, and to lay the fault upon his " miniſters; the falſe accuſing of ſix members of " parliament; the juſtifying of maſter attorney in " that falſe accuſation; the violent coming to the " houſe of commons; the denial of the mi- " litia; the ſharp meſſages to both houſes, contrary " to the cuſtom of former Kings; the long and " remote abſenſe of his Majeſty from parliament; " the heavy and wrongful taxes upon both houſes; " the cheriſhing and countenancing a diſcontented " party in the kingdom againſt them. Theſe cer- " tainly are the fruits of very ill counſel, apt to " put the kingdom into a combuſtion, to hinder " the ſupplies of Ireland, and to countenance " the proceedings and pretenſions of the rebels " there; and the authors of thoſe evil counſels, " we conceive, muſt needs be known to his Ma- " jeſty. And we hope our laboring with his Ma- " jeſty to have theſe diſcovered and brought to a " juſt cenſure, will not ſo much wound his honor " in the opinion of his good ſubjects, as his la- " boring to preſerve and conceal them.

CHARLES I AN' 1642.

" And whereas his Majeſty ſaith, he could wiſh " that his own immediate actions, which he avows " on his own honor, might not be ſo roughly cen- " ſured under that common ſtile of evil counſel- " lors. We could alſo heartily wiſh, that we had " not cauſe to make that ſtile ſo common: but " how often and undutiful ſoever theſe wicked " counſellors fix their diſhonor upon the King, by " making his Majeſty the author of thoſe evil " actions which are the effects of their own evil " counſels, we his Majeſty's loyal and dutiful ſub- " jects can uſe no other ſtile, according to that " maxim in the law, ' The King can do no " wrong;' but if any ill be commited in matter " of ſtate, the council; if in matter of juſtice, the " judges muſt anſwer for it.

" We lay no charge upon his Majeſty, which " ſhould put him upon that apology, concerning " his faithful, zealous affection of the Proteſtant " profeſſion: neither doth his Majeſty indeavor to " clear thoſe in greateſt authority about him, by " whom (we ſay) that deſign hath been potently " carried on for diverſe years; and we rather " wiſh, that the mercies of heaven, than the judg- " ments, may be manifeſted upon them; but " that ſuch have been, there are ſo plentiful and " frequent evidences, that we believe there is none, " either Proteſtant or Papiſt, who hath had any " reaſonable view of the paſſages of latter times " but, either in fear or hope, did expect a ſudden " iſſue of this deſign.

" We have no way tranſgreſſed againſt the act of " oblivion, by remembering the intended war " againſt Scotland, as a branch of that deſign to " alter religion, by thoſe wicked counſels, from " which God did then deliver us, which we ought " never to forget.

" That the rebellion in Ireland was framed and " cheriſhed by the Popiſh and malignant party in " England, is not only affirmed by the rebels, " but may be cleared by many other proofs: the " ſame rebellious principles of pretended religion, " the ſame politic ends, are apparent in both, " and their malicious deſigns and practiſes are " maſked and diſguiſed with the ſame falſe color " of their earneſt zeal to vindicate his Majeſty's " prerogative from the ſuppoſed oppreſſion of the " parliament. How much theſe treacherous pre- " tenſes have been countenanced by ſome evil " counſel about his Majeſty, may appear in this, " that the proclamation, whereby they were de- " clared traitors, was ſo long with-held as to the " ſecond of January, tho' the rebellion brake forth " in October before, and then no more but forty " copies appointed to be printed, with a ſpecial " command from his Majeſty not to exceed that " number; and that none of them ſhould be pub- " liſhed, 'till his Majeſty's pleaſure was farther " ſignified, as by the warrant appears, a true copy " whereof is hereunto added, ſo that a few only " could take notice of it; which was made more

" obſervable

CHARLES I AN' 1642.

" obſervable by the late contrary proceedings " againſt the Scots, who were in a very quick and " ſharp manner proclaimed, and thoſe proclama- " tions forthwith diſperſed, with as much diligence " as might be, thro' all the kingdom, and or- " dered to be read in all churches, accompanied " with public prayers and execrations.

" Another evidence of favor and countenance " to the rebels, in ſome power about his Majeſty, " is this, that they have put forth, in his name, a " cauſeleſs complaint againſt the parliament, which " ſpeaketh the ſame language of the parliament " which the rebels do, whereby to raiſe a belief " in mens minds, that his Majeſty's affections are " alienated, as well as his perſon is removed from " that great council; all which doth exceedingly " retard the ſupplies of Ireland, and more ad- " vance the proceedings of the rebels, than any " jealouſly or miſapprehenſion, begotten in his " ſubjects, by the declaration of the rebels, in- " junctions of Roſetti, or information of Triſtram " Whitecombe; ſo that, conſidering the preſent " ſtate and temper of both kingdoms, his royal " preſenſe is far more neceſſary here than it can " be in Ireland, for redemption or protection of " his ſubjects there.

" And whether there be any cauſe of his Majeſty's " great indignation, for being reproached to have " intended force or threatening to the parliament, " we deſire them to conſider, who ſhall read our " declaration, in which there is no word tending " to any ſuch reproach; and certainly we have " been more tender of his Majeſty's honor, in this " point, than he, whoſoever he was, who did write " this declaration, where, in his Majeſty's name, " he doth call God to witneſs, he never had any " ſuch thought, or knew of any ſuch reſolution of " bringing up the army; which truly will ſeem " ſtrange to thoſe who ſhall read the depoſition of " mr. Goring, the information of mr. Percy, and " diverſe other examinations of mr. Wilmot, " mr. Pollard, and others; the other examinations of " captain Legg, ſir Jacob Aſhley, ſir John Conyers; " and conſider the condition and nature of the " petition, which was ſent unto ſir Jacob Aſhley, " under the approbation of C. R. which his Ma- " jeſty doth now acknowledge to be his own " hand; and being full of ſcandal to the parlia- " ment, might have proved dangerous to the " whole kingdom, if the army ſhould have in- " terpoſed betwixt the King and them, as was " deſired.

" We do not affirm, that his Majeſty's warrant " was granted for the paſſage of mr. Jermin, af- " ter the deſire of both houſes for reſtraint of his " ſervants, but only that he did paſs over, after " that reſtraint, by virtue of ſuch a warrant. We " know the warrant bears date the day before our " deſire; yet it ſeems ſtrange to thoſe who know " how great reſpect and power mr. Jermin had " in court, that he ſhould begin his journey in " ſuch haſte, and in apparel ſo unfit for travel, as " a black ſatten ſuit, and white boots, if his going " away was deſigned the day before.

" The accuſation of lord Kimbolton, and the " five members of the houſe of commons, is called " a breach of privilege; and truly ſo it was, and " a very high one, far above any ſatisfaction hath " been yet given. How can it be ſaid to be largely " ſatisfied, ſo long as his Majeſty labored to pre- " ſerve maſter attorney from puniſhment, who " was the viſible actor in it; ſo long as his Ma- " jeſty hath not only juſtified him, but by his let- " ters declared, that it was his duty to accuſe " them, and that he would have puniſhed him if " he had not done it; ſo long as thoſe members " have not the means of clearing their innocency, " and the authors of that malicious charge undiſ- " covered, tho' both houſes of parliament have " ſeveral times petitioned his Majeſty to diſcover " them, and that not only upon grounds of com- " mon juſtice, but by act of parliament, his Ma- " jeſty is bound to do it; ſo long as the King " refuſes to paſs a bill for their diſcharge, alleging, " that the narrative in that bill is againſt his ho- " nor, whereby he ſeems ſtill to avow the matter " of that falſe and ſcandalous accuſation, tho' he " deſerts the proſecution, offering to paſs a bill " for their acquital; yet with intimation, that " they muſt deſert the avowing their own inno- " cency, which would more wound them in honor, " than ſecure them in law.

CHARLES I AN' 1642.

" And in vindication of this great privilege of " parliament, we do not know that we have in- " vaded any privilege belonging to his Majeſty, " as is alleged in this declaration.

" But we look not upon this only in the notion " of a breach of privilege, which might be, tho' " the accuſation were true or falſe, but under the " notion of a heinous crime in the attorney, and " all other ſubjects who had a hand in it; a crime " againſt the law of nature, againſt the rules of " juſtice, that innocent men ſhould be charged with " ſo great an offenſe as treaſon, in the face of the " higheſt judicatory of the kingdom, whereby their " lives and eſtates, their blood and honor are indan- " gered, without witneſs, without evidence, without " all poſſibility of reparation in a legal courſe, yet " a crime of ſuch a nature that his Majeſty's com- " mand can no more warrant, than it can any " other acts of injuſtice. It is true, that thoſe " things which are evil in their own nature, ſuch " as falſe teſtimony, or falſe accuſation, cannot be " the ſubject of any command, or induce any ob- " ligation of obedience upon any man, by any " authority whatſoever; therefore the attorney, in " this caſe, was bound to refuſe to execute ſuch a " command, unleſs he had ſome ſuch evidence, " or teſtimony, as might have warranted him " againſt the parties, and be liable to make ſatiſ- " faction if it ſhould prove falſe; and it is ſuffici- " ently known to every man, and adjudged in " parliament, that the King can be neither the " relator, informer, or witneſs. If it reſts as it " is, without farther ſatisfaction, no future parlia- " ment can be ſafe, but that the members may be " taken and deſtroyed at pleaſure; yea the very " principles of government and juſtice will be in " danger to be diſſolved.

" We do not conceive that numbers do make an " aſſembly unlawful; but when either the end or " manner of their carriage ſhall be unlawful. Di- " verſe juſt occaſions might draw the citizens to " Weſtminſter, where many public and private " petitions, and other cauſes, were depending in " parliament; and why that ſhould be found " more faulty in the citizens, than the reſort of " great numbers every day in the term to the or- " dinary courts of juſtice, we know not. That " thoſe citizens were notoriouſly provoked and " aſſaulted at Weſtminſter, by colonel Lunsford, " captain Hyde, with diverſe others, and by ſome " of the ſervants of the archbiſhop of York, is " ſufficiently proved; and that afterward they " were more violently wounded, and moſt barba- " rouſly mangled with ſwords, by the officers and " ſoldiers near Whitehall, many of them being " without weapons, and giving no cauſe of di- " ſtaſte, as is likewiſe proved by ſeveral teſtimo- " monies; but of any ſcandalous or ſeditious miſ- " demeanors of theirs, which might give his Ma- " jeſty good cauſe to ſuppoſe his own perſon, or " thoſe of his royal conſort, or children, to be " in apparent danger, we have had no proof ever " offered

Charles I An' 1642.

" offered to either houſe; and if there had been " any complaint of that kind, it is no doubt the " houſes would have been as forward to join in an " order for the ſuppreſſing ſuch tumults, as they " were not long before upon another occaſion, " when they made an order to that purpoſe. " Whereas thoſe officers and ſoldiers, who com- " mited that violence upon ſo many of the citi- " zens at Whitehall, were cheriſhed and foſtered " in his Majeſty's houſe. And when, not long af- " ter, the common-council of London preſented " a petition to his Majeſty, for reparation of thoſe " injuries; his Majeſty's anſwer was (without " hearing the proof of the complaints) that if any " citizens were wounded or ill treated, his Ma- " jeſty was confidently aſſured, that it happened " by their own evil and corrupt demeanors.

" We hope it cannot be thought contrary to the " duty and wiſdom of a parliament, if many " concurring, and frequently reiterated and " renewed advertiſements from Rome, Venice, " Paris, and other parts, if the ſollicitations of " the Pope's nuncio, and our own diſcontented " fugitives, do make us jealous and watchful for " the ſafety of the ſtate. And we have been " very careful to make our expreſſions thereof ſo " eaſy and ſo plain to the capacity and underſtand- " ing of the people, that nothing might juſtly ſtick " with them, with reflection upon the perſon of " his Majeſty; wherein we appeal to the judg- " ment of any indifferent perſon, who ſhall read " and peruſe our own words. We muſt maintain " the ground of our fears to be of that moment, " that we cannot diſcharge the truſt and duty " which lie upon us, unleſs we do apply ourſelves " to the uſe of thoſe means which the law hath " inabled us in caſes of this nature, for the ne- " ceſſary defenſe of the kingdom; and as his Ma- " jeſty doth graciouſly declare, the law ſhall be " the meaſure of his power; ſo do we moſt hear- " tily profeſs, that we ſhall always make it the " rule of our obedience.

Prudent omiſſions in the King's anſwer.

" The next point of our declaration was, with " much caution, artificially paſſed over by him " who drew his Majeſty's anſwer, it being indeed " the foundation of all our miſery, and his Ma- " jeſty's trouble, that he is pleaſed to hear general " taxes upon his parliament, without any parti- " cular perſons upon miſ-information; and altho' " thoſe informations have been clearly proved " to be falſe, yet he would never bring the ac- " cuſers to queſtion, which lays an impoſſibility " upon honeſt men of clearing themſelves, and " incouragement unto falſe and unworthy perſons " to trouble people with untrue and groundleſs " informations. Three particulars were mentioned " in our declaration, which the penner of that an- " ſwer had good cauſe to omit; the words ſup- " poſed to be ſpoken at Kenſington; the pretended " articles againſt the Queen; and the groundleſs " accuſation of the ſix member of parliament: " there being nothing to be ſaid in defenſe or de- " nial of any of them.

" Concerning his Majeſty's deſire to join with " his parliament, and with his faithful ſubjects, in " defenſe of religion, and public good of the " kingdom; we doubt not but he will do it fully, " when evil counſellors ſhall be removed from " about him; and until that be, as we have " ſhewed before of words, ſo muſt we alſo ſay " of laws, that they cannot ſecure us; witneſs the " petition of right, which was followed with ſuch " an innundation of illegal taxes, that we had juſt " cauſe to think, that the payment of eight hun- " dred and twenty thouſand pounds was an eaſy " burden to the common-wealth, in exchange of " them; and we cannot but juſtly think that, if " there be a continuance of ſuch ill counſellors, " and favor to them, they will, by ſome wicked " device or other, make the bill for the triennial " parliament, and thoſe other excellent laws men- " tioned in his Majeſty's declaration, of leſs value " than words.

Charles I An' 1642.

" That excellent bill for the continuance of this " parliament was ſo neceſſary that, without it, we " could not have raiſed ſo great ſums of money for " the ſervice of his Majeſty and the commonwealth " as we have done, and without which the ruin " and deſtruction of the kingdom muſt needs have " followed. And we are reſolved, the gracious " favor of his Majeſty expreſſed in that bill, " and the advantage and ſecurity which thereby " we have from being diſſolved, ſhall not in- " courage us to do any thing, which otherwiſe had " not been fit to have been done: and we are " ready to make it good, before all the world, " that altho' his Majeſty hath paſſed many bills " very advantageous for the ſubject, yet in none " of them have we bereaved his Majeſty of any " juſt, neceſſary, or profitable prerogative of the " crown. We ſo earneſtly deſire his Majeſty's re- " turn to London, for that upon it, we conceive, " depend the very ſafety and being of both his " kingdoms: and therefore we muſt proteſt that, " as for the time paſſed, neither the government " of London, nor any laws of the land, have loſt " their life and force for his ſecurity; ſo for the " future, we ſhall be ready to do or ſay any thing " may ſtand with the honor of a parliament, which " may raiſe a mutual confidence betwixt his Ma- " jeſty and us, as we do wiſh, and as the affairs " of the kingdom do require.

" Thus far the anſwer to that which is called " His Majeſty's Declaration,' hath led us. Now " we come to that which is intitled, ' His Ma- " jeſty's Anſwer to the Petition of both Houſes, " preſented to him at York, the twenty-ſixth of " March 1642:' in the begining whereof his " Majeſty wiſheth, that our privileges on all parts " were ſo ſtated, that this way of correſpondency " might be preſerved, with that freedom which " hath been uſed of old. We know nothing in- " troduced by us which gives any impediment " hereunto; neither have we affirmed our privi- " leges to be broken, when his Majeſty denies us " any thing, or gives us a reaſon why he cannot " grant it, or that thoſe who adviſed ſuch denial " were enemies to the peace of the kingdom, and " favorers of the Iriſh rebellion, in which aſper- " ſion, that is turned into a general aſſertion which, " in our votes, is applied to a particular caſe; " wherefore we muſt maintain our votes, that thoſe " who adviſed his Majeſty to contradict that " which both houſes, in the queſtion concerning " the militia, had declared to be law, and com- " mand it ſhould not be obeyed, is a high breach " of privilege; and that thoſe who adviſed his " Majeſty to abſent himſelf from his parliament " are enemies to the peace of the kingdom, and " juſtly to be ſuſpected to be favorers of the " rebellion in Ireland. The reaſons of both are " evident, becauſe in the firſt there is as great a " derogation from the truſt and authority of par- " liament; and in the ſecond, as much advantage " to the proceedings and hopes of the rebels as " may be: and we hold it a very cauſeleſs impu- " tation upon the parliament, that we have herein " any way impeached, much leſs taken away, the " freedom of his Majeſty's vote, which doth not " import a liberty for his Majeſty to deny any " thing, how neceſſary ſoever for the preſerva- " tion of the kingdom, much leſs a licenſe to evil " counſellors

Charles I An' 1442.

" counſellors to adviſe any thing, tho' never ſo " deſtructive to his Majeſty and his people. (2).

Rem. (2) I am not of opinion that it was ever decided, to what Acts the King may, or may not, deny his aſſent: ſo there ariſes an inexhauſtible fountain of diſputes, when the King and parliament do not agree.

" By the meſſage of the twentieth of January, " his Majeſty did propound to both houſes of par- " liament, that they would with all ſpeed fall into " a ſerious conſideration of all thoſe particulars, " which they thought neceſſary, as well for the " holding and maintaining his Majeſty's juſt and " regal authority, and for the ſetling his revenue, " as for the preſent and future eſtabliſhing our pri- " vileges, the free and quiet injoying our eſtates, " the liberties of our perſons, the ſecurity of the " true religion profeſſed in the Church of Eng- " land, and the ſetling of ceremonies in ſuch a " manner as may take away all juſt offenſe, and " digeſt it into one intire body.

" To that point of upholding and maintaining " his royal authority, we ſay, nothing hath been " done to the prejudice of it, which ſhould require " any new proviſion. To the other of ſetling the " revenue, the parliament hath no way abridged " or diſordered his juſt revenue; but it is true, " that much waſte and confuſion of his Majeſty's " eſtate hath been made by thoſe evil and unfaith- " ful miniſters, whom he hath imployed in the " managing of it, whereby his own ordinary ex- " penſes would have been diſappointed, and the " ſafety of the kingdom more indangered, if the " parliament had not in ſome meaſure provided for " his houſhold, and for ſome of the forts, more " than they were bound to do; and they are ſtill " willing to ſetle ſuch a revenue upon his Majeſty, " as may make him live royally, plentifully and " ſafely; but they cannot in wiſdom and fidelity " to the common-wealth do this, 'till he ſhall " chuſe ſuch conſellors and officers as may order " and diſpoſe it to the public good, and not apply " it to the ruin and deſtruction of his people, as " heretofore it hath been. But this and the other " matters concerning ourſelves, being works of " great importance, and full of intricacy, will " require ſo long a time of deliberation, that the " kingdom might be ruined before we ſhould " effect them. Wherefore we thought it neceſſary, " firſt to be ſuitors to his Majeſty, ſo to order the " militia, that, the kingdom being ſecured, we " might with more eaſe and ſafety apply ourſelves " to debate of that meſſage wherein we have been " interrupted by his Majeſty's denial of the ordi- " nance concerning the ſame, becauſe it would " have been in vain for us to labor in other things, " and in the mean time to leave ourſelves naked " to the malice of ſo many enemies, both at home " and abroad; yet we have not been altogether " negligent of thoſe things which his Majeſty is " pleaſed to propound in that meſſage. We have " agreed upon a book of rates in a larger pro- " portion than hath been granted to any of his " Majeſty's predeceſſors, which is a conſiderable " ſupport of his Majeſty's public charge; and " have likewiſe prepared diverſe propoſitions and " bills for preſervation of our religion and liberties, " which we intended ſhortly to preſent to his Ma- " jeſty, and to do whatſoever is fit for us, to make " up this unpleaſant breach betwixt his Majeſty and " his parliament.

" Whereas diverſe exceptions are here taken con- " cerning the militia; firſt, that his Majeſty never " denyed the thing, but accepted the perſons (except " for corporations) only that he denied the way. " To which we anſwer, that this exception takes " off London, and all other great towns and cities, " which make a great part of the kingdom; and " for the way of ordinance it is ancient, more " ſpeedy, more eaſily alterable, and, in all theſe " and other reſpects, more proper and more appli- " cable to the preſent occaſion than a bill, which " his Majeſty calls the only good old way of im- " poſing upon the ſubjects. It ſhould ſeem that " neither his Majeſty's royal predeceſſors, nor our " anceſtors have heretofore been of that opinion; " 37 Ed. 3. we find this record, 'The chancellor " made declaration of the challenge of the parlia- " ment; the King deſires to know the griefs of " his ſubjects, and to redreſs enormities. The laſt " day of the parliament, the King demanded of " the whole eſtates, whether they would have ſuch " things as they agreed on, by way of ordinance, " or ſtatute? Who anſwered, by way of ordinance; " for that they might amend the ſame at their " pleaſure; and ſo it was.'

Charles I An' 1642.

" But his Majeſty objects farther, that there is " ſomewhat in the preface, to which he could not " conſent with juſtice to his honor and innocence, " and that thereby he is excluded from any power " in the diſpoſing of it. Theſe objections may " ſeem ſomewhat, but indeed will appear nothing, " when it ſhall be conſidered, that nothing in the " preamble lays any charge upon his Majeſty, or " in the body of the ordinance, which excludes his " royal authority in the diſpoſing or execution of it: " but only it is provided, that it ſhould be ſignified " by both houſes of parliament, as that channel " thro' which it will be beſt derived, and moſt " certainly to thoſe ends for which it is intended; " and let all the world judge, whether we have not " reaſon to inſiſt upon it, that the ſtrength of the " kingdom ſhould rather be ordered according to " the direction or advice of the great council of " the land, equally intruſted by the King, and by " the kingdom, than the ſafety of the King, par- " liament and kingdom ſhould be left at the de- " votion of a few unknown counſellors, many of " them not intruſted at all by the King in any " public way, not at all confided in by the " kingdom.

" We wiſh the danger was not imminent, or " not ſtill continuing; but cannot conceive, that " the long time imployed in this debate is evidence " ſufficient that there was no ſuch neceſſity or " danger, but a bill might eaſily have been pre- " pared: for when many cauſes do concur to the " danger of a ſtate, the interruption of any one " may hinder the execution of the reſt, and yet " the deſign be ſtill kept on foot for better oppor- " tunities. Who knows whether the ill ſucceſs of " the rebels in Ireland had not hindered the in- " ſurrection of the Papiſts here? Whether the " preſervation of the ſix members of parliament " falſely accuſed, hath not prevented that plot of " breaking the neck of the parliament, of which " we were informed from France, not long before " they were accuſed? Yet, ſince his Majeſty hath " been pleaſed to expreſs his pleaſure rather for a " bill than an ordinance, and that he ſent in one " for that purpoſe, we readily entertained it, and, " with ſome ſmall and neceſſary alterations, ſpeedily " paſſed the ſame: but, contrary to the cuſtom of " parliament, and our expectations grounded upon " his Majeſty's own invitation of us that way, and " the other reaſons manifeſted in our declaration " concerning the militia, of the fifth of May, " inſtead of his royal aſſent, we met with an abſo- " lute refuſal.

" If the matter of theſe our votes, of the fifteenth " and ſixteenth of March, be according to law, " we hope his Majeſty will allow the ſubjects to be " bound by them, becauſe he hath ſaid, he will " make the law the rule of his power; and if the

" queſtion

Charles I An' 1642.

" queſtion be, Whether that be law which the " lords and commons have once declared to us ſo, " who ſhall be the judge? Not his Majeſty; for " the King judgeth not of matters of law, but by " courts: and his courts, thro' ſiting by his au- " thority, expect not his aſſent in matters of law: " nor any other courts, for they cannot judge in " that caſe, becauſe they are inferior, no appeal " lying to them from parliament, the judgment " whereof is, in the eye of the law, the King's " judgment in his higheſt court; tho' the King in " his perſon be neither preſent, nor aſſenting there- " unto. (3)

Rem. (3) I elſewhere obſerved the defect of this reaſoning, which is a mere fallacy, grounded upon the equivocal word, parliament. For, under color that, in a certain ſenſe, the two houſes alone are called the parliament, they here aſſume to themſelves the rights belonging ſolely to the parliament, compoſed of King, lords and commons.

" The votes at which his Majeſty takes excep- " tions, are theſe:

That the King's abſenſe ſo far remote from the parliament, is not only an obſtruction, but may be a deſtruction to the affairs of Ireland.

That when the lords and commons ſhall declare what the law of the land is, to have this not only queſtioned and controverted, but contradicted, and a command that it ſhould not be obeyed, is a high breach of the privilege of parliament.

That thoſe perſons who adviſed his Majeſty to abſent himſelf from the parliament, are enemies to the peace of the kingdom, and juſtly may be ſuſpected to be favorers of the rebellion in Ireland.

That the kingdom hath been of late, and ſtill is in ſo imminent danger, both from enemies abroad, and a Popiſh and diſcontented party at home, that there is an urgent and inevitable neceſſity of puting his Majeſty's ſubjects into a poſture of defenſe, for the ſafeguard both of his Majeſty and his people.

The lords and commons, fully apprehending this danger, and being ſenſible of their own duty to provide a ſuitable prevention, have in ſeveral petitions addreſſed themſelves to his Majeſty, for the ordering and diſpoſing of the militia of the kingdom, in ſuch a way as was agreed upon by the wiſdom of both houſes, to be moſt effectual and proper for the preſent exigents of the kingdom, yet could not obtain it; but his Majeſty did ſeveral times refuſe to give his royal aſſent thereunto.

That, in this caſe of extreme danger, and his Majeſty's refuſal, the ordinance of parliament, agreed upon by both houſes for the militia, doth oblige the people, and ought to be obeyed by the fundamental laws of this kingdom.

" By all which it doth appear there is no color " that, by this tax, we go about to introduce a " new law, much leſs to exerciſe arbitrary power, " but indeed to prevent it; for this law is as old " as the kingdom, that the kingdom muſt not be " without a means to preſerve itſelf; which that it " may be done without confuſion, this nation hath " intruſted certain hands with a power to provide, " in an orderly and regular way, for the good and " ſafety of the whole; which power, by the con- " ſtitution of this kingdom, is in his Majeſty and " in his parliament together: yet ſince the Prince, " being but one perſon, is more ſubject to accidents " of nature and chance, whereby the common- " wealth may be deprived of the fruit of that truſt " which was in part repoſed in him; in caſes of " ſuch neceſſity, that the kingdom may not be " inforced preſently to return to its firſt principles, " and every man left to do what is right in his own " eyes, without either guide or rule, the wiſdom " of this ſtate hath intruſted the houſes of par- " liament with a power to ſupply what ſhall be " wanting on the part of the Prince; as is evident " by the conſtant cuſtom and practiſe thereof in " caſes of nonage, natural diſability, and captivity; " and the like reaſon doth and muſt hold for the " exerciſe of the ſame power in ſuch caſes, where " the royal truſt cannot be, or is not diſcharged, " and the kingdom runs an evident and imminent " danger thereby; which danger having been de- " clared by the lords and commons in parliament, " there needs not the authority of any perſon or " court to affirm; nor is it in the power of any " perſon or court to revoke that judgment. (4)

Charles I An' 1642.

Rem. (4) All theſe reaſonings of both houſes are founded on the ſuppoſition of imminent danger. When they come to give proofs of the reality of this danger, they allege only ſuſpicions, whereof they explain the cauſe: after which, they affirm the danger to be real, becauſe they have declared it ſo, and becauſe there is no ſuperior authority to contradict their judgment. But this declaration does not make the danger real, if it be not ſo indeed. It is therefore eaſy to perceive, by their manner of proceeding, that they are imbaraſſed by this article.

" We know the King hath ways enough, in his " ordinary courts of juſtice, to puniſh ſuch ſedi- " tious pamphlets and ſermons, as are any way " prejudicial to his rights, honor and authority; " and if any of them have been ſo inſolently vio- " lated and vilified, his Majeſty's own council and " officers have been to blame, and not the parlia- " ment. We never did reſtrain any proceedings " of this kind in other courts, nor refuſe any fit " complaint to us. The Proteſtation Proteſted " was refered by the commons houſe to a commitee, " and the author being not produced, the printer " was commited to priſon, and the book voted " by that commitee to be burned; but ſir Edward " Deering, who was to make that report of the " votes of that commitee, neglected to make it. " The Apprentices Proteſtation was never com- " plained of; but the other ſeditious pamphlet, " To your Tents, O Iſrael, was once queſtioned, " and the full proſecution of it was not interrupted " by any fault of either houſe, whoſe forwardneſs " to do his Majeſty all right therein, may plainly " appear, in that a commitee of lords and com- " mons were purpoſely appointed to take ſuch in- " formation as the King's council ſhould preſent, " concerning ſeditious words, practiſes, or tumults, " pamphlets or ſermons, tending to the derogation " of his Majeſty's rights or prerogative; and his " council were injoyned by that commitee to in- " quire and preſent them; who ſeveral times met " thereupon, and received this anſwer and declara- " tion from the King's council, that they knew of " no ſuch thing, as yet.

" If his Majeſty had uſed the ſervice of ſuch a " one, in penning this anſwer, who underſtood the " laws and government of this kingdom, he would " not have thought it legally in his power to deny " his parliament a guard, when they ſtood in need " of it, ſince every ordinary court hath it; neither " would his Majeſty, if he had been well informed " of the laws, have refuſed ſuch a guard as they " deſired, it being in the power of inferior courts " to command their own guard; neither would he " have impoſed upon them ſuch a guard, under a " commander whom they could not confide in; " which is clearly againſt the privileges of parlia- " ment, and of which they found very dangerous " effects, and therefore deſired to have it diſ- " charged. But ſuch a guard, and ſo commanded, " as the houſes of parliament deſired, they could " never obtain of his Majeſty; and the placing of " a guard about them, contrary to their deſire, " was not to grant a guard to them, but in effect " to ſet one upon them. All which conſidered,

" we

Charles I An' 1642.

" we believe, in the judgments of any indifferent " perſons, it will not be thought ſtrange, if there " was a more than ordinary reſort of people at " Weſtminſter, of ſuch as came willingly, of their " own accord, to be witneſſes and helpers of the " ſafety of them whom all his Majeſty's good ſub- " jects are bound to defend from violence and " danger; or that ſuch a concourſe as this, they " carrying themſelves quietly and peaceably (as " they did) ought, in his Majeſty's apprehenſion, " or can, in the interpretation of the law, be held " tumultuary and ſeditious.

" When his Majeſty, in that queſtion of viola- " tion of the laws, had expreſſed the obſervation " of them indefinitely, without any limitation of " time, altho' we never ſaid or thought any thing " which might look like a reproach to his Majeſty, " yet we had reaſon to remember that it had been " otherwiſe, leſt we ſhould ſeem to deſert our " former complaints and proceedings thereupon, " as his Majeſty doth ſeem but little to like or " approve of them; for altho' he doth acknow- " ledge here that great miſchief which grew by " that arbitrary power then complained of, yet " ſuch are continually prefered and countenanced " as were friends and favorers, or related unto the " chief authors and actors of that arbitrary power, " and of thoſe falſe colors, ſuggeſtions of imminent " danger and neceſſity, whereby they did make " it plauſible unto his Majeſty. And, on the " other ſide, ſuch as did appear againſt them, " are daily diſcountenanced and diſgraced; which, " while it ſhall be ſo, we have no reaſon to judge " the diſeaſe to be yet killed and dead at root, " and therefore no reaſon to bury it in oblivion. " And while we behold the ſpawns of thoſe miſ- " chievous principles cheriſhed and foſtered in that " new generation of counſellors, friends and abet- " ters of the former, or at leaſt concurring with " them in their malignity againſt the proceedings " of this parliament, we cannot think ourſelves " ſecure from the like or a worſe danger.

" And here the penner of this anſwer beſtows " an admonition upon the parliament, biding us " take heed we fall not upon the ſame error, upon " the ſame ſuggeſtions. But he might have well " ſpared this, 'till he could have ſhewed wherein " we had exerciſed any power, otherwiſe than by " the rule of the law, or could have found a more " authentic or higher judge, in matters of law, " than the high court of parliament.

" It is declared, in his Majeſty's name, that he " is reſolved to keep the rule himſelf, and to his " power to require the ſame of all others. We " muſt needs acknowledge, that ſuch a reſolution " is like to bring much happineſs and bleſſing to " his Majeſty, and all his kingdom; yet with " humility we muſt confeſs, we have not the fruit " of it, in that caſe of lord Kimbolton, and the " other five members, accuſed contrary to law, " both common law and the ſtatute law, and yet " remain unſatisfied; which caſe was remembered " in our declaration, as a ſtrange and unheard of " violation of our laws. But the penner of this " anſwer thought fit to paſs it over, hoping that " many would read his Majeſty's anſwer (which " hath been ſo carefully diſperſed) who would not " read our declaration.

" Whereas, after our ample thanks and acknow- " ledgements of his Majeſty's favor in paſſing " many good bills, we ſaid, that truth and neceſſity " inforced us to add this, that, in or about the " time of paſſing thoſe bills, ſome deſign or other " hath been on foot, which, if it had taken effect, " would not only have deprived us of the fruit of " thoſe bills, but would have reduced us to a " worſe condition of confuſion, than that wherein " the parliament found us. It is now told us, " that the King muſt be moſt ſenſible of what we " caſt upon him, for requital of thoſe good bills; " whereas, out of our uſual tenderneſs of his Ma- " jeſty's honor, we did not mention him at all: " but ſo injurious are thoſe wicked counſellors to " the name and honor of their maſter and Sove- " reign, that, as much as they can, they lay their " own infamy and guilt upon his ſhoulders.

Charles I An' 1642.

" Here God alſo is called to witneſs his Majeſty's " upright intentions, at the paſſing of thoſe laws: " this we will not queſtion, neither did we give " any occaſion for ſuch a ſolemn aſſeveration as " this is. The devil is likewiſe defied to prove, " there was any deſign, with his Majeſty's know- " ledge or privity. This might well have been " ſpared, for we ſpake nothing of his Majeſty: " but ſince we are ſo far taxed as to have it affirmed, " that we laid a notorious and falſe imputation " upon his Majeſty, we thought it neceſſary, for " the juſt defenſe of our own innocency, to cauſe " the oaths and examinations, which had been " taken concerning the deſign, to be publiſhed in " a full narration, for ſatisfaction of all his Ma- " jeſty's ſubjects; out of which we ſhall now offer " ſome few particulars, whereby the world may " judge, whether we could have proceeded with " more tenderneſs towards his Majeſty than we " have done. Mr. Goring confeſſeth, that the " King firſt aſked him, Whether he was ingaged " in any cabal concerning the army? And com- " manded him to join with mr. Percy and mr. Jer- " min, and ſome others, whom they ſhould find " within at mr. Percy's chamber; where they took " the oath of ſecreſy, and then debated of a deſign " propounded by mr. Jermin, to ſecure the Tower, " and to conſider of bringing the army up to " London; and captain Legg confeſſed, he had " received the draught of a petition in the King's " preſenſe; and his Majeſty acknowledged it was " from his own hand: and whoſoever reads the " ſum of that petition, as it was proved by the " teſtimony of ſir Jacob Aſhly, ſir John Conyers, " and captain Legg, will eaſily perceive ſome " points in it apt to beget in them ſome diſcontent " againſt the parliament. And can any man be- " lieve, there was no deſign in the accuſation of " lord Kimbolton, and the reſt, in which his " Majeſty doth avow himſelf to be both a com- " mander and an actor? Theſe things being ſo, it " will eaſily appear to be as much againſt the " rule of prudence, that the penner of this anſwer " ſhould intangle his Majeſty in this unneceſſary " apology; as it is againſt the rules of juſtice, " that any reparation from us ſhould be either " yielded or demanded.

" It is profeſſed in his Majeſty's name, That " he is truly ſenſible of the burdens of his people, " which makes us hope, that he will take that " courſe which will be moſt effectual to eaſe " them of theſe burdens; that is, to join with his " parliament in preſerving the peace of the king- " dom; which by his abſenſe from them hath " been much indangered, and which, by hinder- " ing the voluntary adventures for the recovery " of Ireland, and diſabling the ſubjects to diſcharge " the great tax laid upon them, is like to make " the war much more heavy to the kingdom. " And for his Majeſty's wants, the parliament " hath been no cauſe of them. We have not di- " miniſhed his juſt revenue, but have much eaſed " his public charge, and ſomewhat his private: " and we ſhall be ready, in a parliamentary way, " to ſetle his revenue, in ſuch honorable proportion " as may be anſwerable to both, when he ſhall " put himſelf into ſuch a poſture of government, " that his ſubjects may be ſecure to injoy his

" juſt

CHARLES I AN' 1642.

" juſt protection for their religion, laws and " liberties.

" We never refuſed his Majeſty's gracious offer " of a free and general pardon, only we ſaid, it " could be no ſecurity to our preſent fears and " jealouſies: and we gave a reaſon for it, that " thoſe fears did not ariſe out of any guilt of our " own actions, but out of the evil deſigns and at- " tempts of others; and we leave it to the world " to judge, whether we herein have deſerved ſo " heavy a tax and exclamation " (That it was a " ſtrange world, when Princes proffered favors are " counted reproaches;" ſuch are the words of his " Majeſty's anſwer) who do eſteem that offer as " an act of princely grace and bounty, which, " ſince this parliament began, we have humbly " deſired we might obtain, and do ſtill hold it " neceſſary and advantageous for the generality of " the ſubjects, upon whom the taxes and ſubſi- " dies lie heavieſt; but we ſee, upon every occa- " ſion, how unhappy we are in his Majeſty's miſ- " apprehenſions of our words and actions.

" We are fully of the King's mind, as it is " here declared, That he may reſt ſo ſecure of " the affections of his ſubjects, that he ſhould not " ſtand in need of foreign force to preſerve him " from oppreſſion, and are confident, that he ſhall " never want an abundant evidence of the good " wiſhes and aſſiſtance of his whole kingdom, " eſpecially if he ſhall be pleaſed to hold to that " gracious reſolution, of building upon that ſure " foundation, the law of the land: but why his " Majeſty ſhould take it ill, that we, having re- " ceived information ſo deeply concerning the ſafety " of the kingdom, ſhould think them fit to be con- " ſidered of, we cannot conceive; for altho' the " name of the perſon was unknown, yet that " which was more ſubſtantial to the probability of " the report was known, that is, that he was ſer- " vant to lord Digby, who, in his preſumptuous " letter to the Queen's Majeſty, and other letters " to ſir Lewis Dives, had intimated ſome wicked " propoſition, ſuitable to that information; but " that this ſhould require reparation, we hold it " as far from juſtice as it is from truth, that we " have mixed any malice with theſe rumors, " thereby to feed the fears and jealouſies of the " people.

" It is affirmed, his Majeſty is driven (but not " by us yet) from us: perchance hereafter, if there " be opportunity of gaining more credit, there will " not be wanting who will ſuggeſt unto his Ma- " jeſty, that it is done by us. And if his Maje- " ſty were driven from us, we hope it was not by " his own fears, but by the fears of lord Digby, " and his retinue of Cavaliers (5); and that no " fears of any tumultuary violence, but of their juſt " puniſhment for their manifold inſolence, and in- " tended violence againſt the parliament.

REM. (5). By lord Digby's Cavaliers, were underſtood the officers and gentlemen who aſſembled at Whitehall, to guard his Majeſty, at the head of whom was lord Digby. I believe not that, when this declaration was publiſhed, the term Cavaliers was commonly uſed to denote the Royaliſts. Poſſibly, this word, uſed here by the parliament, was the occaſion of ſtiling thoſe of the King's party, Cavaliers, as the parliament's partiſans were termed Round-heads. Theſe two denominations were afterwards changed into Tories and Whigs.

" And this is expreſſed by lord Digby himſelf, " when he told thoſe cavaliers, that the principal " cauſe of his Majeſty's going out of town, was " to ſave them from being trampled in the dirt; " but of his Majeſty's perſon there was no cauſe " of fear in the greateſt heat of his peoples indig- " nation, after the accuſation, and his Majeſty's " violent coming to the Houſe; there was no ſhew " of any evil intention againſt his regal perſon, " of which there can be no better evidence than " this, that he came next day without a guard into " the city, where he heard nothing but prayers " and petitions, no threatenings, nor irreverent " ſpeeches, which might give him any juſt occaſion " of fear, that we have heard of, or that his Ma- " jeſty expreſſed: for he ſtayed near a weak after " at Whitehall, in a ſecure and peacable condition; " whereby we are induced to believe, that there " is no difficulty or doubt at all, but his Maje- " ſty's reſidence near London may be as ſafe as in " any part of the kingdom. We are moſt aſſured " of the faithfulneſs of the city and ſuburbs; and " for ourſelves, we ſhall quicken the vigor of the " laws, the induſtry of the magiſtrates, the autho- " rity of the parliament, for the ſuppreſſing all " tumultuary inſolences whatſoever, and for the " vindicating of his honor from all inſupportable " and inſolent ſcandals, if any ſuch ſhall be found " to be raiſed upon him, as are mentioned in this " anſwer; and therefore we think it altogether " unneceſſary, and exceedingly inconvenient, to " adjourn the parliament to any other place.

" Where the deſire of a good underſtanding " betwixt the King and the parliament is, on both " parts, ſo earneſt, as is here profeſſed by his " Majeſty to be in him, and we have ſuffi- " ciently teſtified to be in ourſelves, it ſeems ſtrange " we ſhould be ſo long aſunder; it can be nothing " elſe but evil and malicious counſel, miſ-repre- " ſenting our carriage to him, and indiſpoſing his " favor to us: and, as it ſhall be far from us, to " take any advantage of his Majeſty's ſuppoſed " ſtraits, as to deſire, much leſs to compel him " to that which his honor or intereſt may render " unpleaſant and grievous to him; ſo we hope, " that his Majeſty will not make his own under- " ſtanding or reaſon the rule of his government, " but will ſuffer himſelf to be aſſiſted with a wiſe " and prudent council, who may deal faithfully be- " twixt him and his people; and that he will " remember, that his reſolutions do concern king- " doms, and therefore ought not to be moulded " by his own will (much leſs by that of any other " private perſon) which is not alike proportionable " to ſo great a truſt. And therefore we ſtill deſire " and hope, that his Majeſty will not be guided " by his own underſtanding, or think thoſe courſes, " ſtraits and neceſſities, to which he ſhall be ad- " viſed by the wiſdom of both houſes of parlia- " ment, which are the eyes in this politic body, " whereby his Majeſty is, by the conſtitution of " this kingdom, to diſcern the differences of thoſe " things which concern the public peace and ſafety " thereof.

" We have given his Majeſty no cauſe to ſay, " that we do meanly value the diſcharge of his " public duty. Whatſoever acts of grace or juſtice " have been done, they proceed from his Majeſty, " by the advice and counſel of his parliament, yet " we have, and ſhall always anſwer them with con- " ſtant gratitude, obedience and affection: and " altho' many things have been done ſince this " parliament, of another nature, yet we ſhall not " ceaſe to deſire the continued protection of Al- " mighty God upon his Majeſty; and moſt humbly " petition him, to caſt from him all thoſe evil and " contrary counſels, which have, in many parti- " culars formerly mentioned, much detracted from " the honor of his government, the happineſs of " his own eſtate, and proſperity of his people.

" And having paſſed ſo many dangers from " abroad, ſo many conſpiracies at home, and " brought on the public work ſo far, thro' the " greateſt difficulties which ever ſtood in oppo- ſition

CHARLES I An' 1642.

" ſition to a parliament, to ſuch a degree of ſuc-
" ceſs, that nothing ſeems to be left in our way
" able to hinder the full accompliſhment of our
" deſires and indeavors of the public good; un-
" leſs God, in his juſtice, do ſend ſuch a grievous
" curſe upon us, as to turn the ſtrength of the " kingdom againſt itſelf, and to effect that by their " own folly and credulity, which the power and " ſubtilty of their and our enemies could not " attain; that is, to divide the people from the " parliament, and to make them ſerviceable to
" the ends and aims of thoſe who would deſtroy
" them. Therefore we deſire the kingdom to " take notice of this laſt and moſt deſperate and " miſchievous plot of the malignant party, which " is acted and proſecuted in many parts of the " kingdom, under plauſible notions of ſtiring them
" up to a care of preſerving the King's preroga-
" tive; maintaining the diſcipline of the church;
" upholding and continuing the reverence and ſo-
" lemnity of God's ſervice, and incouraging of " learning. And upon theſe grounds, diverſe mu-
" tinous petitions have been framed in London,
" Kent, and other counties, and ſundry of his Ma-
" jeſty's ſubjects have been ſollicited to declare
" themſelves for the King againſt the parliament:
" and many falſe and foul aſperſions have been
" caſt upon our proceedings, as if we had been
" not only negligent, but averſe in theſe points:
" whereas we deſire nothing more, than to maintain
" the purity and power of religion, and to honor
" the King in all his juſt prerogatives; and for
" incouragement and advancement of piety and
" learning, we have very earneſtly indeavored,
" and ſtill do, to the utmoſt of our power, that
" all pariſhes may have learned, pious and ſuffi-
" cient preachers, and all ſuch preachers competent
" livings. (6)

REM. (6) King Charles complained, that the church of England was going to be deſtroyed, to make way for Preſbytery. The parliament dares not ſay the contrary, for fear of diſcouraging the Preſbyterians, nor own it, becauſe it was not yet time to diſcover themſelves ſo openly. They indeavor therefore to get off by general terms, which ſignify nothing; i. e. they have reſolved to ſtation in every pariſh pious miniſters, and provide for their ſubſiſtence.

" Many other bills and propoſitions are in pre" paration for the King's profit and honor, the " peoples ſafety and proſperity: in the proceedings
" whereof we are much hindered by his Majeſty's
" abſenſe from the parliament, which is altogether
" contrary to the uſe of his predeceſſors, and the " privileges of parliament; whereby our time is
" conſumed by a multitude of unneceſſary meſſa-
" ges, and our innocency wounded by cauſeleſs
" and ſharp invectives. Yet we doubt not, but " we ſhall overcome all this at laſt, if the people
" ſuffer not themſelves to be deluded with falſe
" and ſpecious ſhews, and ſo drawn to betray
" us to their own undoing, who have ever been " willing to hazard the undoing of ourſelves, that " they might not be betrayed by our neglect of " the truſt repoſed in us: but if it were poſſible
" they ſhould prevail herein, yet we would not " fail, thro' God's grace, ſtill to perſiſt in our " duties, and to look beyond our own lives, eſtates
" and advantages, as thoſe who think nothing
" worth the injoying, without the liberty, peace
" and ſafety of the kingdom; nor any thing
" too good to be hazarded in diſcharge of " our conſciences for the obtaining it; and
" ſhall always repoſe ourſelves upon the protec" tion of Almighty God, which we are confi" dent ſhall never be wanting to us (while we " ſeek his glory) as we have found it hitherto
" wonderfully going along with us in all our pro" ceedings."

CHARLES I An' 1642.

Charles ſoon anſwered this manifeſto. He had ſtrong reaſons to prevent betimes the impreſſions it might make upon the peoples minds. As a war was unavoidable, both King and parliament were equally concerned to gain the people, and for this theſe papers were intended. We have ſeen, in the parliament's manifeſto, the objections againſt his Majeſty reiterated; and in that Prince's, we ſhall ſee the ſame anſwers he had before given to each article. Theſe two papers therefore may be conſidered as a recapitulation of whatever had been alleged, pro and con, in the contraſt between King Charles and his parliament. Both flattered themſelves, that their reaſons were unanſwerable, and propoſed them with great confidence; nor was this wholly without foundation: for both ſides, reaſoning upon different principles, might be right, according to their reſpective ſuppoſitions.

His Majeſty's anſwer to a book, intitled, The Declaration, or Remonſtrance of the Lords and Commons, of the 19th of May, 1642.

" IF we could be weary of taking any pains for " the ſatisfaction of our people, and to unde-
" ceive them of thoſe ſpecious, miſchievous infu-
" ſions which are daily inſtilled into them, to ſhake
" and corrupt their loyalty and affection to us and
" our government, after ſo full and ample decla" ration of ourſelf and intentions, and ſo fair and " ſatisfactory anſwers to all ſuch matters as have " been objected to us by a major part preſent of " both houſes of parliament, we might well give
" over this labor of our pen, and ſit ſtill 'till it ſhall
" pleaſe God ſo to inlighten the affections and un-
" derſtandings of our good ſubjects, on our behalf
" (which we doubt not but that, in his good time,
" he will do) that they may ſee our ſufferings are
" their ſufferings. But ſince, inſtead of applying
" themſelves to the method propoſed by us, of " making ſuch ſolid, particular propoſitions as " might eſtabliſh a good underſtanding between " us, or of following the advice of our council of " Scotland (with whom they communicate their " affairs) in forbearing all means which may make
" the breach wider, and wound deeper; they have
" choſen to purſue us with new reproaches, or " rather to continue and improve the old, by add" ing and varying little circumſtances and language,
" in matters formerly urged by them, and fully
" anſwered by us. We prevailed with ourſelf,
" upon very mature and particular conſideration
" of it, to anſwer the late printed book, intitled,
" A Declaration or Remonſtrance of the Lords and
" Commons," which was ordered, the nineteenth of " May laſt, to be printed and publiſhed, hoping
" then, that they would put us to no more of this " trouble, but that ſhould have been the laſt of
" ſuch a nature they would have communicated
" to our people, and that they would not, as " they have done ſince, thought fit to aſſault us
" with a newer declaration, indeed of a very new
" nature and learning, which muſt have another
" anſwer. (1)

Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 704. Clarendon, p. 463.

REMARK (1) This was a freſh declaration, of the ſecond of June, whence it may be infered, that this anſwer of the King to the firſt was not publiſhed 'till after that time.

" And we doubt not, but that our good ſub-
" jects, in ſhort time, will be ſo well inſtructed
" in the differences and miſtakings between us,
" that they will plainly diſcern, without reſigning
" their reaſon and underſtanding to our preroga-
" tive, or the infallibility of a now major part of " both houſes of parliament (infected by a few
" malignant ſpirits) where the fault is. (2)

REM.

Rem. (2) King Charles, in this paper, begins to repreſent the reſolutions of the parliament, not as being agreeable to the nation's ſentiments, but as coming only from a diſaffected party, prevalent in both houſes.

" Tho' we ſhall, with all humility and alacrity, " be always forward to acknowledge the infinite " mercy and providence of Almighty God, vouch- " ſafed ſo many ſeveral ways to ourſelf and " this nation, yet ſince God himſelf doth not " allow we ſhould fancy and create dangers to " ourſelf, that we might manifeſt and publiſh his " mercy in our deliverance, we muſt profeſs, we " do not know thoſe deliverances, mentioned in the " begining of that declaration, from ſo many " wicked plots and deſigns from the begining of " this parliament, which if they had taken effect, " would have brought ruin and deſtruction upon " this kingdom. We well know, the great labor " and ſkill hath been uſed to amaze and affright " our good ſubjects with fears and apprehenſions " of plots and conſpiracies; the ſeveral pamphlets " publiſhed, and letters ſcattered up and down full " of ſuch ridiculous, contemptible animadverſions " to that purpoſe, as (tho' they found, for what " end God knows, very unuſual countenance) no " ſober man would be moved with them. But we " muſt confeſs, we have never been able to inform " ourſelf of any ſuch pernicious, formed deſign " againſt the peace of this kingdom, ſince the " begining of this parliament, as is mentioned in " that declaration, or might be any warrant to " thoſe great fears both our houſes of parliament " ſeem to be tranſported with; but we have great " cauſe to believe, more miſchief and danger have " been raiſed and begoten, to the diſturbance of " this kingdom, than cured or prevented by thoſe " fears and jealouſies: and therefore, however the " rumor and diſcourſe of plots and conſpiracies " may have been neceſſary to the deſigns of par- " ticular men, they ſhall do well not to pay any " falſe devotions to Almighty God, who diſcerns " whether our dangers are real or pretended.

" For the bringing up the army to London, as " we have heretofore (by no other direction than " the teſtimony of a good conſcience) called God " to witneſs, we never had or knew any ſuch reſolu- " tion; ſo, upon the view of the depoſitions now " publiſhed with that declaration, it is not evident " to us, there was, ever ſuch a deſign, unleſs very " looſe diſcourſe or argument be inſtance enough " of a deſign. (3)

Rem. (3) His Majeſty ſeems to vindicate himſelf very weakly, upon this article. His whole anſwer lies in the ambiguity of the word deſign, which may ſignify either a bare project, or a ſetled and formed deſign. It is certain, there was a deſign, or project, to bring up the army to London, which King Charles knew of, and was propoſed by Jermyn; but no reſolution was taken thereon. This Prince denies his knowing of any ſuch reſolution, becauſe indeed there was not any: but he dares not deny, his having been informed of the deſign, or project of marching the army to London. Wherefore, after having ſpoken of the deſign in general, he immediately changes the word into that of reſolution. In ſuch kinds of ambiguities, King Charles the Firſt was very ſkilful.

" And it is apparent, that what was ſaid of it, " was near three months before the diſcovery to " both houſes of parliament: ſo that, if there " was any danger threatened that way, it vaniſhed " without any reſiſtance or prevention, by the wiſ- " dom, power, or authority of them. (4)

Rem. (4) The parliament inſiſted chiefly on Charles's intention, and indeavored to prove the fact, in order to make evident this intention: ſo it was not a proof of his ſaid Majeſty's not having any ill intention, that the deſign of ſeducing the army, and bringing it up to London was not purſued.

" It ſeems the intention of that declaration " (whatſoever other end it hath) is to anſwer a " declaration they received from us, in anſwer to " that which was preſented to us, at New-market, " the ninth of March laſt; and likewiſe to our " anſwer to the petition of both houſes, preſented " to us, at York, the twenty-ſixth of March laſt. " But before that declaration falls upon any parti- " culars of our ſaid declaration, or anſwer, it " complains, that the heads of the malignant " party have, with much art and induſtry, ad- " viſed us to ſuffer diverſe unjuſt ſcandals and im- " putations upon the parliament to be publiſhed in " our name, whereby they might make it odious " to the people, and by their help deſtroy it: but " not inſtancing in any one ſcandal or imputation " ſo publiſhed by us, we are ſtill to ſeek for the " heads of that malignant party. But our good " ſubjects will eaſily underſtand that, if we were " guilty of that aſperſion, we muſt not only be " active in raiſing the ſcandal, but paſſive in the " miſchief begoten by that ſcandal, we being an " eſſential part of the parliament. (5)

Rem. (5) This is only a ſubtilty grounded on the ambiguity of the word parliament. In the declaration which his Majeſty is anſwering, by the term parliament, is underſtood both houſes, without including the King; and here Charles means both houſes and the King jointly.

" And we hope the juſt defenſe of ourſelf and " and our authority, and the neceſſary vindication " of our innocence and juſtice from the imputa- " tion laid on us, by a major part then preſent, " by either or both houſes, ſhall no more be called " a ſcandal upon the parliament, than the opinion " of ſuch a part be reputed an act of parliament. " And we hope our good ſubjects will not be long " miſled by that common expreſſion, in all the " declarations, wherein they uſurp the word par- " liament, and apply it to countenance any reſo- " lution, or vote, ſome few have a mind to make, " by calling it. The reſolution of parliament, " which can never be without our conſent; neither " can the vote of either, or both houſes, make a " greater alteration in the laws of this kingdom " (ſo ſolemnly made by the advice of their prede- " ceſſors, with the concurrence of us and our an- " ceſtors) either by commanding or inhibiting any " thing (beſide the known rules of the law) than " our ſingle direction or mandate can do, to which " we do not aſcribe the authority. (6)

Rem. (6) This reaſon is invincible, ſuppoſing the government in its natural ſtate: but it could not make any impreſſion on thoſe who believed this Prince deſigned to eſtabliſh arbitrary power.

" But that declaration informs our people, that " the malignant party hath drawn us into the " northern parts, far from our parliament: it " might more truly and properly have ſaid, that " it hath driven, than drawn us hither. (7)

Rem. (7) The parliament, by malignant party, underſtood the King's party; and here Charles gives the ſame title to that of the parliament.

" For we confeſs our journey hither (for which " we have no other reaſon to be ſorry than with " reference to the cauſe of it) was only forced up- " on us by the true malignant party, which con- " trived and countenanced thoſe barbarous tumults, " and other ſeditious circumſtances, of which we " have ſo often complained, and hereafter ſhall " ſay more, and which indeed threatens ſo much " danger to our perſon, and laid ſo much ſcandal " upon the whole privilege and dignity of parlia-

" ment

CHARLES I An' 1642.

" ment, that we wonder it can be mentioned without bluſhes or indignation: but of that anon.
" But why the malignant party ſhould be charged " with cauſing a preſs to be tranſported to York,
" we cannot imagine; neither have any papers or
" writings iſſued from thence, to our knowledge,
" but what have been extorted from us by ſuch
" provocations, as have not been before offered to
" a King: and, no doubt, it will appear a moſt
" trivial and fond exception, when all preſſes are " open to vent whatſoever they think fit to ſay to " the people (a thing unwarranted by former
" cuſtom) that we ſhould not make uſe of all
" lawful means to publiſh our juſt and neceſſary
" anſwers thereunto. As for the authority of the " great ſeal (tho' we do not know that it hath been
" neceſſary to things of this nature) the ſame ſhall
" be more frequently uſed hereafter, as occaſion
" ſhall require (8); to which we make no doubt
" the greater and better part of our privy-council
" will concur, and whoſe advice we are reſolved
" to follow, as far as it ſhall be agreeable to the " good and welfare of the kingdom.

REM. (8) The parliament's declaration was publiſhed the ninteenth of May, and three days after the lord-keeper Littleton went privately, from London, with the great ſeal to the King: ſo King Charles had it in his hands when he publiſhed his anſwer. For this reaſon, he ſays, the ſame ſhall be more frequently uſed hereafter.

" Before that declaration vouchſafes to inſiſt on " any particulars, it is pleaſed to cenſure both our " declaration and anſwer, to be filled with harſh
" cenſures, and cauſeleſs charges upon the parlia" ment (ſtill miſ-applying the word parliament
" to the vote of both houſes) concerning which
" they reſolve to give ſatisfaction to the kingdom,
" ſince they find it very difficult to ſatisfy us. If,
" as in the uſage of the word parliament, they " have left us out of their thoughts; ſo, by the " word kingdom, they intended to exclude all our " people, who are out of their walls (for that is " grown another phraſe of the time, the vote of " the major part of both houſes, and ſometimes
" of one, is now called, 'The reſolution of the " whole kingdom') we believe it may not be hard
" to give ſatisfaction to themſelves; otherwiſe we " are confident (and our confidence proceeds from
" the uprightneſs of our own conſcience) they will " never be able to ſever the affections of us and
" our kingdom, that what cannot be ſatisfaction to
" one ſhall be to the other: neither will the ſtile
" of 'humble and faithful,' and telling us,
" That they will make us a great and glorious
" King,' in their petitions and remonſtrances, ſo
" deceive our good ſubjects, that they will paſs
" over the reproaches, threats and menaces they " are ſtuffed with, which ſure could not be more
" gently reprehended by us, than by ſaying, their
" expreſſions were different from the uſual language
" to Princes, which that declaration tells you we " had no occaſion to ſay. But we believe, who-
" ſoever looks over that declaration, preſented to " us at Newmarket, to which ours was an anſwer,
" will find the language throughout it to be ſo un-
" uſual, that, before this parliament, it could never " be paralleled; while, under pretenſe of juſtifying
" their fears, they give ſo much countenance to
" the diſcourſe of the rebels of Ireland, as if they " had a mind our good ſubjects ſhould give credit
" to it: otherwiſe, being warranted by the ſame
" evidence, which they have ſince publiſhed, they " would have as well declared, that thoſe rebels
" publicly threaten the rooting out the name of " the Engliſh, and that they will have a King of " their own, and no longer be governed by us;
" as that they ſay, they do nothing but by
" our authority, and that they call themſelves
" The Queen's army.' And therefore we have " great reaſon to complain of the abſenſe of juſtice
" and integrity in that declaration, beſide the un-
" fitneſs of other expreſſions. Neither did we " miſtake the ſubſtance or logic of the meſſage to " us, at Theobalds, concerning the militia, which " was no other, and is ſtated to be no other (even
" by that declaration which reproved us) than a
" plain threat, 'That if we refuſed to join with " them, they would make a law without us.' Nor " hath the practiſe ſince that time been other,
" which will never be juſtified to the moſt ordinary
" (if not partial) underſtandings, by the mere aver-
" ing it to be according to the fundamental laws of
" this kingdom, without giving any direction,
" that the moſt cunning and learned men in the " laws may be able to find thoſe foundations. (9)

CHARLES I An' 1642.

REM. (9) Here is a notorious ambiguity in the term, fundamental law. The parliament had clearly expreſſed what they underſtood by this fundamental law, viz. if the King failed in the diſcharge of his duty, the nation ought not however to be without defenſe, and in that caſe it belonged to the parliament to take care thereof. Inſtead therefore of aſking, where this law was, it ſeems that the King ſhould have ſhewn, either that, tho' he neglected his duty, it belonged not to the parliament to meddle with ſtate-government, or that he never had, nor did now neglect it: for, according to the parliament, tho' this law was not expreſſed in any particular ſtatute, it naturally flowed from the government's conſtitution. His Majeſty, by requiring this law to be produced, ſeems to inſinuate, that the parliament, in no caſe whatever, could interfere in ſtate-government, except authoriſed ſo to do by ſome expreſs law; and yet the parliament had alleged two caſes, viz. the captivity and nonage of a King, wherein they might have the management of the government; and they reckoned in this ſame claſs the Sovereign's negligence. To this King Charles ſhould have returned a reply.

" And we muſt appeal to all the world, whether " they might not, with as much juſtice, and by
" as much law, have ſeized upon the eſtate of " every member of both houſes, who diſſented
" from that pretended ordinance (which much the " major part of the houſe of peers did two or three
" ſeveral times) as they have invaded that power
" of ours over the militia, becauſe we (upon reaſons
" they have not ſo much as pretended to anſwer)
" refuſe to conſent to that propoſition: (10)

REM. (10) The authority aſſumed by the parliament, was not an ordinary authority, nor pretended to be ſo. It was extraordinary for the preſent ſuppoſed caſe, that there was great danger from the King. As therefore they had not the ſame ſuſpicions of thoſe who had, at firſt, refuſed their conſent to the ordinance, they could not ſeize their eſtates upon the ſame foundation. Thus the conſequence Charles drew from the parliament's uſurpation ſeems not juſt or rational.

" And if no better effects, than loſs of time
" and hindrance of the public affairs, have been " found by our anſwers and replies, let all good
" men judge, by whoſe default, and whoſe want of " duty ſuch effects have been: for as our end
" (indeed only end) in thoſe anſwers and replies,
" hath been the ſetlement and compoſure of public
" affairs, ſo we are aſſured, and moſt men do be" lieve, that if that due regard and reverence had " been given to our words, and that conſent and
" obedience to our counſels, which we did expect,
" there had been before this time a chearful calm
" upon the face of the whole kingdom, every " man injoying his own, with all the peace and ſecu-
" rity can poſſibly be imagined; which ſurely thoſe

" men

" men do not desire, who (after all those acts of " justice and favor passed by us this parliament, " all those affronts and sufferings indured and un- " dergone by us) think fit still to reproach us with " ship-money, coat and conduct-money, and other " things so abundantly declared (as that declaration " itself confesses) in the general remonstrance of the " state of the kingdom, published in November " last, which we wonder to find now avowed to be " the remonstrance of both houses, and which we " are sure, was presented to us only by the house " of commons; and did never, and we are con- " fident in that time could never have passed the " house of peers; the concurrence and authority " of which was not then thought necessary. Shall " we believe those reproaches to be the voice of " the kingdom of England? That all our loving " subjects, eased, refreshed, strengthened and abun- " dantly satisfied with our acts of grace and favor " towards them, are willing to be involved in these " unthankful expressions? We must appeal to the " thanks and acknowledgments published in the " petitions of most of the counties of England; " to the testimony and thanks we have received " from both houses of parliament, how seasonable, " how agreeable this usage of us is to our merit, " or their former expressions.

" We have not the least swerved or departed " from our resolution, or words, in the begining " of this parliament. We said, we were resolved " to put ourself freely and clearly upon the love " and affection of our English subjects; and we " say so still, as far as concerns England. And " we call Almighty God to witness all our com- " plaints and jealousies, which have never been " causeless, not out of our houses of parliament " (but of some few schismatical, factious and am- " bitious spirits, and upon such grounds, as short " time, we fear, will justify to the world) our " denial of the militia, our absenting ourself from " London, have been the effects of an upright and " faithful affection to our English subjects, that we " may be able (thro' all the inconveniencies we are " compelled to wrestle with) at last, to preserve and " restore their religion, laws and liberties unto them.

" Since the proceedings against lord Kimbolton, " and the five members, is still looked upon, and " so often pressed as so great an advantage against " us, that no retraction made by us, nor no " actions since that time commited against us, and " the law of the land, under the pretense of vindi- " cation of privilege, can satisfy the contrivers of " that declaration, but that they would have our " good subjects believe, the accusation of those six " members must be a plot for breaking the neck of " the parliament (a strange arrogance, if any of " those members had the pening of that declara- " tion) and that it is so often urged against us, as " if, by that single casual mistake of ours (in form " only) we had forfeited all duty, credit and alle- " giance from our people; we must, without in- " deavoring to excuse that, which in truth was an " error (our going to the house of commons) give " our people a clear and full narration of the matter " of fact, assuring ourself, that our good subjects " will not find our carriage in that business such as " hath been reported.

" When we resolved, upon such grounds as, " when they shall be published, will satisfy the " world, that it was fit for our own safety and " honor, and the peace of the kingdom, to pro- " ceed against those persons (11); tho' we well " know there was no degree of privilege in that " case, yet (to shew our desire of correspondency " with the two houses of parliament) we chose, " rather than to apprehend their persons by the " ordinary ministers of justice (which, according " to the opinion and practise of former times, " we might have done) to command our attorney- " general to acquaint our house of peers with our " intention, and the general matter of our charge " (which was yet more particular than a mere ac- " cusation) and to proceed accordingly; and, at " the same time, sent a sworn servant, a serjeant " at arms, to our house of commons, to acquaint " them, that we did accuse, and intended to pro- " secute the five members of that house for high- " treason, and did require that their persons might " be secured in custody.

Rem. (11) I have already intimated the parliament to have been chiefly offended, that the articles of accusation, exhibited by the attorney-general, were leveled at the whole house of commons, and a great number of lords, as much as at the persons accused. Here King Charles maintains the matter of the accusation, since it was for the kingdom's peace, and passes over in silence the reasons, which he reserved for another time, and thereby his vindication cannot be full and perfect.

" This we did, not only to shew that we in- " tended not to violate or invade their privileges, " but to use more ceremony towards them than " we then conceived in justice might be required " of us; and expected at least such answer as might " inform us, if we were out of the way: but we " received none at all; only in the instant, without " offering any thing of their privileges to our " consideration, an order was made (and the same " night published in print) that if any person what- " soever should offer to arrest the person of any " member of that house, without first acquainting " that house therewith, and receiving farther orders " from that house, that it should be lawful for such " members, or any person to assist them, and to " stand upon his or their guard of defense, and to " make resistance, according to the protestation " taken to defend the privileges of parliament. " And this was the first time we heard the pro- " testation might be wrested to such a sense; or " that, in any case (tho' of the most undoubted and " unquestionable privilege) it might be lawful for " any person to resist, and use violence against a " public minister of justice, armed with lawful au- " thority, tho' we well knew, that even such a " minister might be punished for executing such " authority.

" Upon viewing this order, we must confess we " were somewhat amazed, having never seen or " heard of the like, tho' we had known members " of either house commited without so much for- " mality as we had used, and upon crimes of a " far inferior nature to those we had suggested; " and having no course proposed to us for our pro- " ceeding, we were upon the matter only told, " that against those persons we were not to pro- " ceed at all: that they were above our reach, or " the reach of the law. It was not then easy for " us to resolve what to do. (12)

Rem. (12) This is somewhat disguised. The King was not told, that these members were above the reach of the law: but only that, the parliament siting, its members could not be imprisoned without the consent of their house, and that it was expected the grounds of the accusation should be made known, in order to this consent.

" If we imployed our ministers of justice in the " usual way for their apprehension (who, without " doubt, would not have refused to execute our " lawful commands) we saw what resistance and " opposition was like to be made, which very pro- " bably might cost some blood. If we sat still, " and desisted upon this terror, we should at the " best have confessed our want of power, and the " weakness of the law. In this strait, we put on " a sudden

CHARLES I An' 1642.

" a ſudden reſolution to try, whether our own " preſenſe, and a clear diſcovery of our intentions " (which haply might not have been ſo well under- " ſtood) could remove thoſe doubts, and prevent " thoſe inconveniencies, which ſeemed to have " been threatened; and thereupon we reſolved to " go in perſon to our houſe of commons, which " we diſcovered not 'till the very minute of our " going; when we ſent out, that our ſervants, " and ſuch gentlemen as were then in our court, " ſhould attend us to Weſtminſter: but giving " them expreſs command (as we have expreſſed in " our anſwer to the ordinance) that no accidents " of provocation ſhould draw them to any ſuch " action as might imply a purpoſe of force in us; " and ourſelf (requiring thoſe of our train not to " come within the door) went into the houſe of " commons: the bare doing of which we did not " then conceive, would have been thought more a " breach of privilege, than if we had gone to the " houſe of peers, and ſent for them to come to us, " which is the uſual cuſtom. We uſed the beſt " expreſſions we could to aſſure them, how far we " were from any intention of violating their privi- " leges; that we intended to proceed legally and " ſpeedily againſt the perſons we had accuſed, and " deſired therefore, if they were in the houſe, that " they might be delivered to us; or, if abſent, " that ſuch courſe might be taken for their forth- " coming, as might ſatisfy our juſt demands: and " ſo we departed, having no other purpoſe of " force, if they had been in the houſe, than we " have before proteſted before God, in our anſwer " to the ordinance. You have an account of our " part of this ſtory fully, let our people judge " freely of it. What followed on their part (tho' " this declaration tells you, 'it could not with- " draw any part of their reverence and obedience " from us;' it may be any part of theirs it did " not) we ſhall have too much cauſe hereafter to " inform the world.

" There will be no end of the diſcourſe, and " upbraiding us with evil counſellors, if, upon our " conſtant denial of knowing any, they will not " vouchſafe to inform us of them; and, after eight " months amuſing the kingdom with the expecta- " tion of a diſcovery of a malignant party, and of " evil counſellors, they will not at laſt name any, " nor deſcribe them. Let the actions and lives of " men be examined, who have contrived, coun- " ſelled, actually conſented to grieve and burden " our people; and if ſuch be about us, or any " againſt whom any notorious, malicious crime can " be proved; if we ſhelter and protect any ſuch, " let our injuſtice be publiſhed to the world: but " 'till that be done, particularly and manifeſtly " (for we ſhall never conclude any man, upon a " bare general vote of the major part of either, or " both houſes, 'till it be evident that major part " be without paſſion or affection) we muſt look " upon the charge this declaration puts on us, of " cheriſhing and countenancing a diſcontented " party of the kingdom againſt them, as a hea- " vier and unjuſter tax upon our juſtice and honor, " than any we have, or can lay upon the framers " of that declaration. (13)

Remark (13) With ſuch reſtrictions, one may diſpute eternally: for who ſhould be judge, whether the major part of the houſe were without paſſion or prejudice?

" And now to countenance thoſe unhandſome " expreſſions, whereby uſually they have implied " our connivance at, or want of zeal againſt the " rebellion of Ireland (ſo odious to all good men) " they have found a new way of exprobration: " That the proclamation againſt thoſe bloody " traitors came not out 'till the begining of Janua- " ry, tho' that rebellion brake out in October; " and then, by ſpecial command from us, but forty " copies were appointed to be printed." It is well " known where we were at that time, when that " rebellion brake forth; in Scotland: that we im- " mediately from thence recommended the care of " that buſineſs to both houſes of parliament here, " after we had provided for all fiting ſupplies " from our kingdom of Scotland: that after our " return hither, we obſerved all thoſe forms for " that ſervice, which we were adviſed to by our " council of Ireland, or both houſes of parliament " here; and if no proclamations iſſued out ſooner " (of which for the preſent we are not certain, " but think that others before that time were iſſued " by our direction) it was, becauſe the lords juſtices " of that kingdom deſired them no ſooner, and " when they did, the number they deſired was but " twenty, which they adviſed might be ſigned by " us, which we, for expedition of the ſervice, " commanded to be printed (a circumſtance not " required by them) thereupon we ſigned more " then our juſtices deſired. All which was very " well known to ſome members, of one or both " houſes of parliament, who have the more to an- " ſwer, if they forbore to expreſs it at the paſ- " ſing of this declaration: and if they did expreſs " it, we have the greater reaſon to complain, that " ſo envious an aſperſion ſhould be caſt on us to " our people, when they know well how to anſwer " their own objections. (14)

Remark (14) This anſwer appears ſomewhat weak; for ſuppoſing forty copies would have been ſufficient for Ireland, why was not the proclamation publiſhed in England? King Charles makes no anſwer to what the parliament ſaid of the pro- clamation againſt the Scots.

" What that complaint is againſt the parliament, " put forth in our name, which is ſuch an evidence " and countenance to the rebels, and ſpeaks the " ſame language of the parliament which the rebels " do, we cannot underſtand. All our anſwers and " declarations have been, and are owned by us, " and have been atteſted under our own hand; if " any other had been publiſhed in our name, and " without our authority, it would be eaſy for both " houſes of parliament to diſcover and apprehend " the authors: and we wiſh, that whoſoever was " truſted with the drawing and pening of that de- " claration, had no more authority or cunning to " impoſe upon, or deceive the major part of thoſe " votes by which it paſſed, than any man hath to " prevail with us to publiſh, in our own name, " any thing but the ſenſe and reſolution of our " own heart; or, that the contriver of that decla- " ration could, with as good a conſcience, call " God to witneſs, that all his counſels and indea- " vors have been free from all private aims, per- " ſonal reſpects or paſſions whatſoever, as we have " done and do; that we never had or knew of " ſuch reſolutions of bringing up the army to Lon- " don. And ſince this new device is found out, " inſtead of anſwering our reaſons, or ſatisfying " our juſt demands, to blaſt our declarations and " anſwers, as if they were not our own (a bold, " ſenſeleſs imputation) we are ſure that every an- " ſwer and declaration, publiſhed by us, is much " more our own, than any one of thoſe bold, " threatening and reproachful petitions and remon- " ſtrances are the acts of either, or both houſes: " and if the penner of that declaration had been " careful of the truſt repoſed in him, he would " never have denied (and thereupon found fault " with our juſt indignation) in the text or margin, " that we had never been charged with the inten- " tion of any force, and that, in their whole de- " claration, there is no word tending to ſuch a " reproach;

Charles I An' 1642.

" reproach ; the contrary whereof is ſo evident,
" that we are in expreſs terms charged in that de-
" claration, that we ſent them gracious meſſages,
" when, with our privity, bringing up the army
" was in agitation. And even in this declaration
" they ſeek to make our people believe ſome ſuch
" thing to be proved in the depoſitions now pub-
" liſhed, wherein, we doubt not, they will as " much fail, as they do in their cenſure of that
" petition ſhewed formerly to us by captain Legg,
" and ſubſcribed by us with C. R. which, not-
" withſtanding our full and particular narration of " the ſubſtance of that petition, the circumſtances
" of our ſeeing and approving it, this declaration
" is pleaſed to ſay, was full of ſcandal to the par" liament, and might have proved dangerous to " the whole kingdom. If they have this dangerous
" petition in their hands, we have no reaſon to " believe any tenderneſs to us-ward hath kept them
" from communicating it : it they have it not,
" we ought to have been believed. But that all
" good people may compute their other pretended
" dangers by their clear underſtanding of this,
" the noiſe whereof hath not been inferior to any " of the reſt, we have recovered a true copy of " the very petition we ſigned with C. R. which
" ſhall in fit time be publiſhed ; and which we " hope will open the eyes of our good people.(15)
" Concerning our warrant for mr. Jermin's paſſage,
" our anſwer was true and full : but for his black
" ſattin ſuit, and white boots, we can give no
" account.

Remark (15) This whole article of the anſwer ſeems very weak, ſince his Majeſty's defenſe conſiſts only of his own teſtimony. There could not be a properer occaſion to publiſh this petition, of which he ſaid he had a true copy : but, in defering its publication to a more convenient time, he gave room to ſuſpect there were ſome things in the petition which were not greatly to his favor.

" We complained in our declaration, and as " often as we have occaſion to mention our return
" and reſidence near London we ſhall complain,
" of the barbarous and ſeditious tumults at Weſt-
" minſter and Whitehall, which indeed were ſo
" full of ſcandal to our government, and danger
" to our perſon, that we ſhall never think of our " return thither, 'till we have juſtice for what is
" paſſed, and ſecurity for the time to come : and " if there was ſo great a neceſſity, or deſire of our " return, as is pretended, in all this time, upon
" ſo often preſſing our deſires, and upon cauſes
" ſo notorious, we ſhould at leaſt have procured
" ſome order for the future. But that declaration
" tells us, we are upon the matter miſtaken: the " reſort of the citizens to Weſtminſter, was as " lawful as the reſort of great numbers every day,
" in the term, to the ordinary courts of juſtice.
" They knew no tumults. Strange! Was the diſ-
" orderly appearance of ſo many thouſand people,
" with ſtaves and ſwords, crying thro' the ſtreets,
" Weſtminſter-hall, the paſſages between both
" houſes (inſomuch the members could hardly paſs
" to and fro) ' No biſhops! Down with the bi-
" ſhops!' no tumults ; What member is there,
" of either houſe, who ſaw not thoſe numbers,
" and heard not thoſe cries? And yet, lawful aſ-
" ſemblies! Were not ſeveral members of either
" houſe aſſaulted, threatened and ill-treated? And " yet, no tumults! Why made the houſe of peers
" a declaration, and ſent it down to the houſe of " commons, for the ſuppreſſing of tumults, if there " were no tumults? And if there were any, why
" was not ſuch a declaration conſented to and pub-
" liſhed? When the attempts were ſo viſible, and
" the threats ſo loud to pull down the abbey at
" Weſtminſter, had we not cauſe to apprehend
" that ſuch people would continue their work to " Whitehall? Yet, no tumults! What a ſtrange
" time are we in! That a few impudent, mali-
" cious (to give them no worſe term) men, ſhould
" caſt ſuch a ſtrange miſt of error before the eyes
" of both houſes of parliament, as that they either
" cannot, or will not ſee, how manifeſtly they
" injure themſelves by maintaining theſe viſible
" untruths? We ſay no more. By the help of " God, and the law, we will have juſtice for
" thoſe tumults. (16)

Charles I An' 1642.

Remark (16) The parliament's declaration contained two points upon this article. Firſt ; That the concourſe of people at Weſtminſter was no tumult. Secondly ; That his Majeſty's perſon was in no danger, ſince on the morrow he went thro' the city without a guard, and moreover ſtayed ſeveral days at Whitehall in ſafety. King Charles here replies to the firſt of theſe, and leaves the other without reply. Only he draws a conſequence, that Whitehall was in danger, becauſe the people threatened to pull down Weſtminſter-abbey ; a circumſtance which does not any where appear in the accounts of theſe tumults.

" From excepting (how weightily let every man
" judge) to what we have ſaid, that declaration
" proceeds to cenſure us for what we have not ſaid,
" for the prudent omiſſions in our anſwer. We
" forbore to ſay any thing of the words ſpoken
" at Kenſington, or the articles againſt our deareſt
" conſort, and of the accuſation of the ſix mem" bers : of the laſt we had ſpoken often ; and we " thought enough of the other two ; having never
" accuſed any (tho' God knows what truth there " might be in either) we had no reaſon to give any " particular anſwer.

" We do not reckon ourſelf bereaved of any " part of our prerogative, which we are pleaſed
" freely, for a time, to part with by bill ; yet
" we muſt ſay, we expreſſed a great truſt in our
" two houſes of parliament, when we diveſted our-
" ſelf of the power of diſſolving this parliament,
" which was a juſt, neceſſary and proper preroga-
" tive : but we are glad to hear their reſolution,
" that it ſhall not incourage them to do any thing,
" which otherwiſe had not been fit to have been " done ; if it do, it will be ſuch a breach of " truſt God will require an account for at their " hands.

" For the militia, we have ſaid ſo much in it
" heretofore, and the point is ſo well underſtood
" by all men, that we will waſte time no more
" in that diſpute. We never ſaid, there was no
" ſuch thing as an ordinance (tho' we know that " they have been long diſuſed) but that there
" was never any ordinance, or can be, without
" the King's conſent : and that is true ; and the " unneceſſary precedent cited in that declaration
" doth not offer to prove the contrary. But " enough of that ; God and the law muſt deter" mine that buſineſs.

" Neither hath this declaration given us any
" ſatisfaction concerning the votes of the fifteenth
" and ſixteenth of March laſt, which we muſt de-
" clare, and appeal to all the world in the point, to " be the greateſt violation of our privilege, the law
" of the land, the liberty of the ſubject, and the " right of parliament, that can be imagined. One
" of theſe votes is (and there needs no other to de-
" ſtroy the King and people) ' That when the " lords and commons (it is well the commons are
" admited to their part in judicature) ſhall declare
" what the law of the land is, the ſame muſt be aſ-
" ſented to, and obeyed ; that is the ſenſe in few " words. Where is every man's property ; every " man's liberty? If a major part of both houſes de-
" clare that the law is, that the younger brother

" ſhall

Charles I An' 1642.

" ſhall inherit, what is become of all the families " and eſtates in the kingdom? If they declare that, " by the fundamental law of the land, ſuch a raſh " action, ſuch an unadviſed word ought to be " puniſhed by perpetual impriſonment, is not the " liberty of the ſubject, 'durante bene placito,' " remedileſs? That declaration confeſſeth, They " pretend not to a power of making new laws; " that without us they cannot do that. They need " no ſuch power, if their declaration can ſuſpend " this ſtatute from being obeyed or executed, and " make this order, which is no ſtatute, to be obeyed " and executed. If they have power to declare lord " Digby, waiting on us to Hampton-court, and " thence viſiting ſome officers at Kingſton, with " a coach and ſix horſes, to be levying of war and " high-treaſon; and ſir John Hotham's defying us " to our face, keeping our town, fort and goods " againſt us by force of arms, to be an act of affec- " tion and loyalty, what needs a power of making " new laws? Or is there ſuch a thing as law left? " We deſire our good ſubjects to mark the reaſon " and conſequence of theſe votes, the progreſs they " have already made, and how infinite that progreſs " may be. Firſt, they vote the kingdom is in im- " minent danger (it is above three months ſince " they diſcerned it) from enemies abroad, and a " Popiſh and diſcontented party at home: this is " matter of fact; the law follows. This vote hath " given them authority, by law (the fundamental " laws of the kingdom) to order and diſpoſe of the " militia of the kingdom, and, with this power, " and to prevent that danger, to enter into our " towns, ſeize upon our magazine, and by force " keep both from us. Is not this our caſe? Firſt, " they vote we have an intention to levy war againſt " our parliament (a); that is matter of fact: then " they declare ſuch as ſhall aſſiſt us to be guilty " of high-treaſon; that is the law, and proved by " two ſtatutes themſelves know to be repealed: " no matter for that, they declare it. Upon this " ground they exerciſe the militia, and ſo actually " do that upon us, which they have voted we in- " tended to do upon them. Who doth not ſee the " confuſion which muſt follow upon ſuch a power " of declaring? If they ſhould now vote, that we " did not write this declaration, but that ſuch a " one did it, which is ſtill matter of fact; and then " declare, that for ſo doing he is an enemy to the " commonwealth; what is become of the law that " man was born to? And if all their zeal for the " defenſe of the law be but to defend that which " they declare to be law, their own votes, it will " not be in their power to ſatisfy any man of their " good intentions to the public peace, but ſuch as " are willing to relinquiſh their titles to 'Magna " Charta,' and hold their lives and fortunes by a " vote of a major part of both houſes. In a word, " we deny not but that they may have power to " declare, in a particular doubtful caſe, regularly " brought before them, what law is; but to make " a general declaration, whereby the known rule " of the law may be croſſed or altered, they have " no power, nor can exerciſe any, without bring- " ing the life and liberty of the ſubject to a lawleſs " and arbitrary ſubjection. (17).

Remark (17) It muſt have been a great mortification to King Charles, to be forced to ſhew, by ſuch good arguments, the miſchiefs which flow from arbitrary power. The ſame reaſons uſed by this Prince to demonſtrate, that arbitrary power was a natural conſequence of the parliament's maxims, ſerved to prove, that it was equally hazardous to leave, not every King of England, but himſelf in particular, inveſted with the authority allowed him by the laws, conſidering the uſe he had already made of that power.

Charles I An' 1642.

" We complained (and let the world judge of " the juſtice and neceſſity of that complaint) of " the multitude of ſeditious pamphlets and ſer- " mons; and that declaration tells us, they know " we have ways enough in our ordinary courts of " juſtice to puniſh thoſe: ſo we have to puniſh " tumults and riots, and yet they will not ſerve our " turn to keep our towns, our foreſts and parks " from violence (b). And, it may be, tho' thoſe " courts have ſtill the power to puniſh, they may " have loſt the ſkill to define what riots and " tumults are; otherwiſe a jury in Southwark, " legally impanneled to examine a riot there, would " not have been ſuperſeded, and the ſheriff in- " joined not to proceed, by virtue of an order of " the houſe of commons, which it ſeems at that " time had the ſole power of declaring. But it " is no wonder, that they who could not ſee the " tumults, do not conſider the pamphlets and ſer- " mons, tho' the author of the 'Proteſtation Pro- " teſted' be well known to be Burton (that infa- " mous diſturber of the peace of this church and " ſtate) and that he preached it at Weſtminſter, " in the hearing of diverſe members of the houſe " of commons. But of ſuch pamphlets, and ſedi- " tious preachers (diverſe whereof have been recom- " mended, if not impoſed upon ſeveral pariſhes, by " ſome members of both houſes, by what autho- " rity we know not) we ſhall hereafter take a " farther account. (18)

Rem. (18) Theſe ſermons contained, chiefly, the maxims which the parliament would have eſtabliſhed, or pretended to be agreeable to the laws; but which the King looked upon as ſeditious, and for that reaſon affirmed the parliament ought to puniſh the authors. This Burton was the ſame whoſe ears were cut off by the ſtar-chamber, and who was baniſhed to Guernſey, for publiſhing a treatiſe againſt the church of England. It ſeems here, that his Majeſty was diſpleaſed with the parliament's reverſing his ſentence.

" berties

CHARLES I An' 1442.

" berties, ſo, if they found us inclined to any " thing not agreeable to honor and juſtice, they " would leave us to-morrow. Whether different " perſons have not and do not receive countenance " elſewhere, and upon what grounds, let all men " judge; and whether we have not been forward " enough to honor and prefer thoſe of the moſt " contrary opinion, how little comfort ſoever we " have had of thoſe preferments; in beſtowing of " which hereafter we ſhall be more guided by " mens actions than opinions. And therefore we " had good cauſe to beſtow that admonition (for " we aſſure you it was an admonition of our own) " upon both our houſes of parliament, to take " heed of inclining, under the ſpecious ſhews of " neceſſity and danger, to the exerciſe of ſuch ar- " bitrary power as they before complained of: the " advice will do no harm, and we ſhall be glad to " ſee it followed.

" And are all the ſpecious promiſes, and loud " profeſſions of making us a great and glorious " King; of ſetling a greater revenue upon us than " any of our anceſtors have injoyed, of making " us to be honored at home, and feared abroad, " reſolved into this; that they will be ready to " ſetle our revenue in an honorable proportion, " when we ſhall put ourſelf in ſuch a poſture of " government, that our ſubjects may be ſecure to " injoy our juſt protection for their religion, laws " and liberties? What poſture of government they " intend, we know not, nor can we imagine what " ſecurity our good ſubjects can deſire for their " religion, laws and liberties, which we have not " offered, or fully given. (19)

REM. (19) Unhappily, ſince the violation of the petition of right, neither his Majeſty's word, nor his promiſes, nor even acts of parliament, had been deemed a ſufficient ſecurity: at leaſt, plauſible reaſons were alleged not to confide in them. Nothing but the militia could ſatisfy the parliament, and that was what King Charles would not willingly concede.

" And is it ſuitable to the duty and dignity of " both houſes of parliament, to anſwer our parti- " cular, weighty expreſſions of the cauſes of our " remove from London (ſo generally known to " the kingdom) with a ſcoff, that they hope we " were driven from thence, not by our own fears, " but by the fears of lord Digby, and his retinue " of Cavaliers? Sure the penner of that declaration " inſerted that ungrave and inſolent expreſſion (as " he hath done diverſe others) without the conſent " or examination of both houſes, who would not " ſo lightly have departed from their former pro- " feſſions of duty to us.

" Whether the way to a good underſtanding, " between us and our people, hath been as zea- " louſly preſſed by them, as it hath been profeſſed " and deſired by us, will be eaſily diſcerned by thoſe " who obſerve, that we have left no public act un- " done on our part which, in the leaſt degree, might " be neceſſary to the peace, plenty and ſecurity of " our ſubjects, and that they have not diſpatched " one act which hath given the leaſt evidence of " their particular affection and kindneſs to us; " but, on the contrary, have diſcountenanced and " hindered the teſtimony other men would give to " us of their affections; witneſs, the ſtoping and " keeping back the bill of ſubſidies granted by " the clergy almoſt a year ſince; which, tho' " our perſonal wants are ſo notoriouſly known, " they will not to this time paſs: ſo they not only " forbear ſupplying us themſelves, but keep the " love and bounty of other men from us, and " afford no other anſwers to all our deſires, " all our reaſons (indeed not to be anſwered) than, " that we muſt not make our underſtanding, or " reaſon, the rule of our government, but ſuffer " ourſelf to be aſſiſted (which we never denied) " by our great council. We require no other " liberty to our will, than the meaneſt of them do " (we wiſh they would always uſe that liberty) " not to conſent to any thing evidently contrary " to our conſcience and underſtanding; and we " have and ſhall always give as much eſtimation " and regard to the advice and counſel of both our " houſes of parliament, as ever Prince hath done; " but we ſhall never (and we hope our people will " never) account the contrivance of a few factious, " ſeditious perſons, a malignant party who would " ſacrifice the common-wealth to their own fury " and ambition, the wiſdom of parliament: and " that the juſtifying and defending ſuch perſons (of " whom, and of their particular ſiniſter ways to " compaſs their own bad ends, we ſhall ſhortly " inform the world) is not the way to preſerve " parliaments, but is the oppoſing and prefering " the conſideration of a few unworthy perſons be- " fore their duty to their King, or their care of " the kingdom. They would have us remember, " that our reſolutions do concern kingdoms, and " therefore are not to be moulded by our own un- " derſtanding. We well remember it; but we " would have them remember that, when their " conſultations indeavor to leſſen the office and " dignity of a King, they meddle with that which " is not within their determination, and of which " we muſt give an account to God and our other " kingdoms, and muſt maintain with the ſacrifice " of our life.

CHARLES I An' 1642.

" Laſtly; that declaration tells you of a pre- " ſent deſperate and malicious plot the malignant " party is now acting, under the plauſible notions " of ſtiring men up to a care of preſerving the " King's prerogative; maintaining the diſcipline of " the church; upholding and continuing the reverence " and ſolemnity of God's ſervice, and incouraging " learning (indeed plauſible and honorable notions " to act any thing upon) and that upon theſe " grounds, diverſe mutinous petitions have been " framed in London, Kent and other places. " Upon what grounds would theſe men have peti- " tions framed? Have ſo many petitions (even " againſt the form and conſtitution of the king- " dom, and the laws eſtabliſhed) been joyfully " received and accepted? And ſhall petitions " framed upon theſe grounds be called mutinous? " Have multitudes of mean, unknown, inconſider- " able, contemptible perſons, about the city and " ſuburbs of London, had liberty to petition " againſt the government of the church; againſt " the book of common-prayer; againſt the free- " dom and privilege of parliament, and been " thanked for it? And ſhall it be called mutiny " in the graveſt and beſt citizens of London, in " the gentry and commonalty of Kent, to frame " petitions upon theſe grounds, and to deſire to " be governed by the known laws of the land, " not by orders or votes of either, or both houſes? " Can this be thought the wiſdom and juſtice of " both houſes of parliament? Is it not evidently " the work of a faction within or without both " houſes, who deceive the truſt repoſed in them, " and have now told us what mutiny is? To ſtir " up men to a care of preſerving our prerogative, " maintaining the diſcipline of the church, upholding " and continuing the reverence and ſolemnity of " God's ſervice, incouraging of learning, is mu- " tiny. Let heaven and earth, God and man, " judge between us and theſe men. And however " ſuch petitions are there called mutinous, and the " petitioners threatened, diſcountenanced, cenſured " and impriſoned. If they bring ſuch lawful " petitions to us, we will graciouſly receive them,

" and defend them and their rights againſt what " power ſoever, with the uttermoſt hazard of our " being.

" We have been the longer (to our very great " pain) in this anſwer, that we might give the " world ſatisfaction, even in the moſt trivial " particulars which have been objected againſt us; " and that we may not be again reproached with " any more 'prudent omiſſions.' Explication of the differences between King and parliament.

On peruſing all theſe papers, in this ſecond part of King Charles I's reign, one ſhould ſeemingly have a perfect knowledge of the differences between that Prince and his parliament, and the ſubject be exhauſted. Nevertheleſs, if a reader keeps to the papers publiſhed on both ſides, he will not have a very ſtrong idea of the cauſe of theſe differences. In order thereto, he muſt underſtand the motives which they took care not to diſcover in their manifeſtoes, publiſhed only with deſign to gain the public's approbation. The following recital will, in my opinion, ſerve to give a clear and manifeſt idea of theſe differences. I ſhall not ſay any thing but what has been intimated in ſeveral places; and yet, I am of opinion it will not be ſuperfluous briefly to recapitulate the whole, which may be of ſervice to ſhew the grounds and cauſes of the civil wars.

After what has been advanced, it muſt be laid down as a fact undeniable, that King Charles had formed a deſign to eſtabliſh in England a power unlimited. They who deny this, have only to ſeek in their imagination a more natural cauſe of the peoples diſcontent againſt his government: but it is certain, whatever their ſyſtem may be, they will not, without this, ever be able ſo to reconcile it with the events as to ſatisfy ſuch as are unprejudiced. The four preceding parliaments conſidered this Monarch's procedure, from the begining of his reign, as tending to eſtabliſh deſpotiſm. This was what they termed their grievances, the redreſs whereof they had frequently, tho' fruitleſly required.

King Charles I, inherited his father's irradicable averſion to the Puritans, or Preſbyterians. Like him, he was perſuaded, that their principles touching eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, were directly oppoſite to monarchy. Both went ſtill farther. They believed not only, that all the Puritans were antimonarchical, but likewiſe, that all thoſe who were averſe to arbitrary govenment were confirmed Puritans. This induced Charles I, to reſolve on ruining ſuch as were not ſubmiſſive enough to his will, by confounding them all under the name of Puritans. To that end, he admited into his council, and public offices, ſuch only as adhered to thoſe his maxims. Hence ſprang all the ſeverities exerciſed by the council, ſtar-chamber, high-commiſſion, judges, and the whole magiſtracy, on thoſe who, according to the court's notions, were infected with Puritaniſm, tho' many of theſe men were ſincerely attached to the church of England. Herein this Prince, contrary to his intention, did a very conſiderable ſervice to the true Preſbyterians, ſince he confounded their intereſts with thoſe of a great number of people, who would not, otherwiſe, have had any inclination to Preſbytery. The truth is, they were alike menaced with the ſame deſtruction: and therefore, in the elections for this laſt parliament, many of principles contrary to King and court, were returned. Among theſe the Preſbyterians were the moſt ardent, perceiving their ruin was determined, and would ſoon approach if Charles ſucceeded in his deſigns. Thus, the Preſbyterian party, which before made but a very inconſiderable figure in the kingdom, grew powerful, by the junction of that other ſort of Puritans, whom the court had pleaſed to confound with them.

CHARLES I An' 1642.

Contrariwiſe, archbiſhop Laud, with ſome other court-prelates, deviſed a method, which could not fail affording them occaſions to perſecute the Puritans. This was to injoin moſt rigorouſly the obſervance of certain practiſes, which moſt people regarded as indifferent: nay, they ſubjoined diverſe innovations, which offended not only the Preſbyterians, but alſo many of the church of England. This produced great murmurs: but people were not ſatisfied with complaining, they openly diſobeyed, and their diſobedience afforded a pretenſe to puniſhment. Hereby the biſhops, who were the chief authors of theſe innovations, rendered themſelves ſo odious, that many believed there was juſt reaſon to ſuſpect a deſign to reſtore the Romiſh creed, ſince the eſtabliſhment of theſe innovations was ſo ardently purſued, which ſeemed to tend only to draw the church of England nearer to that of Rome. If to this diſcontent be added that occaſioned by King Charles's adminiſtration, with regard to the peoples liberties and parliamentary privileges, it will not be difficult to conceive, that the nation in general was extremely diſſatisfied.

Tho' in this laſt parliament there were many Preſbyterians, for the above mentioned reaſon, they were not however ſtrong enough to form a party capable of oppoſing that of the church, had they at firſt diſcovered their intentions; ſo, it may be affirmed that, in general, the deſign of this parliament, when they met, was not to overthrow the church of England, and eſtabliſh Preſbytery in its room; tho' it can ſcarce be doubted this was the private aim of the Preſbyterians: but, as their number was too ſmall to oppoſe all the other members, they reſolved to join with that party which oppoſed the King for procuring a redreſs of grievances. Among thoſe grievances, ſome concerned religion, as thoſe innovations which offended the Church-men no leſs than the Preſbyterians themſelves. Upon this ſubject, theſe latter ſcrupled not declaiming ſtrenuouſly whenſoever occaſion offered, and repreſenting theſe grievances as being of very dangerous conſequence. This they could do without diſcovering themſelves too openly, becauſe, as I obſerved, moſt of the members of parliament were already prejudiced againſt the prelates innovations and their whole conduct. As King Charles was exceſſively zealous for the church of England, and of the number of thoſe who conſidered the innovations and ſome other trifles as neceſſary to the ſolemnity of the public worſhip, he oppoſed their ſuppreſſion as much as poſſible, not directly, but by means of the biſhops, Popiſh lords, and others of his party: wherefore the Preſbyterians indeavored to convince all the reſt of the contrary party, that as long as biſhops ſat in the houſe of lords, it would be in a manner impoſſible

to attain a full redreſs of grievances. The houſe of commons perſiſted therefore in ſo ordering matters, that the biſhops votes ſhould be ſilenced, wherein they met with great obſtacles: but finally, by means of the tumults, they frightened them away, and induced them to preſent the proteſtation, which occaſioned the ordering twelve of them to the Tower. By this ſame means, the Popiſh lords were alſo conſtrained to abſent themſelves from the parliament. From that time the royal party became very feeble, and the Preſbyterians acquired freſh vigor.

Afterwards, the Preſbyterian faction, having gained ſo much ground, ſedulouſly applied themſelves to cheriſh the diſſenſion between King and parliament. They it was who got paſſed the remonſtrance of the kingdom's ſtate and condition, which was preſented to Charles at his return from Scotland, and was as the ſignal of this rupture. Unhappily, there was in the Preſbyterian party another claſs of men, who concealed themſelves, and were afterwards known by the name of Independents. This party, as they could not accompliſh their ſecret deſigns without diſorder and confuſion, affected a rigid Preſbyterianiſm, and ſtrove to carry matters to extremities, under color of maintaining Preſbytery, tho' in reality their intention was to deſtroy it, as well as the church of England.

Mean while his Majeſty, withdrawing to York, and perceiving a war unavoidable, ſent private notice to all whom he thought his friends in both houſes, to leave the parliament and repair to York, or elſewhere. Many obeyed, and by their retreat the Preſbyterian party became ſuperior in the two houſes. Before that time, when any thing was moved by the Preſbyterians, tending to the ſubverſion of the church of England, thoſe who had any regard for the church failed not oppoſing it, and of this number were all King Charles's friends; but, ſoon as theſe were retired, the Preſbyterian party, by their ſuperiority in both houſes, paſſed whatever they pleaſed: this is what Charles obſerved in ſeveral paſſages of his anſwer. Thus, the Preſbyterian faction prevailed in both houſes, and ſecretly intended to alter church-government; but the thing being impracticable, ſo long as Charles ſhould preſerve his powet, it is evident that, according to this project, it greatly imported the parliament, which was directed by the Preſbyterians, carefully to avoid whatever tended towards accommodation, which would have diſconcerted all their meaſures: but they took care not to diſcover too plainly their deſigns, it not being yet time, 'till they had put it out of this Prince's power to prevent the execution. So, notwithſtanding they rendered as plauſible as they were able their fears and jealouſies of his Majeſty, and tho' it ſhould be granted they had reaſon to fear and be jealous, there is however room for a preſumption, that the danger they repreſented as ſo very imminent, was not ſo real as they pretended. Their grand aim was to induce Charles to begin the rupture; and herein that Monarch ſeems not to have ſoon enough perceived the ſnare which was laid for him.

With regard to King Charles, it is not any way poſſible to know preciſely his ſecret motives and intentions, becauſe, ſince opening this parliament, it had not ever been in his power to ſhew them evidently, by any effects. It is true, he gave his aſſent to diverſe bills very advantageous to the people, and thereby ſeemed to expreſs ſome ſort of reluctance for his former conduct: but his ſituation, when he paſſed theſe acts, made it ſomewhat dubious, whether he ſincerely conſented to the redreſs of grievances, or whether it was only to accommodate himſelf to the times. He aſſured, that his future intention was to govern according to law, and called God to witneſs his ſincerity: but people would not rely on his aſſeverations. Thus much is certain, that whatever he ſaid, or did, in favor of the laws, was little conformable to the maxims he had followed for fifteen years. If any were perſuaded, that his promiſes and proteſtations were ſufficient for the nation's ſecurity, others were of opinion there was juſt cauſe to queſtion their ſincerity, becauſe they came at a time when he had no other refuge than the laws to ſupport himſelf, nor other means than his promiſe to obſerve them, to prevent a general defection of the whole nation. I ſhall not pretend to decide ſo difficult a quere, which is not within human reach, God alone knowing intirely what paſſes in the heart. I count it a temerity to aver King Charles not to have been ſincere in his promiſes: but I likewiſe believe his ſincerity may be doubted, ſince he had never opportunity to demonſtrate it by effects.

Charles I An' 1642.

Whatſoever was this Prince's private intention, he plainly perceived that of the prevailing party in this parliament, and ſaw that force alone could deliver him from his danger. His propoſals for agreement were rejected, and his promiſes to keep the laws thenceforwards conſidered as ſo many ſnares; and, unfortunately for him, he had given but too much cauſe for diſtruſt. He could not diſown it, with reſpect to what had paſſed before this parliament; and, even during this parliament, he had taken certain ſteps which his adverſaries well knew how to turn to their advantage. Such was the attempt to ſeduce the army, wherein very poſſibly he was concerned, tho' he could ſafely affirm, he knew of no reſolution to bring up the army to London. Such was the accuſation of the ſix members of parliament, which could not but create a ſuſpicion of ſome hidden deſign. His project to ſecure Hull; his withdrawing to York; the Queen's voyage into Holland, the motive whereof was at length diſcovered, were matters which helped not to cure the peoples ſuſpicions. So both houſes, firmly keeping to the occaſions of jealouſy, fear and diſtruſt which they had, or pretended to have of his Majeſty, made uſe of them to convince the people, there was no depending on his promiſes, except it was put out of his power to break them. This occaſioned the militia affair, on account of which King Charles was drawn into a ſtreight whence he could not extricate himſelf: for by granting the militia, he would himſelf have been ſubſervient to the execution of the parliament's deſigns; and, by refuſing it, he gave occaſion to ſay, he was willing to agree with both houſes, without giving them other ſecurity than his word, which, as they pretended, could not be relied on. It is likewiſe certain that he would not recede from any of his rights, neither would he offer other aſſurance than his bare word to ſatisfy the parliament.

After what has been advanced, it will not be hard to comprehend the riſe of this breach, and the difficulties of any accommodation. That concerning eccleſiaſtical government was one of the principal, tho' it may not be clearly explained in the manifeſtoes of both parties. Had Charles's own intereſts been ſolely in queſtion, perhaps he would have agreed to ſome conceſſions, at leaſt for a time. But he found, that one chief reaſon of his enemies deſiring to contract his power was, the more eaſily to accompliſh a change in church-diſcipline, which he thought himſelf bound in conſcience to oppoſe, to the utmoſt of his ability. He was ſo ſincerely and ſo firmly attached to the church of England, that he looked on any condeſcenſion which might tend to its deſtruction, as the moſt atrocious crime he could be guilty of, and perſiſted in this ſentiment even when his affairs were become quite deſperate. All his counſellors were of the ſame principles. They believed the epiſcopal government of the church church ſo abſolutely neceſſary, that, according to them, a church without prelates was no true church. On the other hand, the Preſbyterians were no leſs poſſeſſed with their notions, and, without diſtinguiſhing what is eſſential in religion from what is only external, they conſidered the uſages and practiſes of the church of England as a ſpecies of Popery. Beſide, they were ſo convinced of King Charles's hatred to them, that they could not believe themſelves ſafe ſo long as it was in his power to oppreſs them. Matters ſtanding thus, it is evident, that force alone was capable of obliging one or other party to ſubmit.

The earl of Briſtol in vain propoſes ſome accommodation, May 20. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 714.

A war being ſcarce avoidable, the earl of Briſtol, tho' he had no great reaſon to be ſatisfied with King Charles, made his laſt effort to procure ſome wholeſome accommodation, by a ſpeech in the houſe of peers. He repreſented, that the thing was not impoſſible, if ſincerely indeavored. After having enumerated all the miſchiefs of a civil war, and the calamities wherewith it is uſually attended, he moved to appoint a ſelect commitee of both houſes, truly to ſtate all the differences between his Majeſty and the parliament, with the moſt probable ways of reconciling them; what the King ought to do to ſatisfy his people, and what ſecurity he ſhould give. He added ſundry other particulars, which manifeſtly ſhewed, he inclined to the King's ſide; and becauſe withal he mentioned religion but very ſlightly, and in general terms, his arguments produced not any great effect.

That, or the next day, the commons voted:

Votes of the commons. p. 717. Clarendon, p. 418.

" 1. That it appeared, that the King, ſeduced " by wicked counſels, intended to make war " againſt the parliament, who, in all their conſultations and actions, had propoſed no other end " unto themſelves, but the care of his kingdoms, " and the performance of all duty and loyalty to " his perſon.

" 2. That whenſoever the King made war upon " the parliament, it would be a breach of the truſt " repoſed in him by his people, contrary to his " oath, and tending to the diſſolution of the government.

" 3. That whoſoever ſhould ſerve or aſſiſt him " in ſuch wars, would be traitors by the fundamental laws of the kingdom; and had been ſo " adjudged by two acts of parliament, and " ought to ſuffer as traitors: 11 Richard II. " 1 Henry IV." (1)

Charles has the great ſeal ſent him. Ib. p. 713. Clarendon, p. 442, &c.

May the twenty-ſecond, lord-keeper Littleton delivered the great ſeal to be carried to his Majeſty, and followed it himſelf next morning, before the parliament had thereof any notice.

The parliament petition him to diſband his forces. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 719.

The twenty-third, both houſes ſent the King a petition, deſiring him to diſband ſuch cavalry and infantry as he had levied, under color of a guard for his perſon. They told him, if he diſmiſſed not theſe forces, they ſhould be obliged to preſerve the kingdom's peace by the propereſt means. Charles returned a very ſharp anſwer to this petition, reproaching both houſes, that they had raiſed a guard for themſelves, and ordered the ſheriffs to oppoſe, with the power of the counties, ſuch as ſhould be drawn together by the King's command (2).

May 23. The King's anſwer. p. 720. Clarendon, p. 418.

A war, as I ſaid, was reſolved on both ſides; but each ſtill proceeded with ſome caution, in order to caſt the blame on the adverſe party: for in a civil war, it is chiefly the people who are wanted, becauſe in them lies the ſtrength of both factions. The earl of Briſtol, in his ſpeech to their lordſhips, May twenty, obſerved, that it was not impoſſible to propound and ſetle the differences between King and parliament; but that the great difficulty conſiſted in finding ſuch ſecurity, as might ſtand with his Majeſty's honor, and the peoples ſatisfaction. He chiefly inſiſted that, the King offering to give reaſonable ſecurity, they were not to reject his offer, and charge themſelves with the events of a war. As this offer, tho' made in general terms, appeared plauſible, the parliament apprehended it might make ſome impreſſion on the public; and therefore, they judged it neceſſary to ſhew that the King, by his general offer, did however offer only his word for ſecurity, which could not be a firm foundation of a good agreement. To this end, they ſent him, the ſecond of June, nineteen propoſitions, which they conſidered as proper to eſtabliſh a good peace, and ſtrict union between the Sovereign and his parliament. The propoſitions were theſe:

CHARLES I An' 1642.

Nineteen propoſitions ſent his Majeſty by the parliament. June 2. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 722. Clarendon, P. 493, &c.

" 1. That the lords, and others of your Ma- " jeſty's privy-council, and ſuch great officers and " miniſters of ſtate, either at home or beyond the " ſeas, may be put from your privy-council, and " from thoſe offices and imployments, excepting " ſuch as ſhall be approved of by both houſes of " parliament; and that the perſons put into the " places and imployments of thoſe who are removed, may be approved of by both houſes of " parliament; and that the privy-council ſhall " take an oath for the due execution of their places, " in ſuch forms as ſhall be agreed upon by both " houſes of parliament.

" 2. That the great affairs of this kingdom may " not be concluded or tranſacted by the advice of " private men, or by any unknown or unſworn " counſellors, but that ſuch matters as concern the " public, and are proper for the high court of parliament, which is your Majeſty's great and ſupreme council, may be debated, reſolved and " tranſacted only in parliament, and not elſewhere: " and ſuch as ſhall preſume to do any thing to " the contrary, ſhall be reſerved to the cenſure and " judgment of parliament. And ſuch other matters " of ſtate, as are proper for your Majeſty's privy-council, ſhall be debated and concluded by ſuch " of the nobility, and others, as ſhall from time " to time be choſen for that place, by approbation " of both houſes of parliament: and that no " public act concerning the affairs of the kingdom, " which are proper for your privy-council, may " be eſteemed of any validity, as proceeding from " the royal authority, unleſs it be done by the " advice and conſent of the major part of the " council, atteſted under their hands; and that " your council may be limited to a certain number, not exceeding five and twenty, nor under " fifteen. And if any counſellor's place happens " to be void in the interval of parliament, it ſhall " not be ſupplied without the aſſent of the major " part of the council; which choice ſhall be confirmed at the next ſiting of parliament, or elſe " to be void.

" 3. " part of the council, in ſuch manner as is before " expreſſed in the choice of counſellors.

" 4. That he or they, unto whom the go- " vernment and education of the King's chil- " dren ſhall be commited, ſhall be approved " of by both houſes of parliament; and, in " the intervals of parliament, by the aſſent of " the major part of the council, in ſuch manner " as is before expreſſed in the choice of counſellors; " and that all ſuch ſervants as are now about them, " againſt whom both houſes ſhall have any juſt " exceptions, ſhall be removed.

" 5. That no marriage ſhall be concluded, or " treated for any of the King's children, with any " foreign Prince, or other perſon whatſoever, " abroad or at home, without the conſent of par- " liament, under the penalty of a Præmunire upon " ſuch as ſhall conclude, or treat of any marriage " as aforeſaid; and that the ſaid penalty ſhall not " be pardoned, or diſpenſed with, but by the con- " ſent of both houſes of parliament.

" 6. That the laws in force againſt Jeſuits, " prieſts and Popiſh recuſants be ſtrictly put in " execution, without any toleration or diſpenſation " to the contrary; and that ſome more effectual " courſe may be inacted, by authority of parlia- " ment, to diſable them from making any diſtur- " bance in the ſtate, or eluding the law by truſts, " or otherwiſe.

" 7. That the votes of Popiſh lords in the houſe " of peers may be taken away, ſo long as they con- " tinue Papiſts; and that your Majeſty will conſent " to ſuch a bill as ſhall be drawn, for the education " of the children of Papiſts by Proteſtants, in the " Proteſtant religion.

" 8. That your Majeſty will be pleaſed to con- " ſent, that ſuch a reformation be made of the " church-government, and liturgy, as both houſes " of parliament ſhall adviſe; wherein they intend " to have conſultations with divines, as is expreſſed " in their declaration to that purpoſe; and that " your Majeſty will contribute your beſt aſſiſtance " to them, for the raiſing of a ſufficient mainte- " nance for preaching miniſters thro' the kingdom; " and that your Majeſty will be pleaſed to give " your conſent to laws for the taking away inno- " vations, ſuperſtition and pluralities, and againſt " ſcandalous miniſters.

" 9. That your Majeſty will be pleaſed to reſt " ſatisfied with that courſe which the lords and " commons have appointed for ordering the mi- " litia, until the ſame ſhall be farther ſetled by a " bill, and that your Majeſty will recal your " declarations and proclamations againſt the or- " dinance made by the lords and commons con- " cerning it.

" 10. That ſuch members, of either houſe of " parliament, as have, during the preſent parlia- " ment, been put out of any place or office, may " either be reſtored to that place and office, or " otherwiſe have ſatisfaction made for the ſame, " upon the petition of that houſe whereof he or they " are members.

" 11. That all privy-counſellors and judges may " take an oath, the form whereof to be agreed on " and ſetled by act of parliament, for maintaining " the petition of right, and of certain ſtatutes made " by the parliament, which ſhall be mentioned by " both houſes of parliament; and that inquiry of " all the breaches and violations of thoſe laws may " be given in charge, by the juſtices of the King's- " Bench every term, and by the judges of aſſize in " their circuits, and juſtices of the peace at the ſeſ- " ſions, to be preſented and puniſhed according " to law.

" 12. That all the judges, and all the officers " placed by approbation of both houſes of par- " liament, may hold their places, 'Quamdiu bene " ſe geſſerint.'

Charles I An' 1642.

" 13. That the juſtice of parliament may paſs " upon all delinquents, whether they be within the " kingdom, or fled out of it; and that all perſons " cited by either houſe of parliament may appear, " and abide the cenſure of parliament.

" 14. That the general pardon offered by " your Majeſty may be granted, with ſuch except- " tions as ſhall be adviſed by both houſes of par- " liament.

" 15 That the forts and caſtles of this king- " dom may be put under the command and cu- " ſtody of ſuch perſons as your Majeſty ſhall ap- " point, with the approbation of your parliament; " and in the intervals of parliament, with the ap- " probation of the major part of the council, in " ſuch manner as is before expreſſed in the choice " of counſellors.

" 16. That the extraordinary guards, and mi- " litary forces now attending your Majeſty, may " be removed and diſcharged; and that for the " future you will raiſe no ſuch guards or extraordi- " nary forces, but according to the law, in caſe " of actual rebellion or invaſion.

" 17. That your Majeſty will be pleaſed to " enter into a more ſtrict alliance with the ſtates " of the United Provinces, and other neighbor " Princes and ſtates of the Proteſtant religion, for " the defenſe and maintainance thereof againſt all " deſigns and attempts of the Pope and his adhe- " rents to ſubvert and ſuppreſs it, whereby your " Majeſty will obtain a great acceſs of ſtrength " and reputation, and your ſubjects be much in- " couraged and inabled, in a parliamentary way, " for your aid and aſſiſtance, in reſtoring your " royal ſiſter and her princely iſſue to thoſe digni- " ties and dominions which belong unto them, and " relieving the other Proteſtant Princes who have " ſuffered in the ſame cauſe.

" 18. That your Majeſty will be pleaſed, by " act of parliament, to clear lord Kimbolton, and " the five members of the houſe of commons, in " ſuch manner, that future parliaments may be " ſecured from the conſequence of that evil pre- " cedent.

" 19. That your Majeſty will graciouſly be " pleaſed to paſs a bill, for reſtraining peers made " hereafter from ſiting or voting in parliament, " unleſs they be admited thereunto with the conſent " of both houſes of parliament.

" And theſe our humble deſires being granted " by your Majeſty, we ſhall forthwith apply our- " ſelves to regulate your preſent revenue, in ſuch " ſort as may be for your beſt advantage; and " likewiſe to ſetle ſuch an ordinary and conſtant " increaſe of it, as ſhall be ſufficient to ſupport " your royal dignity in honor and plenty, beyond " the proportion of any former grants of the ſub- " jects of this kingdom to your Majeſty's royal " predeceſſors. We ſhall likewiſe put the town " of Hull into ſuch hands as your Majeſty ſhall " appoint, with the conſent and approbation of " parliament, and deliver up a juſt account of all " the magazine; and chearfully imploy the utter- " moſt of our power and indeavors in the real " expreſſion and performance of our moſt duti- " ful and loyal affections, to the preſerving and " maintaining the royal honor, greatneſs and " ſafety of your Majeſty and your poſterity."

To theſe propoſitions King Charles returned a long anſwer, and that with ſuch prolix periods, and ſo frequent parentheſes that it is no eaſy taſk to tranſlate it, without loſing ſomething of its force.

CHARLES I AN' 1642.

Rushworth, Vol. IV. p. 725. Clarendon, p. 498, &c.

The King's answer to the nineteen propositions.

"BEfore we shall give you our answer to your petition and propositions, we shall tell you, that we are now clearly satisfied, why the method which we traced out to you, by our message of the twentieth of January, and have since so often pressed upon you, as the proper way to compose the distractions of this kingdom, and render it truly happy, hath been hitherto declined, and is at length not thought fit to be looked upon. We now see plainly (and desire that you and all other our good subjects should do so too) that the cabalists of this business have, with great prudence, reserved themselves, until due preparations should be made for their design. If they had unseasonably vented such propositions, as the wisdom and modesty of your predecessors never thought fit to offer to any of our progenitors; nor we, in honor or regard to our regal authority (which God hath intrusted us with for the good of our people) could receive without just indignation (and such many of your present propositions are) their hopes would soon have been blasted, and those persons, to whom offices, honors, power and commands were designed, by such ill-timing of their business, would have failed of their expectation, not without a brand upon the attempt. Therefore, before any thing of this nature should appear, they have (certainly, with great wisdom in the conduct of it) thought fit to remove a troublesome rub in their way, the law; to this end (that they might undermine the very foundations of it) a new power hath been assumed to interpret and declare laws, without us, by extemporary votes, without any case judicially before either house (which is in effect the same thing as to make laws without us) orders and ordinances made only by both houses (tending to a pure arbitrary power) were pressed upon the people as laws, and their obedience required to them.

"Their next step was, to erect an upstart authority, without us (in whom, and only in whom the laws of this realm have placed that power) to command the militia, very considerable to this their design. In farther order to it, they have wrested from us our magazine and town of Hull, and abeted sir John Hotham in his bold-faced treason. They have prepared, and directed to the people unprecedented invectives against our government, thereby (as much as lay in their power) to weaken our just authority and due esteem among them; they have, as injuriously as presumptuously (tho' we conceive by this time, impudence itself is ashamed of it) attempted to cast upon us aspersions of an unheard-of nature, as if we had favored a rebellion in our own bowels. They have likewise broached a new doctrine, that we are obliged to pass all laws which shall be offered to us by both houses (howsoever our own judgment and conscience shall be unsatisfied with them) a point of policy as proper for their present business, as destructive to all our rights of parliament, and so, with strange shamelessness, will forget a clause in law still in force, made in the second year of King Henry V, wherein both houses of parliament do acknowledge, that it is of the King's regality to grant or deny such of their petitions as pleaseth himself. They have interpreted our necessary guard, legally assembled for the defense of us and our children's persons against a traitor in open rebellion against us (1), to be with intent to levy war against the parliament (the thought whereof our very soul abhoreth) thereby to render us odious to our people. CHARLES I AN' 1642.

"They have so awed our good subjects with pursevants, long chargeable attendances, heavy censures, and illegal imprisonments, that few of them durst offer to present their tenderness of our sufferings, their own just grievances, and their sense of those violations of the law (the birthright of every subject in this kingdom) tho' in an humble petition directed to both houses; and if any did, it was stifled in the birth, called sedition, and burned by the common hangman.

"They have restrained the attendance of our ordinary and necessary household servants (2), and seized upon those small sums of money, which our credit had provided to buy us bread, with injunctions that none should be suffered to be conveyed, or returned to us to York, or any of our peers or servants with us; so that, in effect, they have blocked us up in that county.

"They have filled the ears of the people with the noise of fears and jealousies (tho' taken up upon trust) tales of skippers, salt-fleets, and such like, by which alarms they might prepare them to receive such impressions as might best advance this design, when it should be ripe. And now it seems they think we are sufficiently prepared for these bitter pills. We are in a handsome posture to receive these humble desires (which probably are intended to make way for a superfetation of a yet lighter nature, if we had not made this discovery to you) for they do not tell us this is all. In them we must observe, that these contrivers, the better to advance their true ends, disguised as much as they could their intents with a mixture of some things really to be approved by every honest man, others specious and popular, and some which are already granted by us; all which are cunningly twisted and mixed with those other things of their main design of ambition and private interest, in hope that, at the first view, every eye may not so clearly discern them in their proper colors.

"We would not be understood, that we intend to fix this design upon both or either house of parliament. We utterly profess against it; being most confident of the loyalty, good affection and integrity of the intentions of that great body; and knowing well, that very many of both houses were absent, and many dissented from all those particulars we complain of: but we do believe, and accordingly profess to all the world, that the malignity of this design (as dangerous to the laws of this kingdom, the peace of the same, and the liberties of all our good subjects, as to ourself and our just prerogative) hath proceeded from the subtil informations, mischievous practises and evil counsels of ambitious, turbulent spirits, disaffected to God's true religion, and the unity of the professors thereof, our honor and safety, and the public peace and prosperity of our people, not without a strong influence upon the very actions of both houses. But how faulty soever others are, we shall, with God's assistance, indeavor to discharge our duty with uprightness of heart; and therefore, since these propositions come to us in the name of both houses of parliament, we shall take a more particular notice of every of them.

"If the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, nineth, tenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, nineteenth demands, had been writ and printed in a tongue unknown to us and our people, it might have been possible we and they might have charitably believed the propositions to be such, as might have been

" in order to the ends pretended in the petition, " to wit, the eſtabliſhing of our honor and ſafety, " the welfare and ſecurity of our ſubjects and domi- " nions, and the removing thoſe jealouſies and " differences which are ſaid to have unhappily " fallen betwixt us and our people, and procuring " both us and them a conſtant courſe of honor, " peace and happineſs: but being read and under- " ſtood by all, we cannot but aſſure ourſelf, that " this profeſſion, joined to theſe propoſitions, will " rather appear a mockery and a ſcorn, the demands " being ſuch as tho' we were unworthy of the " truſt repoſed in us by the law, and of our deſcent " from ſo many great and famous anceſtors, if we " could be brought to abandon that power which " only can inable us to perform what we are ſworn " to, in protecting our people and the laws, and " ſo aſſume others into it, as to diveſt ourſelf of " it, altho' not only our preſent condition (which " it can hardly be) were more neceſſitous that it is, " and we were both vanquiſhed, and a priſoner, " and in a worſe condition than ever the moſt un- " fortunate of our predeceſſors have been reduced " to, by the moſt criminal of their ſubjects. And " tho' the bait laid to draw us to it, and to keep " our ſubjects from indignation at the mention of " it, the promiſes of a plentiful and unparalleled " revenue were reduced from generals, which ſig- " nify nothing, to clear and certain particulars; " ſince ſuch a bargain would have but too great " a reſemblance of that of Eſau's, if we ſhould " part with ſuch flowers of a crown, as are worth " all the reſt of the garland, and have been tranſ- " mited to us from ſo many anceſtors, and have " been found ſo uſeful and neceſſary for the well- " fare and ſecurity of our ſubjects, for any preſent " neceſſity, or for any low and ſordid conſiderations " of wealth and gain. And therefore, all men " knowing that thoſe accommodations are moſt " eaſily made, and moſt exactly obſerved, which " are grounded upon reaſonable and equal condi- " tions, we have great cauſe to believe, that the " contrivers of theſe had no intention of ſetling " any firm accommodation, but to increaſe thoſe " jealouſies, and widen that diviſion, which (not " by our fault) is now unhappily fallen between us " and both houſes.

" It is aſked, that all the lords and others of our " privy-council, and ſuch (we know not what you " mean by ſuch, but we have cauſe to think you " mean all) great officers and miniſters of ſtate, " either at home or beyond the ſeas (for care is " taken to leave out no perſon or place, that our " diſhonor may be ſure not to be bounded within " this kingdom, tho' no ſubtil inſinuations at ſuch " a diſtance can probably be believed to have been " the cauſe of our diſtractions and danger) ſhould " be put from our privy-council, and from thoſe " offices and imployments, unleſs they be approv- " ed by both houſes of parliament, how faithful " ſoever we have found them to us and the public " and how far ſoever they have been from offend- " ing againſt any law, the only rule they had, or " any others ought to have, to walk by. We " therefore, to this part of that demand, return " you this anſwer; that we are willing to grant, " that they ſhall take a larger oath than yourſelves " deſire, in your eleventh demand, for maintain- " ing, not of any part, but of the whole law. (1)

REMARK (1) This is ſaid, becauſe in the whole body of the law were contained thoſe laws which aſcribed to his Majeſty thoſe prerogatives they wanted to deprive him of.

" And we have and do aſſure you, that we will " be careful to make election of ſuch perſons in " thoſe places of truſt, as ſhall have given good " teſtimony of their abilities and integrities, and " againſt whom there can be no juſt cauſe of ex- " ception, whereon reaſonably to ground a diffi- " dence; that if we have or ſhall be miſtaken in " our election, we have and do aſſure you, that " there is no man ſo near to us, in place or af- " fection, whom we will not leave to the juſtice " of the law, if you ſhall bring a particular charge " and ſufficient proofs againſt him; and that we " have given you (the beſt pledge of the effects of " ſuch a promiſe on our part, and the beſt ſecurity " for the performance of their duty on theirs) a " triennial parliament, the apprehenſion of whoſe " juſtice will, in all probability, make them wary " how they provoke it, and us wary how we " charge ſuch as, by the diſcovery of their faults, " may, in any degree, ſeem to diſcredit our elec- " tion; but that, without any ſhadow of a fault " objected, only perhaps becauſe they follow their " conſciences, and preſerve the eſtabliſhed laws, " and agree not in ſuch votes, or aſſent not unto " ſuch bills, as ſome perſons, who have now too " great influence even upon both houſes, judge, or " ſeem to judge to be for the public good, and as " are agreeable to that new Utopia of religion and " government, into which they indeavor to tranſ- " form this kingdom (2).

" REMARK (2) This alludes to ſir Thomas " More's Utopia.

" For we remember what names, and for " what reaſons, you left out in the bill offer- " ed us concerning the militia, which you " had yourſelves recommended in the ordinance. " We will never conſent to the diſplacing of any " whom, for their former merits from, and affec- " tion to us and the public, we have intruſted; " ſince we conceive, that to do ſo would take " away both from the affection of our ſervants " the care of our ſervice, and the honor of our " juſtice; and we the more wonder it ſhould be " aſked by you of us, ſince it appears, by the " twelfth demand, that you yourſelves count it " reaſonable, after the preſent turn is ſerved, that " the judges and officers who are then placed " may hold their places 'Quamdiu ſe bene geſ- " ſerint;' and we are reſolved to be as careful of " thoſe we have choſen, as you are of thoſe you " would chuſe, and to remove none 'till they ap- " pear to us to have otherwiſe behaved them- " ſelves, or ſhall be evicted by legal proceedings " to have done ſo.

" But this demand, as unreaſonable as it is, is " but one link of a great chain, and but the firſt " round of that ladder by which our juſt, ancient, " regal power is indeavored to be fetched down " to the ground. For it appears plainly, that it " is not with the perſons now choſen, but with " our chuſing, that you are diſpleaſed; for you " demand, that the perſons put into the places " and imployments of thoſe who ſhall be removed, " may be approved by both houſes; which " is ſo far (as to ſome at firſt ſight it may ap- " pear) from being leſs than the power of nomi- " nation, that of two things (of which we will " never grant either) we would ſooner be content, " that you ſhould nominate and we approve, than " you approve and we nominate; the mere no- " mination being ſo far from being any thing, that " if we would do no more, we could never take " the pains to do that, when we ſhould only hazard " thoſe whom we eſteemed to the ſcorn of a refu- " ſal, if they happened not to be agreeable, not on- " ly to the judgment but to the paſſion, intereſt, or " humor of the preſent major part of either houſe.

" Not to ſpeak now of the great factions, " animoſities and diviſions which this power would " introduce in both houſes, between both houſes, " and in the ſeveral counties, for the choice of

" perſons

" perſons to be ſent to that place where that " power was, and between thoſe perſons who " were ſo choſen. Neither is this ſtrange po- " tion preſcribed to us only for once, for the cure " of a preſent preſſing, deſperate diſeaſe, but for " a diet to us and our poſterity: it is demanded, " that our counſellors, all chief officers both of " law and ſtate, commanders of forts and caſtles, " and all peers hereafter made (as to voting, with- " out which how little is the reſt?) be approved of " (that is choſen) by them, from time to time; " and rather than it ſhould ever be left to the " crown (to whom it doth and ſhall belong) if " any place fall void in the intermiſſion of parlia- " ment, the major part of the approved council is " to approve them; neither is it only demanded " that we ſhould quit the power and right our " predeceſſors have had, of appointing perſons in " theſe places, but for counſellors we are to be re- " ſtrained, as well in the number as in the perſons, " and a power muſt be annexed to theſe places, " which their predeceſſors had not; and indeed, " if this power was paſſed to them, it were not " fit we ſhould be truſted to chuſe thoſe who were " to be truſted as much as we.

" It is demanded, that ſuch matters as concern " the public, and are proper for the high court of " parliament (which is our great and ſupreme " council) may be debated, reſolved and tranſ- " acted only in parliament, and not elſewhere; " and ſuch as preſume to do any thing to the " contrary, ſhall be reſerved to the cenſure and " judgment of the parliament; and ſuch other " matters of ſtate, as are proper for our privy-coun- " cil, ſhall be debated and concluded, by ſuch of " our nobility (tho' indeed if, being made by us, " they may not vote without the conſent of both " houſes, we are rather to call them your nobility) " and others, as ſhall be from time to time choſen " for that place, by approbation of both houſes of " parliament; and that no public act concerning the " affairs of the kingdom, which are proper for " our privy-council, may be eſteemed of any vali- " dity, as proceeding from the royal authority, " unleſs it be done by the advice and conſent of the " major part of our council, atteſted under their " hands; which demands were of that nature, that " to grant them were, in effect, at once to depoſe " both ourſelf, and our poſterity.

" Theſe being paſſed, we may be waited on " bare-headed, we may have our hand kiſſed, the " ſtile of Majeſty continued to us, and the King's " authority, declared by both houſes of parliament, " may be ſtill the ſtile of your commands; we " may have ſwords and maces carried before us, " and pleaſe ourſelf with the ſight of a crown " and ſcepter; and yet even theſe twigs would not " long flouriſh, when the ſtock upon which they " grew were dead: but as to true and real power, " we ſhould remain but the outſide, but the " picture, but the ſign of a King. We were ever " willing that our parliament ſhould debate, re- " ſolve and tranſact ſuch matters as are proper " for them, as far as they are proper for them; and " we heartily wiſh, that they would be as careful " not to extend their debates and reſolutions be- " yond what is proper to them, that multitudes of " things puniſhable, and cauſes determinable by the " ordinary judicatures may not be entertained in " parliament, and ſo cauſe a long, chargeable and " fruitleſs attendance of our people, and (by de- " grees) draw to you, as well all the cauſes as all " the faults of Weſtminſter-hall, and divert your " proper buſineſs: that the courſe of law be no " ways diverted, much leſs diſturbed, as was actu- " ally done by the ſtop of the proceedings " againſt a riot in Southwark, by order of the " houſe of commons, in a time ſo riotous and tu- " multuous, as much increaſed the danger of popu- " lar inſolencies by ſuch a countenance to riots, " and diſcountenance of law: that you deſcend " not to the leiſure of recommending lecturers to " churches, nor aſcend to the legiſlative power, by " commanding (the law not having yet com- " manded it) that they whom you recommend be " received, altho' neither the parſon nor biſhop do " approve of them; and that the refuſers (accord- " ing to the courſe ſo much formerly complained " of to have been uſed at the council-table) be not " ſent for to attend to ſhew cauſe at leaſt, that " you would conſider conveniency, if not law, " and recommend none but who are well known " to you to be orthodox, learned and moderate, " or at leaſt ſuch as have taken orders, and are " not notorious depravers of the book of com- " mon-prayer; a care which appeareth by the " diſcourſes, ſermons and perſons of ſome recom- " mended by you not to have been hitherto taken; " and it highly concerneth both you in duty, " and the common-wealth in the conſequences, " that it ſhould have been taken: that neither one " eſtate tranſact what is proper for two, nor two " what is proper for three; and conſequently, that " (contrary to our declared will) our forts may not " be ſeized, our arms may not be removed, our " monies may not be ſtoped, our legal directions " may not be countermanded by you, nor we de- " ſired to countermand them ourſelf; nor ſuch en- " trances made upon a real war againſt us, upon " pretenſe of an imaginary war againſt you, and a " chimera of neceſſity. So far do you paſs be- " yond your limits, while you ſeem, by your de- " mand, to be ſtrangely ſtraitened within them; " at leaſt, we could have wiſhed, you would have " expreſſed what matters you meaned as fit to be " tranſacted in parliament, and what you meaned " by only in parliament.

" You have of late been perſuaded, by the " new doctrine of ſome few, to think that proper " for your debates, which hath not uſed to be at " all debated within thoſe walls, but been truſted " wholly with our predeceſſors and us; and to " tranſact thoſe things which, without the regal " authority, ſince there were Kings of this king- " dom, were never tranſacted. It therefore con- " cerneth us the more that you ſpeak out, and " that both we and our people may either know " the bottom of your demands, or know them to " be bottomleſs. What concerneth more the pub- " lic, and is more (indeed) proper for the high- " court of parliament than the making of laws, " which not only ought there to be tranſacted, but " can be tranſacted no where elſe? But then you " muſt admit us to be a part of the parliament: " you muſt not (as the ſenſe is of this part of the " demand, if it hath any) deny the freedom of " our anſwer, when we have as much right to " reject what we think unreaſonable, as you have " to propoſe what you think convenient or neceſ- " ſary; nor is it poſſible our anſwers, either to " bills or any other propoſitions, ſhould be wholly " free, if we may not uſe the liberty of every one " of you, and of every ſubject, to receive ad- " vice (without their danger who ſhall give it) " from any perſon, known or unknown, ſworn or " unſworn, in theſe matters, in which the manage " of our vote is truſted, by the law, to our own " judgment and conſcience; which how beſt to in- " form, is (and ever ſhall be) left likewiſe to us: " and moſt unreaſonable it were, that two eſtates " propoſing ſomething to the third, that third " ſhould be bound to take no advice, whether it " were fit to paſs, but from thoſe two who did " propoſe it. We ſhall ever, in theſe things which

Charles I An' 1642.

" are truſted wholly to us by the law, not decline " to hearken to the advice of our great council, " and ſhall chuſe to hear willingly the free debates " of our privy-council (whenſoever we may be " ſuffered to have them for ſending for, and they " ſhall not be terrified from that freedom by votes, " and brands of malignants and enemies to the " ſtate, for adviſing what no law forbids to ad- " viſe) but we will retain our power of admiting " no more to any council than the nature of the " buſineſs requires, and of diſcourſing with whom we " pleaſe, of what we pleaſe, and informing our under- " ſtanding by debate with any perſons who may " be well able to inform and adviſe us in ſome " particulars, tho' their qualities, education, or " other abilities may not make them ſo fit to be " of our ſworn council; and not tie ourſelf up " to hear no more than twenty-five (and theſe " not choſen abſolutely by us) out of a kingdom " ſo repleniſhed with judicious and experienced " perſons of ſeveral kinds. And tho' we ſhall " (with the proportionable conſideration due to " them) always weigh the advices both of our " great and privy-council, yet we ſhall alſo look " upon their advices as advices, not as commands " or impoſitions; upon them as our counſellors, " not as our tutors and guardians; and upon our- " ſelf as their King, not as their pupil or ward: " for whatſoever of regality were, by the modeſty " of interpretation, left us, in the firſt part of the " ſecond demand, as to the parliament, is taken " from us in the ſecond part of the ſame, and " placed in this new-fangled kind of counſellors, " whoſe power is ſuch, and ſo expreſſed by it, that " in all public acts concerning the affairs of this " kingdom, which are proper for our privy-coun- " cil (for whoſe advice all public acts are ſome- " times proper, tho' never neceſſary) they are de- " ſired to be admited joint patentees with us in the " regality; and it is not plainly expreſſed, whether " they mean us ſo much as a ſingle vote in theſe " affairs; but it is plain, they mean us no more at " moſt than a ſingle vote in them, and no more " power than every one of the reſt of our privy- " counſellors only leave to us, out of their reſpect " and duty (and that only is left of our ancient " power) a choice, whether theſe who are thus to " be joined with (or rather ſet over) us, ſhall be " fifteen or twenty-five: and great care is taken, " that the oath which theſe men ſhall take, ſhall be " ſuch, in the framing the form of which (tho' " ſure we are not wholly unconcerned in it) we may " be wholly excluded, and that wholly reſerved to " be agreed upon by both houſes of parliament.

" And to ſhew that no more care is taken of " our ſafety, than of our power, after ſo great in- " dignities offered to us, and countenanced by thoſe " who were moſt obliged to reſent them: after our " town and fort kept from us (from which, if it " were no otherwiſe ours than the whole kingdom " is, we can no more legally be kept out, than out " of our whole kingdom, which ſure yourſelves " will not deny to be treaſon) our arms, our goods " ſent away, and our money ſtoped from us, our " guards (in which we have no other intention than " to hinder the end of theſe things from being pro- " portionable to their beginings) are not only " deſired to be diſmiſſed, before ſatisfaction for " the injury, puniſhment of the injurers, and care " taken for our future ſecurity from the like; but " it is likewiſe deſired (and for this, law is pre- " tended, and might as well have been for the reſt, " which yet, with ſome ingenuity, are it ſeems ac- " knowledged to be but deſires of grace) that we " ſhall not for the future raiſe any guards, or ex- " traordinary forces, but in caſe of actual rebellion " or invaſion; which if it had been law, and ſo " obſerved in the time of our predeceſſors, few of " thoſe victories, which have made theſe nations " famous in other parts, could have been legally " atchieved: nor could our bleſſed predeceſſor, " Queen Elizabeth, have ſo defended herſelf in " eighty-eight. And if no forces muſt be levied " 'till rebellions and invaſions (which will not ſtay " for the calling of parliaments, and their conſent " for raiſing of forces) be actual, they muſt un- " doubtedly (at leaſt moſt probably) be effectual " and prevalent.

Charles I An' 1642.

" And as neither care is taken for our rights, " honor nor ſafety, as a Prince, ſo our rights, as " a private perſon, are indeavored to be had from " us; it being aſked, that it may be unlawful and " and puniſhable not only to conclude, but even " to treat of any marriage with any perſon for our " own children, or to place governors about them, " without conſent of parliament; and in the inter- " miſſion of theſe, without the conſent of our good " lords of the council; that we may not only be " in a more deſpicable ſtate than any of our pre- " deceſſors, but in a meaner and viler condition " than the loweſt of our ſubjects, who value no " liberty they have more, than that of the free " education and marriage of their children, from " which we are aſked to debar ourſelf; and have the " more reaſon to take it ill that we are ſo, becauſe " of our choice of a governor for our ſon, and a " huſband for our daughter (in which the Prote- " ſtant religion was our principal conſideration) we " conceive we had reaſon to expect your preſent " thanks, and the increaſe of your future truſts.

" We ſuppoſe theſe demands, by this time, to ap- " pear ſuch as the demanders cannot be ſuppoſed " to have any ſuch real fear of us, as hath been " long pretended; they are too much in the ſtile " not only of equals, but of conquerors; and as " little to be intended for removing of jealouſies, " for which end they are ſaid to be aſked; and " that is not as merchants aſk at firſt, much more " than they will take, but as moſt neceſſary to " effect it (which if they be God help this poor " kingdom, and thoſe who are in the hands of ſuch " perſons, whoſe jealouſies nothing elſe will re- " move) which indeed is ſuch a way, as if, there " being differences and ſuits between two perſons, " whereof one would have from the other ſeveral " parcels of his ancient land, he ſhould propoſe to " him, by way of accommodation, that he would " quit to him all thoſe in queſtion, with the reſt " of his eſtate, as the moſt neceſſary and effectual " means to remove all thoſe ſuits and differences. " But we call God to witneſs that, as for our ſub- " jects ſake theſe rights are veſted in us, ſo for " their ſakes, as well as for our own, we are re- " ſolved not to quit them, nor to ſubvert (tho' " in a parliamentary way) the ancient, equal, " happy, well-poiſed, and never-enough com- " mended conſtitution of the government of this " kingdom; nor to make ourſelf, of a King of Eng- " land, a duke of Venice, and this, of a kingdom, " a republic.

" There being three kinds of government among " men, abſolute Monarchy, Ariſtocracy, and Demo- " cracy, and all theſe having their particular con- " veniencies and inconveniencies; the experience " and wiſdom of our anceſtors have ſo moulded " this, out of a mixture of theſe, as to give to " this kingdom (as far as human prudence can " provide) the conveniencies of all three, without " the inconveniencies of any one, as long as the " balance hangs even between the three eſtates, and " they run jointly on in their proper channel (beget- " ing verdure and fertilty in the meadows on both " ſides) and the overflowing of either, on either " ſide, raiſe no deluge or inundation. The ill of " abſolute

Charles I An' 1642.

" abſolute Monarchy, is tyranny; the ill of Ariſto-
" cracy, is faction and diviſion; the ills of Demo" cracy, are tumults, violence and licentiouſneſs.
" The good of Monarchy, is the uniting a nation
" under one head, to reſiſt invaſion from abroad,
" and inſurrection at home: the good of Ariſto-
" cracy, is the conjunction of counſel in the ableſt
" perſons of a ſtate, for the public benefit: the " good of Democracy, is liberty, and the courage
" and induſtry which liberty begets.

" In this kingdom, the laws are jointly made
" by a King, by a houſe of peers, and by a houſe
" of commons, choſen by the people, all having free
" votes and particular privileges. The government,
" according to theſe laws, is truſted to the King;
" power of treaties, of war and peace, of making
" peers, of chuſing officers and counſellors for ſtate,
" judges for law, commanders for forts and caſtles;
" giving commiſſions for raiſing men; to make war
" abroad, or to prevent or provide againſt inva-
" ſions or inſurrections at home; benefit of con-
" fiſcations, power of pardoning, and ſome more
" of the like kind, are placed in the King. And this " kind of regulated monarchy, having this power
" to preſerve that authority, without which it " would be diſabled to preſerve the laws in their
" force, and the ſubjects in their liberties and pro" perties, is intended to draw to him ſuch a reſpect
" and relation from the great ones, as may hinder
" the ills of diviſion and faction; and ſuch a fear
" and reverence from the people, as may hinder
" tumults, violence and licenciouſneſs.

" Again; that the Prince may not make uſe
" of this high and perpetual power to the hurt of
" thoſe for whoſe good he hath it, and make uſe
" of the name of public neceſſity, for the gain of " his private favorites and followers, to the detri" ment of his people, the houſe of commons (an " excellent conſerver of liberty, but never intended
" for any ſhare in government, or the chuſing of " them who ſhould govern) is ſolely intruſted
" with the firſt propoſitions, concerning the levies
" of monies (which are the ſinews as well of peace
" as of war) and the impeaching of thoſe who,
" for their own ends, tho' countenanced by any
" ſurreptitiouſly-gotten command of the King,
" have violated that law, which he is bound (when
" he knows it) to protect, and to the proſecution
" of which they were bound to adviſe him, at leaſt
" not to ſerve him in the contrary. And the lords
" being truſted with a judicatory power, are an ex" cellent ſcreen and bank between the Prince and
" people, to aſſiſt each againſt any incroachments
" of the other; and by juſt judgments to preſerve
" that law, which ought to be the rule of every " one of the three. For the better inabling them
" in this, beyond the examples of any of our an-
" ceſtors, we were willingly contented to oblige
" ourſelf, both to call a parliament every three " years, and not to diſſolve it in fifty days: and
" for the preſent exigent, the better to raiſe mo" ney, and to avoid the preſſure (no leſs grievous
" to us than them) our people muſt have ſuffered
" by a longer continuance of ſo vaſt a charge as
" two great armies, and for their greater certainty
" of having ſufficient time to remedy the incon-
" veniencies ariſen, during ſo long abſenſe of par-
" liaments, and for the puniſhment of the cauſers
" and miniſters of them; we yielded up our right
" of diſſolving this parliament; expecting an " extraordinary moderation from it, in grati" tude for ſo unexampled a grace, and little
" looking that any malignant party ſhould be
" incouraged, or inabled to have perſuaded
" them firſt, to countenance the injuſtices and " indignities, we have indured, and then, by a
" new way of ſatisfaction for what was taken
" from us, to demand of us at once to confirm
" what was ſo taken, and to give up almoſt all
" the reſt.

Charles I An' 1642.

" Since therefore the power, legally placed in " both houſes, is more than ſufficient to prevent " and reſtrain the power of tyranny; and with-
" out the power, which is now aſked from us,
" we ſhall not be able to diſcharge that truſt,
" which is the end of monarchy; ſince this would " be a total ſubverſion of the fundamental laws,
" and that excellent conſtitution of this kingdom,
" which hath made this nation, ſo many years,
" both famous and happy to a great degree of " envy; ſince, to the power of puniſhing (which " is already in your hands according to law) if the " power of prefering be added, we ſhall have no-
" thing left for us but to look on; ſince the in-
" croaching of one of theſe eſtates upon the power
" of the other, is unhappy in the effects both to " them and all the reſt; ſince this power, of at
" moſt a joint government in us with our counſel-
" lors (or rather our guardians) will return us
" to the worſt kind of minority, and make us
" deſpicable both at home and abroad, and beget
" eternal factions and diſſenſions (as deſtructive to " public happineſs as war) both in the choſen, and
" in the houſes which choſe them, and the people
" who choſe the chuſers; ſince ſo new a power
" will undoubtedly intoxicate perſons who were " not born to it, and beget not only diviſions
" among them as equals, but in them contempt of " us, as become an equal to them, and inſolence and
" injuſtice toward our people, and now ſo much
" their inferiors, which ſhall be the more grievous
" unto them, as ſuffering from thoſe who were
" ſo lately of a nearer degree to themſelves: and
" being to have redreſs only from thoſe who placed
" them; and fearing they may be inclined to pre-
" ſerve what they have made, both out of kind-
" neſs and policy, ſince all great changes are ex" tremely inconvenient, and almoſt infallibly be-
" get yet greater changes, which beget yet greater
" inconveniencies.

" Since as great a one in the church, muſt fol-
" low this of the kingdom; ſince the ſecond eſtate
" would in all probability follow the fate of the
" firſt, and, by ſome of the turbulent ſpirits, jea-
" louſies would ſoon be raiſed againſt them, and " the like propoſitions for reconciliation of differ" ences would be then ſent to them, as they now
" have joined to ſend to us, 'till (all power being
" veſted in the houſe of commons, and their num" ber making them incapable of tranſacting affairs
" of ſtate with the neceſſary ſervice and expe" dition, thoſe being retruſted to ſome cloſe
" commitee) at laſt the common people (who in " the mean time muſt be flattered, and to whom
" licenſe muſt be given in all their wild humors,
" how contrary ſoever to eſtabliſhed law, or their " own real good) diſcover this 'Arcanum Im-
" perii.' That all this was done by them, but not " for them; and grew weary of journey-work,
" and ſet up for themſelves; call parity and inde" pendence, liberty; devour that eſtate which had
" devoured the reſt; deſtroy all rights and proper" ties; all diſtinctions of families and merit; and
" by this means, this ſplendid and excellently-di-
" ſtinguiſhed form of government end in a dark
" equal chaos of confuſion, and the long line of " our many noble anceſtors, in a Jack Cade, or
" a Wat Tyler. *

" For all theſe reaſons, to all theſe demands
" our anſwer is, 'Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari:'
" But this we promiſe, that we will be as careful
" of preſerving the laws, in what is ſuppoſed to " concern wholly our ſubjects, as in what moſt
" concerns ourſelf: for indeed we profeſs to be" lieve,

* His Majeſty ſeems here to ſpeak with a true ſpirit of propheſy.

CHARLES I An' 1642.

" lieve, that the preſervation of every law concern-
" eth us; thoſe of obedience being not ſecure, when
" thoſe of protection are violated: and we being,
" moſt of any, injured in the leaſt violation of " that by which we injoy the higheſt rights and
" greateſt benefits, and are therefore obliged to " defend no leſs by our intereſt, than by our duty,
" and hope that no jealouſies to the contrary ſhall
" be any longer nouriſhed in any of our good peo" ple, by the ſubtil inſinuations, and ſecret prac-
" tiſes of men who, for private ends, are diſ-
" affected to our honor and ſafety, and the peace
" and proſperity of our people. And to ſhew you,
" that no juſt indignation at ſo reproachful offers
" ſhall make us refuſe to grant what is probable to " conduce to the good of our good people, be-
" cauſe of the ill company it comes in, we will
" ſearch carefully in this heap of unreaſonable de" mands, for ſo much as we may (complying with " our conſcience, and the duty of our truſt) aſſent
" unto, and ſhall accordingly agree to it.

" In purſuance of which ſearch, in the fourth
" propoſition, under a demand, which would take
" from us that truſt, which God, nature, and the " laws of the land have placed in us, and of which
" none of you could indure to be deprived, we " find ſomething to which we give this anſwer;
" that we have commited the principal places
" about our children to perſons of quality, inte" grity and piety, with ſpecial regard, that their " tender years might be ſo ſeaſoned with the prin" ciples of the true Proteſtant religion, as (by the " bleſſing of God upon this our care) this whole
" kingdom may in due time reap the fruits there-
" of: and, as we have been likewiſe very careful
" in the choice of ſervants about them, that none
" of them may be ſuch as, by ill principles, or
" by ill examples, to croſs our indeavors for their
" pious and virtuous education; ſo, if there ſhall
" be found (for all our care to prevent it) any per-" ſon about our children, or about us (which is " more than you aſk) againſt whom both houſes
" ſhall make appear to us any juſt exception, we
" ſhall not only remove them, but thank you for " the information; only we ſhall expect that you
" ſhall be likewiſe careful, that there be no under-
" hand dealing by any, to ſeek faults to make " room for others to ſucceed in their places.

" For the fifth demand, as we will not ſuffer
" any to ſhare with us in our power of treaties,
" which are moſt improper for parliaments, and
" leaſt of all in thoſe treaties in which we are
" neareſt concerned, not only as a King, but as a
" father, yet we do (ſuch is our deſire to give all
" reaſonable ſatisfaction) aſſure you, by the word
" of a King, that we ſhall never propoſe or en-
" tertain any treaty whatſoever, for the marriage
" of any of our children, without due regard to " the true Proteſtant profeſſion, the good of our " kingdom, and the honor of our family.

" For the ſixth demand, concerning the laws in " force againſt Jeſuits, prieſts and Popiſh recuſants,
" we have by many of our meſſages to you, by
" our voluntary promiſes to you ſo ſolemnly made,
" never to pardon any Popiſh prieſt, by our ſtrict
" proclamations lately publiſhed in this point, and
" by the public examples which we have made in " that caſe ſince our reſidence at York, and be" fore at London, ſufficiently expreſſed our zeal
" herein. Why do you then aſk that in which " our own inclination hath prevented you? And " if you can yet find any more effectual courſe
" to diſable them from diſturbing the ſtate, or
" eluding the law by truſt, or otherwiſe, we ſhall
" willingly give our conſent to it.

" For the ſeventh demand, concerning the votes
" of the Popiſh lords; we underſtand, that they in
" diſcretion have withdrawn themſelves from the " ſervice of the houſe of peers (and had done ſo when
" uſe was publicly made of their names to aſperſe the " votes of that houſe, which was then counted as
" malignant as thoſe who are called our unknown
" and unſworn counſellors are now) neither do we
" conceive, that ſuch a poſitive law againſt the votes
" of any whoſe blood gives them that right is ſo
" proper, in regard of the privilege of parliament,
" but are content that, ſo long as they ſhall not
" be conformable to the doctrine and diſcipline of " the church of England, they ſhall not be ad-
" mited to ſit in the houſe of peers, but only to " give their proxies to ſuch Proteſtant lords as they
" ſhall chuſe, who are to diſpoſe of them as they
" themſelves ſhall think fit, without any reference
" at all to the giver.

" As to the deſires for a bill for the education of " Papiſts, by Proteſtants, in theProteſtant profeſ-
" ſion, many about us can witneſs with us, that
" we have often delivered our opinion, that ſuch
" a courſe (with God's bleſſing upon it) would be
" the moſt effectual for the rooting Popery out of " this kingdom; we ſhall therefore thank you for
" it, and incourage you in it, and, when it comes
" unto us, do our duty: and we heartily wiſh,
" for the public good, that the time you have
" expended in making ordinances without us, had " been imployed in preparing this and other good
" bills for us.

" For the eighth, touching the reformation to be " made of the church-government and liturgy, we " had hoped, that what we had formerly declared
" concerning the ſame had been ſo ſufficiently un-
" derſtood by you, and all good ſubjects, that we
" ſhould not need to have expreſſed ourſelf far" ther in it. We told you, in our anſwer to your " petition preſented us at Hampton-court, the
" firſt of December, that for any illegal innovations
" which may have creeped in, we ſhould willingly
" concur in the removal of them; and if our par" liament ſhould adviſe us to call a national ſynod,
" which may duly examine ſuch ceremonies as
" give juſt cauſe of offenſe to any, we ſhould take " it into conſideration, and apply ourſelf to give
" due ſatisfaction therein; that we were perſuaded
" in our conſcience, that no church could be found,
" upon the earth, which profeſſeth the true reli" gion with more purity of doctrine than the church
" of England doth, nor where the government and
" diſcipline are jointly more beautified, and free
" from ſuperſtition, than as they are here eſta-
